The teaching of Jesus presents the Kingdom of God under a number of aspects, it contains subtleties and shades of thought which cannot be reduced to a single formula. He spoke of the 'mystery' of the Kingdom (Mk 4:11; Mt 13:11; Lk 8:10). It is a heavenly Kingdom that is suggested in the Beatitudes (Mt 5:3-10). 'Rejoice for your reward is very great in heaven' (v 12; cf. Lk 6:20 ff.). The realm of God, something into which one enters and not simply his 'kingship', is indicated, e.g. in Mt 5:20, 'For I tell you that unless your justice abound more than that of the scribes and Pharisees, you shall not enter into the Kingdom of Heaven'. Entry into it is the equivalent of being 'saved' (Mk 10:23 ff.; Lk 18:24 ff.). Moreover the state of soul needful for making entrance is the product, not of nature, but of grace; a spiritual re-birth is demanded (Jn 3:5 ff.). Again the Kingdom has a supra-mundane and eschatological aspect; the just are received into it 'at the end of the world' (Mt 13:40 ff.). The way into this Kingdom, in which an eternal banquet is enjoyed (Mt 8:11; Lk 13:29), is through the Resurrection (Mt 22:30; Mk 12:25; Lk 20:36), and at the time of the Parousia (Mt 25:1-46); after a solemn judgement (v 31 ff.), Jesus will drink anew the fruit of the vine with his own (Mk 14:25; Mt 26:29). The risen just will there lead the lives of angels (Mt 22:30); they will shine as the sun

6254 (Mt 13:43) and enjoy perfect felicity (Mt 5:3 ff.; Lk 6:20 ff.). Thus the Regnum Dei, considered as a divine realm, culminates in the transcendent and eschatological reign of God over his elect in heaven, which is the Kingdom as described in the apocalypses and in rabbinical literature.

● Nevertheless the Kingdom of God is already, at least in part, realized upon earth. 'The Kingdom of God is come upon you' (Lk 11:20). That the true believers in Jesus are already 'in the Kingdom' is clear from Lk 7:28. No doubt it does not yet exist in its full splendour; men cannot point to it, 'Behold here, or behold there' (Lk 17:20-21); but the same verses show that it is already within Israel. Yet the 'Thy Kingdom come' of the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:10; Lk 11:2) tells us that its fruition is still to be looked for in the future. What seems to be suggested, and the lessons of the parables bear this out, is that the coming of the Kingdom means the progressive development of the Kingdom already in being. Nor does this view need to be abandoned in the light of the apparent difficulties arising from such a text as Mk 8:38-39 (cf. Lemonnyer, op. cit., 42; *Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom, 53). We cannot enter into details here concerning the Parousia and the general eschatological teaching of Jesus; but there are good grounds for supposing that he implied that there would be several parousias or 'comings' of the Kingdom, and of the Son of Man, 'in power'—the Resurrection was certainly one of these—before the final coming for the Last Judgement. The close inter-connexion between the eschatological discourses and the predictions of the fall of Jerusalem warrant the interpretation that the coming of the Kingdom 'in power' points to a particular development of the already existing Kingdom of God on earth, a development bound up with the disappearance of the Jewish nation.

† The kingship of God is concerned chiefly with his rulership over the hearts of men, but, as we have already seen, in Mt 16:18-19 God's Kingdom, or Realm, appears under the form of a 'Church', that is, a visible and organized society. Compared to a building, the Kingdom-Church has Peter and the apostles as its foundation (cf. Eph 2:20-21); it is opposed to, and impregnable by, the forces of evil (Mt 16:18). And this close relationship between the Kingdom and Christ's Church emphasizes the still more intimate connexion between it and his own person. Jesus clearly knows himself to be not only the founder of the Kingdom, but the possessor of it; it is his Kingdom as well as the Father's, and he is the Lord and Ruler over it (Mt 13:41; 16:28; 20:21; 25:34, etc.). It is thus closely linked with the OT theocracy, with God's kingship over a chosen people and its exercise through visible representatives. Typically, though imperfectly, shadowed forth in the descendants of David, it is now wholly realized in the Messianic King, by reason of his being completely at one with God (Mt 11:27; Jn 4:34; 5:30; 6:38, etc.). The new theocracy has Christ for its living embodiment; he is the prototype of the new relationship of sonship with God into which men are invited to enter through him. So that, in the profoundest sense, the Kingdom of God may be said to have existed on earth from the first moment of the Incarnation. The full realization of the Kingdom is in the measure of men's union with Jesus, in faith and love, in obedience and submission to his rule, which is the same thing as doing the Father's will, in the ever deepening reality of their vital contact with him, as of branches with their parent vine (Mt 7:21-23; 8:10; 11:28-30; 16:24-25; Jn 15:1-8, etc.). Whence there follows the 'transvaluation of all values' involved in the very nature of the Kingdom. Christ's sovereignty was exercised, not by violence and earthly power, but by lowliness, by service and deeds of mercy, above all, by the invincible witness to truth in the face of a hostile world and at the price of bitter suffering (Mt 11:4-6, 29; 18:3-4; 20:25-28; Jn 18:36-37). So likewise is his Kingdom to be ruled; not by compulsion and tyranny, but by the patient and steadfast testifying to the Gospel, and the all-conquering influence of love over hearts freely submitted to its sway (Mt 22:37-40; Jn 14:15; 15:15).

(b) A very large portion of our Lord's teaching on the Kingdom of God was embodied in parables. Indeed he is acknowledged on all hands to be the supreme master of the art of inculcating doctrine by happy illustrations from the events of everyday life. The term parable means 'a placing of one thing beside another' with a view to comparison. In employing this method Jesus not only conformed to the usage of the Jewish rabbis, but showed his appreciation of the truth that concrete examples are more effective instruments of instruction than abstract principles. Longum est iter per praecepta, breve et efficax per exempla (Sen. Ep. 6). A large proportion of the parables have the Kingdom of God as their theme, though the allusion is clearer in some than in others. The more explicit ones open with the formula, 'The Kingdom of heaven (or 'of God') is like to . . .' Such are the parables of the good seed and cockle (Mt 13:24 ff.); of the grain of mustard seed (vv 31 ff.); of the leaven (vv 33 ff.), and a number of others (vv 44 ff.; Mk 4:26). But the use of parables, which are of a simplicity often more apparent than real, gives rise to two important questions, the answer to which throws much light upon the mission and message of Jesus. How are the parables to be interpreted? And what was their purpose?

It is now generally admitted that the allegorical interpretation to which the parables were submitted by the Church Fathers was not seldom arbitrary and unconvincing. It consisted in taking every term in the story as a cryptogram for an idea, and so decoding the whole term by term. (For a typical example from St Augustine, see his Quaestiones Evangeliorum, 2, 19; paraphrased by Dodd, op. cit., 12.) This method gave scope to much ingenuity, and was even justifiable as a vehicle for the exposition of doctrine valid enough on other grounds, but it gives little help when we are concerned to elucidate the literal meaning of the text. It must, however, be borne in mind that the borderline between a strict parable, a story told to illustrate a single main lesson, and an allegory, containing many significant points, is not always clear-cut. This is evident from those cases in which we have our Lord's own interpretations—see the Sower (Mt 13:4 ff.) and the Tares (Mt 13:25)—where many of their several features are explained. Nevertheless it is probable that the typical parable, whether it be a simple metaphor, or a more elaborate similitude, or a full-length story, presents one single point of comparison; its details are not intended to have independent significance. Thus, in the parable of the importunate friend (Lk 11:5-8), we are not meant to ask who is represented by the friend arriving from a journey, or by the children in bed; these and other details serve merely to build up the picture of a sudden critical need calling for an urgency otherwise untimely and out of place. Even in the Sower the incidental features would seem in the first place to be no more than the setting for a single main picture—that of the vast amount of wasted labour which the farmer must face, and so throwing into relief the satisfaction brought by the harvest, in spite of all.

The remarkable realism and vividness of the parables, their faithfulness to nature, the fact that they are not far-fetched and artificial analogies, are due to the affinity which does in truth exist between the natural order and the spiritual order. The Kingdom of God is, in many respects, intrinsically like the processes of nature and the daily life of men. We may note also, as illustrative of our Lord's pedagogical method, that the parable has the character of an argument, in that it entices the hearer to a judgement upon the situation depicted, and then challenges him, directly or by implication, to apply the judgement to the matter in 6251 hand. A famous example of this is Nathan's story of David (2 Kg 12:1 ff.) about the poor man's ewe lamb which was stolen by the rich man—with its dramatic conclusion 'Thou art the man'. So was it with the parables of Jesus; always there is an underlying question, explicit or implicit. 'What do you think? If a man has a hundred sheep. . . . What do you think? A man had two children. . . . We are invited to a judgement on the imagined situation and so to grasp, by a process of active assimilation, the lesson intended; see Dodd, op. cit., 22-4. Whence we are led to the further question: what was our Lord's motive in teaching by parables?

626a The foregoing remarks have already suggested a partial answer. Jesus, a master of pedagogy, wished to persuade his hearers by evoking an assent based on their own reflexions. But we must note that, while he preached to the multitude in parables, he reserved their explanation to his disciples (Mk 4:33-34; Mt 13:34 ff.). Why did he indulge in this apparent mystification? Not because there was anything esoteric in his doctrine; our Lord had no 'secret' teaching exclusively for the initiated (Jn 18:19-21). His message was for all 'according as they were able to hear' (Mk 4:33). Without doubt, 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear' (v 9); but the implication of this saying is that many would comprehend imperfectly or perhaps not at all (cf. Jn 1:5). Nor need this unresponsiveness always have been due to malice or bad faith. As Grandmaison remarks (Jesus Christ, E. Tr., 2, 41), 'With many of those who heard Jesus, it was less a case of grave sin against the light than an attitude suggested to them and almost forced upon them by the prestige of the scribes and doctors who were enemies of the Gospel. It was a temporary attitude, a heaviness which the leaven of the Gospel could eventually lighten. For such men (and they were legion) this teaching, whose enigmatic nature did not demand—as a clearly expressed instruction would have demanded—the immediate decisions of which they were as yet incapable, this teaching, given in parable and metaphor, though apparently a punishment, was in reality a great act of mercy. They were sent back to wait for a more favourable season, and were not excluded from the Kingdom of God. Meanwhile the idea of the Kingdom was kept before them, and its character explained to them "according as they were capable of understanding."'

b Thus there is disclosed to us a divine forbearance in the ministry of him who would not break the bruised reed or extinguish the smouldering flax (Mt 12:20; Is 42:3). But a dark saying still remains to be explained: 'To you it is given to know the mystery of the Kingdom of God: but to them that are without, all things are done in parables: That seeing they may see and not perceive; and hearing they may hear and not understand: lest at any time they should be converted and their sins should be forgiven them' (Mk 4:11-12; cf. Mt 13:10-17; Lk 8:9-10. On this and the whole question of the parables, see Buzy, Introduction aux Parables Evangéliques, especially 233-86). Here it should be observed that the Semitic idiom, of which the gospel Greek is the expression, finds no place for the distinction, familiar to the Church Fathers and theologians, between what God positively wills and what he permits. To the Jewish mind everything happened because God had so decided, so decreed. But the economy of mercy, which is the Gospel's chief characteristic, as well as the light subsequently thrown on the matter by the theologians (vid. S. Aug., Tract. 53 in Joan., PL 1774 seq.; S. Thom., Expos. in Joan., 12, lect. 7, Parma edit., 10, 519), rules out the possibility of a divine predestining to sin and damnation.

c We must nevertheless not overlook the fact that there is such a thing as the 'hardening of the heart', a sinning against the light which brings with it the penalty of God's withdrawal of grace. Among 'those without' who listened to the parables there were certainly proud and self-interested men determined to resist Jesus at all costs. They could be won over by nothing; therefore their doom was pronounced. Whatever the possibility of a last-minute repentance for individuals, the final consequences of such a general attitude are inescapable; and our Lord was concerned to impress upon his hearers the fearful urgency of his message, not to make allowances for those who rejected it. Set for the rise and fall of many in Israel, he embodied in his own person the most tremendous 'crisis' with which mankind could be presented. Following the method of the Jewish rabbis, he put it before his hearers in those strong contrasting phrases which alone could give expression to it. Moreover the synoptic writers, confronted with the patent results of widespread rejection, had good reason for throwing into the sharpest relief the words of Jesus. St John also, in his sorrowful epilogue to the Public Ministry, records the fulfilment of Isaiah's predictions concerning the blinding of the eyes and the hardening of the hearts (Jn 12:37-41). It was the darker obverse side of the Gospel picture, the dread alternative to the experience of believers: 'Blessed are your eyes because they see, and your ears because they hear' (Mt 13:16).

(c) A word remains to be said with regard to the miracles, or 'signs', which our records show Jesus as having worked habitually throughout his ministry. A discussion on the miraculous as such is outside the scope of this study (see Grandmaison, op. cit., 3, 97-154; Michel, DTC, 10, pt 2, 1798-1859; de Tonquédec, DAFC, 3, 517-78; *Bernard, HDB, 3, 379-96); here we must confine ourselves to a brief note on the fact, the significance, and the purpose of the gospel miracles. (For an acute critique of recent attempts to explain away the miraculous element in the NT, see Allo, Le Scandale de Jésus, 57-100.) In the first place it must be observed that our Lord's miracles form an integral part of the evangelists' story; they have nothing of the character of decorative embellishments; were they eliminated the whole narrative would have to be recast on different lines—a consequence which has been clearly seen, and boldly acted upon, by many modern critics. This notwithstanding, the judgement still remains true that 'we cannot construct a consistent picture of the life of Jesus Christ from the gospels, if we do not take account of his miraculous powers, however those "miraculous" powers are to be explained. . . . We cannot contrive any theory by which we may entirely eliminate the miraculous, and yet save the historicity, in any intelligible sense, of those wonderful narratives' (HDB, 3, 389).

The miracles have often been classified as 'miracles of healing' and 'cosmic miracles'—a division which, though roughly applicable, is not wholly satisfactory. Whether all our Lord's cures are to be ranked technically as 'miracles' depends upon our definition of that term and, in particular, upon the account we give of demoniacal possession, with which so many of his healings were concerned (see Grandmaison, op. cit., 3, 128-40). Among this class we find the cures of the demoniacs (Mk 1:23 ff.; Mt 8:28 ff.; 15:21 ff.; 17:14 ff.), of the impotent man at the Pool of Bethesda (Jn 5:2 ff.), of the man with the withered hand (Mt 12:10 ff.), of the woman with the spirit of infirmity (Lk 13:11 ff.), of the dumb man with a devil (Mt 9:32 ff.), of the man 'possessed with a devil, blind and dumb' (Mt 12:12 ff.). Perhaps even more striking than these, in that they allow less of a 'natural' explanation, are the cases of the centurion's servant (Mt 8:5 ff.), of the palsied man (Mt 9:2 ff.); of the deaf and dumb man (Mk 7:32 ff.), of the blind (Mk 8:22 ff.; Mt 9:26 ff.; 20:30 ff.), and the very remarkable instance, which occasioned such a stir at the time, in Jn 9:1 ff. Here we may note also the cures of the dropsical man (Lk 14:2 ff.), of the fever patient healed with a touch (Mt 8:14 ff.), of the woman with a haemorrhage (Mt 9:20 ff.), of the lepers (Mt 8:2 ff.; Lk 17:11 ff.), and of the servant Malchus (Lk 22:50 ff.). Most arresting of all are the three

THE PERSON AND TEACHING OF CHRIST

f The 'cosmic' miracles, i.e. those worked upon nature as distinct from man, include the first 'sign' of all, the transformation of water into wine at the marriage feast (Jn 2:1 ff.), the stilling of the storm (Mt 8:26) and the walking on the sea (Mt 14:25), the feeding of the five thousand (Mt 14:19) and of the four thousand (Mk 8:1 ff.), and the blasting of the fig tree (Mt 21:19). In addition there are the remarkable 'coincidences' of the great draught of fishes (Lk 5:1 ff. and Jn 21:6 ff.) and the finding of the stater in the fish's mouth (Mt 17:24 ff.). Finally, in a class apart and transcending all others, is the Resurrection of Jesus himself. This was the credential to which the Church continually appealed (Rom 1:4; 4:24; 1 Pet 1:21). Over and above the explicit testimony of the evangelists, the Resurrection is presupposed in all the apostolic epistles; it is likewise the burden of the apostolic sermons recorded in Acts (2:32; 3:15; 10:40; 13:34; 17:3, 31; 26:23). It would be hard to surpass the circumstantiality of St Paul's account of it in 1 Cor 15:3-8 (cf. Rom 8:34; 14:9; 2 Cor 5:15; 1 Thess 4:13). So confident is he, that he appeals to the fact of the Lord's resurrection as a reductio ad absurdum of those who would deny that we too shall rise again (1 Cor 15:13 ff.). It is from the actual historic event that he draws forth its spiritual and symbolic meaning: 'that, as Christ is risen from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we also may walk in newness of life' (Rom 6:4; cf. Phil 3:10; Col 3:1).

627a It should be unnecessary to point out that our Lord was not a wonder-worker, a thaumaturge, in any ordinary sense. This role, precisely the one which the devil had tempted him to assume (Mt 4:3-7), was explicitly rejected by him (Mk 8:11 ff.; Mt 16:4). If there was to come a time when, in a last vain attempt to win over the incredulous, he would point to his wonderful deeds as proof that he came from God—'though you will not believe me, believe the works' (Jn 10:38; cf. Allo, op. cit., 95-6)—he did not parade them in this light, as being, so to say, ocular demonstrations of divinity. Proofs and evidences to the well-disposed they certainly were, and have always been so regarded by the Church; but their probative force is not compelling. Human pride is impervious to the appeal of miracles; in such an atmosphere they can often afford a motive for disbelief. That the miraculous element in the gospels is nowadays sometimes looked upon as an obstacle rather than an aid to faith is no peculiarly modern phenomenon; it was the experience of Jesus himself. His enemies, who could not gainsay the facts, were anxious to ascribe them to the agency of Satan (Mt 12:24). The Galilean prophet might well have cured a man blind from birth; but what of that? The point to consider was that he had offended by doing so on the Sabbath (Jn 9:1 ff.)! Of what use are miracles to this temper of mind?

b The truth is that the miracles are as much, nay more, manifestations of God's love than demonstrations of his power. Power in subordination to love, love declaring itself in power—is the key to the understanding of the miracles. The preternatural works of Jesus were almost without exception beneficent deeds—to alleviate human misery or to further the interests of the Kingdom. They were not arbitrary interferences with the course of nature, a show of divine might without reference to the needs of the situation or the saving character of Christ's mission. On the contrary they were outpourings of God's favour, wholly of a piece with the mercy and loving kindness which received their supreme embodiment in the person of Jesus. For this reason he himself seems almost to make light of his miraculous healings, or to desire at least to keep them secret (Mk 7:36; 8:26); there was a moment when the people would have acclaimed him as the mighty wonder-working Messiah of their earthly expectations (Jn 6:14 f.), and he openly rebuked them for seeing in his miracles no more than the alleviation of material necessities (v 26). Our Lord's wonderful works were thus symbols of God's goodness, and only goodwill could rightly respond to them. Considered as mere evidences, they were not sufficient to produce belief; there was needed also the inward enlightenment of the mind and heart for which they were the occasion. For all the persuasive power of the miracles of Jesus, they would not of themselves have sufficed to make the refusal to accept him inexcusable, had they not been accompanied for the unbelievers by an interior grace of illumination (S. Thom., Expos. in Joan., 15, 5, 4, Parma edit., 10, 573).

From the viewpoint of Christian apologetics it should e be remembered that the supreme motive of credibility is not the miracles, but the personality of him who worked them. This was the influence which could subjugate all hearts, a light irresistibly alluring to those who did not voluntarily close their eyes. The charm and majesty of the mere presence of Jesus, his unblemished purity, the serenity which distinguished him from the OT prophets, the manifest goodness at once so accessible and so resourceful, the incomparable teaching, proclaimed with such divine assurance, in a manner so different from that of the Jewish rabbis—these are what constituted the most impressive 'miracle' of all. Even had there been no miracles men should still have believed in Jesus Christ; for he bore within his own person, and could bring to bear upon the soul, the appeal and illumination of the 'first Truth', loved instinctively by every creature. To resist this inward impulsion is suicide for the intelligence, a sin only to be explained by perversity of heart. 'If any man do the will of him [that sent me], he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself' (Jn 7:17; cf. Allo, op. cit., 93 ff.). Cf. also §§ 87-91.

(d) In this brief note we shall treat exclusively of the d knowledge present to the human mind of Jesus. It should be observed that the Church's magisterium and the dogmatic theologians have laid down certain principles for the guidance of scriptural exegetes (Dz 2032-5; 2183-5). A comprehensive statement of these principles may take the form of the commonly accepted theological thesis that 'the soul of Christ possessed every species of knowledge and human science which accorded with his dignity and are not contrary to the end for which he became incarnate' (Dickamp, Theologicae Dogmaticae Manuale, 2, 312). It is now generally admitted that, in addition to the normal human knowledge acquired from sense experience, our Lord possessed two other forms of knowledge: that gained from God's direct infusion into his mind of ideas or 'species', so giving him an insight comparable to that of the angels, and—most enlightening of all—the knowledge resulting from the direct contemplation of God in the Beatific Vision. For he was a comprehensor as well as a viator; he dwelt in the heights of heaven even while making his journey on earth.

Our Lord's human knowledge, though not amounting e to the omniscience which is the prerogative of the Godhead, cannot be said to have involved ignorance or error; it did not embrace the infinite realm of possibilities known only to the divine mind, but it substantially included all actual events, past, present and to come. Such would seem to be involved in the plenitude of knowledge proper to the Incarnate Word. 'No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him' (Jn 1:18). 'Amen, amen, I say to thee, that we speak what we know and we testify what we have seen' (3:11). The divine authority embodied in Jesus, constituting God's final self-disclosure to the world, demands that we recognize in him unequivocal Truth. He was, as St John tells us, 'full of grace and truth' (1:14); from this there follows the possession of that supreme degree of knowledge which is the 627e basis of our confidence in, and acceptance of, what he taught. This is the source of the otherwise inexplicable self-assurance of Jesus; for all his humble subjection to the Father, he comes before us throughout his ministry as complete master of the situation; there is no hesitation, no uncertainty of touch. He was conscious from the beginning of his Messianic dignity, clearly aware of all that pertained to him as God the Son made man.

f It is clear, however, that our Lord did not always choose to reveal the full content of his knowledge. That he practised a certain deliberate 'economy' in his teaching is evident from Jn 16:12; perhaps the most famous example of this is Mk 13:32: 'But of that day or hour no man knoweth, neither the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but the Father' (on the various interpretations of this text, see Dickamp, op. cit., 322-3; Hugon, Tractatus Dogmatici, 2, 475-7). Briefly it may be said that the Son had not received from his Father the commission to communicate the precise date of the Parousia and from that point of view, the only one which concerned his ministry, was within his rights in professing ignorance of it (cf. Lagrange, Saint Marc, 326-7). Here it may be recalled that the ecclesiastical magisterium has explicitly condemned the proposition that 'the natural sense of the evangelical texts cannot be reconciled with what our theologians teach concerning the infallible knowledge and science of Christ' (Dz 2032); but it should be noted that the Church, by this very declaration, is as much concerned to preserve 'the natural sense of the evangelical texts' as to safeguard the deliverances of theology. Nothing must be allowed to whittle away the clear evidence of Jesus's acquired and experimental knowledge. May it not be that the a priori processes habitual with theologians can make them insufficiently appreciative of what was implied in our Lord's perceptual experience in the workaday world of space and time? Even the youthful St Thomas was disposed to underestimate the reality of Christ's acquired knowledge (In Sent. 3, d. 14, q.1, a. 3, sol. 5), though he afterwards revised his opinion (Summa 3, q. 9, a. 4).

628a However this may be, as a safeguard against the unconscious Docetism into which too concentrated attention on the higher forms of knowledge might lead us, the great text from the Epistle to the Hebrews remains a reminder that our Lord shared the fullness of our humanity: 'he learned obedience by the things which he suffered' (5:8). From boyhood, like the rest of us, he 'advanced in wisdom' (Lk 2:52). As a man, though revealing the keenest natural intelligence and superlative powers of sense observation, as illustrated by the similitudes and parables, he could yet experience wonder (Mk 6:6; Lk 7:9). In all this there was no play-acting; the mind of Jesus was really enlightened by his contacts with nature, with man and human affairs, by a mode of knowledge which had not hitherto been his. That these concepts acquired by his intellect were themselves bathed in a light issuing from the divine sources of knowledge already mentioned we cannot for one moment doubt; but this theological schematization, though valid within its limits, must not be interpreted to mean the monstrosity of a series of wholly distinct departments of knowledge within our Lord's mind. Having all the perfections due to the Incarnate Word, his human consciousness was wholly at one with itself; there were no lines of cleavage, no elements at variance one with another. But into the inner harmonies of the mind of Jesus we cannot presume to enter. We are brought face to face with the legitimate refugium in mysterium, the 'refuge in mystery' which ultimately confronts every believer when contemplating the only begotten Son of God.

b VI The Mystery of Jesus—It has been well said that the gospels portray in Jesus Christ 'a Person who, despite his obvious humanity, impresses us throughout as being at home in two worlds', *Illingworth, Divine Immanence (1904) 50, and cf. Grandmaison, op. cit., 2, 329. He was a man of his age, a pure Jew, with all the ardour and intensity of his race. He was not a 'superman', nor yet, as some have thought, an apparition from some higher realm clothed in human flesh. Everything points to his being a sharer in our common clay. He was tired and hungry, could rejoice familiarly with his friends and weep with them in sorrow; when he chose, he could speak out vehemently against his enemies, yet be prostrated in anguished apprehension at the prospect of his torments. The evidence shows him to have had a mother and near relatives; he plied a trade; there is nothing remote or inaccessible about him. On no reading of his character could he be described as a shadowy and colourless figure; so remarkable was the impression of vitality upon his contemporaries, that they were moved alternatively to worshipping admiration or passionate hatred. In a word, if the colloquialism may be allowed, he was one of ourselves: 'consubstantial (of the same substance) with us according to humanity' (Dz 148).

But together with all this he was immeasurably more. Notwithstanding his approachableness, the disciples, save when they forgot themselves, looked upon him with something akin to awe. There was about his person the fascination of the numinous, the All-Holy was present within him—'Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord' (Lk 5:8). He knew and declared himself to be more than a prophet, which was the highest ideal of manhood in his day; for the prophetic formula 'Thus saith the Lord' he substitutes the ultimately authoritative 'I say unto you'. Nor does he show the least trace of having scaled to these heights as it were from below; in this sense he is no 'hero' who has raised himself, or been raised in the common estimation, above his fellows by his outstanding exploits. The divine quality within him is not the result of an achievement: it is something already given, a fact. The marvellous deeds, the mastery of their performance, the incomparable sayings, embodied though they be in the texture of human life, issue from a source that is more than human; the deep underlying serenity, undisturbed by the surface turmoil and conflict, points rather to the God-head's 'striking downwards' than to a human individual's aspiring to the heights. Jesus acts and speaks as one for whom heaven is his native element, the Deity a personal possession: 'consubstantial with the Father according to divinity'.

d Yet there is no suggestion that divinity and humanity are anything but harmoniously united. Deeds and words, and the whole conduct of the Public Ministry, hold together with utter consistency; never was a life led with more complete unity of purpose. Jesus could experience both depression and elation, but of a 'split personality' there is not a trace. He is equally poised, at one with himself, when being acclaimed by the crowd and when standing before Pilate; the personal 'I' comes as naturally to his lips in the familiar instructions to the disciples as when united in prayer to his heavenly Father; there is one sole ego, in whatever heights or depths it may be said to dwell. How is this duality in oneness to be put into words? 'One person, two natures'—such is the traditional Catholic formula, attempting to express the inexpressible. It is inevitably inadequate to what it represents; nor can any analysis of its terms yield the fullness of the knowledge of Jesus available only in the inspired scriptural texts. The statement is in no sense offered as the conclusion of a demonstration of the truth of the Incarnation; for, as has already been said, this is a mystery of faith not susceptible of rational proof. But it was believed by those responsible for its formulation, as it is held by the vast majority of Christians today, to be a proposition in comprehensible language which does least injustice to the evidence of Scripture. Nor have recent attempts to suggest

6284 alternatives or substitutes given the least grounds for supposing that the modern mind has fundamentally a better understanding of Christ our Lord than the Fathers at Chalcedon. The Catholic formula can be assailed, but, from the nature of the case, it cannot be refuted. The mystery of Jesus remains—a subject more proper for adoring contemplation than theological disputation. It is the supreme glory of the Church to have made full allowance for this mystery : 6284 at one and the same time, guarding the inner secret of the Lord's personality from the desecrating hands of the rationalists and unbelievers, and presenting to the world in intelligible terms the Truth by which alone it may hope to live : ' This is eternal life : that they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent ' (Jn 17:3).

Introduction—The purpose of this article is to try to present the NT data as a whole, in so far as it reveals the life and thought of the early Christians, in the first decades subsequent to our Lord's earthly ministry. Such an approach is in harmony with the most recent trends in biblical scholarship generally, viz. that, instead of looking for the differences between the various books, and even within the same book, one starts with the presumption that this body of writings has, for all its variety, a common source in certain historical facts, and testifies to the emergence of a way of life, of a new outlook on creation and beyond—in fact, to the 'originality' of Christianity. This 'modern' realization of the fundamental unity of our sources (cf. JTS 45 [1944] 85-7) is one of the periodical 're-discoveries' of what Catholics have always taken for granted thanks to their sense of continuity with the past.

This sense of continuity with the past is in fact the key to the way in which Catholics normally come to understand the nature of the Church which Christ founded. They do so primarily from their contact with the living Church of today to which they belong, and they learn not only from what they are told, but from what they see and find out from experience of her; cf. Dz 1793-4. But they can also read and study and analyze the sacred text as if they had not the developed teaching of the Church to fall back upon; in difficulties, they can consult the works of her scholars, which reveal the progress constantly being made in the understanding of the ancient world, as new fields are opened up by archaeology, the study of comparative religions and philosophies, of linguistics, papyrology, and the rest. This progress means a better understanding of the details, but the main lines of the picture remain, and as these often stand out all the clearer under the light of the new evidence, the Church's serene confidence in the truth of the message which she proclaims today is repeatedly vindicated.

Not that the whole of modern Catholic doctrine and practice is to be found within the pages of the NT. Even if all that was said or done in those times had been 630e written down in them, we should not expect to find direct testimony to everything that we now believe and do. If 'Scripture and Tradition' are the sources of our Faith and Catholic life, that life has not been static, but has developed, as all life develops, from the day of Pentecost until now. Nevertheless, if what we now express and do is more, what we have is not other than what the first Christians enjoyed.

d A final word of introduction is perhaps necessary. As Catholics, who recognize the doctrine of inspiration and therefore are assured of the historical accuracy of the NT, we naturally take our four gospels as narrating the earliest events in our period, then the first part of the Acts of the Apostles, then most of the epistles strung along the latter part of the Ac, and lastly the rest of the NT writings. To assess correctly the theories of non-Catholic critics, and indeed to enter into the minds of the NT writers ourselves, we have to remember that the gospels were not written at the precise time when the events were taking place, and that St Luke compiled the first part of the Acts anything up to thirty years after Pentecost. St John wrote his Gospel towards the end of the 1st cent. Those who, for a century and more, have called in question the truth of these accounts, have been using a sound enough principle, viz. that a writer is bound to be affected by his present milieu even when he is trying to record accurately what happened in the past. But not only have many of these critics grossly exaggerated the effect on the NT writers of the development of the Church about them when they were recounting its origins, but, to make such exaggeration plausible, they have always pushed the dates of those writings as late as they possibly could. One of the great merits of the historian *A. Harnack was his refutation of the current dating of the Gospels, which the Tübingen School placed in the 2nd cent., and his assigning to them dates well in the first—though, even so, much later than can reasonably be admitted (cf. The Synoptic Problem, §§ 610–15, and The Chronology of NT times, §§ 674–6). The more modern school of Form-Criticism, while calling attention to some useful features in the construction of the Gospels, makes of these a sort of folk-lore created by the Christian communities around the quite ordinary events of the life of a merely human Christ. It treats the gospels as if they were merely the projection of the religious experience of the communities, and makes little or no account of the decisive part played by those who were the witnesses of the events themselves. This complete inversion of the process which produced the Gospels has, after attracting much attention for some years, met with attacks from so many quarters that its influence is on the wane. Indeed the progress of NT scholarship today is such that our assumption that the Synoptics and the Acts are in substance historically accurate can hold its own whenever the evidence is not parcelled out according to pre-conceived theories but accepted as it stands, its various parts converging in one complex whole.

I THE FIRST THIRTY YEARS

(This section has been put into the mouth of an intelligent, not unsympathetic observer, who, about A.D. 60, has been asked for an account of this new 'Christian' religion.) 'It all began with the young Rabbi from Nazareth, if he could be called a Rabbi at all, for he had been through none of the ordinary training. For all that, he made quite a stir during his short campaign of preaching—two or three years at most, until the opposition of the Jewish religious authorities could stand his unauthorized activities no longer, and they had him executed by the Roman Procurator on a trumped-up charge of fomenting disaffection towards the emperor. This, of course, only shows how powerful had been the effect of his preaching and how widespread his influence had become. The fact was that he knew the mind of the people, and striking a note of authority and independence, searched their hearts implacably, not sparing their prejudices and foibles any more than he did the formalism and hypocrisy of their official leaders. He laid down maxims which he taught them to remember, and illustrated his ideas with telling little stories which generally had much more in them than appeared on the surface, so that they were treasured and repeated by those whose confidence he had won. Free as he was from any violence of gesture, or incitement to mass demonstrations, his open-air preaching in the Galilean countryside, on the mountain slopes or by the lake, recalled the memory of the Hebrew prophets of old. This was enhanced by the perfectly well authenticated stories of the cures which he worked instantaneously on the fever-stricken, the cripples, and the blind, not to mention a few cases of his raising the dead to life. His enemies, of course, put this down to magic or devilry, but this latter accusation, prompted by his strange power with the possessed, was neatly rebutted by his question: 'Can Satan cast out Satan? If a kingdom be divided against itself, that kingdom cannot stand', Mk 3:23–24.

'Whether or not he foresaw that with the manifest antagonism of the Jewish priests and Pharisees he was riding for a fall, it is clear that he made provision that his ideas should be perpetuated and his memory endure. Soon after he had acquired a fairly regular following, he picked out twelve from among them, who by sharing his life and receiving a more thorough instruction and training might carry on his work after him. They were mostly fishermen of no education, only one or two being of a slightly better class. As one might have expected, he had no small trouble in getting them to grasp his own lofty principles; to the very end he had constantly to correct their misconceptions as to the true character of his message, and to help them to an ever truer estimate of the significance of his own life and personality. With one of them he failed completely: the priests bribed him and he enabled them to arrest his Master at dead of night out of sight of the crowds who revered him; but this act of black treachery was almost his last, for remorse and suicide removed him from the scene. The rest of the Twelve, the Apostles as he had called them, thus showing his intention to use them in future missionary work, were utterly devoted to him, and if they were lacking in understanding and unstable in an emergency, he knew he could rely on their love to bring them back sorrowfully but loyally 631b to him. This was particularly true of the one whom he had specially chosen as his deputy and called 'the rock', meaning him to be the foundation of the new brotherhood of his followers, and who in fact took such a leading part in the resurgence of the movement a couple of months after the Rabbi's execution. It is also said that the Rabbi promised that they would each be endowed with that same superhuman power by which he himself had cast out devils and worked his cures.

c 'Certainly the results corresponded with what he seems to have planned for. Unexpectedly, dramatically even, the whole of Jerusalem was one day stirred by the emergence into its streets of some 120 men and women, under the leadership of the original Apostles (their number having been made up to twelve again by a special election), who fearlessly maintained that, so far from having been finally silenced, Jesus of Nazareth had been raised up again from the dead by God, had been seen by them more than once, and was now at the right hand of God, inspiring them to speak what they knew without fear, as all could see for themselves. And they quoted the prophets to show that the whole series of events of the past months had been pre-ordained by God, and that, responsible as the city had been for the murder of him whom they must now recognize to be the long-expected Christ, they should repent and by baptism attach themselves to their company so as to live henceforth as he had instructed them. Of course, many who heard them upheld their first conviction that these men were all drunk, but the fact remains that some 3,000 rallied to them that very day, and a couple of thousand were added to them when their leader, Cephas ('the rock'), cured a cripple in his master's name near the Beautiful Gate of the Temple. It all testifies to the influence which Jesus had really had despite his apparent failure. Besides, there was the fact of the disappearance of his body from its guarded tomb—which the chief priests were unable to explain away—and the number of independent witnesses of his resurrection provided evidence which could not be gainsaid. What is more, Jerusalem was crowded at the time for the feast of Pentecost, so that the pilgrims on returning home prepared the way in far distant parts for the coming of the authorized missionaries later on.

d 'But, in the city, organization began at once. Filled with a strange zeal, most of the new sect began leading a kind of communal life, selling their property and putting the money into the common pool, so that the poor among them were at first well cared for. The deficiencies of the experiment only appeared with time. [See § 660g]. Officials, later called deacons, ministered at the common meals, leaving the Twelve free to devote themselves to their more spiritual ministrations. Preaching went on in spite of the arrest and punishment of the leaders on two occasions; and the particularly outspoken harangue of Stephen, one of the deacons, at his arrest, led not only to his being lynched then and there, but to a general persecution which spread for a while from the city to other centres. The Apostles stayed in Jerusalem, but many others fled and carried with them their new message, so that new centres sprang up throughout all Judaea and Galilee and Samaria, Ac 9:31; there was perhaps one already at Damascus, Ac 9:2, 19. In Palestine the names of Lydda, Joppe and Caesarea occur to one, Ac 9:32, 36; 10:1 ff., and quite early one began to hear of "the churches of Judaea" in general, Gal 1:22. The "Gospel" was also preached in Phœnicia, Cyprus and Antioch, Ac 11:19; 15:3; and this opened a new chapter in the history of the expansion.

e 'For with few exceptions all that one hears of it is connected with the activities of Saul, previously their persecutor, who as Paul has come to be known as the Apostle par excellence. He broke new ground first in his own country of Cilicia, Ac 9:30, Gal 1:21-23, Ac 11:25, whence he was fetched by Barnabas to help in the development of a Church of a new kind, that of Antioch, where for the first time there was a large access of Gentiles, Ac 11:20-26. The 631c three missionary journeys which he undertook from this base cover a period of some ten years, during which time he devoted most attention to southern Galatia, Corinth and Ephesus, the two latter, as cosmopolitan ports, being particularly important for more distant contacts. But he had also preached in Cyprus, later to be developed by Barnabas and Mark, Ac 15:39; founded flourishing churches at Philippi and Thessalonica in Macedonia, and developed, either personally or through his helpers, the growth of Christianity in the province of Asia, the hinterland of Ephesus. He could in fact summarize his labours by saying: "My own work has been to complete the preaching of Christ's gospel, in a wide sweep from Jerusalem as far as Illyricum", Rom 15:19 KNT. Meantime, other missionaries had founded the flourishing Church of Rome to which he addressed these words, and no doubt other churches too of which one hears, though details of their origins are wanting. Certainly, it is an interesting movement, and I should be surprised if it had not a great future before it.'

Of these 'other churches', something can be added I to round off the account of our benevolent observer. Thus the northern parts of Asia Minor are covered by the address of 1 Pet: Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia. But Paul's own work was not completed yet. Besides the incidental preaching he was able to do as a prisoner in Caesarea, Malta and Rome itself, he planned to go to Spain, Rom 15:23, 28, and may well have realized his project, as later evidence suggests (1 Clem. 5 and Frag. Murat. 38-9). He certainly preached in Crete and provided for further developments there, Tit 1:5. No doubt eastern Syria had been evangelized already and perhaps Alexandria and Cyrene. At least centres had been established along most of the Mediterranean littoral before Paul's death, an achievement which speaks highly not only for the devotion of the first missionaries, but for the authenticity and vitality of the religion which they taught.

Conversion to Christianity—If we know something of 632a the geographical spread of Christianity, we have little to enable us to estimate the number of its adherents, after the first days. That it was notable in the various cities can be estimated by the opposition aroused. At Philippi: 'These men are convulsing our city', Ac 16:20; at Thessalonica: they 'have turned the world upside down', 17:6 WV; at Ephesus: 'This Paul, by persuasion, hath drawn away a great multitude, not only of Ephesus, but almost of all Asia', so that there was a great riot, instigated by the silversmiths, whose craft of making models of Diana's temple was 'in danger to be set at nought', Ac 19:24-27; and in Rome the leading Jews, though obviously unacquainted with the doctrines of 'this sect', could at least report that it was 'everywhere decried', Ac 28:22 KNT. Far more important are the questions: why did people become Christians at all, and what did their conversion mean to them?

Though it is true that every conversion is ultimately b something quite personal, and the interplay of grace and circumstances will vary in almost every case, some general indications can be given of the motives of the early converts, whether Jews or Gentiles; of the circumstances which favoured their believing, and of those which formed obstacles to be overcome. Of course, those who lived in Palestine and especially in Jerusalem, and who had thus come under the direct influence of our Lord himself, had special motives not offered to the rest of the world. They had been brought up against the facts in a way that made it impossible to evade them. If the earnestness of the new disciples is patent, one senses the bad faith of those most opposed to them, Ac 4:3, 14-22; 5:17-18, 24, 26, 33, 40; 6:11-14; 7:54, 57-58; 8:1, 3 (cf. 9:5)—also Lk 2:34 (cf. P. Gaechter, The Hatred of the House of Annas, in Theological Studies VIII [1947] 3-34). One cannot therefore reduce the motives of the converts, here or elsewhere, merely to there being 'something in the Christian message which 632b appealed to them : essentially it proclaimed facts which might or might not appeal, but in face of which each must decide what his own attitude should be. Indeed, their objective reality was of a kind that demanded not merely the cold recognition of their truth, but a complete re-orientation of life in response to them, and called therefore for immediate action.

Consequently, any argumentation which the Apostles might use, any miraculous sign which attended their preaching, was no more than paving the way to that essential personal response, not so much to the Apostles' appeal, as to the personal appeal of Christ, manifested in his life, death and resurrection, whereby God was reconciling mankind to himself, 2 Cor 5:19, etc. These were the objective facts to which the Apostles testified : it rested with their hearers to humble themselves beneath the mighty hand of God, that he might exalt them in his own good time ; casting all their care upon him, for he had care of them ; cf. 1 Pet 5:6-7. It meant a recognition and a personal acceptance of Christ and of all his intentions and purposes, a love for him which took the exigencies of his love for granted, and therefore the repudiation of their sinful past as a necessary preliminary. It was all this which the Apostles, following our Lord's teaching, meant when they spoke of Faith—of believing—the faith that finds its expression in love, Gal 5:6 KNT ; cf. BEJC, ch 10. It was of such Faith that our Lord had said : ' This is eternal life : that they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent ', Jn 17:3 ; and St Paul : ' It is only through the Holy Spirit that anyone can say, Jesus is the Lord ', 1 Cor 12:3 KNT.

The Mission in Palestine—It was some such unanalysed process by which the 3,000 Jews were converted on the day of Pentecost. As was suggested above, § 631c, the crowds addressed that day received the full impact of the divine manifestation. The minds of most had already been prepared by our Lord's preaching, and by their own friendly, hostile, or vacillating attitude towards him. And now, they saw these men who had been so cowed since the crucifixion, boldly asserting his innocence and their loyalty to him, challenging thereby the authority of the Jewish leaders who had condemned him. These ' simple men, without learning ', Ac 4:13 KNT, were handling the Scriptures with confidence, and showing them that this Jesus, whom they had crucified, had been raised by God from the dead according to what had been prophesied of the Messias. And that this was no mere fanaticism on their part, but a divinely inspired fervour, was clear from the fact that they spoke in the various languages of their hearers—a sign from God that all should hear them. These Jews then, recalling Jesus's patent goodness, his preaching, his kindly miracles on behalf of the sick and the afflicted, contrasting his modest uprightness with the shameless insincerity of the charges made against him, and above all conscious of their own share, great or small, in the responsibility for his cruel death—no wonder that their consciences were stung, and that they turned to Peter and his fellow-Apostles and asked them what they should do. ' Repent, Peter said to them, and be baptized, everyone of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, to have your sins forgiven ; then you will receive the gift of the Holy Spirit ', Ac 2:37-38 KNT.

It is clear that, so far as rested with the Apostles and their future helpers, it was the presentation of Christ's life, death and resurrection as the long-awaited fulfilment of the ancient prophecies, which was to be their most cogent argument with the Jews. But as the Jewish expectation had been for a ' redemption ' and a ' kingdom ' of a very different sort, the Holy Spirit came to the assistance of the Apostles with miracles of many kinds to bear witness to the divine favour which their ministry enjoyed ; cf. Heb 2:3-4. There was the healing of the cripple at the Beautiful Gate, Ac 3 ; cf. 4:30 ; and there were the many miracles wrought by the hands of the Apostles, so that men hurried out their sick into the streets that Peter's mere shadow might fall across them and cure them, and sick and possessed were even carried in from the neighbouring town to be healed, Ac 5:12-16. All these happenings would be referred to, later, in confirmation of their own witness to Christ's life and resurrection, and would in their turn serve as ' motive ' for men's turning wholeheartedly to Christ. Nor did such miracles stop there. A few of those recorded in the Acts may be recalled here : the deliverance of the Apostles from prison, 5:19-25, as also that of Peter alone later, 12:6-11 ; the great wonders and signs of Stephen, 6:8, and his ecstatic vision of ' the heavens opened and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God ', which so exasperated his judges and earned for him the first martyr's crown, 7:55 ff. ; Philip's cures in Samaria of the possessed, the paralytic and the lame, and the manifestations there of the Holy Spirit at the prayer of Peter and John—important as an offset to the ' spiritualism ' of Simon the magician, 8:6-13, 14 ff. (cf. 10:44-48 ; 19:6) ; at Lydda, St Peter's cure of Aeneas the paralytic, and at Joppe, his raising of the pious Tabitha to life, 9:32-41—primarily simple acts of kindness, it would seem, yet potent on the minds of the inhabitants, 9:42.

One must not belittle the importance of these ' signs and wonders ', but equally one must not exaggerate the part which they played in the work of conversion, any more than we should exaggerate that of our Lord's own miracles, cf. Jn 4:48 ; 20:29 ; also Mk 13:22 ; Apoc 13:13-14 and BEJC, 457-62. Many as they appear when thus collected together, they were in fact only occasional—spread over a considerable time and space—in comparison with the constant preaching of the Apostles, so that many of their converts will never have actually seen a miracle—and it is always easier to evade a report than to repudiate a personal experience. Consequently, it was chiefly the preaching itself of the word, and the unconscious example of the Apostles and their disciples in their life together (cf. §§ 636-7) which, with the grace of the Holy Spirit, turned the hearts of their hearers to Christ, and made Christians of Jews and Gentiles alike (Mt 7:15-20 ; 12:33-37 ; and Ac 20:18-21, 31-35 ; and passim in St Paul).

The Mission in Gentile Lands—Our Lord's last words had set the programme : ' You shall be witnesses unto me in Jerusalem, and in all Judaea and Samaria, and even to the uttermost parts of the earth ', Ac 1:8. They had not looked beyond the immediate task before them, nor indeed had he told them either when they should begin to ' make disciples of all the nations ', Mt 28:19 WV, nor on what conditions the Gentiles should be admitted into the Church. They could wait on events, relying on the guidance of the Holy Spirit. It was only after some ten years that the visions and other signs, attending the conversion of Cornelius, intimated to Peter, and through him to the mother Church of Jerusalem, that Gentiles might be received without circumcision and the other peculiarly Jewish practices, Ac 10-11:18 ; and it was another ten years—after the first successes at Antioch and after Paul's first mission to Cyprus and the cities of Galatia—that this was publicly recognized as a general principle, Ac 15.

The importance of this recognition for the Gentile mission cannot be exaggerated. Hitherto it had been taken for granted that the Jewish religious customs should be preserved except where they had been explicitly modified by our Lord, and that a Gentile would have to adopt them if he came to believe in Christ. And as hitherto many devout ' God-fearing men ' (cf. 13:16 etc.) had come to believe in the God of the Jews and in his promises, but had been deterred from full participation by the requirement of circumcision and of their many taboos, so now they will at first have listened wistfully to the announcement of the Messias' actual coming and still have felt unequal to the sacrifice. To such as these the door was now opened, and they had a dauntless champion in Paul, who would brook no attempt on what he called the liberty which 633b they enjoyed in Jesus Christ, Gal 2:4 KNT. He indignantly rejected the accusation that he was making things too easy for them, and merely courting the goodwill of men, 1:10; there was a principle at stake, the nature of which had, at least now, been made patent to all. It affected the presentation of Christianity to the Jews themselves. For St Paul was the first who, to the argument that the prophecies had been fulfilled in Jesus, added the further fact that 'in him everyone that believeth is justified from all those things from which ye could not be justified by the Law of Moses', Ac 13:38 WV. Implicit as it had been before, the radical inefficacy of the Law now took a central position in the apostolic witness to Christ, as they proclaimed to the Jews the absolute necessity of his grace.

c If this had a place in the message to the Gentiles too, it was only a subordinate one of explanation, when they were being introduced to the Scriptures and to the historic background of Jesus, and when the relationship of Christianity to Judaism was explained to them. What was inevitably central was the Person of Jesus Christ, depicted above all as crucified, and thereafter raised from the dead and one day to return to judge the deeds of men, Gal 3:1; 6:14; 1 Cor 1:23; 2:2; Ac 17:31; Rom 2:12-16; 14:9-12; cf. 2 Cor 5:10; 2 Tim 4:1, etc. At Athens, St Paul approached his subject by an appeal to the spirituality and transcendence of God, Ac 17:22-27; cf. 14:15-17, and to memories of poetical intuitions of God: 'In him we live and move and have our being'—for we are also his offspring', Ac 17:28; but his poor success there led him to concentrate on the great central message of salvation through the historic deeds of Christ; discarding the wisdom of the world for the foolishness and the weakness of God, 1 Cor 1:17-25; 2:1-5.

d As in the Palestinian days, so now, far afield, the preaching was supported by occasional miracles, Ac 13:8-12; 14:8-18; 14:19-20; 16:16-34; 19:11-20; 28:3-6, cf. Mk 16:18; Ac 28:8-10. But it is clear enough that neither Paul nor the others relied on such interventions. (At Corinth, where he spent 18 successful months, no miraculous cures are recorded.) He relied on his own example of charity and hard manual work to supplement the spoken word: he would at times appeal to these later (e.g. 1 Thess 1:5-6; 2:1-12; 1 Cor 4:1-4, 9; 11:1), and if he wanted to invoke God's intervention, he always had the story to tell of his own conversion: Ac 9; 22; 26, and often referred to it in his epistles, from Gal 1:13-16 to 1 Tim 1:12-17. So much, then, we may glean of the character of the first impact of Christianity on the Jewish and Gentile minds of the time. Its force can be estimated only against the background provided by three of the preceding articles: The History of Israel, 130 B.C.-A.D. 70, §§ 69 ff.; The Jewish World in NT Times, §§ 584 ff.; The Pagan World in NT Times, §§ 597 ff.

e The obstacles which it had to overcome were many and various. The Jews not only had to spiritualize their ideas of the Messianic Kingdom, but to acknowledge a suffering Messiah, 1 Cor 1:23; § 642g-j. (One way in which this 'stumbling-block' may have been removed has recently been suggested in terms, however, perhaps too exclusive. 'Only upon the interpretation of that judicial murder on Calvary as the deliberate offering of the Messianic Sacrifice by the Messianic High-priest was any proclamation of Jesus as Messiah by or to Jews possible at all', *Gregory Dix in The Apostolic Ministry, ed. K. E. Kirk [1946] 247-8.) Besides this scandal of the cross, their fierce national and cultural isolationism soon felt a like scandal at the admission of Gentiles on an equality with themselves—and, in the Gentile cities, at the speedy predominance of the Gentile element, with its consequent depreciation of 'the custom of our fathers', cf. Ac 21:21; 28:17.

f But, quite obviously, the obstacles to conversion were even more numerous among the Gentiles. Idolatry, in all its forms, public and private, filled the air they breathed; cf. Rom 1:23. State occasions, holidays, military life, celebrations of all kinds were unthinkable without their appropriate acts of worship and sacrifice, cf. 1 Cor 8; 10:14-11:1 and § 600h. To the great gods of the Greco-Roman pantheon were now being added, even in the West, the divinities of the imperial house, so that observance of the State religion became more than ever identified with civic loyalty. This may have had a genuine hold on the masses, but even those who had little respect for the gods were not necessarily any nearer to Christianity. On the contrary. The general religious scepticism of the educated classes, the widespread pessimism and escapism of the times, the licentiousness, whether cloaked in religious respectability or naked and unashamed, the cruelty and rapacity—characteristics only rarely mitigated by some nobler or gentler qualities to be found in the best Roman and Hellenist types—all these (cf. Rom 1:26-32) militated against serious attention being paid to the outpourings of a Levantine babblers, who made tents for a living. Moreover, no sooner had he secured a group of adherents, than he was liable to assault from interested parties, who might raise the cry that these Jews were 'recommending customs which it is impossible for us, as Roman citizens, to admit or to observe', Ac 16:21 KNT, or even that 'all these folk defy the edicts of Caesar'; they say that there is another king, one Jesus', Ac 17:7.

This accusation of political ambitions, echoing the g accusation made during the Passion, was natural and spontaneous in a pre-Christian atmosphere, when it was taken for granted that the omni-competent State controlled, and in great part initiated, all religious manifestations. Christ's disjunction of the things that were God's from those that were Caesar's—an unparalleled innovation at the time (cf. J. Lecler, L'Eglise et la Souveraineté de l'Etat [1946], esp. 18-22)—was blackest heresy and rebellion; it was a captious distinction, subversive of the State. How great was this obstacle, not merely as an inflammatory slogan, but as setting the whole machinery of State power in motion against the Christians, the next 250 years were to show. Already in NT times, when emphasis on the responsibility of Rome for the judicial murder of Christ could scarcely be avoided (cf. *S. Liberty, 'The Importance of Pontius Pilate in Creed and Gospel', JTS 45 [1944] 38-45), the Apostles were at pains to clarify the Christian attitude and to show not only that the Christians were loyal subjects of Caesar, but that the Roman officials, once they had understood their case, had treated them so far with toleration, and indeed with friendliness, Rom 13:1-8; 1 Tim 2:1-4; Tit 3:1; 1 Pet 2:13-17 (cf. Prat, II, 321-6 [1927 ed.]). Thus Ac, probably intended, in part at least, as an historical apologia for Paul as he awaited his trial in Rome, conveys a very favourable impression of the Roman officials with whom he had come in contact). The optimism which this implied persisted e.g. in Clement's prayer for the ruling powers—in spite of Nero and Domitian—and even later (cf. 1 Clem 61). On the other hand, the fearsome descriptions of the almost contemporary Apoc, were perhaps needed to remind the faithful that State persecution had been foretold by our Lord, Mt 10:18-20; Lk 12:11-12; 21:12-15; cf. In 15:18-20; 16:20-22, 33; and § 660s-u.

Telling against the acceptance of Christianity in a h more personal way, were those half-religious, half-family or social customs which were interwoven with everyday life, and to which the more conservative spirits were piously attached. To become a Christian was to ostracize oneself in one's own home or set. As to the Mystery Religions (§§ 599a-d, 645d) and the multitude of small semi-religious guilds (in some of which national and even class distinctions were done away with), they expressed and responded to the gathering need of something more personal in religion than the official cults had ever provided. The Mysteries, in general, encouraged the sense of need for purification, promised a personal immortality and made use of secret symbolic rites and 'dramatic' representations, which may well 633h have made a deep impression at the time of initiation (cf. L. de Grandmaison, S.J., Jésus-Christ [Eng. trans. 1934] III, 349-72; 319-46, etc.). The small religious guilds will have encouraged a fraternal atmosphere among their members and revealed to them the unexpected pleasure of comradeship across the barriers maintained in ordinary life. Both types can be seen as providential preparations for Christianity, with its doctrines of sin, redemption and immortality, its sacraments and the 'comprehensiveness' of its membership—its cohesion through charity. On the other hand, the secrecy and the emotionalism on which they were based, and the fact that, up to a point, they did satisfy a need hitherto unprovided for, will have so attached their members to them, that their minds were closed to further religious search: their 'religious experience' would be proof even against a religion which actually met their deepest, if unappreciated, needs to the full. Those who did come from the Mystery Religions to Christianity may appear to us to have found in them a preparation for their new faith; while still under their spell, they did not feel it so. But the crucial obstacle was that, while all these 'mysteries' and guilds were compatible with the official and in fact with any other kind of religion (§ 600a), Christianity was all-inclusive, allowing no religious side-lines for the adventurous individualist. It demanded a renunciation never insisted on before.

1 Such, in brief, were some of the chief influences which we can discern at work during the first thirty years, facilitating or impeding the acceptance of Christianity. The success actually achieved by the Apostles' preaching depended less on the exterior conditions of the time than on the plain truth of the 'good news', the Gospel, which they preached, i.e. the life and death of Christ with all its cosmic implications. It was not the beauty and sublimity of a moral ideal which converted men; it was the revelation of God's love, made concrete for us on the cross and authenticated by the resurrection, which was recognized to be true, and which therefore challenged them to respond becomingly. It was no philosophical system that had been devised by men (cf. 1 Cor 1:18 ff.; Justin, Apol. I, 14, 5); it was no myth which by its symbolism put beautiful thoughts into the minds of the initiates; it was historical facts, playing out a divine drama in the very midst of mankind and directed towards their hearts, which ultimately motivated the conversion of such numbers of Jews and Gentiles of every type, and were at the root of the subsequent growth and persistence of the Christian Church.

634a The Individual—Before asking what were the doctrines which so inspired the early Christians, cf. §§ 640-54, it is necessary to consider in what setting they were learnt. Otherwise it might be thought that the essence of Christianity consisted in believing certain 'doctrines', and that the Church came into being by the subsequent coming together of those who were so like-minded, cf. § 655a. Such an individualist conception of Christianity would overlook the concrete reality of the setting in which the early Christians found themselves from the first. In fact, to try to distinguish between what Christianity meant to the new converts as individuals, and what it meant to them as members of a body, is not so easy as one might expect. The response to the first preaching, the compunction, the request for Baptism and the open witnessing to Christ made when receiving it, these were all certainly the individual's own acts, but they were stimulated by the preacher or by the example of men already Christian. In the very act of reception, he was received into the body of the faithful, and even his most personal actions, his private prayer, his self-denial or all those things 'done in secret' according to our Lord's commands, Mt 6:3-4, 6, 18; cf. 1 Cor 14:28; 1 Pet 3:4, became indissolubly connected with the whole life of the Christian community. Ever since Pentecost, it was not a question of individuals, who had come to believe in Christ, banding themselves together so as to form a 'Church'; it was a question of the Church, which had then come into being, gathering into her already existing life new members who were thus admitted to share in it, (cf. *O. Cullmann, 'Le Baptême—agrégation au Corps du Christ', in Dieu vivant, 11, 45-66; cf. § 650m).

But if the distinction between the 'individual' and the 'community' is in part an artificial one, so that neither can be adequately treated without the other, it remains true that the acceptance of the 'good news', the self-commitment, and the obligations undertaken were intensely personal—as was indeed, thereafter, the sharing in the life of the community itself. A short outline of the personal response of the individual to the appeal of Christ's personality and work at the very beginnings, will prepare for the consideration of the individual within the community, §§ 635-9; cf. §§ 655-60.

The first Christians, being Jews by race and upbringing, were naturally in the first place seized by the realization that Jesus of Nazareth was their Messiah, the Christ, after all. The tension of expectation, which for so many centuries had supported and yet tried them by its very length, was suddenly resolved, and a flood of joy filled their hearts. What they knew of his life, his goodness and his miracles, had prepared the way for the recognition of the truth; now, the manifestations of Pentecost and the witness borne by his closest disciples to his resurrection and ascension, removed all hesitations—reversed, all the more completely, their possibly adverse estimate of him which his humiliations and crucifixion had provoked. As he had conquered death, so now was he sitting at the right hand of God, and would return on the clouds of heaven for the judgement of the whole world. Such was the first κρίσις, the first apostolic preaching (cf. *C. H. Dodd, The Apostolic Preaching, 1936) in its briefest outlines, but in what a new light did Jesus's life appear now, and what a transformation did their understanding of the Sacred Books undergo! The chaotic, contradictory-seeming prophecies and types of the Messias found their unified realization in him: what had been taken literally was now seen to be fulfilled in a higher, spiritual way; what had been overlooked—the suffering servant, for instance—was now seen to be central, Is 42:1-4 and Mt 12:16 ff.; Is 61:1 and Ac 4:27; and many things which had seemed to be but accidental details in their history, became types of realities 'fulfilled' in him. This mutual illumination of the life of Jesus and their memories of the past, not only acted as a guarantee to them of the reality of his Messiahship, but intensified their certitude of God's loving care of his Chosen Race throughout its history, of which now they were participating in the undreamt-of culmination. Truly could they now appreciate all that he had told them of 'their Father who was in heaven', e.g. Mt 6; 7:7-11. The first Gentiles to become Christian had, themselves, so much of the Jewish background; even the sheer pagans who, very soon, began to come, were introduced to that background, so that without the travail which the Jew must go through, the Gentile too could come to appreciate the economy of the divine condescension and his own inclusion in the new non-racial 'Chosen People'. With their distinct antecedents, both faced the same Jesus who 'went about doing good', Ac 10:38, the same divine intrusion in history.

Repentance for the past, absolute faith and confidence for the future formed the natural response evoked by this divine initiative. Let the Apostles and his other close friends tell them more of him, tell them what to do. And so they learned and practised. Baptism first, then the 'breaking of the bread' which he had told them to do 'in commemoration of him'. Hereby they became 'partakers of the body of the Lord', yielding themselves to his now hidden influence to make them 'put on his mind', 'put him on', so that they too might live as the sons of God, which they had become by Baptism. They must leave their old life, with its sins and concupiscences and darkness, and come into the light shining upon them from the face of Christ, led 684d by the Spirit in fulfilling all things whatsoever he had commanded. Their new life opened up vistas of unbounded possibilities: they could, and must, grow in the knowledge of Christ, cf. Eph 4:12-16; Phil 1:9-11. If to all had been preached 'a Christ crucified', the implications, the hidden depths of this were not to be appreciated in a day. If all had undergone a radical, divinely wrought transformation, if to all could be rightly attributed the title of 'saints', that gave to each new capabilities and responsibilities. Each, in his own measure, must 'live up to' what had been done for him, and 'realize' his own capacities to the full.

e Each had received an earnest of what he might expect, each was encouraged by the fact that Christ 'was offered because it was his own will', that 'he was wounded for our iniquities . . . by his bruises we are healed', and that he had 'given his life a redemption for many', Is 53:7, 5; Mt 20:28. It was the love of him and the hope that he inspired, which roused them to follow his example along the narrow way, as also his assurances that there would be much treasure laid up for them in heaven, Mt 10:38; 16:24; 7:13-14; 4:12; 6:20; 19:21; cf. Lk 10:20. Not at once would they analyse out all the elements of their new life in Christ: all they felt was that it sprang from what they knew of him, what he had shown himself to be despite all appearances to the contrary, and for that reason they could compendiously sum up their response to him in the one word, Faith in him. Faith could not but 'work by charity', Gal 5:6, and if the works of the Law were impotent to achieve justification, Rom 3:19 etc., Faith understood in that pregnant sense, could do so, and thereafter pursue its own law, Rom 3:27; 8:2, 7 etc. (cf. Prat, I, 172-4; 180-1; II, 311-21), accomplishing its own works, since faith if it have not works is dead in itself (cf. Jas 2:14-26; §§ 643i-k, 647h-n, 648l-n).

II THE COMMUNITY OF THE FAITHFUL

685a This personal, individual life, though based on the fuller understanding of the first Commandment of the Law which our Lord had revealed both in his own actions and in his teaching, is no more than an abstraction when considered apart from the realities of concrete life, and cannot itself be fully realized apart from the second 'which is like unto the first': 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself', Mt 22:36-39. Indeed, not merely historically, but in the very nature of things, to follow Christ meant joining others who were already following him, and it therefore involved entering into a whole system of relationships already established among them. The new disciple, who joined the Christians of his town or city, found himself received into a company of men and women united not only by their common faith and worship, but also by a certain general goodwill, an interest in one another's good, Phil 2:4, a mutual helpfulness in which he was now privileged to share. As he found himself receiving much from them, so was he encouraged in his turn to give, 1 Pet 4:8-11: to enter into this new life where the principle, if not always the practice, was to look not to their own ends, but to those of Jesus Christ, cf. Phil 2:21. But despite his new realization of the Father's love revealed in Christ, despite his new love for Christ and his efforts to put on that mind which was his, and despite the promptings and help of the Holy Spirit which he could not deny, he found the 'old man' strong within him still, and mutual criticism, back-biting, if not open disputes, 1 Cor 1:11 etc.; 2 Cor 12:20; 1 Pet 2:1 (cf. Jas 4)—to mention only less grievous failings—still came easily or were easily joined in. Only by seeing the day-to-day life of his immediate Christian surroundings in a wider setting, would he be enabled to hold his own against that life of the flesh, that spirit of the world on which he had thought to turn his back for good. This was provided by the bold teaching which completed what he knew of his union with God through Christ in the Holy Spirit, and which laid down for all the principle of unity in charity, the positive practice of 'peace' among themselves. Out of the fact that he now was living by the life of Christ rather than by his own unaided powers, came the natural corollary that his fellow-Christians were living by that same life too, that he and they were all 'in Christ'.

The reality of this, itself as mysterious and elusive to the mind of the natural man (ψυχικός) as was the reality of his personal union with Christ, was inculcated by a variety of metaphors. None of these, by itself alone, quite covered the whole truth, and they only combined up to a point, but between them they provided a vast field for meditation and gratitude and joy, and at the same time an incentive to action which in its turn deepened the realization of the mystery. Unity based on charity was meant to exist, and indeed already existed, radically, not only among the Christians he knew but among all Christians wherever they might be. For all were 'in Christ': they formed the living body of Christ; each being united to him by his Spirit, they were all united to one another as members of his body, he being at once their Head and continuing to live his life in and through them too. If each personally was to grow into the likeness of him who was the image of the invisible God, Col 1:15, so was each to grow within his body, subservient to and also subserving the good of the whole. That process was going on all the time, and must go on; purification, mortification of the flesh (if the spirit were not to be done to death by its warring members), and in all activities an ever greater docility to the indwelling of the Spirit, according to the capabilities of each and to the needs of the other members; a process never done with, for its term must be the re-presentation of Christ in the perfection of order prevailing among his members—a maturity measured by the flawless perfection of Christ himself, cf. Eph 4:13. (The crystallization of the mystery in the form: 'the body of Christ' was due to St Paul. For a close discussion of its genesis and purport cf. L. Malevez, S.J., 'L'Eglise, corps du Christ' in Science Religieuse [war-time RSR 1944] 27-94.)

The same reality was represented in two other metaphors both closely allied to the first, and each mixing unawares with it: that of a building—and in particular a sanctuary like that of the Holy of Holies—and that of the bride of Christ. The conjunction of the ideas of the Body of Christ and of a sacred building goes back, it seems, to Christ himself. It would have been difficult to guess what really underlay the garbled saying of Jesus which the false witnesses attributed to him, Mt 26:61; Mk 14:58; but St John gives us both his words and their significance: 'Destroy this sanctuary and in three days I will raise it up', Jn 2:19—'He spoke of the sanctuary of his body', 2:21 (cf. A. M. Dubarle, O.P., 'Le Signe du Temple' [Jn 2, 19], RB 48 [1939] 21-44).

The memory of these words, 2:22, enabled the first Christians to add fresh developments to their understanding of the sacred ties that bound them to one another—along with and beyond those provided by the idea of their being the members of the body of Christ. The Spirit coming with love-streams into their hearts, Rom 5:5; Gal 4:6, already suggested that they were, each of them, a sanctuary of the Holy Spirit, 1 Cor 3:16-17; 2 Cor 6:16-18 (cf. 1 Cor 6:19, of their own bodies); now they could see themselves as living stones being shaped to fit into one another to build up and adorn a new sanctuary (ναός, not ιερόν)—and all the numerous associations of the word would give to Jew and Gentile alike a fresh appreciation of the sacred character of their mutual relations already implied, under another aspect, by the idea of their being the Body of Christ (cf. Eph 2:14-22: Jew and Gentile reconciled in the flesh of Christ—making one body—built together upon and in Christ to form a holy sanctuary, the dwelling of God; and especially 1 Pet 2:5, in its context). Thus in their common develop-d The danger of a sort of 'Pan-Christism' following from their being the 'members of Christ' was probably remote enough: it was in fact eliminated by the insistence that Christ was the Head of the Body, and that among the stones which made up the sanctuary, he was the one which crowned the summit. (Cf. KTW I, 792-3, ἀκρογωνιαίος, and especially PEQ July-Oct 1946, 103-15, Edwin E. Lebas, 'Was the Corner-Stone of Scripture a Pyramidion?' for the rich implications of the true meaning). This combination of identity and difference is perhaps most strongly brought out in the 'Bride of Christ' metaphor (cf. Is 62:5; Os 2:19-20, and Malevez, 81 [§ 635b]). In the OT, the marriage-idea was not uncommon to express the relation between God and his chosen people, but it was practically confined to the correlative ideas of God being a jealous God and of Israel being either faithful or adulterous. That the Christians constituted the Body of which Christ was the Head, suggested a richer development of thought which left the old in the background (however cf. 2 Cor 11:2-3); the wife was subject to her husband as to her 'head', 1 Cor 11:3; Eph 5:23, and yet he looked upon her as 'bone of his bones and flesh of his flesh', Gen 2:23, the two being 'in one flesh', ib. 24; so too while the Christians as a whole were subject to Christ as to their Head, they were made to realize that as 'members of his body, of his flesh and of his bones', they were the object of his special love and self-sacrifice in the task of their purification by him, cf. Eph 5:22-32.

635e ment the Christians could see Christ at work rebuilding the sanctuary of his Body (in Jn 2:19 and Rom 4:25 the same word [ἐγείρω] is used of raising up the sanctuary and of Christ's rising [from the dead] for our justification—δικαίωσιν not δικαιοσύνην); and as they knew his life to be in them, they must co-operate with him in the building. The idea became so familiar for expressing all the influence for good which they might have on one another, that the word 'building' by itself could stand for all—a use which survives with a now weakened sense in the word 'edifying'. Some of the ways in which the idea was woven into the texture of their minds will appear below; (cf. Prat, I, 302-7, § 660).

e These highly spiritual conceptions—to which should be added the relation of the vine to the branches (if recorded only by St John, Jn 15:1 ff., not for that reason remembered by him alone)—were not relegated to the sphere of speculation, but were made to enter into their practical daily lives. No doubt their application to Jewish life alone or to pagan life alone would in either case have meant a revolution of outlook and practice: but besides they challenged the historic antagonism which divided the Jewish world from the Gentiles. Racial exclusiveness, the consciousness of a cultural tradition of divine origin, higher moral standards—all tended to make the Jew look upon the non-Jews as 'sinners' par excellence, cf. Gal 2:15; while the Greco-Roman world of the time looked on the Jews as at best a nuisance for their narrowness, and at worst the scum of the earth. Both had now to learn to live together 'in Christ', for Christ had broken down the barrier that separated them, replaced their age-long antagonism by his peace, uniting them to God by his Blood on the Cross, and so of the two creating a new man by their reconciliation in his one Body, Eph 2:13-16. They must face the world together as one man: the world before knew 'the Jew'; let it now know 'the Christian'.

f The importance of this Christian unity manifests itself in the very language of the NT. A study of the uses of the word 'Communion' will show how active was the idea from the very first and how deeply rooted it became wherever the Church established itself.

636a Communion manifold—Those entering the Pentecostal community found themselves sharing a life in common: 'They were persevering in the doctrine of the Apostles and in the communion: the breaking of the bread and the prayers. . . . All they that believed were together and had all things common', Ac 2:42, 44. On the day which recalled the giving of the Old Law the Holy Spirit had taught them the meaning of Christ's new commandment 'that you love one another as I have loved you', Jn 15:12. As St Paul would say: 'The love of God has been poured out in our hearts by the Holy Spirit which we have received', Rom 5:5, KNT (ἐκρέω as in Ac 2:17; 33a; Tit 3:6; cf. Jl 2:28). In descriptions of the first congregation the word 'unanimous' constantly recurs, Ac 1:14; 2:46; 4:24; 5:12; 15:25; cf. MMV, ὁμοθυμαδόν. From interior union of heart and soul, 4:32, flowed exterior union: they lived 'all together' (ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ, 2:44, 47) exemplifying and fulfilling that perfection in unity for which their Lord had died and prayed, Jn 11:52; 17:23; 1 Jn 5:8; cf. DBV(S), Eglise, 600-1. He had asked for it 'that the world may believe that thou hast sent me', Jn 17:21, 23, and the sight of this united congregation, living in the manner of his disciples a common life of faith, prayer, sacrifice, praise, love and practical charity under the direction of the Apostles, reinforced the witness of the latter's preaching and miracles so as to win 'goodwill with all the people', the Lord adding converts daily 'to the same unity', Ac 2:47; cf. 5:13b; Pet 2:12; 3:16.

The words 'communion' (κοινωνία), 'companion' b (κοινωνός), the verb 'to have communion in' or 'partake of one undivided thing' (κοινωνέω) and its practical synonym 'share with those who also have their shares' (μετέχω with its derivatives (cf. Lk 5:7, 10; 2 Cor 6:14; Heb 2:14; MMV, 350, 351, 405, 406; KTW, III, 789-810 and esp. the profound study by *L. S. Thornton, The Common Life in the Body of Christ) are rendered in our versions by fellowship, communion, communication, participation, partners, sharers, partakers, etc. This variation fits the shades of meaning in the contexts, but the original repetition of the words showed how that meaning expanded with the Christian life. We can trace the expansion from the moment when Peter, with James and John, his 'sharers in common' in the fishing business leave all things to follow the call of Jesus, Lk 5:7, 10, to when Peter's Second Epistle tells Christians that in accordance with the promises of him who has called us we have become 'sharers in common' in the divine nature, 2 Pet 1:3, 4; cf. Chaine, Les Épîtres catholiques, 40-3. For everything belonged to those who were Christ's: Paul, Peter, the world, life, death, things present and things to come, 1 Cor 3:22, 23. The 'Communion' of the Christians was therefore far deeper than the 'communism' of goods in some philosophic brotherhood. 'It was the sharing of a common life whose source was in God', Thornton, 6. It was a communion, sharing with Christ and one another in everything divine and human. Communion of life with Christ is 'the master idea, one might almost say the unique idea' of the first Epistle to the Corinthians, who had been 'called through God into the communion of his Son', 1 Cor 1:9 (cf. Allo, Sec. ép. aux Cor., 343). Therein was 'communion in the Gospel', Phil 1:5 (cf. 1 Cor 9:23); 'communion of spirit', Phil 2:1; (cf. Heb 6:4); 'communion of faith', Phm 6 (cf. Tit 1:4; Rom 1:12); 'communion of the sufferings of Christ', Phil 3:10; 1 Pet 4:13 (cf. 2 Cor 1:7). In common they shared Christ himself, Heb 3:14, and his promise, Eph 3:6, grace, Phil 1:7 (cf. 1 Cor 10:30), their heavenly vocation, Heb 3:1, salvation, Jude 3, their training in tribulation, Heb 12:8; Apoc 1:9, each other's sufferings, trials and consolations, 2 Cor 1:7; Phil 4:14; Heb 10:33, their own apostle, Phm 17, his apostolic work, 2 Cor 8:23, and their future glory, 1 Pet 5:1. There was a corresponding communion in sin which throws light on this by contrast, Mt 23:30; Eph 5:5-11; 1 Tim 5:22; 2 Jn 11; Apoc 18:4. In this Christians could not share: 'For what share hath justice with licence, or what communion hath light with darkness', 2 Cor 6:14: 'if we say that we have communion with him and walk in darkness, we lie . . . but if we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have communion with one another', 1 Jn 1:6, 7.

By communion with those sent by Christ they d

636d entered communion with the Divine Persons themselves: 'What we have seen and heard', affirms St John, his gaze rising to Christ as principle of life in his eternal pre-existence and his Incarnation, 'we declare unto you, that you also may have communion with us, and our communion may be with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ', 1 Jn 1:3. Thus Christ's prayer is fulfilled: 'that they may be one in us', Jn 17:21; cf. 1 Jn 5:20. And since Christ is in us through his Spirit whom he imparts to us, Rom 8:9, 10, those who share in Christ, Heb 3:14, share in the Holy Spirit, 6:4. Thus St Paul desires for the Corinthians that 'the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and the charity of God and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with you all', 2 Cor 13:13.

Returning now to the primitive community, we find that the spiritual communion was the source of the temporal one: 'The multitude of believers had but one heart and soul. Neither did anyone say that aught of the things which he possessed was his own, but all things were common unto them. . . . Neither was there anyone needy among them', Ac 4:32, 34a. The Communion found expression in a community of goods which supplied the wants of all. This Christian 'Communism' sprang from love, not compulsion. That it was voluntary is shown by the examples given: the generosity of Barnabas and the humbug of Ananias and Sapphira, 4:36-5:10. St Peter's words to Ananias make this plain: 'Unsold, the property was thine; after the sale, the money was at thy disposal', 5:4, KNT. On the other hand, such generosity is the mark of genuine Communion.

f Next it had to be shown that the Communion was universal. Although the way was opened by St Peter's admission of Cornelius and the Gentiles with him to baptism without imposing the Mosaic Law, the Judaizers seem to have interpreted the case as exceptional. But when Paul and Barnabas came to consult the Apostles about their work among the Gentiles, James and Cephas and John 'gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of communion: that we should go unto the Gentiles and they unto the circumcision', Gal 2:9. This historic moment in the history of the Church's expansion proclaimed Communion of Government (as we speak of bishops being in or out of Communion with the Apostolic See), for the apostolic authority was shared in common while the spheres of apostolate were distinguished. These seem to have been merely geographical—the other Apostles, for the time at least, were to go on working in Palestine while St Paul went to the nations. But the gesture of communion was crucial, for it showed 'the riches of the glory of the mystery' which Paul preached to the Gentiles, a mystery 'now revealed by the Spirit to (God's) holy apostles . . . that through the gospel preaching the Gentiles are to win the same inheritance, to be made part of the same body, to share the same divine promise, in Christ Jesus', Eph 3:5, 6, KNT. Like a wild olive, grafted into the Jewish stock, they had communion in the root and riches of the olive, Rom 11:17. The Communion was visible and it was Catholic.

637a And from this Catholic Communion there flowed immediately a universal, practical charity, a 'sharing in common' like that in the primitive community. The other Apostles only asked St Paul 'to remember the poor', that is the Jerusalem Christians then in poverty, 'which', he adds, 'was the very thing I had set myself to do', Gal 2:10, KNT. In consequence he embarked upon one of the major enterprises of his career, 'the crown of his work in the East'. Why should this great missionary, with all the world to win for Christ, spend so much time and risk his life over a collection? Because it manifested and fostered the 'Communion' of the universal Church, since it embodied the evangelical charity and sacred service (leitourgia) which the Gentiles owed the mother church and won the latter to thankfulness 'glorifying God for the obedience of your confession unto the gospel of Christ and for the simplicity of your communion unto them and unto all'; 2 Cor 9:12, 13; cf. Allo, in loc., and in RB 45 (1936) 529-37, La portée de la collecte pour Jérusalem dans les plans de S. Paul. No wonder that St Paul comes back to this Collection in four epistles and preached such a beautiful 'charity sermon' about it, 2 Cor 8:4-9:13; cf. Gal 2:10; 1 Cor 16:1-4; Rom 15:25-28; Ac 24:17. It was purely voluntary and with perfect spiritual realism he calls it 'a Communion': 'Macedonia and Achaia have spontaneously determined to make a communion towards the poor of the saints in Jerusalem . . . and indeed it is they who are their debtors. For if the Gentiles have had communion in their spiritual goods, they owe it to them to serve (leitourgein) them with their temporal goods', Rom 15:26-28; cf. 1 Cor 9:11; 2 Cor 8:4. Upon the Communion is founded the delicacy of Christian charity: the poor saints have put the rich in their debt for the faith itself, and it is the latter's privilege to serve them, as the Philippians were privileged to help St Paul himself, Phil 4:14, 15, συγκοινωνήσαυτες. Christians were taught to practise this 'communion' with their teachers and with one another, Gal 6:6; Rom 12:13; 1 Tim 6:18; Heb 13:16.

'They were persevering . . . in the Communion: the breaking of the bread', Ac 2:42. The fountain-head of the 'Communion', the bond of Christian charity, is common sharing in the Eucharistic sacrifice and banquet, cf. §§ 652g-653d. Perfecting the incorporation with Christ and with one another begun by baptism, it is the sign and source of the Communion of the congregation. Because Christ was truly present beneath the sign (cf. 1 Cor 11:24, 25, 27) they came into Communion with him (cf. Jn 6:56) the one Food making them one: 'The chalice of benediction which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? And the bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? Because there is one bread, we in our multitude are one body, for we all have a share from the one bread', 1 Cor 10:16, 17; cf. Ign. Ant., Philad., 4; Smyrn., 7, 1; Did., 9, 4. St Paul contrasts this with the Jews' communion 'in their altar by eating the sacrifice and the pagans' communion 'with devils by eating sacrifices offered to idols, 1 Cor 10:18-21; cf. Heb 7:13. 'The unity of the Mystical Body is the fruit of the true Body which we have received', Aquin., ST, 3, 82, 9, ad 2.

This is why St Luke, disciple of St Paul and a very accurate writer, juxtaposes 'the communion' and 'the breaking of the bread', Ac 2:42. The expressions explain and enfold each other: the 'communion' has its active centre in 'Holy Communion', and 'Holy Communion' expands into the 'communion'. At Jerusalem, the Upper Room being no longer large enough, the Apostles went from house to house (cf. 5:42) and with the celebration of the Eucharist went the sharing of ordinary food in a Love Feast, cf. § 652f. 'Breaking bread from house to house, they took their share of food with joy and gladness', 2:46. First celebrated at a Supper, the Eucharist imparted its 'communion' to the food shared in common.

To sum up: In the vision of the Christian 'Communion' and its expansion into every relation of human life is contained the Gospel message of love. Perfect fruit of the sacrifice of Calvary, love poured out by the Holy Spirit, this Communion in and with Christ and each other brought forth the Catholic charity of the Church. It embraced alike the life of the Spirit which has Communion with the Persons of the Holy Trinity and the practical charity extended to the needy, cf. 1 Jn 3:17; Jas 2:15, 16. Nurtured by the Gospel, fed by the Eucharist, the union of love in each congregation and in the whole Church reinforced the sign of the unity of faith.

But how to reduce these spiritual ideas to common practice was not at all obvious. If they must present a common front to the world, at least general lines of conduct were necessary. How should former pagans behave towards their unconverted friends? How were the Jewish Christians to treat the other members of their race? And how were both to regard the social 638a customs and practices which they each found the others wishing to preserve within their new unity in Christ? That their new-found unity presented innumerable problems which no neophyte could be expected to solve for himself, may be illustrated by the questions about meats offered to idols, e.g. 1 Cor 8-10, and by the question of the preservation of the Jewish ritual taboos among the Christians in general, Ac 10-11; 15, and especially Gal 2.

b But the neophyte was not left to himself: if a new orientation had been given to his life with the coming of faith, that did not exhaust the help and guidance that he might expect from the members of the body into which he had been admitted. Not indeed from the first members he might chance upon, but from such as were looked up to by them as having the right to decide such questions, those in fact to whom they already turned for the fuller knowledge of Christ's Gospel. If it was only natural that the neophyte should look to others for guidance, it was no surprise to see even Christians of long-standing recognizing certain among them as exercising authority over the rest. The very idea of their all helping to constitute the Body of Christ implied the very opposite of egalitarianism: if all the parts of the human body are interdependent, some nevertheless control others, some help to bind the rest into one whole as do the 'joints and ligaments', Col 2:19, to ensure, through vital continuity with the head, the harmonious growth of the whole man, cf. Eph 4:12-16. Each could share in the life of the whole, and as the neophyte could see that very varied functions were exercised by the different members of the community, so he was encouraged by the teachers among them to find his own appropriate place in relation to the rest. What was his charisma, the special gift which the Holy Spirit had made him, to be used for the general good? For the union which he had entered was no static one: growth and development were of its very essence; he must himself contribute to them along with the rest.

639a The Charismata—The guidance of the Holy Spirit had been continual from the first, now in explosive manifestations, now in quiet interior seductive ways, the manner of his help being adapted to times, places, persons and circumstances. There was the grand transformation scene of Pentecost, the wind, the tongues of fire outwardly heralding the new boldness of the Twelve, who preached fearlessly to the Jews of the whole world the meaning of the judicial murder which their leaders had committed, in that very place, only a few weeks before. The conversion of three thousand on the spot completed the outward evidence of the Spirit's action. There were the miracles in the name of Christ (Ac passim) which not infrequently accompanied and confirmed the early apostolate; there were also visions, such as those of Stephen, Ac 7:55, of Peter, Ac 10:9-16, and of Paul, Ac 9 (cf. Ac 22; 26), and the latter was guided more than once in his apostolate by the Holy Spirit, Ac 13:2-4; 16:6, 7, 9-10; 20:22-23 (cf. 21:4; 10-14); cf. also 18:9-10; 19:21; 23:11; 27:23-24. Other outward manifestations occurred at times on the bestowal par excellence of the Holy Spirit, 'Confirmation', Ac 8:14 ff.; 19:6 (cf. 10:44 ff.), not to mention the exorcism of evil spirits, Ac 8:7, 13; 16:16 ff.; 19:13 ff.; cf. 5:1-11; 13:8-11. These wonders were not predictable, and might at first suggest a completely haphazard choice by the Holy Spirit of the human instruments of his activity. Yet we can notice at once that the vast majority of cases 'happened' through the Apostles—above all, through Peter or through Paul; other intermediaries were exceptional, and even so were in some way associated with the former.

b But what characterized all these extraordinary interventions of the Spirit was that though they might at the moment call attention to the person of those who were so moved by him, yet their total effect was the advantage of the body of the faithful in numbers or in fervour. It was by an easy transition of thought that the same term was applied to any activity or endowment which benefited the community as a whole. Indeed it was by this characteristic that the activity of the Spirit was to be distinguished from manifestations of false or dubious origin. Hence we can define these gifts (or charismata) as being functions exercised either continuously or momentarily, which, whether extraordinary or not, of their nature tended to the building up of the body of the faithful, either locally or universally. It is a mistake to confine the word, as so many modern exegetes do, to extraordinary manifestations and, above all, to deny it to functions exercised in virtue of a special appointment to office by election or nomination. It had a much wider scope, as an analysis of St Paul's teaching on the subject shows.

Thus (a) charismata were not only extraordinary gifts: 639b for instance, in the list of Rom 12:6 ff., are mentioned 'he that exhorteth' (ὁ παρακαλῶν), 'he that dispenseth' (ὁ μεταδίδους), 'he that sheweth mercy' (ὁ ἐλεῶν), and the list includes 'him that presideth' (ὁ προϊστάμενος), 8. Encouragement, almsgiving, works of mercy can be inspired by the Spirit of Christ without supposing any preternatural manifestations; cf. 1 Pet 4:11. So too the 'presidency' of a Christian community. 'Even those charismata which were essentially extraordinary—like prophecy—were not equally so in all their manifestations. When the prophet was exercising οἰκοδομή (edification) and παρακλήσις (exhortation) and παραμυθία (comfort), 1 Cor 14:3—which constituted undoubtedly his most regular function—this use of his charisma came to no more than fulfilling his office of preacher' (A. Lemmonyer, O.P., art. 'Charismes' in DBV(S) 1, 1241). In fact, unless this be admitted, we should indeed have the preaching of the κήρυγμα [the glad tidings of God's intervention, by the coming, death and resurrection of Christ,] and of the διδάχη [the instruction of the faithful in the new way of life consequent on it], but we should have no record of the ordinary sermon of exhortation and encouragement such as even the best instructed of the faithful require and appreciate. The prophet would rarely be foretelling the future, less rarely he would be really inspired with some immediately relevant message from God, but mostly he would devote himself to the general edification of the Christian assembly by homily or by hortatory explanation of the Scriptures.

This distinction is important in more ways than one. d Just as the special guidance which St Paul at times was given by the Holy Spirit in his travels, in no way dispensed him from ordinarily 'planning for himself', so the charisma of prophecy was recommended as one worthy of ambition—and therefore as one which could be prepared for and practised without any ecstatic or astounding impulse of the Spirit. The fact that prophets themselves were subject to control by others (cf. 1 Cor 14:29 and Allo, ibid.), points to the possibility of an all too human initiative in certain cases, as also do our Lord's warnings against false prophets, Mt 7:15; 24:11, 24; Mk 13:22, which St Paul in various ways reiterates, Ac 20:29-30 etc.; cf. 1 Tim 4:1-2; 6:3-5, 20. If then a true charisma of the Spirit might be exercised while the full consciousness of one's initiative remained, and if its supernatural source did not necessarily reveal itself in its external effects, it was also possible for delusion and even malice to produce a counterfeit 'prophesying', not always easy to detect.

Such a possibility was still more obvious in the case e of the charisma of 'tongues' as it is usually named. It gave more trouble to St Paul than any other, 1 Cor 12-14. Its name and certain of its characteristics led to its being identified with the faculty of speaking in many languages granted to the Apostles on the day of Pentecost, Ac 2. But a closer study of St Paul's words and of the quasi-technical use of the word γλῶσσαι at the time, shows that a foreign tongue need have nothing to do with this charisma; cf. Allo, Première Epître aux Corinthiens, Excursus XV, 374-84, and Comm. An address in a foreign tongue at a gathering of Christians would not have led the chance visitor, unlearned or in-639a fidel, to treat them as madmen, 1 Cor 14:23. Rather was it an apparently ecstatic condition in which articulate or inarticulate utterances were voiced, of which the general character could be grasped (prayer, thanksgiving, etc.) but not the precise meaning. The γλώσσαι, strictly speaking, were not entirely foreign expressions nor a mere magical jargon—which no one could have understood—but rather unfamiliar words of little or no currency, rare or archaic expressions in some dialect, neologisms and startling compounds, even exaggerated circumlocutions (Allo, loc. cit. 379, 381). A love of display, memories of similar ecstatic transports in the pagan mystery religions, sheer hysteria might all contribute to produce a parody of the real mystical gift; that is why St Paul is so anxious that such manifestations should be properly controlled and so insistent on the indispensable gift of Charity and the far more beneficial gift of prophecy, 1 Cor 14:13, 26-33; 13; 14:1-5.

f The fact that the charisma of 'tongues' was an extraordinary manifestation of the Spirit's action, as was also that of 'prophecy', at least on occasion, so fascinated certain minds in fairly modern times, that they identified all action of the Spirit as being necessarily manifested by extraordinary outbursts, and maintained that the life of the primitive Church was wholly guided by such spiritual interventions, so that law and reason played no part in its organization. How arbitrary is this conception of 'pneumatic anarchy', as they called it, is clear from the consideration of the lists of the charismata which St Paul enumerates, or even of the few mentioned above; and whatever success the theory enjoyed, was due to its falling in with the desire to do away with all idea of juridical authority in 'genuine' Christianity. If it has been treated here at some length, it is because reminiscences of the theory still befog the minds of many, though such treatment is out of all proportion to the place which these extraordinary transports held in the life of the early Church. In our records, the references to them are few, and, if kept in perspective, have a real importance; but though, like miracles, they then had a larger place in the Church's life than they have today, they were subject to control, tested and submitted to definite regulations as to their exercise even by the most charismatic of men, the Apostle St Paul.

g (b) The foregoing discussion has incidentally suggested that quite ordinary pursuits—works of charity, spiritual and temporal—were regarded as depending on the 'gifts' of the Spirit, and there is no reason for thinking that they were regarded any differently when undertaken in a regular way as the result of some quite human appointment to office, whether by election or nomination. Sometimes, no doubt, as in the case of Barnabas and Saul, a special prompting of the Holy Spirit intervened, Ac 13:2; but there is no ground for thinking that this was more than exceptional, still less that it was the rule. It is only a pre-conceived system which requires that juridical appointments should be regarded as a pis-aller resorted to when charismatic endowments had begun to wane, or which sees an opposition between such appointments and the free agency of the Spirit—between office and 'charisma', as if the Holy Spirit might not freely make such appointments the occasion for the bestowing of his gifts. If not Matthias, then the Seven may be quoted as examples, and he would be rash indeed who refused a charisma to the πρεσβύτεροι 'appointed' by Paul and Barnabas 'in every church', Ac 14:22, especially as a 'charisma' attaches to him 'that presideth', cf. § 639c. Timothy's consecration to office was a very formal investiture, even if prophecy (but of what kind?) paved the way to it: Paul certainly regarded the charisma which Timothy had received, as having been conferred by himself when he headed the presbyters in imposing hands upon him, 2 Tim 1:6; 1 Tim 4:14; cf. C. Spicq, op. cit., 322-3.

h Such considerations, which will be resumed when the Ministry is treated of below (§§ 656h, 657h), must not be understood to belittle the direct, at times 639b startling interventions of the Spirit. Insistence on the matter-of-factness of some of the gifts is intended only to correct the tendency to level up all the gifts to the plane of the extraordinary, not to level them all down to the commonplace. It is the diversity of the gifts which must be kept in mind: there were the highest as there were the lowest. And among the highest (ranking, indeed, even above the 'presidency') stand 'the utterance of wisdom (σοφία) through the Spirit', and 'the utterance of knowledge (γνώσις) according to the Spirit', 1 Cor 12:8—that wisdom which was no milk for babes, but solid food for 'grown-ups' in the spirit, learnt from the Holy Spirit, spoken in words of his teaching—incomprehensible, 'foolishness' to the natural man (ψυχικός), 1 Cor 2:6-3:4 and Allo in loc. This 'wisdom' did not consist of the knowledge of certain facts withheld from the generality of the faithful, for all received from the Spirit the same faith in God's dealings with men in the person of Christ, along with their Baptism into his Body—it was no esoteric knowledge; but it consisted in the deeper penetration into God's designs and into the harmony of their various parts, through the possession of the intuition (νοῦς) of Christ (cf. Allo 1 Cor Excursus V: and Comm. on 1 Cor 2:6-3:4; § 634d). It was the fuller, yet never exhausted, understanding of the faith such as all should strive for: it might, besides, be crowned by the charisma of the 'utterance' of this wisdom (λόγος σοφίας, λόγος γνώσεως, 1 Cor 12:8), whereby the 'adult' souls might converse of the divine plan with the mentality of Christ himself, 2:16, being conformed to him and growing ever more conformed to him thereby.

III THE HOLY TRINITY

The difference between the first Christians and their 640a contemporaries is immense. They are not confined within the shadows of the Law, or the speculations of Greek philosophy, or religious systems which are only symbols of the cosmic cycle. God has entered human history in Person, explaining, altering and summing it up, not only enlightening but transforming the faith and life of man. 'In these last days he hath spoken to us by his Son', Heb 1:2; cf. Rom 16:25; Eph 3:5; Col 1:26 f.

God is no longer, as for the Pharisees, 'une monade b inféconde, isolée dans sa majesté', Lagrange, Le Judaïsme, 590. Nor is he only the One Creator, whose spirituality, eternal power and divinity are manifested to human reason by his creation, Rom 1:19 f.; cf. Wis 13:1-9; Ac 14:15 ff.; 17:22 ff. By the revelation of the 'Son of the living God' men have passed beyond the stage when they knew him only in unity of essence. He is the Living God, living above anything that 'flesh and blood' can conceive, Mt 16:15 ff.; Jn 17:6; Gal 1:15 f.; 1 Thess 1:9 f.; 1 Jn 1:2. The NT is the revelation of One God in Three Persons and of our union with him. The Mystery of the Holy Trinity is the 'substantia Novi Testamenti', Tertullian, Adv. Prax., 31.

Henceforth Christians are and know themselves to 6 be the children of the living God, Rom 9:26; Os 1:10, dwelling in his house which is the Church, 1 Tim 3:15, his city, the heavenly Jerusalem, Heb 12:22; Apoc 21:2, each his temple, 2 Cor 6:16. The New Law rests on the state of sonship to which they have been raised. Born of the Spirit by baptism, Jn 3:5 f., 'even now the sons of God', 1 Jn 3:1 f., they are free with the freedom which Christ has won for them, Gal 4:21-5:1; Jn 8:36, 'sons in the Son', living in him their new, Trinitarian life, e.g. Jn 15:1 ff.; Rom 6:4; 8:29; 1 Jn 5:20.

The Son has revealed his Father to these sons in the 6 context of their own life, Mt 11:25 ff.; Lk 10:21 f.; 1 Cor 1:24-31. They are to pray 'Our Father' to him who knows their needs, for the tender heart of a father is only a type of his, Mt 7:11. To be truly his 640d sons, they must do good and be perfect like him, forgiving as he forgives, 5:44-48. But the Beloved, Only Son revealed his Father not only in their life but in the Divine Life, as 'My Father'. He glorified him by manifesting his proper name of 'Father' to these new brethren 'that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them and I in them', Jn 17:1-6, 26; cf. especially Cyr. Alex., In Joann., PG, 74, 497-501. To him the Son refers all things, e.g. Jn 6:65; 8:28; Apoc 2:28. Now they know him as he is, he from whom every family group in heaven and on earth is named, the Father who begets a Son, Eph 3:14 f., 1 Jn 1:3. The Spirit of the Son continues to reveal this Father to them, teaching them to cry, Abba, Father, Gal 4:4 ff.; Rom 8:14 ff. He is the first principle and last end of the redemptive work, e.g. 2 Cor 5:8 ff. To him all praise must ascend, Eph 1:3-14.

e As the son reveals the Father, so the Father reveals the Son, e.g. Mt 3:17; 16:17; 17:5; 2 Pet 1:17. The Mystery of the Father is inseparable from that of the Son, Mt 11:25 ff., Lk 10:21 f.; Jn 5:23; 1 Cor 1:30; 1 Jn 2:23. 'I am in the Father and the Father in me', Jn 14:11; 17:21. In the Son we see the Father and through him we go to the Father, Jn 1:18; 14:4-14; Rom 5:1 f. Both are revealed together because the Son, in whom is the fullness of the Godhead, received from the Father all that the Father has, Jn 5:26; 16:15; Col 2:9.

f But the Mystery of the Father and the Son is revealed by the Holy Spirit. He comes forth from God and sounds the depths of God, 1 Cor 2:10 ff. He glorifies and bears testimony to the Son, Jn 15:26; 16:14; 1 Cor 12:3. By receiving this 'other Paraclete', the 'Spirit of truth' whom the Son sends from the Father and the Father sends in the name of the Son, the disciples know that 'I am in my Father and you in me and I in you', Jn 14:16-20, 26; 15:26; 1 Jn 4:2-6, 13 ff. For this knowledge is essentially loving knowledge. The mutual knowledge of the Father and the Son is not separable from the love whereby the Father loves the Son and is loved by him. Therefore men can share it only in the unity of the love of the Holy Spirit, who pours the love of God into their hearts, Rom 5:5. As later theology recognized, he is the bond of love in the Trinity, the Person who is the mutual love of Father and Son. He is not an intermediary between us and the Son, who is the only Mediator. But as the Spirit of Love he assimilates us to the union of the Son and the Father. In other words he perfects our adoptive sonship by the spirit of filial love, and thereby shows us that we are in the Son and the Father, Gal 4:6. As Paraclete, Advocate, he assures our spirit that we are sons of God and intercedes for us with groans beyond all utterance, Rom 8:15 f., 26 f. Hence his presence in us is the 'first-fruits' of the new creature divinized in the Son, 23; 2 Cor 1:22; Eph 1:14; and by contrast he proves the sin of the world and the defeat of the devil, Jn 16:8-11. This communication of the Spirit, the Love of the Divine Persons, is the supreme gift of the glorified Christ to his own, and enables them to understand divine love and their Master's parting injunction to mutual love: 'These things I have spoken to you that my joy may be in you, and your joy may be filled. This is my commandment that you love one another as I have loved you . . . Just Father . . . I have made known thy name to them and will make it known; that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them, 15:11 f.; 16:20 ff.; 17:25 f.; Rom 8:9; Bouyer, 134-40, here followed closely.

g The NT keeps constantly in view the order of the Divine Persons, but approaches the Mystery from various points in their to-and-fro relationship, descending from the Father or ascending to him: 'I came forth from the Father and am come into the world; again I leave the world and I go to the Father', Jn 16:28. 'God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts crying, Abba, Father', Gal 4:6. Again, it is through the Son that we have access in one Spirit to the Father, 640g Eph 2:18, and St Paul will turn from him through whom all graces come, to their source in the Father's love and thence to their communication in the Spirit: 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the charity of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with you all', 2 Cor 13:13.

Already we share in the divine nature, 2 Pet 1:4. h As the Father has life in himself, he has given the Son to have life in himself and to bestow life upon whom he wills, Jn 5:21, 26; cf. 1:4. We have this life in the Son, 1 Jn 5:11 f., in whose life we shall be saved, Rom 5:10. He bestows and nourishes it by the gift of himself in the Eucharist, Jn 6:40, 57 f. It constantly grows, 2 Cor 2:16. Though now hidden with him in God, it shines out through suffering, and will be manifested in glory when he who is our life appears, 4:10 f.; Col 3:3 f. The Father has given us the Spirit who is inseparable from Christ to dwell within us as first share of our inheritance as sons and earnest money of the eternal life which finally will absorb even our bodies, 2 Cor 1:22; 5:4 f.; Eph 1:13 f.; Rom 8:5-17. He constantly intercedes for the fullness of our sonship, 8:23, 26 f.

This revelation is made, this life communicated in the Body of Christ. There the gifts which come from all the Divine Persons are distributed by the Holy Spirit, the offices by the Son who is the body's Head, and all activity derives from the Father as ultimate source: 'There are varieties of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are varieties of ministrations, and the same Lord. And there are varieties of workings, but the same God, who worketh all in all', 1 Cor 12:4, WV. It is upon the unity of the Holy Trinity that the rich, organic unity of the Body is founded. Animated by one Spirit it tends to the one end of eternal possession of God, takes its existence from the one Lord in whom all are incorporated, and forms one family, all sons of the one God who is the Father of all, Eph 4:3-6; cf. Huby, in loc. Thus its members attain to divine intimacy, 2:18 f., and the visible unity of the Body, based on a sharing in the unity of the Persons abiding within it, is an open manifestation of the Son's mission from the Father, Jn 10:30; 17:11, 21-26.

Further, the Holy Trinity is the source of the sacramental life of the members of the Body. The final, universal command of the omnipotent Son of God had been to baptize 'in the name' of the Three Divine Persons, Mt 28:19; cf. § 650c. Thus baptismal salvation is wrought by the Divine Persons, the Father sanctifying through the Son in the Spirit, 1 Cor 6:11; Tit 3:4 ff. Again, the Father makes the disciples firm and anoints them in Christ, sealing them by the earnest of the Spirit whom he pours into their hearts, 2 Cor 1:21 f. The sacramental reference here recognized by modern exegetes is suggested in another way. As Christ 'through eternal Spirit' offered himself to God and so won eternal redemption, Heb 9:12 ff., as he consecrated himself (ἀγιάζω) a victim that his Apostles might be 'consecrated in truth', Jn 17:19, so Paul, his sacred minister (leitourgos), with the priestly office of the Gospel (εὐαγγελιστής), prepares the Gentiles to be consecrated by the Holy Spirit and offered to the Father, Rom 15:16; Phil 2:17; cf. Eph 5:25 f.

All this, taken with what will be said on the part of k the Father, the Son and the Spirit in the work of redemption, on union with the Son, and on the gift and fullness of the Spirit, shows a constant teaching, which fully confirms the authenticity of Mt 28:19. That text, in which the revelation given at Jesus's own baptism shone out in full splendour (Lebreton, The Living God, 104) finds its echo in many others, often containing a baptismal reference, where the Three Persons are mentioned together and distinguished from all created being, § 650g; Prat, II, 132 ff. and Note S. Given the rigorous monotheism of the Christians, the only formula for this relative opposition and mutual compenetration is Trinity in unity, 138, and there is ample material to justify and make necessary the technical terms of

1 Thus is revealed not an abstract God but God One in Three Persons. The Son, in speaking of God as 'my Father', also reveals himself as Son. The Father, bearing testimony to his Beloved Son, reveals himself as Father. In the 'life of the Spirit' is revealed the Holy Spirit who testifies to the presence of Father and Son. So the Christian life, coming from the whole Trinity and within the unity of the Trinity, involves relations to each of the Divine Persons. The members of Christ's Body are taught to realize these relations individually and collectively. They know that all in them is the work of the Father (Phil 2:13; 1 Thess 2:13) who predestines them to be conformed to the image of his Son, Rom 8:29, and that the graces of the life of the spirit come to them from the Spirit who is given by the Father to the Son and by him rendered back to the Father; cf. 1 Cor 12:1-11; 2 Cor 3:4 ff.; Gal 3:5; Eph 4:3 ff.; 1 Jn 4:13.

m This life of the Divine Persons within them is to be the reason for their Christian living. Because God works in them, they must work at their salvation with fear and dread, Phil 2:12. Because they are sons in the Son, they must walk with the freedom and love of sons, Gal 4:4-7. And the indwelling of the Spirit is their motive for hope, Rom 5:5, purity, 1 Cor 3:16 f.; 6:19, avoiding pagan ways, 2 Cor 6:14, and for steadfastness in doctrine, 2 Tim 1:14. Thus will they be built up in Christ into one holy sanctuary and spiritual dwelling place of God, Eph 2:21 f.; 1 Pet 2:5.

n So too St John sees the Holy Trinity in the Church present and consummated, the heavenly Jerusalem. The Father penetrates all the city with his glory, the Lamb lights it with his doctrine, and the Holy Spirit, represented by his operation as the water of life flowing from the throne of God and of the Lamb, gives to the Tree of Life its fecundity, Apoc 21:22-22:5 (cf. Allo, in loc.; Jn 7:38 f.), while from within the Church, the Spirit cries 'Come' to Jesus, Apoc 22:17, 20.

o This deep Trinitarian life is proclaimed in the salutations of epistles, grace, peace and mercy coming simultaneously from the Father and the Son, Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:3; Gal 1:3; 1 Tim 1:2, in the Spirit, 1 Pet 1:2. It is at the heart of contemplative prayer, Rom 8:26 f. It breaks out in the prayers to Christ and canticles in his honour (e.g. Ac 1:24; 7:59 f.; Eph 5:14; 1 Tim 3:16; Apoc 5:9 f.) and in Doxologies. These abbreviated hymns, reserved by the Jews to God, are usually referred to the Father, e.g. Rom 11:36; Gal 1:5; Phil 4:20; 1 Tim 1:17; 1 Pet 5:11; Apoc 7:12. But when the thought is fixed on Christ, they apply directly to him, Rom 9:5; 2 Tim 4:18; 2 Pet 3:18; Apoc 1:6; 5:9-13; cf. 7:10, God and the Lamb. When both are mentioned together, Christ as the Head of the Church is the Mediator through whom honour, glory, and thanks are given to the Father, Eph 3:21; Jude 25. St Paul seems to provide a norm for such prayers: 'Whatsoever ye do in word or in work, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through him, Col 3:17, WV; cf. *Chase, The Lord's Prayer in the Early Church, Texts and Studies, 1, 3, 168-76; Prat, II, 119-24; Lebr., HDT, 265 f.

641a Jesus Christ the Lord—Jesus Christ is the centre of all that is old and new in the NT revelation. On his divinity in the Gospels cf. §§ 616-28. On the earliest Christian teaching about him cf. § 817c-e. It contains two elements: the apologetic presentation shown in the preaching of Peter, Stephen and Paul, and the belief of the Christian community, which comes out in prayer, worship, ways of speaking and living, and in the common faith assumed by the epistles. All preachers of new doctrine naturally lead their hearers on from what they already acknowledge. Christ himself did so, Lebr., HDT, 259 ff. The new faith consummated the old: 'Jesus does not separate the Christians from God, he unites them . . . never has prayer been more confiding and filial, or union with God closer', 266.

The Resurrection was the decisive proof of the Messianic dignity of Jesus and the supreme manifestation of his divine Sonship, 261 f. He was 'marked out Son of God by resurrection from death', Rom 1:4, WV; cf. *Sanday-Headlam, Rom., in loc. Hence the NT often repeats that God raised him from the dead, and St Paul takes the Resurrection as the final proclamation of the Sonship already declared at the Baptism and Transfiguration, Ac 13:33. But it was not the Resurrection which made him Christ and Son; he had been so in his life-time, e.g. Mt 16:16; 21:37; 26:63; Mk 13:32.

The Conversion of St Paul is of cardinal importance for the development of NT doctrine. The revelation he then received was recognized by the other Apostles as coinciding with that given to St Peter, Gal 2:7 ff.; Mt 16:16 f. His faith was the same as theirs, 1 Cor 15:11; Gal 2:6, and as that of churches he had not visited, Rom 1:12. The Judaizers, who would have pounced upon his slightest deflexion from monotheism, could accuse him only about Jewish observances. He who had met the chief Apostles and lived with Barnabas, Mark and Luke, must have been fully informed on the life and words of Jesus. In fact, they were constantly in his mind, BEP, 19-27. Modern scholars have shown that he knew Mt and later Lk, cf. Chapman, RB, 9 (1912) reproduced in DR, 36 (1937) 432 ff. on Gal 1:15 ff.; 2:7 ff. and Mt 16:16 f.; Orchard, Bi, 19 (1938) 19 ff., with Buzy, RSR, 28 (1938) 473 ff. on 1 and 2 Thess and Mt 24, 25; B. C. Butler, St Paul's Knowledge and Use of St Matthew, DR, 66 (1948) 367 ff.; Spicq, op. cit., cxliii-cliii.

But while the first disciples had passed from the earthly life of Jesus to his exaltation, Paul had been 'seized' by the 'Lord of glory' whom he had seen, Phil 3:12; 1 Cor 2:8; 9:1. From this revelation his doctrine expanded homogeneously. It had pleased God 'who called me by his grace to reveal his Son in me that I might preach him among the Gentiles', Gal 1:15 f. To them he preached first Christ risen from the dead, living and heavenly, possessing and communicating the Spirit, Ac 17:31; 1 Cor 2:4; 15:1-4, and after that Christ true man who fulfilled the Messianic prophecies, cf. 2 Tim 2:8; Spicq, cliv. Although he is ready to start with Messianism when preaching to the Jews, Ac 9:22; 26:22, it moves into the background in the epistles, and from the moment of his vision Jesus is for him the Transcendent, the Infinite, Prat, op. cit., II, 112 f.

The entire work of Paul is fundamentally only a Christology, since it all centres in the Person or the mission of Christ, 424. His theology does not derive from syncretism, nor from a distinction between Jewish 'flesh' and Hellenic 'spirit', nor from 'Lutheran' principles on Justification. Such intellectual systems are far too narrow for this great mystic, 477 ff., 'Theologies of St Paul'; BEP, 35 ff. His Gospel is summed up in 'the mystery of God, Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom', Col 2:2 f.; BEP, 49 ff.

'Lord' is the title for Christ which Paul uses most (at least 260 times, isolated or as 'the Lord Jesus' or 'Jesus Christ our Lord', BEP, 51 ff.). Its Palestinian origin is shown by its use in the Gospel data (where it passes from an honorary to an exclusive sense, e.g. Mt 22:43), in the primitive community, e.g. Ac 1:21; 2:36, and in the Aramaic prayer formula 'Maranatha', 1 Cor 16:22; cf. Apoc 22:20. Hence *W. Bousset (Kyrios Christos) was wrong in claiming that its origin was Hellenistic and accounted for belief in Christ's divinity, Lebr., HDT, 268-80; KTW, Kyrios, III, 1045-82. 'Who art thou, Lord', had been Paul's first cry on seeing the risen Jesus, followed by total submission: 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do', Ac 9:5; 22:10. The title 'Lord', familiar from LXX, may be applied to the Father, usually under OT influence, e.g. Rom 9:28, but St Paul clearly marks it as Christ's: 'There are varieties of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are varieties of ministrations, and the same Lord. And there are varieties of workings, 641f but the same God, who worketh all things in all', 1 Cor 12:4 ff., WV; cf. Eph 4:4 ff. This divine name is given by a strict monotheist fully conscious of pagan usage: 'We know . . . that there is no God save one. For even though there are gods so-called . . . as indeed there are 'gods' many and 'lords' many—yet for us there is only one God, the Father, from whom come all things and for whom we live; and one Lord Jesus Christ, through whom come all things, and through whom we live', 1 Cor 8:4 ff., WV. Jesus is Lord to whom all belongs and to whom Christians give themselves completely, doing all in his name, Rom 14:7 ff.; 1 Cor 7:22; Col 3:17. To confess him as Lord is an act of faith proceeding from the Holy Spirit, 1 Cor 12:3; cf. Mt 16:17; Gal 1:16, and necessary for salvation, Rom 10:9 f.; cf. Phil 2:11.

g The name 'God', in continuity with OT monotheism, is normally reserved to the Father, the ultimate Principle of the Godhead. Jesus is called 'Son of God' nineteen times. He is the Son of the Father's love, Col 1:13; Eph 1:6, the 'Beloved Son' of the Gospels. He is the pre-existing, divine Son, e.g. 'God (sent) his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh. . . . Seeing that he hath not spared his own Son . . . how can he fail to grant us all things with him?', Rom 8:3, 32, WV; 1:3 f.; 2 Cor 1:19 f.; Gal 2:20.

h But sometimes he is called God directly, as in the culmination of Israel's privileges: 'From whom is Christ according to the flesh, who is over all things, God blessed for ever', Rom 9:5; cf. Com. in loc.; Durand, RB, 12 (1903) 550-70; KTW, III, 106 (Stauffer). That 'the manifestation of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ', Tit 2:13, refers wholly to him is accepted by nearly all modern exegetes, Spicq, in loc.; KTW, IV, 544-46 (Grundman). On Ac 20:28 cf. Com., in loc.; but R. Schnackenburg, in Episcopus (Munich Univ. Studien, 1949) recognizes 'God' as the Father, and translates 'the blood of his own', cf. MMV, ibos. OT texts concerning God are applied to Christ, e.g. Rom 10:9-13; 1 Cor 10:9. The Spirit of God, who spoke in the prophets, is the Spirit of Christ, Rom 8:9; 1 Pet 1:11, and God's coming, tribunal, Gospel, Church and Kingdom are Christ's, 1 Thess 3:13; 2 Thess 1:9 f.; Rom 14:10; 2 Cor 5:10; Rom 1:1, 9; 1 Cor 1:2; Rom 16:16; Eph 5:5; Prat, II, 130. The supreme efficacy assigned to his Passion is another sure proof of belief in his divinity; cf. § 647c; Lebr., HDT, 310.

i Christ's divinity is shown again in the great Christological texts. Phil 2:5-11, 'the most complete expression of St Paul's thought' (Prat, II, 129) sets forth his divine, pre-existing life, his life of trial and his glorified life, cf. 2 Cor 8:9. God's own Son was born of a woman, Gal 4:4, and coming into the world to save sinners, appeared in the flesh, 1 Tim 1:15; 3:16. In terms closely resembling the Prologue of St John's Gospel, Col declares that all things were created through him and for him, and he is the sovereign head of the Church, his Body, possessing the plenitude of graces to bring universal peace and reconciliation; 'in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead corporally', Col 1:16-20; 2:9, WV.

j Paul had been sent to teach the Gentiles the Mystery of Christ's divine life in the Church. It was an expansion of that first revelation: 'I am Jesus whom thou persecutest', Ac 9:4 f.; 1 Cor 15:9; Eph 3:3-7; Col 4:3. 'In Christ Jesus' occurs 164 times in his epistles. Occasionally it means little more than 'Christian', e.g. Gal 1:22; 2 Cor 12:2, or by Heb. idiom 'in' expresses Christ's agency in redemption, e.g. 5:18 f. 'through Christ . . . in Christ'. But usually it involves the doctrine of the Body of Christ and our real, mystical inclusion by baptism in the Saviour who died and has risen for us, e.g. Rom 6:3; 2 Cor 5:17; Gal 3:26 ff.; sometimes his presence in us is indicated, e.g. Rom 8:9 ff.; 2 Cor 13:3 ff., Prat, II, 297 ff., 391-5; Malevez, RSR 30 (1944) 35 ff. Further, Christ is the principle of life and growth in the organism of the Church, Eph 4:7-16; cf. Col 3:4.

The mystery of the Infinite Person of the Saviour 641j including all men within himself is apparent in the doctrines of the Second Adam, Rom 5:12-19; 1 Cor 15:45-9, and of the summing-up of all creatures in Christ, Eph 1:3-14; Col 2:9 f.; 2 Tim 1:9 f.; cf. BEP, 89 ff., 101-3 and § 646b-g.

'The unsearchable riches of Christ', Eph 3:8, were k shown forth to the various churches by their Apostle. To the conceited, sophisticated Corinthians he preached Christ crucified, the Power and Wisdom of God, 1 Cor 1:23 f., 30 f. To the Colossians, troubled by angel-worship, he laid open his universal primacy and Mediatorship. When the Galatians were falling back under the Law, he urged the liberating power of his redemptive grace. An exhortation to humility and service passes into the famous text: 'Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus. . . .', Phil 2:5 ff. The great dogmatic epistles show Christ the centre and sum of human history. Against the terrible fact of universal sin, Rom sets God's free, loving justification through the redemption in Christ Jesus, the Second Adam restoring the life of grace to those who died in the first, Rom 3:22-5; 5:12-21. Eph praises the Father's eternal design to sum up all things in Christ, making him head of the Church which is his body and his fullness; in this one Body Jews and Gentiles, alike sons of God, have access in one Spirit to the Father, Eph 1:10, 22 f.; 2:16 f. In face of a temptation to return to the temple liturgy and undue worship of angels, Heb celebrates the perfection of Christ's Sonship, sacrifice and priesthood: 'He, being the flashing forth of his glory and the very expression of his being, sustaineth all things by God's word of power'; 'Jesus Christ is the same, yesterday and today, yea, and for ever', Heb 1:3; 13:8, WV; cf. § 647e.

By the time of the Pastorals, these great doctrines did l not need developing again. Christology was expressed under themes already familiar in the Church: confessions of faith, baptismal professions or liturgical hymns, Spicq, clix. But now the title Saviour comes into its own. The OT had reserved it to God (cf. Lk 1:47), and the NT given it to Christ as Messias, Lk 2:11; Ac 5:31; 13:23, and as saving his Body, the Church, Eph 5:23, and our bodies, Phil 3:20. The Pastorals often apply it to God, Saviour of all by his redemptive design, and to Christ, the Mediator of the mystery of salvation, e.g. 1 Tim 1:1; 2:3 ff.; 2 Tim 1:10; Tit 3:4, 6; cf. 2 Pet 1:11; 1 Jn 4:14. When St Paul speaks of 'the epiphany of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ', Tit 2:13, he seems deliberately to choose in connexion with his 'epiphany' or 'manifestation' 'the greatest title the NT has bestowed upon Jesus', Spicq, clxii. For Christianity was now entering into conscious conflict with world paganism. All peoples were required to unite in celebrating the emperor's birthday or accession ('epiphany') as of the 'god manifest', the 'great god' bringing favour (χάρις), salvation (σωτηρία), peace and fair hopes to his subjects; the imperial cult had its priests and hymnology; there were also the 'saviour-gods' of the 'mystery religions', cf. Lagr., S. Luc, 74 f.; Allo, L'Apocalypse* 225 ff.; § 645d. To such pretensions the Christians opposed their own 'imperial proclamations' of Christ and God, 1 Tim 1:17; 6:14 ff., and their own hymnology, cf. 3:16; Pliny, Ep., X, 96 'carmen Christo quasi Deo'. For the Lamb will conquer the kings 'because he is Lord of lords and King of kings', Apoc 17:14; 19:16, and all creation sings: 'To him that sitteth upon the throne and to the Lamb, benediction and honour and glory and power for ever and ever', 5:13; cf. 4:9; 7:12; Spicq, clxii-iv, 264 ff.

IV THE REDEMPTION

The riches of the Redemption were not brought to 642a Christians confined within legal explanations or in a few formulae. Formulae were indeed given: 'Faithful 642a is the saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners', 1 Tim 1:15, WV. But they were seen against the background of OT prophecy, 1 Cor 15:3, and the doctrine of the sinfulness of the whole human race, and their redemption in the Second Adam, through whom they have access in one Spirit to the Father. Moreover the doctrine was embodied in an institution, the central act of Christian worship, the Sacrifice of the New Covenant, wherein Christians renewed, as Christ had commanded, the 'memorial' of his sacrifice on the Cross, and 'showing forth' his death, waited for his coming, cf. 1 Cor 11:23-26. As the OT and the Gospels look forward to Christ's redeeming sacrifice, so St Paul and St John look outwards from it to the vast horizons of salvation, God's New Covenant, the Kingdom which the glorified Christ offers to the Father, the whole world consummated through him.

b The OT was God's fatherly and merciful preparation of his design to save the world through his Son. Though it had in it nothing of final achievement, it was the introduction to a 'better hope by which we draw nigh to God', Heb 7:19. Christ himself, 'beginning at Moses and all the prophets' had shown that the Messiah ought to 'have suffered these things and so enter into his glory', Lk 24:25-35. The strands of this design are gathered together in the NT.

c The moral law and the reality of sin and of the judgements of God had been inculcated by the giving of the Commandments, cf. Rom 3:19 f.; Gal 3:19. The Law was holy, and the Commandment holy, just and good, Rom 7:12. Though the Israelites constantly transgressed, they were as constantly called back to repentance through the mercy, compassion and fidelity of Yahweh and his tender love for Israel, his unfaithful spouse, e.g. Ex 34:6 f.; Deut 7-11; Mic 7:18 ff.; Os 2:19 f.; 11:1, 4. If they return to him, he takes away their sins, Ac 10:43; Jer 31:33; Dan 9:24. He will give them a new heart and spirit, Ez 11:19; 36:26, since before his omnipotence they are like clay in the potter's hand, Is 29:16; Jer 18:6; Rom 9:21. His preventive action goes before their co-operation: 'Make me to return and I will return, for thou art Yahweh, my God', Jer 31:18; cf. Lam 5:21; Ez 18:31; DBV(S), Grâce, 734-7; 839-41.

d Sacrifice, which is natural to man, was freed for the Hebrews, at least in principle, from magical associations. For God himself had instituted the rites and was moved by the humble prayer and obedience which they embodied. But their repetition and multiplicity (bloody and unbloody sacrifices, holocausts, peace-offerings, offerings for sin etc., cf. Heb 8:3; 9:9; 10:5-10, and §§ 104-15) suggested deficiency, Heb 10:1-4.

e Expiatory sacrifices, to avert punishment due to sin, almost all involved the offering of blood, Heb 9:22. Blood, the vehicle of life, God's most precious gift, was so sacred that men were strictly ordered to abstain from it, and it was reserved for the altars, Gen 9:4; Lev 17:10-14; Deut 12:23; Ac 15:29. When life had been forfeited by sin, the victim's blood, offered in substitution, obtained pardon and alliance with God, Lev 17:11 (lxx); cf. 1 Jn 1:7; Apoc 1:5; 7:14. On the great Day of Atonement (Kippurim), the purification of the sanctuary and the people depended on the presentation of blood before God, and the high-priest entered the Holy of Holies to perform this, his highest office, Lev 16:15 ff.; Heb 9:7-14. The immolation of a victim for sin contained an element of penal substitution, but the central act was the pouring forth of the blood, symbol not of death but of the offering of life. Symbols of love, alliance and union were therefore dominant, cf. DBV(S), Expiation, 74-6; *Westcott, The Ep. of St John, 34 f.; The Ep. to the Heb., 295 ff. As bond of brotherhood between men, blood was also the symbol of the Covenant between God and his people and of his protection, Ex 12:13; 24:3 ff.; Heb 9:19. This holy union was imaged in the Peace-Offerings, followed by a meal conceived to be shared between God and the worshipper, a sacrament of fellowship. But since the efficacy of these sacrifices depended on the sincerity of the offerers, the prophets tried to arouse corresponding dispositions of heart and insisted that sacrifices were useless without them; cf. Lattey, The Prophets and Sacrifice, JTS 42 (1941); §§ 155-65. Thus 'the sentiment of reconciliation and of love impregnates the whole symbolism of sacrifice and makes us already understand why, in preparing by ancient figures the salvation of the human race, God willed that there should be "no redemption without the shedding of blood"', DBV(S), 81; Heb 9:22.

f Abraham's Heroic Faith, and his obedience, particularly in sacrificing Isaac, had founded the destinies of Israel and thereby the salvation of the world, Gen 15:6 ff.; 22:16 ff.; Ac 3:25; Rom 4:1-22; Heb 11:8-12, 17 ff. The merits and prayers of the Patriarchs and other great heroes were also a source of expiation, e.g. Gen 18:22-32; Ex 32:13 f.; Num 11:2; Jer 15:1; Ez 14:14. The doctrines of solidarity and substitution here implicit were developed by Jewish theology in its teaching on 'the merits of the Fathers'. The prayers of God's great servants continued to intercede for his people, 2 Mac 15:12-14, without removing individual responsibility and need for conversion, e.g. 1 Kg 26:23; Jer 32:19; Ez 18:1-32. The belief in expiation by suffering, especially by the blood of martyrs, is attested for Palestinian and Hellenistic Jewry by 2 Mac 7:37 f., and by rabbinical writings about the beginning of the Christian era, art. cit., 105-8; Lagr. Le Messianisme chez les Juifs, 236 ff. In the apocryphal 4 Mac Eleazar says 'may my blood be an instrument of their purification and take my life as ransom for theirs' (κατάρατον . . . ἀντίλυτρον). God accepts the lives of the mother and her sons as 'ransom of the sin of the people. . . Through their blood and their expiatory death (ἰλαστήριον θανάτου) Divine Providence has saved Israel', 17:20 f.; cf. art. cit., 108; BJP, II, 98.

g The Gospel of the Suffering Servant linked the doctrines of sacrifice and merit at their deepest level. A mysterious and incredible theme, Is 53:1; Jn 12:38; Rom 10:16, the sweet and humble offerer takes on himself the faults of all the straying sheep without contracting their stain, and God delivers up his Servant in compassionate love, only to exalt him as the head of a glorious humanity. His life will be a 'sin-offering' (ἁμάρτια) and thus 'the ritual act of the shedding of blood is joined with the noblest interior virtues to become the most perfect symbol of religion . . . the ideal expiatory sacrifice', DBV(S), art. cit., 99-100; Is 53:4-12. The Servant is distinguished from the 'many' whose sins are pardoned on account of his self-sacrifice; cf. § 446f; art. cit., 91-7; R. Murphy, Second Isaiah: the servant of the Lord, CBQ 9 (1947) 262 ff. The Isaian prophecy, echoed in Zach 12:10-13:1, is continually in the thoughts of the Great Servant himself as the Passion approaches, and in the apostolic preaching, e.g. Mk 9:12; Ac 3:13; 8:32; 1 Cor 15:3; Heb 9:28; 1 Pet 2:22-5; 1 Jn 3:5. The Servant's history, and especially the Crucifixion, are imaged with amazing precision in the Psalms, e.g. Ps 22 (Vg 21); DBV(S), art. cit., 100-5. The Just One offers himself to God as a victim whose heroic obedience is more meritorious than OT sacrifices, Ps 40(39) 7-10, where LXX suggests the thought of Heb 10:5-10 that God had prepared his body to be a victim replacing those of the Old Law, cf. Lagr., Notes sur le messianisme dans les Psaumes, RB⁹ (1905) 54. The Messiah, though not of Aaron's family, is priest in the manner of Melchisedech, Ps 110(109) 4; Heb 5:10; 7.

h Why then was a Suffering Messiah a Scandal to the Jews?—Rom 9:30 ff.; 1 Cor 1:23. For all their advantages over the Gentiles, Rom 9:4 f., only a 'remnant' recognized him. This too had been prophesied, e.g. Rom 9:27; 11:5; Is 10:22. Prophecy, always fragmentary, does not force its recognition upon the will, and contemporary Judaism had fashioned a Messiah after its own image. The sense of God's free, 642h profound action upon the soul (still preserved nobly by Philo in Alexandrian Judaism; cf. DBV(S), Grâce, 926 ff.), was replaced by an exaggerated idea of the dignity of man: his actions demanded in strict justice a divine salary from a far-off, divine Master, and with only the Law's external help, he could keep that Law and triumph over evil. The wide charity of the Law itself was degraded into legal formalism. The privileges of Israel, which had been guarded by segregation from other nations, were made exclusive. The universalist understanding of the prophetic visions was abandoned. All that surpassed the natural order and the racial horizon was shut out by a personal and national pride which became the bitter enemy of the Gospel of grace, BJP, II, 318-25; DBV(S), Grâce, 930-7.

1 Thus a total incomprehension of the redemptive death of the Suffering Servant is shown by Contemporary Rabbinical Writings. He would be a warrior or a wonder-worker. His humiliations were ascribed to the Jewish people or their adversaries. How could he be a victim of love who would make void the ancient ceremonies and open God's kingdom to all nations? St Paul himself, while a disciple of the Rabbis, did not understand the universalist chapters of the prophets; cf. Eph 3:5. Though the 'just remnant' of prophecy would appeal to the prophets (cf. Ac 3:13 with Is 42:1; ch 53; and Ac 8:32 with Is 53:7 f.), the sectarianism of the Pharisees would never 'sacrifice the Law to a text of Isaiah', Lagr., Le Messianisme chez les Juifs, 251.

2 This spirit implacably opposed and crucified Jesus, recognizing that his mission, life and teaching condemned it. Jesus, usually so mild, revealing the merciful and bountiful God, Friend and Lover of men, denounced its justice as insufficient for the kingdom of heaven, Mt 5:20; and its professors as hypocrites, blind guides, whited sepulchres, vipers; summing them up in the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican and warning his disciples against them. It cast forth and killed the Son and heir of the Vineyard of Israel, seeking to take his inheritance, and thus rejected the corner-stone of God's building, Mt 21:33-45; cf. Is 5:1-7; Ac 4:11; Rom 9:32 f. It is the key to that opposition of darkness to the Light which goes through the Gospel of St John. It continued to persecute the early Church, tried to restrict her universalism and subject her to the Law, and pursued its great enemy, the Apostle of the Gentiles. It explains the vehement warnings of Gal against falling under the yoke of the Law, the treatise on the universality of sin and on God's gracious justification in Rom, and the teaching of Heb on the transcendence of Christ's mediatory Priesthood and expiatory sacrifice. This spirit re-appears in early heresies, and in the Pelagian attempt to 'make void the Cross of Christ'.

643a The Gospel of Grace—St Paul's developed theology on the initiative of the Father and the universality of sin and salvation for Jew and Gentile was rooted in the Gospel revelation. We now deal with the Gospels, cf. §§ 645b-649 for Paul. Isaiah had been a universalist long before Paul, and Simeon in heralding the salvation brought by Christ 'set himself exactly in the horizon of Isaiah' (Lagrange), Lk 2:30-32; Is 40:5; 42:6; 49:6; 52:10; Ac 13:47. The Precursor also took his manifesto and his images from Isaiah when he sought in preaching judgement and repentance from sin to 'prepare the way of the Lord' by opening men's hearts to grace, Mt 3:1-12; Mk 1:2-4; cf. Is 40:3-5; 59:5, etc. Jesus carrying forward the message, required repentance and belief: 'The appointed time has come and the Kingdom of God is near at hand; repent and believe the gospel', Mk 1:15, KNT.

b 'Grace' (χάρις)—The word is not in Mt and Mk, nor Jn, apart from the Prologue, and seems not to have been used by our Lord, DBV(S), Grâce, 715-1; cf. 727-48 for Hebrew terms. The Good Shepherd taught in words his flock understood. Grace is God's free gift. The verb 'give' (δίδωμι) with its derivatives (KTW, δίδωμι, etc., II, 169) in the technical sense of God giving man all he has and specially what he cannot gain of himself, is characteristic of the entire NT. 'It is given' or 'will be given' or 'given' constantly recurs. 'It is given' to the Apostles to know the mysteries of the Kingdom, Mt 13:11; cf. 1 Jn 5:20. The Kingdom itself is given, Mt 21:43. God's love is not a sentiment but a 'giving', e.g. 7:11; Rom 8:32; 1 Jn 3:16. The Father gives: 'God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son', Jn 3:16; 'a man cannot receive anything unless it be given him from heaven', Jn 3:27; 'no man can come to me unless it be given him by my Father', 6:65; 'behold what manner of love the Father hath given to us, that we should be called and should be the sons of God', 1 Jn 3:1. Christ's love is the gift of his life, Mt 20:28, of himself, Gal 1:4, of his body in the Eucharist, Mt 26:26; Lk 22:19. The Holy Spirit is 'given' and 'received', e.g. Lk 11:13; Jn 3:34; 7:37 ff.; Ac 1:8; 2:38; 1 Cor 2:14.

Although the gift is gratuitous, it does not exclude recompense, 'merit', itself the fruit of grace, or 'demerit'. This is marked by the compounds ἀποδίδωμι and ἀνταποδίδωμι with their nouns, Mt 6:4, 6, 18; 16:27; Rom 2:6; 12:19; 2 Tim 4:8, 14; Apoc 22:12. It is shown in the parables, cf. Mt 20:13 ff.; Lk 17:7 ff. with Mt 25:14 ff.; Lk 19:12 ff. To him who has, more will be given, Mt 25:29. Though God, always master of his gifts, rewards a hundredfold, making the servants enter their Lord's own joy, 5:12; 19:29; 25:21; Lk 6:38, there is correspondence between merit and reward, ib., the merciful obtain mercy, those who pardon are pardoned, those who acknowledge Christ will be acknowledged, if they lose their lives for him, they will save them, the humble will be exalted, and the watchful servants will be served by the Master himself. In short, God crowns men's merits, but in doing so, crowns his own gift, Rom 11:35; Col 3:24; 1 Thess 3:9, DBV(S), Grâce, 717-22, 969-71.

Man takes or receives God's gift (λαμβάνω and δέχομαι) are practically synonymous, KTW, II, 49) and may thus welcome or reject 'the word', Mt 13:20; Mk 4:16, 20, a person representing Christ, Mt 10:40 f.; 18:5; and the Kingdom, Mk 10:15. 'Giving' and 'receiving' are used for the whole order of grace: 'What hast thou that thou hast not received? And if thou hast received, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received it', 1 Cor 4:7; Eph 4:7; Jas 1:17.

Salvation from sin (cf. § 645f) is an aspect of the Gospel of Grace which draws out the true meaning of the Messianic concept and distinguishes it from material notions. Jesus came to save men from sin, e.g. Mt 1:21; 1 Tim 1:15. Those who accept him, enter the way of salvation, e.g. Mk 16:16; Lk 13:23; Ac 2:21, 47, which leads, for those who persevere, to final salvation, e.g. Mt 10:22; 24:13; Lk 8:12. It is all in the story of the Samaritan woman: the sinner, the prayer, the Giver, the 'gift of God', the 'fountain of water springing up into life everlasting' which Jesus will give if she asks, Jn 4:10 ff., cf. § 645g.

The Devil and the World—Sin is of the devil; cf. 1 Jn 3:8. Opening the vision upon the fecundity of the creative act, Scripture shows myriads of incorporeal spirits, e.g. Mt 13:41; 25:41; Lk 2:13; Heb 1:6. The wicked angels, hurled from heaven, hold sway on earth through man's infidelity, e.g. Apoc 12:7 ff., 12 ff. Though 'the world' can mean God's creation, or humanity, Jn 3:16; 2 Cor 5:19, it usually stands for the 'whole world' dragged thus under the power of the devil, 1 Jn 5:19, WV; cf. 2:15; Rom 3:19; Jas 4:4 (whom St Paul even calls 'the god of this world', 2 Cor 4:4) and under his demons, 'world-masters of this darkness', Eph 6:12. This 'mystery of wickedness' is working among the 'children of unbelief', 2 Thess 2:7; Eph 2:2. The adoration of devils under cover of 'the elements of the world' was the reason for the Christian horror of idolatry's empty gods, 1 Cor 10:19 ff.; Gal 4:3, 8 f.; Col 2:8, 20; cf. Huby, in loc. From this fundamental point of view Christ came 'to destroy the works of the devil', 1 Jn 648f 2:8. Hence his meeting with Satan in the desert Temptations, Mt 4:1-11, the tremendous encounter of the exorcisms, when the 'strong man' is driven from his usurped dwelling, 12:29, the passing on to the disciples of the power whose exercise draws forth Jesus's words 'I saw Satan like lightning falling from heaven', Lk 10:18, and the final death struggle with 'the prince of this world', Jn 12:31; 14:30; 16:11. On the Cross he triumphed, like a Roman conqueror, over the world and the powers of darkness, 33; Col 2:14 f. It is against them, not merely against 'flesh and blood', that we who are bidden to share his victory, have our warfare, Eph 6:12; 1 Pet 5:8; 1 Jn 2:13. But one who is 'born of God' and keeps himself from sin, cannot be touched by Satan, whom God will crush under our feet, Rom 16:20; cf. Gen 3:15; 1 Jn 3:9; 5:4 f., 18; Apoc 2-3; 15:2; 21:7; Bouyer, 98-104, here followed.

g The Kingdom of God—Cf. §§ 625a-f, 678f, g, the concept chosen by Jesus because familiar to his hearers, 'is above all, a gift', SB, I, 180f. It is 'given' by the Father, Mt 21:43; Lk 12:32, and comes silently from God in his chosen time, Mt 6:10; 10:7; 12:28; Ac 1:7. A man must 'receive' it as a little child, Mt 18:3; and thereby enters the phase of the Kingdom leading to the glorious consummation prepared by the Father for his children, 25:34. Indeed it is the property of the 'poor in spirit', the 'little children', 5:3; 19:14. Within it, the bankrupt sinner is forgiven his debt, 18:27, and the Father distributes rewards and places as he pleases, 20:1-16, 23. It is a marriage feast, invitations to which are issued first to special guests, then to all, 22:1 ff. It can be taken away and given to others, 21:43. One may be shut out from it, 25:10, or cast out, 13:41 f.; 22:13, for even some of those in the Kingdom will not be 'worthy of the age to come', Lk 20:35; 2 Thess 1:5. Christ's parables are symbolic revelations of the Kingdom, a revelation which is itself a gift, Mt 13:11, 34 f.; cf. M. Hermaniuk, La Parabole évangélique, 274-301. Although the Kingdom-concept and the teaching by parables were unfamiliar to Gentiles and are hardly mentioned outside the Gospels (but cf. 1 Cor 15:24 f.; Col 1:13) they lie behind the rest of the NT.

h Repentance (μετάνοια), 'a change of sentiments' from sin to God, is the negative aspect of 'being converted' (ἐπιστρέφω) the turning of the heart from evil to good, a new orientation from self to God, cf. Is 6:9 f.; Mal 4:6; Mt 13:14 f.; Lk 1:16 f.; 22:32; Ac 9:35; 28:26 f. The relations of God and his people in the OT had shown this regular rhythm: infidelity, punishment, conversion, pardon, the help of Yahweh. What Jesus wished to transform was the heart, or will, the free centre of man's dispositions, Mt 5:8; 12:34; Mk 7:21; 11:23; Lk 8:15; Ac 2:37 f.; Rom 2:5. Like the Baptist, he began his preaching by this call to repentance, Mt 3:2; 4:17. He sent his Apostles to preach it, Mk 6:12, and it was always a first part of their message, Ac 2:38; 5:31; Rom 2:4; Heb 6:1. St Luke gives beautiful examples: the sinful woman, the publican, the prodigal son, Zachaeus, the good thief.

i Faith—The positive disposition required by Jesus is called belief in himself, Mt 18:6, in God, Mk 11:22, in the Gospel, 1:15, or simply 'believing', Mt 21:22; Mk 5:36; Lk 8:12 f. In OT faith, though a fundamental virtue, was rarely mentioned, e.g. Gen 15:6; Ex 14:31; 2 Par 20:20; Is 7:9; cf. Heb 11. But with Christ's coming religion is self-giving to a Person and his message. 'Faith' describes the normal Christian attitude (250 times in NT). To believe (300 times) is to accept the Gospel, and Christians are 'believers'. Since the believer logically conforms himself to the way of salvation, Christ often says 'thy faith hath saved thee', e.g. Mt 9:22, and faith is equated with charity, Lk 7:47, 50 (but cf. 1 Cor 13:2, 8); § 648l; DBV(S), Grâce, 968; ZLG, mortis.

This faith is not blind confidence, for its motive is the divine authority of a witness accredited by God. Jesus never told men to shut their eyes and believe, but to open their eyes and hearts to the motives for believing: his miracles or 'works', Mt 11:2-6; Jn 5:36; 10:25, 37; 14:11, the witness of prophecy, e.g. 5:39, his own character, 8:46 f., his doctrine, whose divine origin is apparent to men of goodwill, 7:17; cf. 46; Mt 7:28 f. The Resurrection was final confirmation, Rom 1:4. The dialogue with Nicodemus illustrates the process: he admits that the signs done by Jesus prove him a teacher from God, and when he demurs at a hard doctrine, he is taken back to this motive: Christ's witness is God's, Jn 3:2, 11.

When faith is strong, it brings the trust united with certainty which procures miracles and 'moves mountains', Mt 17:19 f.; 21:21 f.; 1 Cor 13:2. The miracles, as the nature of many of them shows, are not the result of 'faith-healing'. It is for a man's spiritual good that Christ frequently demands the act of faith, and he rewards it by forgiveness or miracles, Mt 9:2 ff., 20 ff., 27 ff., and punishes its absence by withholding them, 12:38 f.; 13:58; Mk 6:5 f.

The faith given to the word of Jesus must be given to that of his appointed witnesses, Mt 10:40; Mk 16:14; Lk 10:16; Ac 1:8; 2:32, as a condition of salvation for all to whom the Gospel is preached, Mk 16:16 f.; Ac 2:38-41; 2 Thess 1:10. It was always needed to obtain and live in accordance with the Messianic blessings, 2 Cor 13:5; Gal 2:20; cf. further § 648e-n; DBV(S), Foi, 291-4.

Justice—Righteousness, conformation to God's will, is an interior aspect of the Kingdom: 'Seek first his Kingdom and justice', Mt 6:33; cf. 3:15; 5:20; BEJC, 140; KTW, II, 200 (Schrenk). It forms a principal theme of the Sermon on the Mount which describes the dispositions comprising it: 'poverty of spirit', gentleness and humility, 5:3, 5, hunger and thirst after 'justice', love of mercy and peace, patience, generosity and forgiveness, 5:6 f., 9, 33-47, purity and goodness of heart, 5:8; Lk 8:15. The 'just' are those in whom God takes pleasure, the opposite of sinners, e.g. 18:9; 20:20. These fundamental dispositions of simplicity, humility, purity and confident love are the reason why 'unless you be converted and become as little children you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven', Mt 18:3, for to such it belongs, 19:14. They are to grow to the perfection of the Heavenly Father, 5:48, Jesus himself being the model, 11:29; cf. 1 Cor 11:1. Opposed to them are hardness and insensibility, fickleness, love of riches, care for this world and especially pride and self-sufficiency, e.g. Mt 13:19 ff. The teaching of St Teresa of Lisieux is thus the heart of the Gospel.

Jesus came to proclaim the 'Jubilee Year', the Messianic 'Day of Salvation' to an evil generation, slaves of sin who thought themselves free men, 16:4; Lk 4:18-21; Is 61:2; cf. Jn 8:34 ff.; Rom 6:16-20. The 'Sinners' Friend', sent to call them to the repentance which all needed, Mt 9:13; 11:19; Lk 13:2-5, he asserted his authority to forgive sins by working the cure on the paralytic, Mt 9:2 ff., and entrusted the same mission of forgiveness to his Apostles, 16:19; 18:18; Jn 20:21 ff. For the sinner, all was made easy: 'My yoke is sweet and my burden light', Mt 11:28 ff. But Jesus gave his death as the price.

The Redemptive Death of Jesus is no Pauline interpolation, but in the very fabric of the Gospels, cf. DBV(S), Expiation, 114-33; BEJC, 219 ff.; J. Lilly, The Idea of Redemption in the Gospels, CBQ 9 (1947) 255 ff.; *A. Rawlinson, St Mark, 108-111. It was not the course of events which showed Jesus that he would die. Early in his public life (and the context is purely Jewish), he had foretold that his disciples would mourn when the bridegroom was taken from them, Mt 9:15. Asked for a sign, he declared 'destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up', Jn 2:19; Mt 26:61, so linking the Resurrection with the day when his body would become the central sanctuary of the New Law, cf. A. M. Dubarle, Le Signe du Temple, RB 48 (1939) 21-44. While he was preparing men's minds to accept a truly religious kingdom, and to acknowledge himself, 644b he did no more than hint at his death, as by the 'sign of Jonas', Mt 12:39 f.; 16:4, the 'baptism' he had to undergo, Lk 12:50, the 'cup' to drink, Mt 20:22, the 'lifting up' of the Son of man, Jn 3:14, and the answer to an attempt to frighten him, Lk 13:31 ff.

c But once he had obtained Peter's vital confession, 'from then' (and the typically Semitic passage is in all the Synoptics), 'Jesus began to show to his disciples that he must (dei) go to Jerusalem and suffer many things . . . and be put to death and the third day rise again'. Mk adds 'and he spoke the word openly'. The shock to the Apostles appears from Peter's reaction. But Jesus called together his disciples with the crowd and insisted that he who would come after him must also be ready to take up his cross, Mt 16:16-27; Mk 8:29-38; Lk 9:20-26. The redemptive programme is suddenly unfolded. We are on the watershed whence the horizon opens upon the Cross and the Resurrection.

d On the journey to Jerusalem Jesus repeated his prophecy with increasing detail, e.g. Mt 17:22 f.; 20:17 ff. These scenes with their vivid touches about the terror of the Apostles and their fear to ask him questions, Mk 9:32; 10:32, part of the web and woof of the Gospel story, are supplemented by the record that the great figures of the OT spoke of these things with Jesus at the Transfiguration, Lk 9:31 (cf. Mk 9:9; Mt 17:9-13), by the little double prophecy that Mary of Bethania had anointed him for burial and would be remembered for it in all the world, 26:6-13, and by the allegory of the vineyard whose rebel husbandmen kill the Lord's son, Mt 21:33 ff.; cf. Is 3:14; 5:1 ff. Jesus's anticipation is not the natural depression of one whose mission is failing, for he joins the Resurrection to his death. Nor is it due to his reading of prophecy, for he always speaks from direct knowledge. But the Scriptures, especially the 'Gospel of Isaiahs' on the suffering, death and glory of the Servant, are continually in his mind, and he uses them to show that the Son of Man 'must' suffer, cf. Is 53 with Mt 26:24, 54; Mk 9:12, 14:49; Lk 18:31; 22:37. The lesson would bear fruit, 24:27, 45.

e In this context Jesus sums up his own plan and purpose to his Apostles, angry over the ambition of the sons of Zebedee: 'The Son of man hath come not to be served but to serve, and to give his life a ransom for many', Mt 20:28; Mk 10:45, WV; cf. DBV(S), Expiation, 123-33; Lagr., S. Marc, in loc.; KTW, IV, 343-51 (Buechsel); HRCS. λύτρον, which in LXX translates hōfer, or words associated with pādāh and gā'al, means a price paid, a compensation offered, the deliverance of men by ransom or substitution, cf. HRCS; Eus. Praep. Ev., PG, 21, 85, mentions Phoenician kings sacrificing their dearest son as a λύτρον, and it was used for the price paid to a temple for manumission. Vg's 'redemptio' is an exact translation. Jesus did not say how, or from what, men were to be 'redeemed', but no man of that evil generation could give compensation for his own soul, Mt 8:37 f.; 9:19. So the 'service' of the Suffering Servant is the reconciliation of 'the many' to God by the offering of his life; cf. Is 53:11 f. Here is the doctrine of the Redemption in germ, as contemporaries could begin to understand it. It will be developed organically by St Paul, but there is no trace of an interpolation of his characteristic doctrines on sin, death, etc. Nor is there contradiction with men's need for repentance. They have but to believe and love, but the Good Shepherd gives his life for his sheep (Jn 10:11; cf. 15:13) and so abundantly does he redeem them, that his devotion calls forth similar love and service; cf. Mk 8:31 with 34; Phil 2:5-8; DBV(S), art. cit., 131 f.

f The Sacrifice of the New Covenant—The fact and doctrine of the Redemption were enshrined by Jesus in the Eucharistic rite which he instituted at the Last Supper. By celebrating it and entering into the sentiments of Jesus, the faithful commemorate his Passion as he intended they should, and are filled with the same mind as that with which he went to Calvary, 1 Cor 11:26. What he did and said showed his death to be an expiatory sacrifice; cf. DBV(S), art. cit., 133-45; Eucharistie, 1146-215 (Coppens); DTC, Eucharistie, 989-1121 (Ruch); Commentaries on Mt 26:26-29; Mk 14:22-25; Lk 22:15-20; 1 Cor 11:23-25; texts compared by BEJC, 230-37.

g Between two prophecies of his death and in circumstances dominated by the thought of Calvary (Mt 26:21, 29; Mk 14:18, 25; cf. Lk 22:15-18) Jesus taking the cup had said, 'This is my blood of the Covenant which is shed for many', Mk; Mt adds 'for the remission of sins'. 'Blood shed' is used for violent death, e.g. Gen 4:8 ff.; 1 Kg 25:31; Is 59:7, and the sacrificial meaning is clear from the words added. The parallelism, and the words 'for you' added in Lk and 1 Cor, show that his body also is offered; cf. Jn 6:51. The ritual separation of body and blood shows the immolation of the victim, followed, as in all such sacrifices, by the pouring forth of the blood. 'Many' does not exclude 'all', cf. § 739h.

The Covenant—(διαθήκη, cf. KTW, II, 105-37 h (Beham); DBV(S), Expiation, loc. cit.) which holds a central place in biblical theology, is the gracious pact of alliance and union made between God and his People. (διαθήκη thus means for Jews 'Covenant'—Sinaitic, Messianic, or simply God's, cf. L. da Fonseca, S.J., Bi, 8 (1927) 290-319; 9 (1928) 26-40; 143-60, for this meaning in 396 cases in LXX and almost always in NT). The prophets had foretold a 'new' and 'everlasting' Covenant, and contemporary Jews were expecting it; cf. Is 55:3; 59:21; 61:8; Jer 31:31 ff.; Ezech 16:60; Os 2:18 ff.; M. Schechter, Documents of Jewish Sectaries; Lagr. RB, 9 (1912) La secte juive de la Nouvelle Alliance, 213-40; 321-60. The 'blood of the Covenant' must be that of this Covenant (1 Cor and Lk add 'new'), the eternal union and friendship between God and men, wherein he is their Father and they his children, the 'marriage' of Os 2:18-20; Mt 22:2 ff.; 25:1 ff.; Eph 5:25-32; Apoc 19:7-9. Blood, symbol of union because bond of brotherhood, had been used to ratify the Old Covenant, Ex 24:6 ff. Jesus now gives his own blood as sacrifice of the New Covenant, not merely as sign but as real, mediatorial cause, Heb 8:6-13; 9:15-23. 'What assurance of divine friendship!' DBV(S), 141 f. To Greek audiences διαθήκη would also suggest its other meaning 'testament', Heb 9:15 ff., and the Fathers say that Jesus left himself to his own. The Paschal character of the Supper shows further that the saving blood of Jesus is that of the true Paschal Lamb, Mt 26:17 ff.; Mk 14:12 ff.; Lk 22:7 ff.; cf. Jn 1:29; 13:1 ff.; Is 53:7.

h Communion with God was given by the sacred meal after sacrifice; cf. 1 Cor 10:18-21; Philo, De Spec. Leg., I, 221. 'Drink ye all of it. For this is my blood', Mt 26:27 f. Christ commands what Moses had forbidden! The Law of Fear gives place to the Covenant of Love! The sanctity of the blood, which had made the faithful abstain from it, is the motive which invites them. Man's bold and impotent desire for union with God, symbolized in sacrifice, is fulfilled. While the sacramental form takes all repugnance from the senses and deepens the mystery for the spirit, the faithful who eat Christ's Body and drink his Blood become in truth brothers of God, DBV(S), 142-3.

i Critics, who deny the divinity of Jesus, cannot accept such conclusions and try to cut the account of the institution of the Eucharist from the Gospel data as 'Pauline'. Yet it was kept in memory by a repetitive rite, the specific and essential act of Christian worship, Ac 2:42, 46 etc., and it was transmitted by the earliest tradition, 1 Cor 11:23 ff. Upon it converge all the lines of the symbolism of OT sacrifice, of the national sense of sin, of prophetic hope, of the redemptive power of the merits of the Just and of Jesus's own teaching upon the purpose of his Messianic work. It is expressed in simple language free from 'Paulinisms'. It shows Jesus loving his own even to the perfect act which consummated his devotion, Jn 13:1. Far from contradict-

644] ing his early preaching on the Fatherly love of God, it is its supreme revelation. 'God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son', Jn 3:16; 'God makes known his love towards us because when as yet we were sinners, Christ died for us', Rom 5:8. With Jesus, all is redemptive: his words revealing the Father, his miracles leading men to the faith, his Person drawing them to repentance, above all his blood which he sheds for many. 'Here, like avenues ending in a cross, join the perspectives opened by the teaching of Jesus on the end of the Law, on the new justice and the religion of the new man, on the reconciliation of the world to the Father in heaven, and on the part of the Son of man in this religion and this reconciliation. The blood of a sacrifice sealed this new covenant, and the Victim of this sacrifice was the Son of man', Batiffol, L'Enseignement de Jésus, 248 f.; art. cit., 145. Cf. further on the Last Supper, §§ 652g-i, 653, 657f-h.

645a The first message of the Apostles to their fellow-Jews was of the realization of the Messianic hope, whose meaning was deepened by the new understanding given by the Spirit. Jesus is the only Saviour, and his gifts the promised remission of sins, and the Spirit, Ac 2:38; 4:12; 10:43. Calvary, which might have seemed the negation of his Messiahship, was part of his work in the 'determined design of God' and the Resurrection its divine consummation; both were fulfilments of prophecy, 2:23 f.; 3:18; 4:25-28; 8:28-35; 13:27; Is 53. Accordingly the primitive catechesis taught that Christ died for our sins and rose according to the Scriptures, 1 Cor 15:3 f.

b The Redemption in St Paul—St Paul handed on the faith which he had received, ib., 11. 'This faith looked outwards from the redeeming sacrifice and the cosmic glory of the Resurrection to the salvation of all mankind. It saw in them the love of the Father of the human family who sent his own Son to save the world, the loving obedience of the Beloved Son even to the death of the Cross and his consequent glorification as risen Head of a new humanity, and the universal extension of sin and death (from which the Law could not deliver) overcome at last by the grace of the universal Mediator, in whom the Father sees the whole race of his redeemed sons, Jews and Gentiles, made one through the action of the Spirit. Incorporation in the Body of Christ came by the grace of baptism, that sharing in the dying and rising of Christ which expands into the individual and corporate life of Christians. This life, guided by the Spirit of Christ, led to the final triumph over concupiscence and death by glorious, bodily resurrection with him on the Day of his final Coming. This is true Paulinism. Cf. Rom 8:14-23; 1 Cor 3:23; 15:28; Col 3:11.

c The Mystery—'We speak of the wisdom of God embodied in a mystery, that hidden wisdom which God devised before the ages unto our glory; a wisdom which none of the rulers of this world hath come to know. . . . To us God hath revealed it through the Spirit', 1 Cor 2:7 f., 10, WV. It was granted Paul to preach to the Gentiles the universality of this Mystery, the wonderful variety of God's wisdom manifested in the unsearchable riches of Christ and their incorporation in him, Eph 3:2-11; Col 1:25 f.; 2 Tim 1:9-11; Tit 1:2 f.; cf. Rom 16:25. Contained in his original vocation, Ac 9:6, 15, formulated already in 1 Cor, this teaching attains its full development in the Epistles of the Captivity; cf. DTC, Paul, 2356.

d This 'Mystery' is utterly different from the Mystery Religions—Cf. §§ 699a-d, 633h, 652e. The former Pharisee fully shared the Jewish horror of pagan rites and apotheoses, and his enemies were able to accuse him only of setting aside the Law, never of compromising with pagan belief, e.g. Ac 12:20 f.; 14:8-18; 26:5 f.; Rom 2:22; 1 Cor 5:11; 6:9; 10:7, 14-21. Pagans who became Christians had to abandon idolatry and henceforth share repugnance for it, 1 Cor 8:4 f.; 2 Cor 6:14 f.; Eph 5:7 f.; 1 Thess 1:9; Lagr., Les origines du dogme paulinien de la divinité du Christ, RB, 45 (1936) 5-33. Besides, the 'mysteries' were rites open only to initiates which it was profane to reveal. But 'the Mystery' in NT means principally God's hitherto secret purpose in his dealings with men which he now wills to be revealed by his Apostles to all who have ears to hear it; cf. *J. A. Robinson, St Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, 240; MMV μυστήριον. The 'mysteries' of God were understood by spiritual Christians not because they were a privileged class but because they had reached spiritual maturity at which all should aim, 1 Cor 2:6; 3:1 ff.; Heb 5:11 ff. The rites of the 'mysteries', expressing vague, human desires for God and immortality, may have remotely prepared their transcendent fulfilment. But contemporary 'mystery cults' were magical, often immoral and usually required no change of life, whereas Paul subordinated salvation to faith in the historic Christ and crucifixion of the flesh with its vices, Gal 5:19-24. Neo-Platonist syncretists who at a later date tried to attribute approximately Christian ideas to these rites, met with indignant repudiation from writers like St Justin and Tertullian. These deities of vegetation or totemistic myth had no historic life, death or resurrection, nor was there any idea of justification through the merits of a suffering God. There is no evidence that Mithraism, which developed after Christianity, had any influence upon it. St Paul's use of the word 'mystery' is not surprising, as it had passed into common speech, cf. Lagr., RB 16 (1919) 157-217 (Eleusis), 419-80 (Attis), 29 (1920) 420-46, review of *Loisy's Les mystères païens et le mystère chrétien; Grandmaison, Jésus Christ, III, 319-46, 'Gods who died and came to life', 349-77, 'The Pagan Mysteries'; Allo, L'évangile en face du syncrétisme païen; Les dieux sauveurs, RSPT 15 (1926) 5-34; DA, Mystères païens et S. Paul; DBV(S), Baptême, 883-6, 903-20; Eucharistie, 1156-63, 1193-209; Expiation, 3-48; Gnase, 690-701; Grâce, 707-14 (full bibliography); KTW, II, 334 f. (Oepke), IV, 810-16 (Bornkamm).

We must not confine the doctrine of the Redemption within the limits of theories which theologians may elaborate with much freedom. They are presented and discussed by J. Rivière, Rédemption, DTC, 1912-2004, with an abundant bibliography; cf. ET 47, 246 ff. (different views), 48, 267 ff. (bibliography). The ground is thus cleared and objections based on mistaken notions are removed. The idea that the Redemption puts constraint upon the good and loving Father from whom its whole design proceeds is as crude and false as that of a vindictive God calming his wrath by punishing his innocent Son. The Father reconciles humanity to himself through his Beloved Son, their new head, 2 Cor 5:18, and the Son crowns a life of devotion and solidarity with fallen man by a sacrifice of perfect obedience which gives back to his Father the honour and worship (violated by sin) which just order requires in man, constitutes him the Mediator of his brethren, and wins for himself the glory which the Father had destined for him, and for men the pardon they need. This act of reconciliation is not extrinsic to men. So effective is it that it calls forth their love and gives them grace to co-operate freely in the redemptive work itself, Phil 2:5; Rom 8:17; DTC, 1962 ff. Metaphors, such as the buying back of mankind at the price of Christ's blood, are only metaphors, whose legal implications are not to be pressed. Equally mistaken is any attempt to confine Christ's sacrifice within the categories of OT sacrifices, for while it fulfils them all, it utterly transcends them. However, Rivière's own theory of satisfaction needs incorporating, in our view, into the Mystery of the Total Christ, cf. Mersch, Théol. du Corps Mys., chh 10, 11.

The word 'Redemption' (ἀπολύτρωσις) is mainly positive in meaning. Five times out of seven in St Paul it stands for the wide process by which God gives us in Christ graces destined to expand in the glory of heaven, Rom 3:24; 8:23; 1 Cor 1:30; Eph 1:14; 4:30; cf. Lk 21:28. This shows that even when it is called 'the remission of sins', Eph 1:7; Col 1:14, it has

g This deliverance from spiritual danger into true happiness, implying a spiritual transformation, is also called Salvation, cf. § 643e. Perfectly realized only in heaven, it strictly stands for 'eternal life', being opposed to 'death', 'perdition', or 'wrath', cf. 1 Cor 3:15; 2 Cor 7:10; Phil 1:28; 1 Thess 5:8 f.; 2 Thess 2:10. But in a wider sense it means the entry into Christian 'justice' of those who are 'saved in hope' and continue to work out their salvation in fear, e.g. Rom 8:24; 1 Cor 15:2; Phil 2:12; 1 Tim 4:16; op. cit., 145 f. Salvation is due to God, 1 Cor 1:21; 1 Tim 2:4, to Christ, Ac 4:12; Rom 5:9; Heb 7:25, and comes through grace, Eph 2:5, faith, e.g. Ac 16:31; Rom 10:9, baptism, e.g. 1 Pet 3:21; Tit 3:5, 'the word', Jas 1:21; 1 Pet 2:2, an Apostle, Rom 11:14; 1 Cor 9:22, a husband or wife, 1 Cor 7:16, one of the faithful, Jas 5:20; Jude 23, attention to Christian doctrine, 1 Tim 4:16; cf. ZLG, σφύζω.

h St Paul's term 'Grace' now comes into its own (at least 100 times, apart from Heb, and 100 in rest of NT); cf. § 643b-d. God is always first in giving, Rom 11:34. The Incarnation with the Redemption is the 'gift' of God par excellence, founding the gratuity of the whole order of grace, which is the absolutely free gift of God's merciful love, 3:24; 5:8; 8:32; Eph 2:4-8; 2 Tim 1:9 f.; 1 Jn 4:9 f. Thus grace is the divine goodness shown in the promise made to Abraham, Gal 3:18, and realized in the Incarnation, 2 Cor 8:9 and specially in Christ's death, Gal 2:21. It is communicated to men, Rom 5:15 ff., by faith and baptism, and by those divine gifts which enable Christians to live their lives and fulfil their functions as members of the Christian community. The Christian state may simply be called 'grace', Gal 5:4; cf. Rom 6:14 f. 'Grace' thus appears as the common factor found in the diverse acts of the process whereby God raises humanity to himself. . . . This idea . . . strips of their prestige the so-called juridical theories of the Redemption', BEP, 147.

Hence Grace and Redemption may be taken as objective or subjective. St Paul sees these points of view together: men are 'justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath proposed to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood', Rom 3:24 f.

i We are redeemed from Sin—cf. § 643 f. As Apostle of salvation St Paul is intensely aware of the universal extension of sin in human history and society and his biblical education is illumined by his experience of the triumph of Christian grace in the tortured conscience of a great Pharisee vainly striving to keep the Law; cf. Rom 2:5-25. In Rom 1-3 he vividly depicts the sinful state of both Jews and Gentiles—for he knew what sin was like in the great cities of the empire. He uses to express it the LXX vocabulary: lawlessness (ἀνομία, the preponderating notion), impiety, impurity, error, disobedience, fall, transgression, and most frequently 'sin' (ἁμαρτία): in plur. personal sins, in sing.: Sin personified and the power of sin, op. cit., 107 ff. Concupiscence, or evil desire, is so much a factor in sin that it can be called 'sin', e.g. Rom 6:12; 7:7 f.; cf. Dz 792; KTW, III, 171.

j Whence comes sin's universality and man's inclination to evil? OT attested the facts, Ps 51(50) 7; Job 14:4, 17 ff., and contemporaries believed in an 'evil heart' or 'tendency' in man which had to be fought; but of original sin there are but vague traces in Jewish literature, which explicitly affirms only that the first sin had physical consequences, BJP, II, 12-23. It was consciousness of solidarity with Christ which illumined the moral solidarity of all men with Adam—a doctrine perhaps too hard to bear (cf. Jn 16:12) till the Redemption was accomplished and understandable only in terms of the Redemption. 'As in Adam all die, so in Christ all shall be made to live', 1 Cor 15:22, WV, expressed solidarity in death with Adam, but this is not only a solidarity in punishment. Sin entered the world through one man's fault and passed into all through solidarity with him, Rom 5:12-21. Starting from the accepted premises that without sin there is no retribution and that death is retribution for sin, St Paul argues to the universality of sin from the universality of death even in the time between Adam and Moses when no personal sins were committed which fell under the direct condemnation of a Law, 12-14. Therefore 'all had sinned' and 'through the disobedience of the one man the many were constituted sinners', 12, 19, WV; cf. Dz 789. This difficult doctrine is set in the context of the abundance of Christ's grace whereby 'we exult in God through our Lord Jesus Christ'. St Paul does not refer to it directly again (not in Rom 8:20-23, nor Eph 2:3) but describes the Redemption as remission of personal sins, Eph 1:7; 2:1-6; Col 1:14. As practical pastor of souls, he directs his attention to the virulence of the 'law of sin and death' in us, and our deliverance by 'the law of the spirit of life', Rom ch 7; 8:2; BEP, 109-15; Prat, I, 213-21; II, 57 ff., 221 ff.

The Flesh—in OT bāsar means the living matter of the bodies of animals and men, and suggests their weakness compared with God, Gen 6:3; Is 31:3; cf. Jl 2:28. St Paul uses 'flesh' for the elements of the body, Rom 2:28; 1 Cor 15:39, the body itself, 1 Cor 5:5; 2 Cor 4:11; Eph 2:14, the human person, e.g. Eph 5:29, life, e.g. 2 Cor 10:3, the race, e.g. Rom 9:3, human nature taken together, e.g. 3:20, and in its creaturely limitations as 'flesh and blood', 1 Cor 15:50; Gal 1:16; Eph 6:12; as distinguished from God but holy (Christ's human nature, Rom 1:3; 9:5); he also uses 'flesh' in some opposition to God as the merely natural, 4:1; 2 Cor 11:18, as natural generation opposed to that by God's promise, e.g. Rom 9:8; finally as 'the carnal', opposed to God or divine life in man, e.g. 7:5; 8:1-13; Gal 5:16-24, subject to sin and inclined to it, Rom 7:18, 25, and its instrument, e.g. 8:3, 12 f.; Gal 5:13; Eph 2:3. There is no physical division between body and spirit. St Paul's sources are not in Greek thought, but in Gen, where all things are good. There is a proud carnal mind, Col 2:18, a fleshly wisdom, 2 Cor 1:12; cf. 1 Cor 1:17; 3:3, sins of the flesh include sins against charity, Gal 5:16-22, and 'spirit' may be defiled as well as 'flesh', 2 Cor 7:1. Therefore 'the flesh' is the entire man disordered by sin, contrasted with 'the spirit' as the same man remade by grace; these correspond to 'the new man' and 'the old man', BEP, 106 f.; Prat, op. cit., II, 17-4; 402-4. *W. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism, 19 ff.

The Law in St Paul means habitually the Mosaic Law, with its 'commandments' and 'decrees', Rom 7:8-13; Eph 2:15; sometimes 'Scripture', cf. Rom 3:19; 1 Cor 14:21; other meanings, Prat, I, 224 ff. A Jew would not distinguish the natural and the Mosaic Law. The Law is God-given, and to have received it was a glory for the Jews to whom it brought moral enlightenment, Rom 9:4; 2:17-20. It is true, holy, just, and even 'spiritual', inspired by God, 2:20; 7:12, 14, 16; 1 Tim 1:8. It is 'for life', Rom 7:10; he who does the commandments will live, Gal 3:12; Lev 18:5; Lk 10:28. It leads men to faith in Christ and bears witness to justification, Gal 3:24; Rom 3:21. The justice that comes through faith, far from making void the Law, establishes its basis, 31, for 'God sent his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh . . . that the justice of the law might be fulfilled in us who walk . . . according to the spirit', 8:3 f. So the commandments remain, fulfilled by charity, 13:8, 10; Gal 5:14; Mt 5:17-20. Finally, there are just Israelites (and just pagans) whose observance of the law is not without faith and grace, Rom 2:13 ff.; 26 ff.; 10:5; cf. Heb 11 on OT 'faith'.

Why, then, does St Paul attack the regime of the m

645m Law, as of a law of sin and death, powerless before the flesh to do more than add to concupiscence the attraction of the forbidden fruit, Rom 8:2 f.; 3:20, a letter which kills, opposed to the life-giving spirit, 2:27, 29; 7:6; 2 Cor 3:6 f.? He is opposing dialectically the 'economy of the Law' to the 'economy of grace'. The Judaizers, by forcing all to submit to the whole Mosaic Law, would have frightened away the Gentiles from Christ, and corrupted the supernatural character of Christianity by changing submission to the Person of Christ into submission to the jurist, divine grace into a commercial system of retribution, and God's justice into their own; cf. Rom 10:3; Jn 10:34 f.; BEP, 135-42. The 'Jew' is thus the man who thinks he can fulfil the commandments by mere force of will, Rom 2:17 ff., and so transforms the Law into a system which brings only cursing and death, Gal 3:10, 13; Deut 27:26. In this sense no man is justified before God by the works of the Law but only by faith in Jesus Christ, Gal 2:16; 3:11; Rom 1:17; 3:20; cf. Ps 143 (Vg 142):2; Hab 2:4.

n If by giving knowledge of sin the Law is not to be simply a spur to sin, and so call forth divine wrath, Gal 3:19; Rom 5:20; 1 Cor 15:56 (cf. KTW, I, 765 f.), it must be brought into relation with Christ, and the total divine economy of the Promise, BEP, 136. The Promise, made to Abraham and realized in Christ, is not annulled by the Law which was promulgated in the interval, Gal 3:14 ff. The Law is inferior to the Promise and the Gospel, being given by the mediation of angels and Moses, not by the unitive act of the Son of God, 19 f., 22. For him it prepares, 24; he is its fulfilment, Rom 10:4; after him its regime gives place to that of faith and sonship, Gal 4:1-7, and its servitude to the liberty which Christ has won for us and gives us by the Spirit, 5:1, 13; 2 Cor 3:17. Those who are led by the Spirit are not under the Law made for transgressors, Gal 5:18; 1 Tim 1:9, but they are not without a divine law, for they are under Christ's, 1 Cor 9:20 f. Thus the commandments abide, fulfilled in Christ by the spirit of love, Rom 13:8, 1 Cor 9:8 ff.; Gal 5:14; the ceremonial law gradually fell into abeyance, BEP, 141 f. To sin and its consequences God's answer is 'the gift given in the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ', Rom 5:15, WV.

646a The Redemption is a Mystery of Divine Love, totally expressed in the Father's supreme gift: his Beloved Son. The initial Mystery, the incomprehensible excess of goodness and generosity, is that God loved sinners and gave up his own Son for them, 5:8; 8:32, 39; Eph 2:4 ff.; 1 Jn 4:8 ff. From this everything flows like a second creation, as gratuitous as the former but more splendid, 2 Cor 4:6; cf. Gen 1:3; Rom 8:19-23; 12:2; Gal 6:15; Eph 2:10.

The Father's Love initiates the whole redemptive work, and in him it ends: 'All things are of God who hath reconciled us to himself by Christ. . . . God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself', 2 Cor 5:18 f.; Rom 11:36. From him 'ye have your being in Christ Jesus', 1 Cor 1:30, WV. 'When the fulness of the time was come, God sent his Son . . . that we might receive the adoption of sons. And the proof that you are sons is that God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying: Abba, Father', Gal 4:4 ff.; Rom 8:14 ff. St Paul cannot thank him enough for his immense kindness, and from and to his praise moves the most splendid of the texts on the divine purpose, celebrating the glory and magnificence of the overflowing grace he has given us in his Son, Eph 1:3-14; cf. Col 1:12 ff.; Tit 3:4; Prat, op. cit., II, 85-89; Mersch, Théol. du Corps Mvs., I, 325-9, here followed.

b The Love of the Son—'If God is the unique first principle of the Redemption as he is of grace, Christ is the unique first principle in Redemption as he is in grace . . . the action of his humanity is the first, unique, universal principle', op. cit., 333. For Redemption is 'in Christ Jesus', Rom 3:24; 1 Cor 1:30; Col 1:14, a mystery of unity in him who includes all within himself cf. § 641j. The 'summing-up' of all things in the Beloved is expounded in Eph 1:3-14 with constant repetition of the words 'in Christ', BEP, 97-103. 'In him it hath pleased the Father that all the fulness should dwell, and through him to reconcile all things to himself, alike the things on earth and the things in heaven, making peace through the blood of his cross', Col 1:19 f., WV; cf. 2:9; Jn 1:16 f. But if Redemption is thus expressed in terms of the Mystical Christ, its source is the Personal Christ, who 'hath loved us and delivered himself for us', Eph 5:2; cf. Gal 2:20, loved the Church, his Body, with a burning love like that of bridegroom for bride, and died for her, Eph 5:23-32. From God's side all is union and love. Jesus is the only Mediator—The word passed beyond its juridic sense of an arbiter or negotiator between two parties with whom he had something in common (as Moses negotiated the acceptance of the Law between God and the people, Ex 19:3 ff.; Gal 3:19 f.) to indicate a much more intimate relation. Jesus is the Mediator of the New Covenant as the victim which the parties set between them as divine representative and guarantee, 1 Cor 11:25; Heb 8:6; 9:15; 12:24. Still more deeply, the sacrificial mediation of the God-man, in whom the fullness of the Godhead is incarnated and the fullness of mankind recapitulated, is founded on a communion of total solidarity. This mediation fulfils God's universal will to save, for 'there is only one God and only one mediator between God and men, Jesus Christ, who is a man, like them, and gave himself as a ransom for them all', 1 Tim 2:5 f., KNT. From him flow all supernatural graces, Rom 1:5; 5:21, peace, 5:1; justice, Phil 1:11; strengthening, 2 Cor 1:5; confidence, 3:4; the gift of the Spirit, Tit 3:6; victory, Rom 8:37; 1 Cor 15:57; eternal life, Rom 5:17, for by him are all things and we by him, 1 Cor 8:6; Prat, II, 166-70; BEP, 89-92.

Christ, in whom is realized God's eternal decree to save mankind is the Mediator of Predestination, Eph 1:3-14; 3:11. This high mystery involving the absolute freedom of God's love and grace given in fullness to the Son and then, without regard to previous 'works', to the brethren who are to be conformed to him, is set forth as a message of encouragement. But it needs to be understood!

We must distinguish Scriptural data from later theological developments. Since it was not till late in the OT that the future life was revealed, the idea of Predestination is only adumbrated there by 'the Book of Life', Ex 32:32; Ps 69(68) 29; Dan 12:1, an image recurring in Phil 4:3 and Apoc 3:5; 17:8; 20:12, 15; 21:27. The Gospels imply it, Mt 20:23; 24:24; 25:34; Lk 10:20; Jn 10:29. It is contained in the great subjects of hope: the Messianic blessings and the Kingdom of God. In this context it finds its theologian in St Paul, whose rabbinic training emphasized God's eternal dispositions, BJP, I, 188-91; BEP, 93-103, here followed; cf. DTC, Predestination, 2809-15.

Rom chh 9-11 envisage the Messianic election of Israel in function of the unbelief of the Jews and the call of the Gentiles. This is also a call to Christian grace, and therefore to salvation and glory, but we cannot simply transpose what St Paul says into terms of individual salvation. Besides, his warnings show that God's call does not guarantee perseverance, Phil 2:12, he knows that some pagans practise 'justice', Rom 2:27, and that God wishes all men to be saved, 1 Tim 2:4, and he always assumes personal responsibility. For predestination to be a motive of hope, it is enough that God wishes his loving call to lead to eternal happiness.

Predestination is totalitarian, bringing with it all subsequent graces, though man remains free. 'We know that for them that love God he worketh all things together unto good, for them that are called according to his purpose. For those whom he hath foreknown, them he hath predestined to bear a nature in the image of his Son's, that he should be first-born among many brethren. And those whom he hath predestined, 646g them he hath also called : and those whom he hath called, them he hath also justified : and those whom he hath justified, them he hath also glorified', Rom 8:28 ff., WV. God's love is expressed in his 'vocation' or 'election', Eph 2:4 ; 1 Thess 1:4, which results from his purposive design (πρόθεσις ; Rom 9:11 ff. ; Eph 1:11 ; 3:11 ; 2 Tim 1:9), man giving a return of love, 1 Cor 2:9 ; 1 Jn 4:19. To show that all graces come from God's free choice, St Paul in human fashion distinguishes five decisions or acts of God : prevenient, elective 'knowledge' ; involving friendship ; cf. 1 Cor 8:3 ; 13:12 ; Gal 4:8 f. ; BEP, 96, n. 2 ; DTC, art. cit., 2813 ; predestination (προορίζω, determine beforehand, cf. Ac 4:28 ; 1 Cor 2:7 ; Eph 1:5, 11 ; KTW, II, 702) ; efficacious calling to Christian grace ; (e.g. 1 Cor 1:9 ; 1 Thess 5:24 ; cf. Rom 9:12 ; KTW, III, 488-97 for OT terms) ; justification (the first realizing of this calling) ; and 'glory', whether possessed already or in hope, 5:2 ; 8:18.

h There is no basis in St Paul for the Calvinist doctrine of positive reprobation. What he says about collectivities or OT typical figures in the Messianic scheme cannot be simply applied to the eternal lot of individuals. As to the latter, ultimately nothing escapes God's will, but their 'rejection' or 'hardening' is due to personal or national sin and abuse of grace, cf. 1 Cor 1:23 f. A just judgement upon wilful obstinacy and hatred of the truth allows those who have refused the light to be further deceived in the course they choose, 2 Thess 2:9-12 ; cf. Rom 1:24-28 (pagans), 11:7-10 (Jews). In this sense those who reject the apostolic preaching are called 'those who perish', 1 Cor 1:18 ; 2 Cor 2:15 ; 4:3. But far from decreeing their sin in order that they might be damned, Rom 11:11, God shows much patience towards them, 9:22. The mystery of his predestined choice of souls on whom he will have mercy remains, 9:19 ff. But while he has prepared glory for the elect, 23 ; Mt 25:34, the eternal perdition of the damned is caused by their own sinful choice, BEP, 122 ff.

647a The New Adam is the Apostle's 'most complete, fruitful and original picture of the redeeming mission of Christ', Prat, II, 171. As we have borne the image of the man from slime, so we shall bear the image of the heavenly man who has become 'quickening spirit', 1 Cor 15:21 f., 44-49. As the first brought the universal reign of sin and death, so through the second, 'the gift in grace of the one man, Jesus Christ', grace superabounds and reigns unto life everlasting, Rom 5:12-21. Thus the Father has 'delivered us from the power of darkness and hath transferred us to the kingdom of his beloved Son ; in whom we have redemption, the forgiveness of our sins', Col 1:13 f., WV.

b Why did Christ die?—To overcome the world's proud wisdom by the folly of the Cross, 1 Cor 1:18-31, to show the abundance of God's love and kindness for us, Rom 5:8 ; 8:31-39 ; Eph 2:4-7, to give us a model, Phil 2:5-11 ; Eph 5:1 f. But the principal reason was to save sinners, e.g. 1 Tim 1:15 ; 1 Cor 15:3 ; Gal 1:4 ; cf. Mt 20:28 ; Lk 15:1 ff. ; 19:10 ; Jn 3:17 ; 1 Jn 4:10. To every aspect of sin, there will be a corresponding aspect in redemption, reconciliation being the most fundamental : 'God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ', 2 Cor 5:18 f. ; Col 1:19-22. Reconciled now by his cross in one body to God, all men have access through him in one Spirit to the Father, Eph 2:15-18, cf. Prat, II, 190.

c By what did Christ redeem us?—His Passion redeems, e.g. Rom 3:24 f. ; 1 Cor 6:20 ; Gal 3:13 ; 1 Tim 2:6, satisfies for sin, Rom 4:25 ; 1 Cor 15:17 ; Eph 5:2, and abolishes death, Rom 6:9 ff. ; 1 Cor 15:54-57 ; 2 Tim 1:10 ; cf. Lebr., HDT, 310. He himself refers to his death in terms of the sacrifice of the Covenant, e.g. Mt 26:28 ; 1 Cor 11:23 ff., and St Paul in terms of the sacrifices of Expiation and the Paschal Lamb, Rom 3:25 ; 1 Cor 5:7 ; cf. Heb 9:13 f. Through his blood we have remission of sins, reconciliation, peace and the graces of salvation and justification, e.g. Rom 5:9 f. ; Eph 1:7. Christ crucified, 'the lamb slain in the midst', 'a propitiation . . . in his blood' is the centre of the Redemptive tableau and the focus of Christian love, e.g. Apoc 5:6 ; Rom 3:25. But NT shows that the fullness of his Redemptive activity is constituted by his life of humiliation, poverty and obedience, culminating in his death on the Cross to fulfil his Father's command and triumphing in his exaltation, Phil 2:5-11 ; cf. Jn 5:30c ; 10:18c ; Rom 5:19 ; 2 Cor 8:9. His sacrificial will began with the Incarnation, sanctified us through the offering of his body once, and eternally presents his offering for us at the Father's right hand, Heb 10:5-14 ; cf. 7:28. This idea of sacrifice in its widest extension is suggested by other texts in which Jesus 'gives himself up' for us, Gal 1:4 ; 2:20 ; Eph 5:2, 25 ; 1 Tim 2:6 ; Tit 2:13 f. Moreover his death is inseparable from his Resurrection: 'Christ was delivered up for our sins and rose again for our justification', Rom 4:25 ; 2 Cor 5:15. He had himself foretold that he 'must' die and rise again, and that he would be 'consummated' the third day, Mt 16:21 ; Lk 13:32. The Apostles' insistence on the Resurrection is repeated in St Paul's constant declaration that the religion of the risen Christ fulfils the hope of Jews and Gentiles in a future life, Ac 23:6 ; 24:21 ; 26:23 ; 28:20 ; 1 Cor 15:12-22. Christ is 'life-giving Spirit', 'the Son of God in power', with whom even now we have been raised and made to sit in heavenly places, 15:45 ; Rom 1:4 ; Eph 2:5-10. Thus the efficacy of his death is joined with the power of his Resurrection in baptism and the Christian life, Rom 6:4 ; Phil 3:10 f. ; Col 2:12 ; 1 Pet 1:21 ; Apoc 1:18. St Paul even gives greater present importance to his Resurrection : 'If when we were enemies we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son, all the more, once reconciled, shall we be saved by his life', Rom 5:10, WV ; cf. 8:34.

Heb celebrates the Redemption by demonstrating the transcendence of Christianity over the Old Law in the Priesthood and Sacrifice of Christ. As the OT showed, a priest must come from among men and be called by God, 'appointed as a representative of men in the things that refer to God, that he may offer gifts and sacrifices for sins ; as one who can be mild with the ignorant and erring, since he himself is encompassed with weakness', Heb 5:1-4, WV. Jesus is the perfect priest. Sharing our flesh and blood, perfected by the sufferings and death in which he experienced obedience, he has become the cause of eternal salvation to all his brethren, 2:10 ff., 17 f. ; 4-14 f. ; 5:7 ff. The priestly role of the Messias, typified in Melchisedech, appears in the royal dignity of the priesthood of the Son of God who made propitiation for the people's sins and sits at God's right hand, pleading for us before the Father, 1:3 ; ch 7 ; 9:24 ff. ; cf. Ps 2:7 ; 110 (Vg 109):1, 4 ; Gen 14:17 ff. A priest must offer sacrifice, Heb 8:3. The sacrifice of Jesus, 8:1-10:18, fulfils and takes the place of all bloody and unbloody sacrifices of the OT, 9:9 ; 10:5, 8 ; cf. § 64d, e. In the great sacrifice of Kippurim the high-priest after expiating sin by the blood of victims might once a year penetrate into the Holy of Holies. Jesus, offering himself once, gained by his own blood eternal redemption and entered heaven which he opens to all. This sacrifice, being perfect, is unique, redeeming once for all the sins committed both before and after it, 9:6-15 ; cf. Rom 3:25 ; 6:10, for the divine Person communicates eternal effects to his sacrificial will, Heb 9:12 ff. ; 13:8 ; DBV(S), Expiation, 190-202.

The New Life in Christ Jesus—There is now Redemption for all men 'in Christ Jesus'. Their incorporation in him is one process described under various heads : the Gift of the Spirit—Faith—Justification—Baptism. The Gift of the Spirit—Christ completes his redemptive work by sending the Spirit from the Father, Jn 15:26 ; 16:7 ; Ac 1:8 ; cf. § 651b. 'Christ hath ransomed us from the curse of the Law . . . that in virtue of faith we may receive the promised Spirit', Gal 3:13 f., WV. Thus when no controversy imposes another termino-648b logy, entry into Christian life is described as the coming of the Spirit: 'Let me be content with asking you one question, Was it from observance of the law that the Spirit came to you, or from obeying the call of faith?', 3:2, 5, KNT.

c Spirit—(379 times in NT, 145 in St Paul) can mean: the superior, thinking principle in man, often opposed to 'flesh', so 'mind' and also 'a manner of thinking', e.g. Mt 26:41; 1 Cor 2:11 f.; incorporeal natures—God, the soul, angels, devils, e.g. Mt 10:1; Jn 4:24; Ac 23:8; Heb 1:14; the OT ruah, divine Principle or Force, and this is possessed by Christ, Rom 1:4; 1 Cor 15:45; 2 Cor 3:17 f.; cf. BEP, 59, 61. Finally it means a distinct, divine Person, highest revelation of this Divine Principle, and man under his influence with 'spiritual' graces and functions, and all that we call 'the supernatural life', e.g. Rom 7:14; 1 Cor 9:11; 15:44; Gal 5:22; Eph 1:3; 1 Thess 5:19; Jud 19. These last senses of man's 'spirit' and 'the Spirit' acting within him are often hard to distinguish, just because the latter is constantly in view. Generally he is called 'the Spirit of God', 'the Spirit of Christ' and 'the Holy Spirit' (but this can mean, his communication, e.g. Ac 6:5; 2 Cor 6:6). His Person is clearly indicated when distinguished from the Divine Essence or the other Persons, e.g. 1 Cor 2:10; 12:4; 2 Cor 13:13; cf. Prat, op. cit., II, 405 ff., 435 ff.; BEP, 74 ff.; § 640f. In him Christian life flows from the Holy Trinity itself.

d He is the Spirit of the Son, and makes Christians sons too, filling them with the spirit of sonship, and pouring the love of God into our hearts, Gal 4:6; Rom 8:15 f.; 5:5. He inspires the word of the preacher and its reception and marks it by his wonders, 1 Thess 1:5 f.; Rom 15:19. His coming is a call to holiness and a seal, a pledge of final Redemption, 1 Thess 4:7 f.; 2 Thess 2:13; Rom 8:23; Gal 5:5; Eph 1:3. All are baptized in one Spirit to make one body, 1 Cor 12:13; 6:11. Dwelling in them as in his temple, he transforms them, giving them a new life, 1 Cor 3:16; 6:11, 19; 2 Cor 3:6; Tit 3:5 f. He knows and reveals the deep things of God, 1 Cor 2:10 f.; Jn 16:3; 1 Jn 2:27, and aids their weakness by praying with them, Rom 8:26; cf. Mt 10:20. Where he is, there is liberty, 2 Cor 3:17. Henceforth they are to believe, hope, love, live and walk in the Spirit, Gal 5:5 f., 16–25; Rom 5:2–5; 8:4. For the giving of the fullness of the Spirit cf. § 651.

e Faith—St Paul develops the Gospel concept, cf. § 543i–k. Faith 'in Christum', self-giving to Christ, e.g. Gal 2:16b, brings faith 'in Christo', an interpenetration of the believer and Christ, e.g. 3:26; cf. 1 Tim 1:14 'faith and love in Christ Jesus'. 'The faith of Christ Jesus' seems to be faith which has Christ as object and lays the foundation of a life in common, Gal 2:16a, 20; 3:22; Rom 3:22, 26; Eph 3:12; Phil 3:9. Faith must profess doctrines about Christ, e.g. he is 'Lord' and God has raised him from the dead, Rom 10:9. Thus it ascends through him to the Father, 4:24; Col 2:12; BEP, 177 ff.; cf. Prat, II, Note V for other meanings of 'faith', such as 'the Faith', the object of belief, Gal 1:23.

f The preambles of faith are proved to the Jews from miracles, prophecies and memories of Christ's life, Ac 2:15–36; 17:2 ff., and to pagans by a rational approach to God's unity and Providence, 17:23 ff.; cf. 14:15 ff.; signs of power accompanied Paul's apostolate, 2 Cor 12:12; cf. Rom 15:19. Christians must show their faith's divine origin by the holiness, purity, gentleness and charity of their lives, and be able to give an account of it, 1 Pet 2:12–3:16. God's witness to Christianity makes belief a moral obligation, but men can refuse to 'obey the Gospel', Rom 10:16; 1 Cor 15:15; 2 Cor 4:4; 1 Jn 5:10.

g Faith is the Gift of God—the initial grace of salvation which comes from his free call, Gal 1:15 f.; Eph 2:8; Phil 1:29; Tit 1:1, though men must accept it to be worthy of eternal life, Ac 13:46, 48. Normally one must hear to believe, but God sends the preacher and it is Christ's 'word' which he speaks, Rom 10:14–18.

This 'word' is faithfully transmitted by the Apostles and must be accepted as God's: 'When you had received from us the word of the hearing of God, you received it not as the word of men, but (as it is indeed) the word of God', 1 Thess 2:13; cf. Rom 1:4 f.; Heb 4:2. It 'worketh in you that believed', 'living and energizing and keener than any two-edged sword', 'a judge of the thoughts of the heart', 1 Thess 2:13; Heb 4:12, WV; cf. Jn 12:48; Apoc 19:15. Acceptance is itself a grace, for the fundamental confession 'Jesus is Lord' can be made only 'in the Holy Spirit', 1 Cor 12:3; cf. Gal 3:2.

God's gift requires men's co-operation, as in the typical case of Abraham, Gal 3:6; Rom 4:3, 10, and they should be obedient to it, Rom 1:5. Their faith is a homage, Phil 2:17; it comes from the 'heart', Rom 10:9 f.; it grows and becomes strong, 2 Cor 10:15; Col 2:7; 2 Thess 1:3; or loses vitality, 2 Cor 13:5. It should be sound and wholesome, firm against evil influences, 1 Cor 16:13; Tit 1:13; 2:2, and used as a defensive armour, Eph 6:16; 1 Thess 5:8. It brings knowledge of divine truth which is veiled from unbelievers, 2 Cor 4:2–4; Phil 3:8–10. It launches a man into a new life, lived with ardent confidence in God, 2 Cor 1:9; 2 Tim 1:12; Heb 10:23 f., and issues in 'the work of faith', 1 Thess 1:3. Because he has faith Paul does not fear to speak his mind, 2 Cor 4:13, and Christians must profess theirs openly, Rom 10:9; Phil 2:11.

'Faith is a basis of things hoped for, a demonstration of things not seen', Heb 11:1; cf. ZLG; DBV(S), Foi, 298. It is thus indispensable for salvation, first of the three great virtues by which we share in the life of God, for without 'faith it is impossible to please him', 11:6, WV; cf. Rom 1:16; 10:9; 1 Cor 13:13. It gives to hope the certainty which rests on divine testimony, Heb 11:4 ff., yet it is not vision, for it concerns things still invisible; cf. 1 Cor 13:12; 2 Cor 4:18; 5:7. Such was the faith of Abraham and of all the just of the OT, Rom 4:19 ff.; Heb 11:2–40.

Christians believe in 'the truth', e.g. 2 Thess 2:12; J Eph 6:14, 16; 1 Tim 2:7. St Paul is always anxious that they should grow in knowledge, wisdom and spiritual understanding as the perfect development of their Christian life, 1 Cor 2:5 ff.; Eph 1:17 ff.; 3:17 ff. Col 2:2 f. The intellectual element in faith is also shown by the historical facts to be believed, 1 Cor 15:3 ff.; 1 Thess 4:14, and by injunctions to keep the apostolic 'traditions' and the 'deposit', 2 Thess 2:15; 3:6; 2 Tim 1:14; 2:2. The idea of orthodoxy in faith emerges from Paul's constant warnings against 'another Gospel', Gal 1:6–9, and specious doctrines leading them astray from the true faith they had learnt, Rom 16:17 ff.; Eph 4:14 f.; Phil 1:27 f.; Col 2:6 ff.; Heb 13:9. The object to be believed consists in revelation as a whole, and particular doctrines, such as Christ's resurrection and ours, Rom 6:8; 10:9; 1 Cor 15:12 ff.; 1 Thess 4:14.

What has been said shows the inadequacy of the Lutheran definition of faith: 'a technical term to express reliance on Christ for salvation', HDB, I, 830. For views of modern Protestants cf. Prat, II, 233 f. Some make faith an attitude of sentiment, but others see in it a conviction of spirit, an adherence to the truths of the Gospel, and so they converge with Catholic doctrine, which never regards faith as purely intellectual, cf. Lagrange, Ep. aux Rom., 137.

Faith and Justification—Why does St Paul often attribute justification to faith? Faith was constantly demanded by Christ, founds a life in common with him, cf. §§ 648e, 643i, and had been the first, well-remembered and critical disposition in conversion. Besides, Paul argues against the Judaizers from the great OT type, Abraham, whose 'faith was reputed to him unto justice', Gen 15:6, and applies Hab 2:4, e.g. Gal 3:6 ff.; Rom 1:17; 4:3 ff. Justifying faith is 'living' faith, working through charity, which is often mentioned with it, Gal 5:6; 1 Cor 13:13; 1 Thess 5:8; 2 Tim 1:13; contrast faith without charity, 1 Cor 13:2, 8.

6481 So Paul's emphasis on faith does not exclude other elements in justification and salvation. NT ascribes these to faith, e.g. Jn 3:16; Ac 16:31, but also to repentance with faith, Mk 1:15, faith with baptism, 16:16, repentance with baptism, Ac 2:38, baptism, Jn 3:5; 1 Cor 6:11; Eph 5:26; Tit 3:5, grace, Jn 6:44; Rom 11:6; Eph 2:5; Tit 3:7, keeping the commandments, Mt 19:17; Rom 2:13, and final perseverance, Mt 10:22; Apoc 2:10; DTC, Foi, 72-5.

m Faith and Justice—Justice is spoken of as 'of', 'from', 'through', 'by' and 'upon' faith, e.g. Rom 4:11 f.; Gal 2:16; Rom 1:17; 3:28; Phil 3:9. From God's side faith 'is reputed to' justice because they are two stages in one gracious operation. From man's side, faith, the co-operative use of intellect and will to adhere to God in Christ, is the last disposition for justification, which is itself the freely accepted work of grace. Hence faith is 'the foundation and root of all justification', Dz 801.

n Faith and Works—'Man is justified by faith without the works of the Law', Rom 3:28; Gal 2:16, expresses St Paul's usual contrast between grace and merely human effort. This faith is accompanied by charity and good works 'in Christ Jesus', Gal 5:6; Eph 2:10. But some abused St Paul's language to calumniate him, Rom 3:8. St James knew others who really made faith a 'dead' thing, mere intellectual adhesion without good works. He insists that Abraham was justified by works coming from faith when he showed himself ready to sacrifice Isaac, Jas 2:14-26; cf. Heb ch 11. St Paul safeguards the principle that faith comes from grace, St James the need to put it into practice. There is conflict only with the Lutheran doctrine of 'justification by faith alone', BEP, 201-5.

o Justification, though not the preponderating element in St Paul's doctrine, is an essential one, as is shown by the controversial concentration of Gal and Rom, and other allusions, e.g. Ac 13:38 f.; Gal 2:15 ff. He used familiar OT words and phrases, 'just', 'justice' and 'justification' to insist against the Pharisees that salvation is always initiated by God, that the first step in the Christian life comes entirely from grace, and that man cannot 'glory' as if it were due to him for mere human works done under the Law, Rom 3:21-27; 4:2; 8:30; Eph 2:8 f.; cf. Bonsirven, op. cit., 199 ff.; KTW, II, 176-229; IV, 649 ff. It was because the Jews did not know God's justice and sought to establish their own, that they did not submit to God's, Rom 10:3. Yet Abraham, the great OT type, had 'believed God and it was reckoned to him justness. Now to him that worketh, his reward is not reckoned as an act of grace, but as a debt; but to him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the impious, his faith is reckoned justness', 4:3 ff., WV; Gal 3:6, 18.

p Scripture, as Catholic theology has always recognized, does not oppose 'justice' to 'mercy' and 'grace', DBV(S), Grâce, 1271. Justice is often associated with mercy in God and man, and in the second part of Is is parallel with salvation, e.g. Ps 85 (84) 10 f.; 116 (114) 5; 145 (144) 7; Os 2:19; Mic 6:8; Is 45:8, 21-26, art. cit., supra, 733 f. Hence 'the justice of God' which is the theme in Rom, is not ordinarily that whereby he judges (as Rom 3:5; Ac 17:31), still less vindictive justice, but justice which brings salvation, Rom 1:16 f. It is God's activity in justifying men whom he pardons on account of Christ's death, and is opposed to 'wrath', art. cit., 1011. But it takes from man all boasting save 'in the Lord', e.g. Rom 2:23; 3:21-27; 1 Cor 1:29 ff.

q God does not simply declare men just, covering non-imputed sins by the justice of Christ, as earlier Reformers asserted, DTC, Justification, 2131-54; 2192-207. In OT the sense which LXX renders 'justify' (δικαιόω) is almost always 'recognize as just', (man also 'justifies' God), and the passive has the intransitive meaning 'to be'; or 'become just'; where God 'declares a man just', he is so. St Paul transforms these OT concepts by deepening them. God makes men just. The justice of God, received in Jesus and flowing from the gift of faith, becomes our justice and redemption and source of eternal life, Rom 3:24 f.; 5:17 f.; 1 Cor 1:30; 2 Cor 5:21; Tit 3:7. Although 'to justify' has a declaratory, eschatological sense in Rom 2:13, it usually stands for God's initial act in conferring 'the gift of justice on one who has believed, asked for and received baptism', Lagrange, Ep. aux Rom., 122-41. Our 'justice' is therefore a spiritual condition due to a profound divine action, Gal 3:5 ff.; Rom 4:3 ff. It is Christian communion and participation in Christ taken in its beginning—though also in its being and end: 'That I may gain Christ and be found in him, not having for my justness that which is from the Law, but that which is through faith in Christ, that justness which cometh from God, based upon faith—that so I may know him, what the power of his resurrection, what fellowship in his sufferings, and become one with him in his death, in the hope that I may attain to the resurrection from the dead', Phil 3:9 ff., WV; BEP, 210. Such is St Paul's legitimate development of Hab 2:4, Gal 3:11 f.; Rom 1:17; Heb 10:38; cf. § 640j.

God justifies the Impious, Rom 4:5, not merely by a simple pardon, but by a gracious transformation so radical that they are as really just as they were formerly sinners, as free of sin as a dead man of earthly punishment for crime, 'there is now no condemnation for those in Christ Jesus', 3:24 f.; 5:18 f.; 6:7; 8:1; 1 Cor 6:11; 1 Pet 4:1 f. This is a bestowal of divine life which removes evil by surmounting it. In place of sin with its wages of death, grace reigns through a living justice with hope of life everlasting, Rom 5:21; 6:23; Tit 3:7. Free now from sin, the just man must give himself to the service of this saving justice whose fruit is holiness and whose term is heavenly glory, Rom 1:16 f.; 5:9; 6:19, 22; 8:30. The Kingdom of God is 'justice and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost', 14:17.

Justification by Faith and Baptism—Faith and baptism are closely connected, and there is no 'unresolved conflict' in St Paul between them. Faith leads to, and cannot be separated from baptism, its efficacious symbol, which identifies the believer with Christ; baptism is the sacrament of faith, for to be baptized one must believe, Mk 16:16; Eph 1:13 f.; Col 2:12. Tradition and the Liturgy show this in practice. When opposing Jewish concepts, Paul attaches justification to faith; when speaking to Christians, he shows it received in and through baptism and the gift of the Spirit, 1 Cor 6:11. This leaves room for the Catholic doctrine that justifying faith includes baptism of desire, Lagr., Ep. aux Rom., 149-52.

St John, prior to St Paul as witness to Christ, certainly knew his writings, and seems to have illustrated them in his use of the Gospel data. But he has his own approach to the Redemption. For St Paul we must 'die to be born', for St John we must 'be born to live' DBV(S), Jean, Evangile, 817; Epîtres, 804, citing *Ed. Reuss, La théol. joh., 143. The seed of God, which is eternal life, is received by the children of God in their new birth from the Spirit, 1:12; 3:3, 5 f.; 1 Jn 3:9. By believing Jesus to be the Son of God, they will have life, Jn 20:31; cf. Gal 2:20.

For St John, as for St Paul, all flows from the Father's love and all returns to the Father. 'God is love', and has been the first to love us, proving the greatness of his love by sending his only begotten Son as propitiation for our sins and those of the whole world, Jn 3:16; 1 Jn 4:8 ff., 14, 16, 19; Rom 3:25; 5:8; 8:32. The Father loves the Son and has given all into his hand, Jn 3:35; 5:20; 15:9, and the Son loves the Father, does his will always, and glorifies him through the Cross which is his own triumph, 3:14; 12:32; 13:31 f.; 14:31. In the Resurrection the Father glorifies the Son, and the Son, 'the Resurrection and the life', glorifies the Father by imparting his own glory to those whom the Father has given him, 7:39; 11:25; 14:13; 15:8; 17:1-5; cf. Phil 2:6-10; 2 Cor 649b 3:18. His Father's love will be in them, as he is, and they will see his glory, Jn 1:14; 17:22, 24. 'In this we have known love: in that he hath laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren', 1 Jn 3:16. St John holds up love's divine model to urge brotherly love, where St Paul (but cf. Phil 2:5 ff.) tends to stress pardon to inculcate trust, Rom 5:5-11; 2 Cor 5:18 ff. 'The diversity of approach only brings out the fundamental identity of teaching: the powerlessness of man, the prevenient action of God, the initiative of the Father, the love of the Son, the mission of salvation embracing the entire life of Jesus and consummated by his death', and his Resurrection, DBV(S), Expiation, 229 f.

e St John is as conscious as St Paul of Sin (cf. § 645i, j) which he expresses in the vivid contrasts of present judgement: Light and darkness, Life and death, Truth and the lie, from on high and from below, heavenly and earthly, God and the devil. Men of evil works love the darkness and will not come to the light, Jn 3:19 f.; 12:46 ff., nor take the life given by Jesus, 3:36; 5:24, 40; 6:53, nor believe him when he speaks the Truth, nor for its freedom shake off sin's slavery, 8:32-37, 40-46; cf. Rom 6:16; 2 Thess 2:10 ff. 'He that doth sin is of the devil . . . to this end was the Son of God manifested, that he might undo the works of the devil', 1 Jn 3:8. This is no dualism, for if men are ready to do God's will, they see that Jesus's doctrine is from God, Jn 7:17, the Saviour of the world draws them to himself, 4:42; 12:32; 1 Jn 4:14, and they pass from the flesh to the spirit, from death to life, Jn 3:3-8; 5:24.

d Though the Baptist had pointed to the 'Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world', it was only on the Cross that he was shown as the true Paschal Lamb, 1:29, 36; 19:34-37; Ex 12:46; cf. Is 53:7. Jesus at first speaks of his redemptive death and resurrection in veiled terms, Jn 2:19 ff.; 3:14 f.; 7:33; 8:28. It is chiefly in the parable of the Good Shepherd that he shows his intention of laying down his life for his sheep with a free, tender love for them which goes with his love for his Father's will, 10:14-18. When in his last days Gentiles sought to speak to him, he foresaw his coming exaltation when he would draw all men to himself and the grain of wheat in dying would bring forth much fruit. Then, after a momentary anticipation of the terrors of Gethsemani, he bade his Father glorify his name, 12:24-32; cf. 15:8. The expiatory effects of his death were foretold in the last oracle of a high-priest, 11:50 ff.

e The life of the Church is the fulfilment of the Redemption—It is in a baptismal context that Jesus declares he must be 'lifted up' that those who believe in him may have eternal life, 3:14 f. The work of the Incarnation, the Son given, the Word made flesh, which is consummated in his expiatory death, is continued in his Eucharistic mystery, 6:51; 1:14; 3:16. The Last Supper is its liturgical setting, and there the divine Priest-Victim's self-consecration consecrates the ministers of his redemptive work, 17:17 ff.; cf. Ex 29:1; Lev 8:14-33; Mt 23:17; Heb 2:11; 10:10. Its effect will be the sending of the Paraclete, Jn 16:7, and the indwelling of all the Divine Persons, 14:16-26. Finally, the Cross is both sacrifice and source of sacrament, for the blood and water which flow from the Saviour's pierced side betoken baptism and the Eucharist, 19:34-37; Zach 12:10-13:6; 1 Jn 1:7 ff.; 5:6. Those who are nourished by his sacrificed body and blood and abide in him, will have eternal life, Jn 6:51-58. Thus 'the apostle of love, the doctor of religion "in spirit and in truth" keeps fundamentally the same language as St Paul', DBV(S), art. cit., 202-24.

f Redemption as Union—Sin causes disunity, Satan's scattering of God's flock, Jn 10:12; 16:32; cf. e.g. Gen 11:1 ff.; Jer 10:21; Zach 13:7; Mt 12:24-30; 26:31; Lk 15:3 f. Jesus died to gather God's scattered children into one and give them peace in himself, Jn 11:52; 10:16; 16:33; cf. Eph 2:15 f. Sharing the glory of the Crucified, they enter the very unity of the Son with the Father, their own unity being a visible proof of his mission: 'The glory which thou hast given me, I have given them, that they may be one, as we are one—I in them and thou in me—that they may be perfected in unity, in order that the world may know that thou hast sent me', Jn 17:20-23, WV. The object of the Redemption is the At-one-ment with the Divine Persons of that Communion which is the Church, cf. §§ 636, 637.

Christ who shed his blood in redemptive love is risen and reigns for ever, and Christians reign with him, sharing his resurrection and eternal Priesthood, while they await his coming, Apoc 1:5-7; 20:6; cf. Eph 2:4 ff.; 1 Pet 1:3-9. They have 'washed their garments in his blood', triumphing through his sacrifice by a work which is also their own, Apoc 7:14; 12:11. John had never forgotten his first sight of the Lamb of God, Jn 1:29, and in 'the most brilliant prophetic vision in the Bible' he sees amid the Throne and the whole company of heaven a Lamb 'as it were slain', yet standing in symbol of life, with the seven horns and eyes of universal power and knowledge, while the twenty-four ancients who represent mankind and myriads of angels and every creature praise and adore him: 'For thou wast sacrificed, and didst redeem to God through thy blood men from every tribe and tongue and people and nation, and hast made them a kingdom and priests to our God, and they shall reign upon the earth'! Apoc 5:6-14, WV; cf. DBV(S), art. cit., 234-42.

V THE SACRAMENTS

Baptism—Critics have tried to break the links between the acts and interventions of Jesus and the NT doctrine of baptism; cf. Dz 2039. But St Paul assumes that the rite and its efficacious symbolism were familiar to the Christian communities. Union with the historic Person of Jesus, requiring moral co-operation on the highest plane, is altogether different from the vague, magical Pantheism of the 'mystery rites', and Jewish and Christian horror of paganism would have repelled any infiltration; cf. DBV(S), Baptême (Coppens), 903-20; § 645d.

Others would derive it from ritual, Jewish washings. The practices of the Essenes have been cited, but this small Pharisaic sect had no provable influence on Christianity, DBV(S), Esséniens (Marchal), 1109-32. The bath of the proselytes came into use in the 1st cent., and was a rite of transition from the legal impurity of idolatry to a new, juridical state; the Talmud compares it with the emancipation of slaves. Although the proselyte is called a 'new-born babe', e.g. Yeb. 22a, this is far from the spiritual re-birth of Jn 3:1-10; Tit 3:5; 1 Pet 1:23; 2:2, which Jewish critics themselves call 'magical', Prat, op. cit., II, 466 ff.; DBV(S), Baptême, 892-95; JE, Baptism, 499 f.; *A. Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus, II, App. 12.

Such rites were given a deeper meaning in the baptism of John, which was a true preparation for the Kingdom, a symbolic act in the manner of the Hebrew prophets, realistically understood by those who received it as embodying their repentance and its acceptance; cf. *Flemington, 22. Jesus himself submitted to it at the inauguration of his public life, the primitive preaching recalled it, e.g. Ac 10:37 (cf. Heb 6:2), and the stress which the Evangelists laid upon this baptism of Jesus with the accompanying manifestation of the Three Divine Persons and of the Divine Sonship of Jesus, shows how significant it was for Christian baptism. The Baptist himself said he was preparing for one greater than he, who would 'baptize in the Holy Ghost and fire', Mt 3:11; Mk 1:7 f.; Lk 3:16; Jn 1:31, 33; cf. Ac 19:4. 'Fire' was the image of divine, purifying work in souls, Deut 4:24; Is 1:25; Mal 3:2 f. That water was also part of Christian baptism is attested by the word βαπτίζω and by e.g. Jn 3:5; Ac 8:36; 10:47;

650d Eph 5:26. The rite made ready by the Baptist was employed by the disciples of Jesus, Jn 3:22-26, though whether as a continuance of John's baptism (cf. Ac 19:3; Chrys., PG, 59, 167), or as that of the Spirit (Aug. PL, 33, 178) is controverted. Our Lord himself commented upon the Baptist's enigmatic prophecy: 'Amen, amen I say to thee: unless a man be born of water and Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God', Jn 3:5. The Spirit, principle of God's creation of life, Gen 1:2; 2:7; Ezech 37:5 ff., now gives that higher life of divine sonship which is contrasted with the life transmitted through the flesh, Jn 3:6; cf. 1:13; 6:63. The rite through which this was effected is assumed to be familiar to the hearers of the Gospel.

• The life of the Spirit was given in its fullness after the glorification of the Redeemer, Jn 7:39, and it was then he gave his command to baptize universally: 'All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me; you, therefore, must go out, making disciples of all nations, and baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost', Mt 28:18 ff., KNT; cf. Mk 16:15 f. This universalism is in line with the prophetic tradition, Is 49:6; Hab 2:14; Lk 2:32; 3:6, the restriction of the Apostles to Israel, Mt 10:5 ff., being lifted now that Jesus's power shines forth in splendour. The Trinitarian doctrine forms a natural conclusion to the Synoptic data, and the frequency of explicit or implied Trinitarian formulae in St Paul—often in connexion with Baptism—shows they were familiar to the earliest Christians. The text in our form is in all MSS and ancient versions, and is quoted by Cyprian, Origen, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Irenaeus and Theodotus. Hence *F. Conybeare's attempt (ZNTW, 1901, 775-88; HJ, 1902, 102-8) to prove from shorter, free citations in Eusebius and others that the Trinitarian and baptismal references were post-Nicene interpolations should never have found support; it was disposed of by *F. H. Chase, The Lord's Command to Baptize, JTS 6 (1905) 481-521; 8 (1907) 161-84; cf. Lebr., HDT, I, Note 4, 436-9; DBV(S), Baptême, 859-64, 920-1, and Com. on Mt 28:18.

† But if Christ prescribed the Trinitarian formula, why do Ac speak of 'baptism in the name of Jesus'? This is held to disprove the authenticity of Mt 28:18 f. even by *Flemington, 108 f., who shows that baptism must have come from a command of Christ. Others assert that the use of 'the name' was a magical exorcism. But in Heb. 'the name' is the person, and cf. §§ 645d, 650d. By rabbinical usage, 'in the name' had a causal or a final meaning, SB, 590, 1045 f. on Mt 10:41; 28:19, and some have held that the Trinitarian liturgical form was not ordered by Jesus, but only baptism 'into union with', or 'by a consecration to', the Divine Persons, Lebr., HDT, 257 f., 439; *J. Armytage Robinson, JTS 8 (1906) 195.

§ But that the Trinitarian form was actually employed is at least strongly suggested by the constant NT allusions to the Trinity in relation to the baptismal rite or its effects, e.g. Ac 2:22-39; 10:34-38; Rom 15:16; 1 Cor 6:11; 12:4 ff., 13; Eph 4:4 ff.; 2 Thess 2:13 ff.; Heb 10:29; 1 Pet 1:2; 2:5; 4:14, and perhaps Paul's question to the men at Ephesus, Ac 19:2 f. The long-standing difficulty is removed if it is recognized that 'baptism in the name of Jesus' refers, not to the action and words of the baptizer, but to the confession of faith made by the adult receiving baptism. J. Crehan, S.J., op. cit., has shown that the Baptist had required faith in him who was to come, 19:4, Paul was baptized 'calling upon his name', 22:16, and Christians were those who 'call upon the name of the Lord', e.g. 9:14, 21; Rom 10:12; 1 Cor 1:2. The invocation seems postulated by St Peter, Ac 2:21, 38; 10:43; 1 Pet 3:21, as by the reading, certainly older than Irenaeus, 'I believe that Jesus is the Son of God' in Ac 8:37, and by St Paul, e.g. Rom 10:9; cf. Phil 2:10 f. J. Coppens, DBV(S), Baptême, 872 ff., gives another explanation: baptism 'in the name' was baptism 'on the authority of Jesus' as foundation or efficacious source (ἐν or ἐν), or 'into the Mystical Christ' (εἰς). The use of the Trinitarian formula, as enjoined by our Lord, remains untouched. 650g

The administration of baptism was the normal conclusion of apostolic preaching, Ac 2:37 f.; 8:12 ff., 32 ff.; 9:18; 10:44 ff.; 16:14 f.; 19:1 ff. The NT presupposes it alike in Pauline and non-Pauline churches, e.g. Rom ch 6; 1 Cor 1:13 ff.; 12:13; Gal 3:27; Eph 4:5; Heb 6:2 ff.; 1 Pet 3:20 f. This could be due only to the initiative of Christ, art. cit., 863 f. Baptism was a bath of purification and sanctification which incorporated men into the Messianic Kingdom, 1 Cor 6:9, 11, an effect expressed subjectively by confession of Jesus as Lord and by the moral conversion foretold by the prophets. It accorded a share in the remission of sins, the gift of the Spirit and the Table of the Lord, Ac 2:38, 41; 5:31 f.; 10:43, and rescue from the power of the devil—though Ac mentions this only once, 26:18, showing how far baptism was from being a 'magical' exorcism. The simple exposition of baptism as a purification from sin and a new birth was easily understood by the first converts and is recalled by St Paul, 1 Cor 6:11; Eph 5:26; Tit 3:5; Heb 6:2; 10:20.

But the aspect expressed by baptism 'into Christ', e.g. Rom 6:3; Gal 3:27; cf. 1 Cor 12:13 'into one body', and by the reception of the Spirit, showed that the baptized entered into communion with their risen Lord. Moreover Jesus himself had suggested a connexion between baptism and his Passion by describing it as a baptism preparatory to glory, and to the 'fire' he would cast upon the earth, Mk 10:38; Lk 12:50. When he entered into his glory as 'life-giving Spirit', 1 Cor 15:45, he baptized 'in the Holy Spirit and fire', (cf. Mt 3:11; Lk 3:16) those to be born of 'water and the Spirit', Jn 3:5. St Paul can assume as part of the common faith that the power of Christ's redeeming death and resurrection pass to the baptized in the act of baptism, Rom 6:3 ff.; 1 Cor 1:13; Col 2:11 f.; cf. Heb 10:22. They have been crucified with Christ, Gal 2:19, baptized into his death so that they have died mystically with him, so that with their 'body of sin' destroyed, they live no longer 'in the flesh' but 'in the spirit', Rom 6:3, 11; 7:5 f.; 8:9; Col 2:20; 3:3. They have been buried with him beneath the baptismal waters to rise gloriously with him to a new life, to 'put on Christ', Rom 6:4 f.; Gal 3:27; Col 2:12 f.; cf. Is 61:10.

The development of the graces of baptism as a sharing in Christ's death and resurrection provides Christians with their life-programme, e.g. Rom 6:4, 6-18; Col 2:20; 3:1, 3. Their baptism is the source of a new morality. St Paul, writing to those already baptized, drops the mention of repentance. He appeals to the new life they have begun in decisive contrast to the old, 1 Cor 6:9-11. At baptism they crucified their flesh with its passions and lusts, Gal 5:24, and henceforth, led by the Spirit of God who dwells in them, they must wage deadly war on their concupiscence, Rom 8:8 ff., 13 f. They are 'dead' to sin and their real life is hidden with Christ in God, 6:2, 8, 11; Col 3:3. As sons of God, they must suffer with the Son that his life may appear in them, and they be glorified with him, Rom 8:15-17; 2 Cor 4:11; Gal 3:26 f.; 2 Tim 2:11. Their baptismal life means freedom, not freedom to sin but freedom from sin, Rom 6:12 ff.; 8:2. The old Law of fear and the discipline of servants went in baptism, and their new life as sons is directed by the Spirit of adoption of sons, Gal 2:19 ff.; 4:6 f. To live by the Spirit, they must walk by the Spirit (for only thus will they possess the Kingdom of God) and his fruits are charity, joy, peace . . . , Gal 5:21-25; Rom 8:6-10. Thus, reflecting the glory of the Lord, they will be progressively transformed by his Spirit from glory to glory, Rom 5:2; 2 Cor 3:18. In a word, Christians must 'become what they are'; baptism is a 'sacrament of realized eschatology', which leads to the final consummation.

650k Therefore Baptism accomplishes a real, sacramental Change—(indicated by the aorist, e.g. 1 Cor 6:11; 12:13, and by comparison with circumcision, Col 2:11 f.). Primarily it is not the act of the faithful but the sanctifying act of Christ received by them once for all. It effects what it symbolizes. It washes away sin, Ac 22:16; 1 Cor 6:11, but it does more. Death to sin coincides with spiritual resurrection, both flowing from the receiving of the Spirit, art. cit., 899. Thus begins a life 'in Christ', 'in the Spirit', which is, by participation, really divine. The baptized son of God is caught up by the merciful love of the Father, through the death and resurrection of the Son and in the outpouring of the Holy Spirit to share the life of the Most Holy Trinity. Towards the close of his life, St Paul summed up baptismal theology in a passage which is an inspired comment on Our Lord's command to baptize in the name of the Divine Persons: 'When God our Saviour manifested his kindness and his love for man, he saved us . . . out of his mercy, with the bath of regeneration and with renewal by the Holy Spirit, whom he poured out on us richly through Jesus Christ our Saviour, in order that justified by his grace we might become in hope heirs of everlasting life', Tit 3:4-7, WV.

1 The initiatory efficacy of baptism is further shown by the term 'Seal' (Sphragis) of the Spirit', though it would seem to apply rather to the post-baptismal gift of the Spirit, who is the earnest and pledge of eternal life, 2 Cor 1:21 f.; Eph 1:13; 4:30; cf. Rom 4:11; 2 Tim 2:19; Coppens, Imposition des mains, 267-75. These passages are the Scriptural basis from which the Fathers developed the doctrine of the seal, the ineffaceable mark on the soul which we call 'character'.

m If Gal and Rom emphasize the mystical union with Christ effected by baptism for the individual, 1 Cor, Eph and Col show baptism creating the new society, the Kingdom of God in preparation, the 'glorious Church' which is the Body of Christ. For we are not baptized as isolated individuals. By one baptism we are all baptized into one Body and one Spirit, in which we all go to the Father, all fellow-citizens of the heavenly city, members of the family of God, brethren whose eldest brother is Christ, 1 Cor 12:13; Eph 2:16-19; 4:4 f.; 5:26; cf. Rom 8:29; Gal 3:26 ff. The Christians were taught to realize vividly the unity which they had entered in baptism. St Paul uses it to heal splits in the congregation, 1 Cor chh 1-3; cf. 1:10-17; 3:4 ff, 22 f., and develops from it the whole doctrine of the Mystical Body, 12:13 ff.; Eph 4:3-7.

n Christians henceforth are to live in the hope of eternal life given them by baptism. This hope is the theme of 1 Pet, a 'baptismal homily' written to encourage them in trial, cf. 1 Pet 1:3-9, 21 ff.; 2:9 f.; 4:13 f.; 5:10; Thils, 124 f. We live in the time granted for repentance to a world already judged by God, 2 Pet 3:9; Jn 16:8-13; 1 Cor 11:32. Baptism is the 'antitype' of the Flood, 1 Pet 3:20 f., a judgement through water, introduced by the preaching of penance (cf. 2 Pet 2:5, Noe 'herald of justice'), effecting that destruction of unbelief and sin which will be consummated by the catastrophic final judgement of fire, Mt 24:37 ff.; Lk 17:26 f.; 2 Pet 3:5 ff, and saving through water those who have a mystical participation with the Just One, 1 Pet 3:18, 20; Justin, Dial., 138, 2. The Spirit who moved over the waters of creation, Gen 1:2, and was typified by the dove with its olive branch over the waters of the Flood, has appeared again over the waters of the baptism of the Anointed, and renders fruitful for eternal life those waters from which are born a new race with whom God makes Covenant, Mt 3:16; Mk 1:10; Lk 3:22; Jn 1:32. Thus this fragment of the primitive catechesis draws its baptismal theology from the whole story of God's dealings with men. It was richly developed by the Fathers and the Liturgy and illustrated by the figures of Noe, type of Christ, and the ark, type of the saving Church, in the catacombs, cf. Daniélou, Déluge, Baptême, Jugement, in Dieu vivant, VIII, 97-112.

o There is no direct NT evidence for the baptism of infants. But the Jews were accustomed to 'baptize' converts' children with their parents on the ground that action on behalf of another is permissible if obviously for his good. Anyhow, Christians, regarding baptism as the entry to the New Covenant (cf. Col 2:11; 1 Pet 3:21; Justin, Dial., 43) would have given baptism in place of circumcision. Further, paedobaptism follows upon the theological concept of baptism as aggregation to the Christian community, and membership of the Body of Christ is suggested when St Paul tells children how to behave 'in the Lord', Eph 6:1; Col 3:20. We may therefore infer, even apart from early tradition, that the 'households' baptized included children; cf. Ac 16:33; 18:8; 1 Cor 1:16; and two good complementary studies, *Flemington, 130-47; *O. Cullmann, Le baptême des enfants et la doctrine biblique du baptême, in Dieu vivant, XI, 45-66.

The Fullness of the Spirit—Foreshadowing but not yet revealing his distinct Personality, the OT had spoken of the Spirit of Holiness, the Spirit of God whom he had put among his people to guide them and teach them to do his will, e.g. Is 63:11, 14; Ps 142:10. The outpouring of the Spirit upon all flesh would be the characteristic of Messianic times, Jl 2:28-32; Ac 2:17-21. Since NT ascribes to him the Incarnation itself, Lk 1:35; prophetic inspiration, e.g. 41, 67, 2:27, baptism, e.g. Mt 3:16; 1 Cor 6:11, the remission of sins, Jn 20:23, and the gift of grace, Ac 11:16 ff.; 15:8 f., his action is not restricted to a special occasion. But the fullness of the Spirit was given after the glorification of the Son, Jn 7:39; 16:7.

The Baptist's words 'he will baptize you in the Holy Spirit and fire', which had rung in the ears of the first disciples, were echoed by Jesus himself before he ascended, Mt 3:11; Mk 1:8; Lk 3:16; Jn 1:33; Ac 1:5; 11:16. In his lifetime he had told his own that the Spirit of their Father would speak through them, and that they would receive the 'living water' of the Spirit, Jn 7:37 ff.; cf. 4:13 ff. On the night before he died he had declared that he would send them from the Father the Spirit of Truth who proceeds from the Father, whose coming would be so vital for them that it was better that he himself should die. For though they would see him no more, this other Paraclete would bear witness to him, glorify him by receiving of his, and by showing it to them, lead them into all truth, 15:26 f.; 16:7, 13 ff.

The preparation of the Father and the Mysteries of the Son were accomplished at Pentecost, when God who had 'sent his Son' in the Incarnation, sent the 'Spirit of his Son' to complete the work in his sons by adoption, cf. Gal 4:4 ff.; DBV(S), Grâce, 980 f. The Holy Spirit, 'the promise of my Father', clothed them with power from on high, Is 44:3; Ez 39:29; Lk 24:49; Ac 1:4 f., 8, to make them 'spiritual' witnesses of Jesus with light to understand and fortitude to preach, Jn 14:26; 16:12 f.; Ac 2:33; 4:29 ff.; 1 Cor 2:11 ff. The whole Church was at prayer round Peter, the Apostles and the Mother of Jesus, Ac 1:13-16; 2:1, when the mighty wind of the Spirit, Gn 1:2; 3 Kg 19:12; Jn 3:8, filled the whole house, and on each of them rested the tongues of fire. Fire symbolizes divine presence, light, warmth, purification, rapid spread, Ex 3:2 ff.; Is 4:4; 6:6; Ez 1:4; Mt 3:11; Lk 12:49; Heb 12:29. The tongue is the organ of witness, Rom 14:11; Phil 2:11. All the 120 present, ten times the Apostles' number, were 'filled with the Spirit' and spoke in different tongues, Ac 2:4, 17 f.; Chrys., PG 60, 43; Aug., PL 38, 1230. Thus, as in Confirmation, Sacrament of 'Catholic Action', the bestowal of the Spirit made all co-operators in the work of the Apostles, the divinely chosen teachers and rulers of the community, Ac 1:2; 2:42; 6:3. All were needed for the conversions about to begin.

In the Mystical Body thus manifested the Holy Spirit is the Soul, Mystici Corporis, 25, 32, 55, 77; Divinum Illud, ASS, 29, 649 f., and from him stream those graces which he distributes there as he wills, 1 Cor 12:4-31;

651d Rom 12:3-9; Eph 4:1-16. The graces of Confirmation were shown in the fortitude and deep understanding of the Scriptures of St Peter's first sermon, and in the corporate life of charity which reinforced the witness of the Apostles' preaching and miracles, Ac 2:14-36, 43-47; 4:32 f. To be 'filled with the Spirit' did not primarily signify exterior ecstasy. It goes with faith, wisdom, grace and fortitude, its special mark being joy, e.g. 6:3-10; 11:24; 13:52; 1 Thess 1:6. The 'fruit of the Spirit' is 'love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faith, gentleness, temperateness', Gal 5:22. The Church is built up by this inner encouragement, this παράκλησις of the Spirit, rather than by human activity, Ac 9:31; 1 Cor 14:3, 5.

e The Holy Spirit was given to others by the imposition of the Apostles' hands with prayer, the case of the Samaritans showing the distinction from baptism given by a deacon, Ac 2:38; 8:15 ff. So Paul imposed hands on the men at Ephesus after their baptism, 19:1-6. This rite normally followed baptism, for it is mentioned as part of Christian initiation in Heb 6:1 f., and Ac imply that the situation of the Samaritans was unusual. Two distinct rites are indicated by the aorists in 1 Cor 12:13: 'In one Spirit all we . . . were baptized into one Body; and were all given to drink of one Spirit', WV. Birth into the spiritual life of the Body by baptism is completed by the 'mission' or 'seal' of the Spirit, who is 'poured out abundantly upon us' after the 'bath of regeneration', 2 Cor 1:22; Eph 1:13; 4:30; Tit 3:5 f. Similarly the Synoptics, who certainly regard Christ's baptism in the Jordan as prefiguring the rites of initiation, distinguish his baptism from the descent of the Spirit, Mt 3:16; Mk 1:10; and two sacramental graces may be inferred from St John's Gospel, since we must be re-born of the Spirit before sharing his special mission and indwelling, Coppens, Imposition des Mains, 210 ff. While, therefore, baptism makes a man a Christian, cf. Ac 8:36 ff.; Ep. Barn., 11, 11; Hermas, 9, 16, 4; Justin, Apol., 1:61, the whole NT supports the authenticity of Ac 8:5-25; 19:1-6; cf. op. cit., 258 ff.; DBV(S), Confirmation, 122-9, 135 ff., 141-7. But the Holy Spirit is master of his gifts, and his effusion upon the first Gentiles preceded their baptism, Ac 10:44 ff.; 11:15 ff.

652a The Holy Eucharist, Christ's supreme gift of himself, fulfilment of all man's instincts of worship and sacrifice expressed in Jewish and pagan rite, is the representation by his Church under efficacious signs of his own sacrifice on the Cross and the source of the life of his Mystical Body. Bond of union between the members of the Body and their risen Head, it is the bond of union between the members themselves, and the joyful pledge of their resurrection, cf. Cyr. Alex., Adv. Nest., 4, ch. 5, PG 76, 189-97. 'Sanguis Christi, novum testamentum', Florus, Expositio Missae, ch. 61. The Eucharist 'sums up in its richness everything which St Paul in Eph unites in the one word "Mystery"', that is to say the whole content of the designs of God upon the world, revealed and realized in Christ', H. de Lubac, S.J., Corpus Mysticum, 224.

b That God who gave life to the world by his Son should not have wholly withdrawn him from the world, that the flesh which saved it should still sustain it—does not that seem worthy of his goodness? Does it not seem consistent with the very plan of the Incarnation? It is, moreover, the only right meaning of Scripture', Lagrange, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, I, 235. Far from contradicting the historical records, it appears in all of them as an essential part of the life of Jesus and the perfect revelation of his love; cf. § 644j. While it recalls previous Jewish practices and beliefs, it is closely joined to salient features of Jesus's own teaching: the Messianic banquet, the new Covenant, his presence among his own to the end of the world, the Messianic gift of the new manna, the heavenly bread, true bread of life, DBV(S), Eucharistie, 1211. This does not explain away the Eucharist, which comes from an historical initiative of Christ. But it helps to show why the minds of the Apostles, prepared already, Jn 6, and probably further instructed by the discourse at the Supper of which we have only essential fragments, were open to understand their Master's supreme act. Besides, the Gospels themselves attribute the full intelligence of the Mysteries of Jesus and specially of the Eucharist to belief in his words under the inspirations of the Holy Spirit, Jn 6:44-7, 63 ff.; 14:26; 16:12 ff.; cf. 16:9; 1 Cor 2:14 f.; art. cit., 1168, 1212.

Heretical Opinions—Luther kept the Real Presence, e but with 'consubstantiation'. Zwingli is father of the purely 'symbolic' interpretation, Calvin of the 'dynamic'. Liberal Protestants and Rationalists tend to admit that the Pauline churches had the realist, Catholic interpretation, but ascribe it to influences from primitive religion or the 'Mysteries'. In their view, Jesus was free from sacramental concepts. As the Gospel account of the Institution abounds in them (since Jesus foresees his death as having a sacrificial, expiatory value), they argue against its historicity: (a) Jesus was too humble to institute a memorial of his passion; (b) the order to repeat the rite is not given by Mt and Mk, but only by Paul and Lk; (c) Paul knew he was innovating, for he traced this order to a direct revelation from Christ, 1 Cor 11:23; (d) various hypotheses are then proposed to account for the origin of the Eucharist. Without going so far, Peake's Commentary says 'it is doubtful if we ought to say that (Jesus) ordained the sacrament', 669. Cf. Dz 2045.

But the evidence of the sources is that Jesus instituted d the Eucharist and ordered its repetition. There are no good reasons for setting aside this evidence. (a) If Jesus was God—this is the real issue—he foresaw his expiatory death and showed a truly divine humility by setting himself beneath sacramental signs that men might commemorate his passion by offering him again and entering communion with him. (b) Mt and Mk customarily reproduce a shorter, liturgical text. The Apostles would not have repeated the Lord's Supper without his command, but there was no need to mention it in the rite. Paul's less polished text may show an earlier tradition. (c) He says, not that he received a direct command from Christ, but that 'I received by tradition from the Lord' (παρέλαβον ἀπὸ τοῦ Κυρίου) 'what I also handed on as a tradition to you' (παρέδωκα), 1 Cor 11:23; cf. 15:3; Gal 1:9; Col 2:6; 4:17; Phil 4:9; 1 Thess 2:13; 4:1 f.; 2 Thess 3:6; full discussion in Allo, Prem. Ep. aux Cor., exc. 12. He thus attests both the Jerusalem tradition and its origin 'from the Lord'. (d) Since the sources stand, the hypotheses fall; cf. for these DBV(S), art. cit., 1147-67, 1192-210.

The most frequent hypothesis is of a dependence e of the Eucharist on the 'Mystery Religions'. But cf. § 645d for these, and 1 Cor 10:20 for Christian horror of pagan rites, which makes any derivation from them impossible. Moreover an abyss divides the real, highly spiritual union with the historic Christ effected by eating his Body and drinking his Blood from the vague union with a mythical deity conceived as present at a banquet or as extending protection to the initiated.

The 'Agape'—Everyone agrees (except Baumgartner, f but cf. Allo, exc. 10), that the Lord's Supper at Corinth was either the Eucharist or joined with its celebration. Some rationalist critics held that it was simply a fraternal banquet manifesting the union of the members of the Church and analogous to those of the pagan brotherhoods; others, that the idea of a relation to the death of Christ was introduced into it by Paul, and from this came the attribution of a sacramental effect to the receiving of the bread and wine (von Dobschütz, Loisy). Early Christian writers distinguish clearly the consecrated elements from what was eaten and drunk besides, the Greeks holding that this meal came before, the Latins after the Eucharist. St Thomas thought the meal an abuse which Paul forbade. Among modern Catholics there are two main views: (1) There is no evidence that the Eucharist in Pauline churches was connected with an Agape (Batiffol, L. Thomas, Coppens, H. Connolly). The 652f Corinthians had perhaps expected to be praised for introducing a meal which recalled the Last Supper, but Paul poured scorn on what may have been a pagan infiltration: 'Do I praise you?' 1 Cor 11:22, and forbade the custom as soon as he heard of it: 'If anyone is hungry, let him eat at home', 11:34. For these authors the evidence for an NT Agape is confined to Jud 12 and 2 Pet 2:13, where the text is doubtful and need not refer to an actual feast. Moreover there is no trace of an Agape in the formal celebration of the Eucharist on 'the first day of the week' at Troas. A long sermon is followed (after its interruption) by the 'breaking of the bread' and only incidentally by the 'tasting' of some food, Ac 20:7-11. (2) Others (Funk, Allo, Leclercq) hold that the 'Lord's Supper' was a fraternal feast which normally culminated in the Eucharist. Jewish meals were ceremonial. Christians did not repeat the Paschal Supper, because Jesus had substituted a new, incomparably higher sacrifice. But they naturally kept the supper framework. The 'breaking of bread' in Ac 2:46 is in the context of a meal. However, among Gentile converts abuses arose. They were suppressed by Paul at Corinth, but led eventually to the separation of Eucharist and Agape, e.g. Pliny, Ep. X, 96. (Had Paul already ordered this separation at Troas?) The injunction to hungry Corinthians to eat at home first so that they may not mind waiting for others, 1 Cor 11:33 f., suggests a meal rather than the Eucharist alone.

g 'The Breaking of bread' with blessing and giving of thanks was the customary sign of union in formal Jewish meals. Noted in Christ's feeding of the multitude by all Evangelists with obvious symbolic reference to the Eucharist, Mt 14:19; 15:36; Mk 6:41; 8:6; Lk 9:16; cf. Jn 6:11, it comes in the scene at Emmaus, Lk 24:30, 35, and in Ac 27:35 (where the point is that Paul eats openly before pagans). It is mentioned in all accounts of the Institution, Mt 26:26; Mk 14:22; Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:24, and became the most ancient technical term for the Eucharist, cf. DAC, Fractio Panis (Cabrol), 2104, n. 6; Did., 14, 1.

We are told that the Pentecostal community 'were persevering in the doctrine of the Apostles, the communion, the breaking of the bread and the prayers', Ac 2:42. Were this an ordinary meal, not a religious act, it would not be joined with the other elements of Christian teaching, life and worship in which they 'persevered'. In the Gk, 'the breaking of the bread' is in apposition (without 'and') to 'the communion', cf. § 637b, c. St Luke is using the same term as his master St Paul: 'The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ', 1 Cor 10:16; cf. Jacquier, Actes, 87. Ac 2:46 continues: 'persevering with one accord in the temple and breaking bread from house to house, they took their share of meat with gladness and simplicity of heart'. 'The breaking of the bread' related at Troas was the purpose of the gathering, 20:7, 11.

h Some critics (*Lietzmann, Messe und Herrenmahl) allege that the primitive Church had two Eucharists: the 'breaking of bread' alone in Acts, which continues the meals taken by Christ with his disciples, and the 'Lord's Supper' introduced by Paul, who connected it with the Last Supper and Christ's death. But the evidence from post-apostolic writings for a double rite shows no more than that from the 2nd to the 4th cent. some heretical sects and some particular churches, under ascetic and doctrinal influences of non-Christian origin, innovated by celebrating under one kind, DBV(S), art. cit., 1171. In reality 'to break bread' was a Jewish expression for a meal which St Paul himself uses to include the Cup, 1 Cor 10:16, and Paul's own 'breaking bread' in Ac 20:11 explains 2:42. While ably refuting the two-rites theory, *O. Cullmann (La Signification de la sainte Cène, in Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses [1936] 1-22), put forward the view that St Paul had attached the Eucharist to the Last Supper and the death of Christ in accord with his theology of the Redemption, whereas the 'breaking of bread' in Acts was a joyful derivation from meals 652h with the risen Christ.

Cullman was right in stressing the importance of these meals in primitive Christianity. He opened the way to the valuable synthesis: Signification eschatologique du Repas eucharistique, by Y. de Montcheuil, S.J., RSR 33 (1946) 10-43, reprinted in Mélanges théologiques. The occasions for collective apparitions after the Resurrection are often meals which the risen Jesus takes with his Apostles, whose authoritative witness they guarantee, Mk 16:14; Lk 24:30, 41 ff; Jn 21:12 f.; prob. Ac 1:4; 10:41. These meals form a link between the Last Supper and the celebration of the Eucharist in Acts. The joy of those who shared them sprang from union with their Lord present in their midst, from union with one another, and from certainty of the Resurrection, first fruits of the glorious coming of that Kingdom in which they already participated. How could the Apostles forget either the Last Supper or those meals with their risen Lord when they celebrated the Eucharist? A meal is a religious act, and Christ's meals in the Gospel have a religious, and in the broad sense a sacramental character, for by them he is in communion with men. Sharing his meals, the sinners he came to pardon have a foretaste of the Messianic banquet, Mt 9:10-15; Mk 2:16 f., Lk 15:1-32. Food and drink are God's gifts. Our daily bread, enjoyment of a divine gift, becomes the promise of a total gift. The meals at the multiplication of bread and at Cana look forward to the Eucharist, Bouyer, Quatrième Ev., 87 ff. By saying that he would not eat the Pasch again until it was fulfilled in the Kingdom of God, nor drink of the fruit of the vine until the Kingdom of God came, Lk 22:16 ff., a kingdom which he disposed to them that they might eat and drink at his table in it, 30, he set the final consummation in eternity, but he envisaged also his kingdom on earth, wherein the divine banquet of the Eucharist replaces and fulfils Jewish figures, cf. Lagrange, in loc. Already 'we have tasted the heavenly gift and the powers, of the world to come', cf. Heb 6:4 f.; 2:5. The risen Christ, present to the eyes of faith, is our host as well as our food. Thus this chain of meals leads to the eternal banquet, and the first Christians seem to have regarded the Eucharist as its anticipation, cf. art. cit., followed closely.

But St Paul did not create a new Eucharist. Christ's resurrection is inseparable from his death, cf. Lk 24:26, and both are to be seen 'less as past events than as present mysteries', art. cit., 25; cf. Rom 6:9-12; Gal 2:19 f.; 5:24 f. It is by sharing his Cross that we share his glory, cf. Rom 8:17. What St Paul does is to bring out from tradition Christ's own words of institution and the double repetition of the command 'Do this', to remind the fickle Corinthians that the Eucharist is a representation of the Last Supper. Therefore 'as often as ye eat this bread and drink of the cup, ye proclaim the death of the Lord, until he come', 1 Cor 11:23-27, WV. The final perspective lighting up the Mystery is still the glorious Coming, 26; cf. Jn 6:54. The pledge of this Coming is the sacrificial act of the New Covenant, the 'remembrance', or effective memorial of the Last Supper, 1 Cor 11:24 f., which carries the community into Christ's kingdom, bringing sentiments of holy fear, repentance, joy and fervent charity. This doctrine Paul had preached from the first, 33, and yet nobody could say that the Eucharist at Corinth was 'sad'! It remains the doctrine of the Church: 'Unde et memores, Domine, nos . . . sed et plebs tua sancta . . . tam beatæ passionis, nec non et ab inferis resurrectionis, sed et in caelos gloriosæ ascensionis . . .'. 653a

The Real Presence is affirmed by the words 'This is my body', 'this is my blood', cf. §§ 720a, b, 739g, h; Aquin ST, 3, 75; In 1 Cor, in loc. and Allo, op. cit., exc. 12. The version 'this means my body' is false to the original, and contradicts all early Christian tradition. The view that the bread only symbolizes the Mystical Body also distorts the words and fails to account for 658b 'this is my blood'. For St Paul's whole treatment, particularly vv 26 'you proclaim the death of the Lord', 27 'guilty of (or 'accused for') the body and the blood of the Lord', and 29 'not discerning the body of the Lord' (μη διακρίνουν τὸ σῶμα, 'without distinguishing the body from other food', WV) shows that 'the faithful entered into direct relation with the personal body and blood of the Saviour', Allo, exc. 11, 296. 'The body of Christ' and 'the blood of Christ' (unless the context determines that the former means the Church) always imply his death; cf. Rom 3:25; 5:9; 7:4; Col 1:20 ff.; Heb 10:5, 10. It is from Communion in the true Body, 'the unique Bread', 1 Cor 10:17, that the Mystical Body results, cf. § 637b. In the analogous passage 'they drank of the spiritual rock that followed them; and the rock was Christ', 10:4, the point is that it was the Person of Christ who accompanied them and was symbolized by the rock, cf. Allo, in loc.

c The Eucharist is a true sacrifice, a representation of the Saviour's Sacrifice: 'Do this for my remembrance. . . . You proclaim the death of the Lord until he come', 1 Cor 11:24-26; Dz 938. The ritual elements of the sacrifice are identical with the Body and Blood of Christ, cf. § 644f-j. In 10:18-21 St Paul compares the drinking of the chalice of the Lord and the sharing of his 'table' with the Jewish and pagan sacrifices, the point being that to share ceremonially in the thing sacrificed, is to share the sacrificial act and all that it implies, ICC. Like the pagans and the Jews, 18, the Christians too have an altar, and they cannot share in this 'table' and in that of devils, 21 (where 'table' certainly means 'altar' in opposition to that of the devils, and to the Jewish θυσιαστήριον); this is sometimes the meaning in OT, and cf. Philo, De Spec. Leg., I, 221. Every time they share the Lord's Supper, they effectively 'proclaim his death until he come', just because his Presence is real, though mysterious and needing 'discernment'. Finally, the statement that this is 'proclaiming the death of the Lord', together with the repetition of Christ's command and words, is good evidence that the words uttered by him at the Last Supper were repeated at the Lord's Supper to represent his death, Allo, 294.

d St Paul unites in one movement of thought the presence of Christ in the Eucharist and the effect upon the communicants. Because they communicate in Christ really present, under effective symbols, their communion is the source of their unity, 10:16f.; cf. Jn 15:1-11; Did. 9, 4; Aquin., ST 3, 73, 3; § 637b, c. This leaves no room for the members of the one body to be selfish individualists, any more than to share in a false cult, 1 Cor 10:20 f., 24, 28 f. The Eucharist, being a spiritual food and drink, like its figures, the manna and the water from the Rock, confers communication of the Spirit and increase of charity, 10:3 f., 17; cf. 15:50; 2 Cor 13:13. But it does not work as magic, and requires moral co-operation, 1 Cor 10:5; 11:17. Let a man examine his conscience before he receives it, 28; cf. 2 Cor 13:5; DBV(S), art. cit., 1186-7.

e Thus the rich Eucharistic doctrine of the NT must not be split into isolated elements by heresy or one-sided piety. Christ is a Person, not a kind of impersonal force. He is the friend around whom his own gather in joy, the host at the Supper at which he gives himself. The commemoration of his death must not be separated from his real Presence, nor that presence from the Sacrifice wherein it becomes real, nor must individualism diminish the sense of a communal banquet. When his coming occupied the horizon, men tended to forget that they must go to him by his death. Now that his coming seems delayed, they forget that they already share in his resurrection. But all these values are in St Paul's doctrine of that breaking of bread which is the communion of the Body of the Risen Lord, who the night before he suffered offered himself under symbolic rite, and commanded his Apostles who supped with him to do what he had done; cf. de Montcheuil, art. cit., 37; § 657f-h.

The unique sufficiency of the sacrifice of the Cross 658f compared with those of the Old Law, and of the one, eternal priesthood of Christ compared with the Levitical, is brought out by Heb, cf. 10:10, 'we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus once for all', WV; 7:27; 9:26, 28; 10:1 ff. This is the point of departure of the Catholic doctrine on the identity of the sacrifice of the Cross and that of the Eucharist, which is a real re-presentation of that Sacrifice, with the same Victim and the same high-priest, who offers himself by the ministry of his priests under those same symbols under which he offered himself at the Last Supper; cf. Dz 938, 940. The Protestant objection that Heb shows that the Eucharist is not a sacrifice, misapprehends this combined doctrine of Heb, 1 Cor and the words of Institution. Deeper examination shows the Eucharistic implications of the epistle. The sacrifice of the Cross is described in the sacrificial terms used by Christ as the Last Supper: offering his body, Heb 10:10, and his blood, 9:12, 14, the Mediator of the NT offers the blood of the New Covenant for the remission of sins, 9:15, 18 ff.; 10:29; 12:24; 13:20. The comparison of Christ's priesthood with that of Melchisedech suggests the sacrifice under symbols of bread and wine. Moreover, his priesthood is not extinguished by his death, 7:15, 24-27. The sacrifices described as proper to Christians, 13:15 f., exclude only those of the Law, and can well be understood in function of the Eucharist. In communion with Christ, 3:14, in and through the blood of the great Priest-Victim, 10:20; 6:19 f., we have the way opened to the heavenly sanctuary, and are thus already citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, and companions of the angels and saints, 12:22 ff.; cf. 1 Cor 1:9; 10:16 ff., 21. In the new dispensation the humblest Christians are far more privileged than the Jewish priests, for 'we have an altar from which they are not entitled to eat who serve the Tabernacle', Heb 13:10, WV. This altar would seem to be the Cross, but we 'eat' from it by the nourishment of the Eucharist.

St John's account of Christ's discourse on the Eucharist g in ch 6 is not his only reference to it. For his facts are also symbols with many values, and though he does not repeat the Synoptic narrative of the Institution, his Gospel is shot through with allusions to the rite which was centre and source of the Christ-life of the churches for whom he wrote. The Incarnation is prolonged by the Eucharist: In the Word 'was life . . . he was in the world . . . the Word was made flesh' . . . 'The bread which I will give is my flesh for the life of the world . . . he that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life', Jn 14:14; 6:51, 54. As Yahweh is married to his people, so Jesus, the bridegroom, 3:29, chooses water and wine at a marriage feast to be the first sign whereby to manifest his glory, 2:11; cf. 1:14, and on the Cross blood and water issue from his side as his last sign prefiguring baptism and the Eucharist, 19:34. It is a sign to which John renders solemn testimony, 35; cf. 1 Jn 5:6-9. Using the traditional symbol for the People of God, Jesus after the Last Supper declares that he is the true vine in which his disciples must abide, Jn 15:1-11; cf. 6:56, a Eucharistic reference recognized by early Christianity, Did., 9, 2. By his sacrificial death he consecrates both himself and those Apostles whom he has commanded to renew his sacrifice, 17:19; cf. § 649e.

The Eucharistic Discourse itself had been preceded h by demonstrations of Christ's power over bread and over his own body. It builds up from the multiplication of bread and the figure of the manna to Christ as the bread from heaven and finally as divine food, really present under sacramental signs. Upon this Real Presence he insists by declarations about 'eating my flesh' and 'drinking my blood', 6:53-58. The only metaphorical meaning in Scripture and Semitic languages for 'eating the flesh' of someone, 'to destroy by calumny', is here impossible. Nor will Jesus explain that what he has said is metaphorical, as, e.g. in Mk 8:14-21. Instead he repeats it six times, 653h Jn 6:53-58. He lets the worldly-minded crowd and many disciples leave him rather than withdraw this, his best gift, only appealing to the latter to exercise that faith which is given by the Spirit of God, 60-66. The 'spiritual mentality' of St John does not contradict but confirms the Real Presence by the words: 'It is the spirit which giveth life; the flesh profiteth nothing', 63, WV. 'The flesh', i.e. mere human, weak, 'carnal'; understanding and action, e.g. Mt 16:17; 26:41; Mk 14:38; Jn 1:13; Gal 1:16; 1 Cor 15:50; cf. § 645k, is not the same as 'my flesh', and it is precisely the spirit, i.e. man under the impulse of the Spirit of God (cf. § 648b, c) who believes the reality of Jesus and his words: 'every spirit which confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God', 1 Jn 4:2 f. For the Spirit bears witness, and he 'is one' with 'the water' and 'the blood', 5:6, 8. Lastly, the sacrificial character of the Eucharist is affirmed as decisively as anywhere in St Paul: 'The bread which I will give is my flesh for the life of the world', Jn 6:52 (Vg).

1 St John's doctrine is thus identical with St Paul's, but individually expressed. What distinguishes it is the stress upon the present effect of the Eucharist, the eternal life already given to him who eats Christ's flesh, the abiding in him, the actual relation of the communicant to him: 'You can have no life in yourselves unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood. The man who eats my flesh and drinks my blood enjoys eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. . . . He who eats my flesh, and drinks my blood, lives continually in me, and I in him. As I live because of the Father, the living Father who has sent me, so he who eats me will live, in his turn, because of me', 6:54-58, KNT. The life which will flow from this communion in the resurrection is in more distant perspective, 52, 55, 59, and it remains for the Supper Discourse to show—how magnificently!—that if we live in Jesus, we live in one another, 13:34 f.; 14:20; 15:9-12; 17:21 ff.

1 Conclusions—Christ, therefore, is truly present beneath the symbols, and there is a true sacrifice which originates from the Lord himself. Catholic exegetes have thus answered both Protestants and Rationalists. Their further task is to display among the riches of NT doctrine and symbolism all the values intended by the Spirit of God. Prefigured by the manna, the vine of Israel and the ancient sacrifices, and foretold by the last prophet as the Clean Oblation to be offered in every place, Mal 1:11, the Eucharist was instituted in the context of the Paschal meal and anticipated the Messianic banquet. Moreover, the Last Supper draws 'into unity the three apparently unrelated notions of the new Kingdom (established by a new Covenant), the suffering Messias, the Bread of Life. For this reason it is the almost indispensable key to the Messianic plan. It so declares the essence of the mission of Jesus and so communicates its effects that it becomes the central liturgical act of the Kingdom which Christ founded: Do this in commemoration of Me!', R. Dyson, S.J., and A. Jones, The Kingdom of Promise (1946) 165. That act re-presents 'for the remission of sins' the death of the Saviour, the universal source of salvation. Men share in the new, risen, eternal life of their Head by renewing his sacrifice, and by participating in his Body and Blood. The sacrifice of Christ's Church is the source of her life and unity. Body and Bride of Christ, she comes forth from his side on the Cross and is nourished by his very flesh, Eph 5:29 f.; Gen 2:21-24. As in the primal Paradise God gave the first pair to eat of the tree of life, so now Christ will give to him who conquers 'to eat of the tree of life which is in the Paradise of my God', Apoc 2:7, that tree of life which gives its fruits and leaves for the healing of the nations, all spiritual promises for time and for eternity, 22:2; cf. Allo, in loc.; Jn 6:52.

k The Day of the Lord—day of the Resurrection and Pentecost, first day of the week, is already in Ac 20:7 the day of public service 'when we were gathered together to break bread', WV, cf. 1 Cor 16:2; Ep.

Barn., 15; Ign., Magnes. 9, 1; Justin, Apol. I, 67; Pliny, Ep. X, 96, 'stato die'. This is the 'day of the Lord', the Lord glorious and risen, when St John saw the heavenly liturgy, Apoc 1:10; chh 4 and 5; Did., 14, 1. As baptism succeeded circumcision, and the era of grace and liberty that of the Law, so the Lord's Day succeeded the Jewish Sabbath, the shadow being fulfilled in the reality of Christ, Col 2:16 f.; cf. Gal 4:10; Tertull., Adv. Jud., 6. Historically, the Christian liturgy completes the Sabbath's, and the vigil began on the evening of the Sabbath and ended at dawn after the celebration of the Eucharist; cf. Ac 20:7-11. Thus the Passion, Resurrection and Ascension of Christ were celebrated by the whole community in unison, leading to the glorious Day of the Lord, itself a joyful anticipation of the final day of his return. For the Jews the eighth day of the cosmic week, for the pagans the 'day of the sun' (cf. Justin, Apol. I, 67), the Christian Mystery of the Lord's Day in its indestructible originality fulfilled, and its liturgy could borrow from, the Jewish world of history and the pagan world of nature. Here are the materials for the restoration of the sense of the Mystery of Sunday, cf. DAC, Dimanche (Dumaine); H. Rahner, S.J., Griechische Mythen in Christlichen Deutung, reviewed by J. Daniélou, RSR 34 (1947) 380; La Vie Spirituelle, n. 317, La huitième Jour (1947).

Penance—Cf. DTC, Pénitence (Amann); Confession (Mangenot). The Gospels are full of invitations to repentance as a prelude to entering the kingdom. Jesus delights to be among the sinners he has come to save, and explicitly claims the power to forgive sins in the case of the paralytic of Capharnaum; cf. Mt 9:2-8; Mk 2:3-12; Lk 5:18-26. To Peter and the Apostles he promises the power of 'binding and loosing' in contexts which involve the intervention of the rulers of the Church, Mt 16:18 ff.; 18:15-18. After the resurrection he bids them preach repentance in terms so absolute as to include cases of relapse (cf. 28:18 ff.; Lk 24:47 ff.) and expressly confers on them his own life-giving mission of peace with authority to remit or retain sins, Jn 20:21 ff. This recalls the promise of the power to bind or loose, and the alternative indicates a judgement, upon due knowledge of the offence and the dispositions of the sinner; cf. Dz 894, 899, 913. Confession of sins, so constantly practised by sinners in the OT, had been required in some form by the Baptist, Mt 3:6; Mk 1:5.

The power of forgiveness was first exercised through baptism, Ac 2:37 ff. But the cases of Ananias and Sapphira, 5:1 ff., and of Simon, 8:18 ff., and the attempts of Saul, probably sometimes effective, to make the faithful 'blaspheme', 26:11, show that something further was needed. Temporary or definitive excommunication was practised by the Jews and had been required by Jesus himself to preserve the purity of faith or morals; cf. Mt 5:29; 18:17. Experience proved the need for it; cf. Ac 5:11; 3 Jn 9 ff. St Paul uses his power of binding to excommunicate the sinner, both to cleanse the community, 1 Cor 5:13, and in hope of his ultimate good, 1 Tim 1:20; cf. 2 Tim 2:17. He mentions sins which carry this penalty, 1 Cor 5:11 ff., citing Deut 13:5, LXX. Exclusion from or reconciliation to the Body of Christ was the essential fact involved, those outside being in Satan's kingdom. To the sinner of 2 Cor 2:5-11, he grants remission of punishment, to be made through the community; cf. Allo, in loc. How this was done, we do not know. Nor can it be proved that the confession of sins mentioned, Ac 19:18, and recommended, Jas 5:16; 1 Jn 1:8 ff., was sacramental. Some attribute to penance the laying on of hands in 1 Tim 5:22.

While the Apostolic Church was conscious of her power to remit sins, and there was repentance even for great sins, Apoc chh 2, 3; 1 Jn 1:7, 2:2, she expected that the baptized would be 'dead to sin' and not fall grievously again, Rom 6:2-23; Col 3:1-11. In Heb 6:4-8; 10:25 ff.; 12:16 f., apostasy is spoken 654e of as if irremissible. Rigorist heretics used such texts. But Jewish forms of speech must be remembered, and the natural insistence, with a community tempted to apostatize, upon the moral impossibility of forgiveness in a state when faith in the only sacrifice efficacious for sin was lacking. Moreover some texts seem concerned with that wilful blindness which in practice makes subsequent appeals useless. Such apostasy may be the 'sin unto death' of 1 Jn 5:16 f., prayer for the remission of which is not forbidden but not enjoined. 'Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit' is the attribution of divine works to the devil, a hardened rejection of God's light which precludes the conditions for forgiveness, though a miracle of accepted grace might remove the sin; cf. on Mt 12:31 f.; Mk 3:28 ff.

d Marriage—God, the author of marriage, joins man and wife to be 'two in one flesh' in a permanent union, image of that 'marriage of God and his people' which is recalled by the parables of the marriage feast of the Son, Gen 1:27 f.; 2:18-24; Mt 22:2 ff.; 25:1 ff. In this normal Christian vocation (a 'charisma', 1 Cor 7:2, 7, 24), the love of husband and wife, a total mutual self-giving unto death, symbolizes and is modelled on the love of Christ and his Bride and Body, the Church, Eph 5:22-33; Apoc 19:7; cf. § 635d. The sacramental grace of marriage between Christians, here suggested (Dz 969; Prat, II, 271-4), enables them to give Christ's own love to each other, for they marry 'in the Lord'; cf. 1 Cor 7:39. Thus their home will be a fruitful cell of the Mystical Body.

e Though Moses had allowed divorce 'by reason of your hardness of heart', Jesus had re-enacted the natural indissolubility of marriage, Mt 5:31 f.; 19:7 ff.; Mk 10:3 ff.; Lk 16:18. Mk, Lk and Paul admit no exception and for explanation of Mt, cf. Com. in loc. and J. Bonsirven, S.J., Le Divorce dans le NT (1948). In a society where the Law had kept the standard of morals high, Jesus needed only to correct its imperfections. But with converts from paganism, St Paul had often to insist on the duties of marriage. The little dogmatic treatise in 1 Cor 7 is based upon and amplifies the teaching of his Master.

f He defends marriage against scrupulous Corinthians and heretics, 1 Cor 7:28, 36 ff.; 1 Tim 4:3 f. It is to be held in honour and kept in holiness, free from any impurity, 1 Thess 4:4-8; Heb 13:4. The conjugal duty is a debt owed by either party to the other; lest they be tempted, they should not abstain save by mutual consent and for a time, to give themselves to prayer, 1 Cor 7:3 ff. The law of the Gospel on the identity of their essential rights and duties, frees the wife from her old, humiliating dependence. She is the equal of the man in all that concerns the unity, fidelity and indissolubility of marriage, 10 f. By their mutual, irrevocable gift, they belong to each other, not to themselves, and Paul gives commands and counsels equally to both, 2 ff. But he firmly maintains the hierarchy in the home. The husband is the head, as Christ is head of the Church, but he is not the irresponsible master. He must love and cherish his wife with tender respect, as she must reverence and be subject to him, 1 Cor 11:3, 7; Col 3:18 f.; 1 Tim 2:11 f. The wife wins her salvation by her Christian motherhood, 15. St Peter adds that husbands must be wise and honour their wives as co-heirs of the grace of life, 1 Pet 3:7; cf. further § 660c-e.

g St Paul gives no command to marry, but 'an exhortation dictated by prudence', 1 Cor 7:2-6, 26 f.; cf. Allo, in loc. Those who cannot be continent should marry, 9. Once married, the Lord commands them not to separate, and if they do, to remain unmarried or be reconciled, 10 f. The bond holds while the other party lives; in case of death, there is freedom to marry again, only 'in the Lord', i.e. normally to a Christian, 39; Rom 7:2 f. For moral reasons, he wishes young widows to marry and have families, 1 Tim 5:14.

h Virginity—Yet to remain unmarried for the Gospel's sake is a better state since it makes possible an undistracted devotion to the interests of Christ, 1 Cor

7:1, 8, 25 f., 32-35, 38, 40. This is Christ's own 654h invitation, but it requires a special grace, Mt 19:12; 1 Cor 7:7; cf. Apoc 14:4; Dz 980; § 660g.

The 'Pauline privilege'—Conscious that he speaks by 1 the Spirit, St Paul gives an apostolic ruling. A baptized Christian, married before baptism to an unbeliever who now consents to their living peaceably together, may not break off the marriage, for the family relations are sanctified by the believing partner. But if the unbeliever (with whom lies the initiative) breaks it off, the marriage may be dissolved for the peace of the Christian party, who should not be enslaved by the possibly chimerical hope of converting the other, 1 Cor 7:12-16, 40; 14:37; § 660f.

For Order, cf. §§ 657f-h, 659; for Extreme Unction, cf. Com. on Jas.

VI THE MINISTRY

Introduction—Reference has already been made to 655a those whom the neophyte would find in every Christian community, and who, by whatever name they might be called, were obviously the guides, the leaders, the teachers of the rest, § 638. It was once fashionable to maintain either that whatever influence these men had was due to the unpredictable influences of the Spirit, or that, if they held some sort of regular office in the community, this was held from the community itself. In both these views, a fundamental pre-supposition was that a Christian community formed itself by individual Christians coming together so that they might help themselves and one another to live their faith better. By thus assembling, they created a Christian 'assembly', an ἐκκλησία, a Church; and just as the local Christian Church came into being by the union of individual Christians, so too the universal Church was conceived of as arising from the union of the many local churches through mutual recognition, cf. § 634a. Today, the individualism which permeates this reconstruction is being more and more abandoned: it was, of course, particularly useful to those who, for whatever cause, denied that the creation of a Church ever held a place in Christ's intentions. As Loisy said: 'Christ proclaimed the coming of the Kingdom of God; and it was the Church which appeared in its place', L'Evangile et l'Eglise (1902) 111. It is now recognized that it is impossible to eliminate such an intention from Christ's mind without doing violence to the historical evidence of the NT records, and the possibility is at once re-opened that the leaders, the 'officials' who are there mentioned incidentally in the local churches, exercised their influence and authority not merely through the invisible working of the Spirit or because of a delegation of power by the local community, but chiefly as the result of a commission ultimately traceable to our Lord himself (cf. F. M. Braun, O.P., Aspects nouveaux du Problème de l'Eglise [1942]; German ed. with supplementary matter: Neues Licht auf die Kirche [1946]).

But before this question could be investigated on its 655b own merits, another ghost had to be laid, which had been haunting ecclesiology for nearly two centuries. In these last years, the eschatological problem has been working itself out to a more reasonable issue. That Christ founded no Church seemed obvious to those who made of him an apocalyptic prophet, predicting the end of the world and the final judgement within the lifetime of his hearers. The Kingdom of God would only be inaugurated after the judgement, but 'the Kingdom of God was at hand', hence the consummation was not far off. No need then for a Church during the few years that remained: Christ merely taught an 'Interim-Ethics', and if the Parousia, the Second Coming, did not occur as expected, and the Christians built a Church instead, this Church could scarcely be said to have been instituted by Christ. The fundamental question is dealt with in §§ 670-1; suffice it to say here first that no one who ascribes such a

656a The Mystical Body and Authority—The fact that all Christians could be called 'saints', obviously neither implied that they were finished products of perfection, nor that their 'sanctity' bestowed on them complete independence from any human interference. Not even their title to be called 'a royal priesthood', Exod 19:6; 1 Pet 2:5, 9; Apoc 1:6; 5:10, did this: such a title only brought out what was implicit in that of 'the saints', for sanctity is not inert but essentially self-communicative: indeed a 'sanctity' which rests in itself and does not in some way try to communicate, priestwise and royally, the divine largesse to others, is not sanctity at all. All this finds its place in the reality, already considered, of the Body of Christ, which his Church is. For the members not only all co-operate (as might nations who had no thought of surrendering each its own sovereignty): their co-operation will often realize itself within a relationship of authority and subordination. However, just as the Church, which is rightly called a society, is nevertheless a society sui generis, so too the authority and corresponding subordination which it entails, are themselves sui generis, and may not be equated with those which prevail, for instance, in the State, in all its various forms; cf. M.-J. Congar, O.P., Esquisses du Mystère de l'Eglise (1941) 47-52.

b This was made clear by our Lord himself on more than one occasion. There were indeed to be among his followers some who should be 'greater' than others, or 'first' or 'leaders', Mt 20:26-27; Mc 10:43-44; Lk 22:26, but they should not on this account 'lord it over' the rest, as did those among the Gentiles who wielded power. On the contrary their position demanded of them the greater service towards others; was not his own example eloquent enough? He, the Son of Man, had not come among them to be waited on by them: he had come to do them service, to give his life in ransom for them; he, their Master and Lord, had laid aside his tunic to wash their feet, like any slave; while they sat at table, he was serving. He was not the less their Master and Lord for performing this lowly task; if they were to follow his example, as he had told them, that need not exclude every kind of distinction between his followers, not even that wherein some should have authority over others; but it did involve excluding that pride and self-aggrandisement which is so wont to be coveted by those who enjoy authority, Mt 20:25 ff.; Mc 10:42 ff.; Lk 22:24 ff.; Jn 13:12 ff. (cf. § 597g-i). So too, from their very context, must be explained such passages as Mt 23:8 ff.: it is not the bearing of this or that title which our Lord forbids his Apostles ('Rabbi', 'Father', 'Teacher'), it is the arrogance with which the Scribes and Pharisees preened themselves, that he here pillories. Fathers and Teachers they must be: but the greater they are as such, the more thoroughly must they become the servants of all (ibid.).

c Much of the fragrance of Christ which enriches the epistles of St Paul comes from this blending of authority and humility. In his 'interpretations' of the Scriptures he could rival the best of the Rabbis (cf. J. Bon-sirven, S.J., Exégèse rabbinique et exégèse paulinienne [1939] passim); he was a father to more churches than that of Corinth, cf. 1 Cor 3:1-2; 4:15; and what did he do but teach on all his missionary journeys, in all his letters, in the special instructions which he gave to his missionary deputies, cf. 1 Cor 4:17; 2 Tim 3:14 etc.? He could threaten to come with a rod if his 'children' began putting on airs, 1 Cor 4:18-21; none more sure than he that he taught the pure Gospel, Gal 1:6-10, that it was for him not only to 'make every mind surrender to Christ's service', but also to be 'prepared to punish rebellion from any quarter', 2 Cor 10:5-6, KNT.

But he manifested in his own person how fully such 'authoritarianism' could be impregnated with what is one-sidedly called 'the spirit of Christ'. When the Corinthians were threatening to split up into rival factions claiming to have Apollo, or Paul, or some other as their 'authority', St Paul's distress showed itself in the way that he rebuked them. They were lowering themselves by thus placing their 'glory' in mere men: like everything else in the world, life and death included, the Apostles and their helpers had been placed at their service, all for them; and their pre-occupation should be to live for Christ, and so for God, by the way they used all that God had placed at their disposal—including those mysteries of his, of which the Apostles were merely the stewards, accountable to him for their ministrations, cf. 1 Cor 1:11-13; 3:21-4:5. The Apostles were merely ministers, assistants, in God's work among them; to him alone must be ascribed the increase: it was not for Paul or for Apollo to take credit for the richness of the harvest, or for the beauty of the building; these belonged to God, 1 Cor 3:3-9; cf. 2 Cor 4:5, 7, 15; 5:17-20.

Thus, just as our Lord himself constantly sought to turn attention away from himself and ascribed all that he said and did to his Father (Lebr. ODT I [1927] 309), so too St Paul manifests an exquisite humility, above all when he is vindicating his authority against the calumnies of those who attacked his apostolate. All those called to such a work had become 'the refuse of this world, the offscouring of all', 1 Cor 4:13, yet he least of all would think of complaining, having previously 'persecuted the Church of God' and thus being the least of all the apostles, as he was indeed the last, 'one born out of due time', 1 Cor 15:8-9. He had worked all the harder for that, or rather the grace of God working with him, ibid. 10; but he showed his sense of peculiar obligation to preach which the 'violence' of his conversion had imposed on him: if preach he must, he would do it 'free of charge, not making full use of the rights which gospel preaching gives me', 1 Cor 9:14-18, KNT (cf. Allo in loc.; also Paul's great 'boasting' apologia, 2 Cor 10-13 etc.). In every way he tried to adapt himself to the various conditions and needs of those he would win to Christ, 1 Cor 9:19 ff.: 'I have made myself everybody's slave, to win more souls', ibid. KNT; so much so that it was easy for his critics to accuse him of opportunism, of 'courting the favour of men', Gal 1:10, KNT. His fierce repudiation of such a charge (e.g. Gal) brings out all the more how, for all his humility in dealing with his converts, he was loyal to the commission he had received to teach and to direct them.

This blending of authority and self-abasement, coming as it did from our Lord himself, was not confined to St Paul. St Peter in his first epistle, teaches and exhorts objectively and peremptorily: yet his deep humility can be sensed in the way he praises his hearers who are so full of love for Christ, though they have never even seen him, let alone known and lived with him as he has done, cf. 1 Pet 1:8; or again when he lays down rules for the 'presbyters', reckoning himself merely as one of them, and revealing his own outlook when he tells them not to lord it over their charges, but to set an example to their flock; cf. 1 Pet 5:3. Such phrases have given occasion to some to belittle g The Catholic Church is often accused for her insistence on the authority of her accredited officials. Perhaps two considerations will put this matter in a clearer light. One can scarcely 'lord it over' others unless one is in a position to do so, cf. sup. § 656b. That our Lord warned his disciples against it implies that they might be in such a position, i.e. so far from excluding it, his words imply that authority is to be exercised within the body of his followers. But those in such a position may abuse it in one way or another; that is why he puts before them the idea—his own—of humble service, which they should themselves adopt; whether they do so or not, the authority is theirs (cf. his reply to Peter, contrasting the conduct of the faithful and wise steward with that of one who is disloyal and violent: Lk 12:39-46).

h Secondly, the repudiation of human authority among Christians can be maintained in the face of the evidence of the NT only by an exaggerated personification of the Gospel revelation. Because Christ is the Word of God in person, not only is a personal authority ascribed to Scripture (the 'word of God' in another sense), but the preaching of the Gospel too (the 'word of God' once more) is given a personality—often indistinguishable from that of Christ himself. Thus where Catholics see the human instrument exercising authority because commissioned by God to do so, others see only 'the Word' with all its binding force and exigencies as well as its appeal and challenge. This 'power of the Word' is not denied by the Catholic Church: the fact that in her teaching the three great realities—Christ, the Scriptures, the preaching of the Gospel—have always been given the same name, shows her awareness of the inner relationships between them; but the experience of nineteen centuries prevents her from forgetting the warnings of Paul, of John, of Peter, of Jude, and those indeed of Christ himself, to beware of false prophets, of men who come speaking in his name, liable to deceive, if possible, even the elect, cf. § 639d. That is why Christ made the preaching of the Word [the Gospel] contingent on an office. There were Gnostics and others even in apostolic times who also professed to proclaim 'the Word': but how were ordinary folk to know the difference? Since it was the Word [i.e. Christ] who gave the Apostles their authority, their 'office' was indeed contingent on 'the Word'; but that office in turn had as its essential function to guarantee, for the generality of the faithful, the proclamation of the Word [i.e. the Gospel] in all its purity. Again, if it was through the power of the Word [i.e. of Christ] that the Apostles had their authority, their approval of those who were, in their turn, raised to an office in the Church was itself but a prolongation of the activity of the Word. And, in fine, if the power of the Word [the Gospel] was manifested in its preserving itself among the children of men, it did so precisely through constantly renewed officials, upon whom was laid the charge of preaching the Word and guarding it against all corruption (cf. §§ 639f, g; 657h). One might then say that, from God's point of view, indeed, the office was contingent on the Word; but from the point of view of the ordinary faithful (for whom the Word was given), the Word was contingent upon the office.

i In the brief survey of the origins of the ministry, which is all that is possible here, what has just been said of the place of the ministry in the organic harmony of the mystical Body, and of the nature of the authority exercised by its members, must be understood where reference to these topics is not explicitly made. (See also §§ 635, 638b, 639f-h.) The full presentation of the evidence does not confine itself to the analysis of a small handful of texts, but embraces in a wide sweep the whole economy of the Redemption as manifested in the two Testaments and in the early Church. In this way, justice can be done, at one and the same time, to the demand for a spiritual appreciation of Christ's Church and to the implication of a firm human structure which, historically, underlies the words of the Apostles, and, in the first place, those of Christ himself. It is to this 'exterior' element of the Body of Christ that we can now turn our attention.

657a What Christ had done: (1) the Apostles—If the first things which the early Christians were taught were the facts about our Lord: his Messiahship (at least), his saving death and resurrection, his promised return to judge the world; if the faith in him as 'Lord', and repentance and Baptism were the essentials for admission to the new company, it is clear that their instruction did not stop there. We hear from the first that they were 'persevering in the doctrine of the Apostles', Ac 2:42, and what was said above of their growing in the knowledge of Christ (§ 634d), suffices to explain why St Luke (or his very early source) used these terms to express what they learnt. We have the qualifications of an Apostle, as then envisaged, in St Peter's address at the election of Matthias: one 'who has accompanied with us, all the time that the Lord Jesus came in and went out amongst us, beginning from the baptism of John, until the day wherein he was taken up from us . . . a witness with us of his resurrection', Ac 1:21-22.

The 'doctrine of the Apostles', then, was what the Apostles had learnt through being with our Lord during his public ministry: they were the men who had lived in closest intimacy with him, had heard his teaching and been witnesses of his life and of his wonders of power and lowliness, cf. Heb 2:3. If they tried chiefly to reproduce his words, they could not do so apart from the incidents which so often occasioned them, and inevitably they would be led on to recall other memories in response to their hearers' questions: 'Why did he do that?' 'What did he do then?' And even if they had wanted to, they could not have escaped explaining the privileged position which they had held at his side, if they were to satisfy the curiosity of the new believers—and not merely their curiosity, but the natural human need to fit into the newly-forming pattern of their minds, the position of these 'witnesses' from whose lips they knew they were receiving the truth. After all, the Twelve had been chosen by our Lord in order that they 'should be with him, and that he might send them to preach', Mk 3:14.

The very way in which St Peter expressed the need of replacing Judas, likewise implies that the Twelve were, in our Lord's mind, to have an official status among the disciples. Others had 'accompanied with' them throughout his public life, and a still greater number had been 'witnesses of his resurrection', yet only one was to 'become with us a witness of the resurrection': the emphasis, therefore, must be put on 'with us', and the meaning be 'join us as one of the official witnesses of the resurrection'. The number Twelve had to be made up again; our Lord had used this number to represent the totality of Israel with its twelve tribes, Mt 19:28; Lk 22:30; cf. Apoc 21:12, 14; Peter and his fellows could not foresee that a thirteenth was destined to be added to them by the unquestionable choice of our Lord himself; the place intended for Judas was vacant owing to his irremediable loss (James of Zebedee's place, on the contrary, was not made vacant by his death, Ac 12:2, since death for Christ spelt salvation: he had merely occupied his throne of judgement before the others, and there was therefore never any question of replacing him); at the moment, the intentions of Christ could only be realized by an appeal to him to show which of the two selected as fulfilling the conditions, was the object of his choice, Ac 1:24; cf. Lebr. ODT I [1927], 347 n. 1. (On the Twelve cf. esp. P. Gaechter, S.J., 'Die Wahl des Matthias', ZKT [1949] 318-46, and, with some slight reservations, *K. H. Rengstorff in KTW s.v. δώδεκα; also s.v. ἀπόστολος; on the Twelve with Paul [and d The presentation of the Apostles by the Synoptists harmonizes perfectly with what Ac etc. imply, without being conditioned by it. They are usually called by them 'the Twelve', or merely 'the disciples', and not 'the Apostles', because while with our Lord they were as yet hearers and, save for one short experimental mission, never acted as 'apostles' before Pentecost, Mt 10:5 ff.; Mk 6:7-13, 30-31; Lk 9:1-6, 10; Lk 10:1-17 mission of the seventy-two (?). Yet when Christ first 'chose out twelve—whom he would—from among his disciples', it is explicitly stated by Lk that it was he who named them ἀπόστολοι, 6:13. The Hebrew word which this represents, šālīḥ, meant 'one entrusted to fulfil a task, acting in the name of the sender' (hence, he is 'not above him who sent him', Jn 13:16; at the same time, 'he that receiveth you receiveth me', Mt 10:40, and 'he that heareth you heareth me, and he that despiseth you, despiseth me', Lk 10:16; cf. Mt 10:14-15). The task entrusted to them, most solemnly, Mt 28:18, was summarized as that of 'making disciples of all the nations, baptizing them . . . : teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you', Mt 28:19-20, WV; and again as that of 'preaching to all the nations repentance and forgiveness of sins in the name of the Christ, beginning from Jerusalem', cf. Lk 24:47.

e But this, of course, was only a summary. Mt concludes a selection of parables and of their explanation to 'the disciples' with our Lord's words: "'Have ye understood these things?'" they say to him: "Yes". He said unto them: "Therefore every scribe instructed in the kingdom of heaven is like to a man who is a householder, who bringeth forth out of his treasure new things and old", Mt 13:51-52. (N.B. The Apostles are the 'scribes' of Christ's new order: e.g. Mt 23:34 compared with Lk 11:49.) What may be called their pastoral duties are summed up in Mt 18, where their authority within the Church is canonized: "'Whatsoever you shall bind upon earth shall be bound also in heaven'", 18:18, not merely the power of excommunication—implied directly by the immediate context—nor, at the other extreme, merely a ratification of all that Christians in general may do which 'conforms to the principles of charity, union and concord' (G. Lambert, S.J., 'Lier-délié' in Vivre et Penser [war-time RB], III [1943-4] 101, where the specific significance of the contrasted terms is unjustifiably set aside), but a real power, replacing that claimed by the Scribes, of making authoritative decisions binding in conscience, which is promised by our Lord to those in general who will act on behalf of 'the Church', and immediately, here, to the Twelve whom he is instructing for their future work (Mt 18:1; cf. the parallel ch in Mk, especially 9:34. So Catholic exegetes generally; also *J. Jeremias in KTW, s.v. κλεις, 751-2, who calls attention to the fact that in Tit 3:10, the final decision rests not, apparently, with the community as such, but with Titus, acting with full power on behalf of the Apostle). This power was not confined to teaching and administration, but included a priestly power to forgive sins through the Spirit, when the sinner gave sufficient evidence of repentance; a power expressly conferred after the resurrection, Jn 20:21-23, and perhaps already hinted at in Mt 9:8: the crowds, after the healing and forgiveness of the paralytic, 'glorified God that gave such power to men'. (K. Adam, 'Zum ausserkanonischen und kanonischen Sprachgebrauch von Binden und Lösen' in TQ 96 [1914] 49-64; 161-97). Protestants generally deny this forgiving power, but this denial is reduced to a question of words when it takes this form: 'Through the Spirit, whom Christ bestows upon his authorised messenger, it is Christ who acts immediately as the forgiver' (Jeremias KTW, ibid. 753). By the power of Orders the priest acts, in fact, as the minister of Christ, and not in his own name, nor merely as a Church official enforcing external discipline. 657e

1 But the greatest priestly power, which our Lord conferred on those whom he had attached closest to him, was that of enacting a liturgical worship far surpassing, and intended to displace, the most solemn sacrifices of the temple. Its institution was of so all-embracing a character that some have seen in it the moment of the creation of the Church itself (cf. *F. Kattenbusch, 'Der Quellort der Kirchenidee' in Festgabe für A. von Harnack [1921] 143-72). At least it manifests, in its pregnant details, our Lord's intention to initiate a society comparable in its inner and external unity to the children of Israel whom on Sinai God had chosen to be his 'people'. Later, there had been promised them a new covenant, to replace the old one which they had broken, whereby in a far more intimate sense 'he would be their God and they his people', Jer 31:31-33; Heb 8:7-13, WV; cf. Dt 26:17-18 etc. Our Lord came, and he had proclaimed the terms of the new relationship with their Father in heaven; he had appealed to the chosen race as a whole—to Jerusalem especially—and they had refused, cf. Mt 23:37; Lk 13:34: the old garment had become torn, the old bottles cracked, and new ones had to take their place, cf. Mt 9:16-17 par. He had chosen the Twelve and he now inaugurated, for them and for all those who through their word should believe in him (cf. Jn 17:20), a rite which, beyond its own inherent sacredness, would be a perpetual memorial of the new covenant which God was sealing with them through his mediatorship.

2 Next day he was to 'give his life a redemption for many', Mt 20:28; 'by his own blood' he was to 'obtain eternal redemption' and to 'cleanse our conscience from dead works, to serve the living God', cf. Heb 9:12, 14. Moses, with the blood of the sacrifices in bowls beside him, had, of old, 'taken the book of the covenant and read it in the hearing of the people: and they said: "All things that the Lord hath spoken we will do. We will be obedient"'. The blood, as being the force of life, was to symbolize the vital bond between God and his people. Moses had already poured half of the blood on the altar (representing Yahweh); and now 'he took the blood and sprinkled it upon the people, and he said: "This is the blood of the covenant which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words"', Ex 24:5-8; cf. Heb 9:18-20.

3 So too Christ, pre-enacting his sacrifice of the morrow, after distributing the bread, which he had blessed with the words: 'This is my body given for you', passed round the cup as he uttered the history-charged words: 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood, which is being shed on your behalf', Lk 22:20, WV; 1 Cor 11:25, WV; cf. Mt 26:28; Mk 14:24 and § 644 f-j. Here was no gift merely to be partaken of by individuals, it was also the pledge of the eternal covenant to which generation after generation would adhere, a covenant sealed not with 'the blood of goats and of oxen' as of old, but with his own blood, when he 'offered himself unspotted unto God', Heb 9:13, 14. He thus showed that he was forming a new 'people of God' (cf. Deut 29:12-13), a new 'nation' which was to possess 'the kingdom of God', of which the Jewish nation, through its representatives, had proved itself unworthy, cf. Mt 21:43; ZLG, s.v. διαθήκη; L. G. da Fonseca, 'Διαθήκη—foedus an testamentum?' in Bi 8 (1927) 299-301, 421-3, 435-40. [The parallelism is what is most significant in this connexion. The word 'covenant', suggesting as it does a certain equality between the parties to it, is clearly inadequate when God is one of those parties; yet it is irreplaceable. Anxiety to safeguard God's sovereign initiative has led Protestants to neglect certain aspects in both 'covenants', and to reduce the meaning merely to 'a proclamation of the sovereign will of God in history whereby he establishes the relationship between himself

h If Calvary was the efficient cause of 'the new people', individuals being transformed and drawn together by its reconciling power, the symbolic rite which so vividly manifested this fact—for the reality of Christ's presence under the separate elements is an essential part of the symbolism—was of itself most apt to become the supreme act of worship of his new people. That it should be so, was determined by himself, Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:25, and in view of the position and the powers which he had already given or was to give to his future Apostles, it was to them that he entrusted the celebration of this rite and the care for its perpetuation. As in so much else, he left the details to them, or rather to the Holy Spirit who was to guide them hereafter in his place, Lk 24:49; Jn 14:16-17, 26; 16:12-15 WV: and if from the bare words: 'This do ye in remembrance of me', one might (as some have done) consider this command as addressed to all the faithful indiscriminately, the fact remains that the early Church never so considered it, but regarded it as a commission entrusted first to the Apostles, and by them in turn, to such as they appointed to share in this and other functions which they had been privileged to receive. Once the privileged position of the Apostles is recognized as having constituted a many-sided 'office' in the life and organization of the early Christians, their own celebration of the Eucharist and their responsibility for the choice of the men who, along with other functions, should celebrate and administer it as the Church expanded, seem so inevitable that only the strongest contrary evidence—which is lacking—could lead one to doubt it (cf. §§ 639f, g; 656h).

i (H) Peter—The responsibilities, which our Lord entrusted to the Twelve alone, sufficiently indicate that he meant them to exercise a sacred authority within the whole body of his disciples. We must now ask ourselves whether, within the group of the Twelve itself, he did not give to one of them responsibilities beyond those which he laid on the rest. No one can seriously call in question that the NT as a whole gives to Peter a unique position among the Apostles—whatever be the nature of that position; one has only to re-read the Gospels and the Acts, with an eye open to whatever concerns Peter, to appreciate the cumulative force of this evidence (conveniently collected by V. Johnson in One Lord, one Faith [1929], chh 10-11). Taken as a whole, it forms the background of the more important incidents (which alone can be treated here), showing not only the special attention which our Lord devoted to him, but the sense of the writers (reflecting that of the early Church) that what concerned Peter in some way concerned all.

j This attitude of the Evangelists, revealed in the numerous incidents and sayings which they record about Peter, finds its natural explanation in the fact that on three occasions our Lord expressly singled him out for a special commission, Mt 16:13-23; Lk 22:31-34; Jn 21:15-23. In each case he takes the initiative, in each case Peter is separated off from the rest, and in each case the distinction between the office and the man is brought into relief by a rebuke from our Lord's lips immediately after. It is clear that the Evangelists understood the incidents in this way, and the attempts to discredit their presentation of them are gradually being dropped simply in the name of biblical scholarship.

k At Caesarea Philippi, Mt 16:13-20, Peter alone answers Christ's question aright, not as a spokesman cognisant of the mind of all the Apostles, but under a divine illumination not apparently accorded to the rest. To his personal confession Christ responds with a promise to him personally, couched in figurative language, its three metaphors combining to express a single unmistakable reality. Peter was to do for Christ's 'Church' what the rock does for the house that is built on it: if floods and winds beat upon it, the house yet stands owing to the stability it derives from the rock, cf. Mt 7:24-27. Until the consummation of the world, even the elect would be imperilled by seducers, traitors, false prophets, Mt 24:5, 10, 11, 22, 24; the wicked one would be snatching away the word of the kingdom sown in men's hearts, Mt 13:19; the good seed would be oversown with cockle by the devil, or choked by the thorns of the deceitfulness of riches, Mt 13:25, 39; 13:7, 22—yet none of these attacks of the power of Satan would succeed in destroying the Church because of the strength which it derived from Peter. Yet how could one man prevail against such odds, how could he support the burden of the Church? The next two metaphors give us some clue. As far as it was possible for any man, Peter was to replace Christ in the exercise of authority over all his followers 'until he come', 1 Cor 11:26, cf. Lk 12:41-48. The keys entrusted to a man have always been a symbol of delegated authority. And, finally, the same is expressed by the power given him of 'binding and loosing', which only secondarily refers to that of forgiving sins (as does that of 'the keys' too), but primarily means the right of making authoritative decisions, binding in conscience (cf. 'shall be bound also in heaven', i.e. in God's sight), whether they be doctrinal (e.g. 'this is forbidden'—'that is allowed'), or disciplinary, viz. applied to individual cases, cf. Mt 18:17; SB I 739. Christ's intention is clear: Peter was to have authority over all the members of his Church. His promise is likewise clear: that through that authority the Church would be preserved from ruin. How this was to be, who should explain? As with all Christ's work, we know enough, we cannot understand all: the mystery remains. (Leading Protestant scholars now recognize the historicity of this passage and its personal reference to Peter: cf. K. L. Schmidt, KTW, s.v. καλέω, III, 523; and Braun, Excursus II, Tu es Petrus.)

During the Last Supper, Lk 22:31-34, our Lord's words to Peter imply a commission of similar import under quite different figurative expressions. Satan is to attack them all; Peter is singled out as the special object of Christ's prayer so that the rest may count on him for the strength they need: his faith shall never fail. This will be due to the office which he holds, for his personal conduct is not guaranteed: within a few hours he will three times deny his Master. But on his faith will theirs be grounded: the parallelism with 'Thou art Christ', Mt 16:16, par., at least suggests that it is not merely trust in Christ that is in question, but objective truth which the Father revealed.

Lastly, at the lakeside after the resurrection, Jn 21:15-17, Christ makes Peter the shepherd of his flock. Some have tried to turn the significance of this event, by making it merely a reinstatement in his apostolic office: Peter had forfeited it by his triple denial, he now makes amends by a triple profession of love, and is restored to his place among the other shepherds. Such an exegesis overlooks certain essential details of the situation. Never before had any of the Apostles been treated as 'shepherds'; Christ reserved that office to himself: he alone was 'the good shepherd', Jn 10:11 ff. (cf. Mt 26:31 and Mk 14:27): he was defending himself in the parable of the lost sheep (Lk 15:1-7, cf. Mk 6:34). The Apostles were still only the 'little flock', Lk 12:32—'sheep' sent in the midst of wolves, Mt 10:16. Our Lord even seems to have deliberately avoided calling them shepherds, Mt 9:37-38; cf. 36. But on this occasion, when he was about to leave them for good (cf. Jn 20:17) to single out one from his little flock and to tell him to 'shepherd' his lambs and sheep, could only convey the meaning that he was appointing one of them to take his place among them. It was thus that his intention to gather his 'other sheep that were not of this fold' was to be 657m realized, since he, personally, had not been 'sent but to the sheep that are lost of the house of Israel', Mt 15:24: the place of Peter in the admission of the Gentiles, Ac 10:1-11; 15:7-12, shows him as fulfilling his Lord's purpose that there should be 'one flock and one shepherd', Jn 10:11, 14, 16. Later, others too, no doubt, came to be called 'shepherds' of his Church, but that was a natural evolution of the term which did not detract from what the seven at the lakeside had understood its first application to mean.

n The importance of the incident is further brought out not only by the acknowledged solemnity of our Lord's thrice repeated address: 'Simon, son of John'—which would have been out of place if he were merely exacting reparation for his fall—but by the fact that the command to 'feed my sheep' was repeated three times, and that in the presence of witnesses. The solemn repetition of a formula engaging oneself, or entrusting some charge to another, or indeed expressing any binding decision, was, if spoken three times before witnesses, the seal of validity, giving the act a legal irrevocability. Before memory and the spoken word were replaced by documents and signatures, that was the recognized way of making good a juridical disposition. It can be traced in Gen 23:3-20; it still characterizes marriage, divorce, etc., in parts of Palestine and in various Muslim lands (cf. P. Gaechter: 'Das dreifache "Weide meine Lämmer"' in ZKT 69 [1947] 328-44). The impressiveness of the scene lay in Peter's being made conscious of his personal unworthiness of such a charge, and in Christ's bringing home to him that the trust he was placing in him called for uttermost loyalty and devotion to himself. But, at the same time, the manner in which Christ laid this charge upon him was calculated to indicate its being the deliberate establishment of a juridical office—of a real delegated power. This however in no way made Christ's own power and activity superfluous, as is sometimes thought to be the Catholic view. If Peter was chosen to be the rock on which the Church is built, it is continually from Christ, not from himself, that he has that strength; if he holds the keys, they are Christ's keys, and it is only in his name that he can use them; if he is to confirm his brethren, it is due to Christ's praying for him that his faith shall not fail; and if he is to feed the flock, it is Christ's sheep that he is to feed and on his behalf. In a word, Peter's position does not mean that he (or anyone else) can dispense with Christ; but it does mean that he is the Vicar of Christ, able to act visibly for him, so long as Christ is only invisibly among his own.

o Some description has already been given of Peter's later activities and of the spirit in which he carried them out (§§ 631b, c, 636f). Furthermore, a wonderful coherence is given to the first half of Ac, and to the varying relations between the local churches of Jerusalem and Antioch, if that unique position of Peter in those times is once recognized. The people of Palestine and Syria were men with a keen sense of legitimate authority and rights, and a close scrutiny of what happened in those years reveals where that authority was felt to be; cf. P. Gaechter, 'Jerusalem und Antiochia' in ZKT 70 (1948) 1-48. Much might be said too of the often neglected testimony to Peter's position by his fellow Apostle Paul in 1 Cor and Gal: even the circumstances and the form of the rebuke which he publicly administered to Peter at Antioch enhance, if anything, our estimate of the prestige in which Peter was generally held; cf. X. Roiron, 'Saint Paul témoin de la primauté de saint Pierre' in RSR 4, 1913, 489-531; A. Médebielle in DBV(S) II 620-2.

p To suggest that the leadership of the Church passed from Peter to Paul, is to miss the force of all this evidence. No doubt Paul fills the centre of the picture in the latter part of Ac, whereas Peter had done so before; but St Luke became Paul's companion for several years, and wrote of what he could vouch for. He could not have known all that Peter was doing at the time; what he 657p does give suggests anything but a loss of authority on the part of Peter. Of course Peter did not 'behave as a tyrant among slaves, but as a leader among brethren'; and if the Catholic doctrine is true that all the Apostles were infallible, there was little call for Peter to assert himself in a way that to us would be unmistakable. At least, at the Council of Jerusalem, when Paul's course of action was being investigated, it was Peter who gave the decisive word, after which 'all the multitude held their peace', Ac 15:12. That James thereafter pronounced in favour of the principle thus decided on, and found a formula (later abandoned) to give practical effect to it, is altogether insufficient evidence for regarding him as superior to either of the great Apostles. And later, Paul did nothing to correct his own disciples at Corinth for the obvious esteem in which Peter was held among them: 'Cephas' was not to be monopolized by one party—he belonged to all: he was 'theirs' as much as Paul himself and Apollo were theirs, 1 Cor 1:12; 3:22.

q But perhaps the most striking indication of Peter's position in the early Church, is the importance which was attached to his having been made by Christ the rock on which he was building his Church. Nothing shows this more clearly than the fact that they felt it necessary, quite early on, to translate into Greek the name which Christ had given to Simon. It is clear, from St Paul's normal usage, that among those who understood Hebrew or Aramaic, the Grecized form Κηφᾶς was fully adequate; and it had become so current as a mere name that its significance ('rock') could fall into the background. We use the names Mr Smith or Mr Miller without advertence to their significance. In normal every-day use, the meaning of a person's name does not matter, and thus it was that the name Κηφᾶς came to be used among all Christians, even by those who knew only Greek. Hence, except for some quite exceptional circumstance, there was no need to create a new (Greek) name for him: Κηφᾶς distinguished him adequately from everyone else. There can be only one explanation for the introduction of the name Πέτρος: the need to convey the significance of the incident at Caesarea Philippi, when Christ told him that he was to be the rock on which he would build his Church. Κηφᾶς would do for any other passage; it would do here for those who understood Hebrew or Aramaic, but it would not do for anyone else: Πέτρος was substituted in order to make intelligible the promise that he was to be the Church's πέτρα. Hence, the fact that a new Greek name was created for him shows both the historicity of that event and the importance attached to it from the first; and every time the name 'Peter' occurs, it is a testimony to it; cf. H. Rheinfelder, 'Philologische Erwägungen zu Matth 16:18' in BZ 24 (1938) 139-63; A. C. Cotter, 'Tu es Petrus', CBQ IV (1942) 304-10.

Successors of Peter and of the Apostles—It is quite true that we are unable to quote any words of Christ which explicitly direct Peter to see to it that Popes should succeed him, or which lay down that monarchical bishops should replace the others. This is however no cause of embarrassment. In fact, the record of any such words would be extremely difficult to harmonize with the rest of the NT. If anything is clear about our Lord's teaching on his Second Coming, it is that, for whatever reason, he wanted to leave his followers in complete uncertainty as to its date. Nothing which he said need have conveyed to his hearers, then, the idea that many centuries were to pass before that event. It might be near, it might be distant: the essential thing for them was to be always ready. He created that state of alertness which he meant to be permanent in his Church. But it is obvious that any kind of direction or pre-occupation shown by him with regard to the men who should succeed them, would have lifted the veil at least to this extent that they could have said to themselves: 'Anyhow, we shan't be alive when he comes'. But there is never a trace of any such assurance—quite the contrary. Even such expressions as 658a 'Behold I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world', would tell them nothing: they would not have been any the less perfectly fulfilled had the end come after no more than ten or twenty years; cf. §§ 670-1.

b Even those Protestants who today are more ready than Luther to admit that the 'Tu es Petrus' granted special privileges to Peter, and who recognize that he and the other Apostles were chosen by Christ to form 'at least that much stable organization which no human society can in fact dispense with', (e.g. *G. Gloege, Reich Gottes und Kirche im Neuen Testament [1929] 375), nevertheless will not hear of their having transmitted their powers to others by what is known as Apostolic Succession. In their view, such powers as the Apostles had were strictly personal, bestowed on them because necessary for the inauguration of the Church; but after their death, those who served the Church were not to have 'authority' strictly so called, nor any clearly defined functions, but their activities would be such as their own devotion might suggest—more or less subject to their being so commissioned by the body of the faithful. Christ will have foreseen the possibility of a multiplication and grading of offices thus arising, and their appearance cannot be taken as being a betrayal of his intentions, nor as constituting a break-away from his dispositions; cf. Gloege, op. cit., 362 ff. This at least allows for 'non-biblical' offices (cf. inf. d.), but as regards its main contention, closer consideration shows its inherent weakness, quite apart from the contrary evidence. To Catholics, at least, it seems obvious that, if the Church was to preserve its identity and unity during its rapid expansion and throughout the adaptations which varying conditions called for, it must have had within itself something guaranteeing the course of its structural development. 'Such an inherent prerequisite, already operative in the time of the Apostles, can only have been the authority and power with which the Apostles were the first to be invested'. Furthermore, 'if what the Apostles had received from Christ was not transmitted to others; if on the contrary offices of a new type took their place, how can one possibly still speak of the one Church having maintained its identity through the changes of history? There is no getting away from the contradiction involved', F. M. Braun, Neues Licht auf der Kirche (1946) 162, n. 4.

c But even *K. L. Schmidt, who decisively rejects the idea of an early evolution from a charismatic to a juridical conception of Church and ministry—such as R. Sohm and A. Harnack had so influentially sponsored—(Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses, 17 [1937] 335 f.; Braun 98-9) refuses to admit Apostolic Succession, because it would lead to the usurpation, by men, of the authority which belongs to God alone, 316 f. But this is entirely beside the point. The possibility of an abuse of power does not touch the question whether God, as the founder of a visible, lasting Church, did not entrust certain men with powers which were by that very fact in some sense divine. Still less does it touch the question whether they were to transmit those powers or not. If they were to act in his name at all, they must appeal to a jus divinum for doing so. That was what the Twelve did; Paul did the same: and no one calls it usurpation. And if Jesus intended such power to continue, as being necessary for the later life of the Church, that was what their successors did too; cf. F. M. Braun, op. cit. 166, n. 1.

d But is Apostolic Succession 'unbiblical', as Schmidt and others contend? In a sense, yes, and the reason is not far to seek. The idea was not primitive, and we have seen why not (sup. a.). But, further, nearly the whole of the NT was written by Apostles, and both letters and narratives deal with the Church in what was still its missionary stage. That means that the direction of the local churches did not depend on the officers (of whatever kind) who might be there, but depended essentially on missionaries from outside, i.e. ultimately, on the Apostles themselves. What local organization there was could only be of a provisional 658d character, and until this was replaced by some stable organization of at least relative independence, there could be no real question of successors to the Apostles. Διάκονος, πρεσβύτερος, ἐπίσκοπος were all terms which of themselves might have a very general or a very particular meaning; and they were all used of men obviously subordinate to the Apostles at the time. It is therefore highly unhistorical to deny the existence of a stable office on the basis of the silence of the biblical documents (which concern a period when such an office was most unlikely to have existed), and then to refuse to consider the subsequent evidence for it because it is 'unbiblical' (cf. Braun, op. cit. 163, especially, n. 2, with its quotation from *O. Linton). John, in his old age, might have been more explicit: that he was not, was due, no doubt, to his seeing no importance in writing down what everybody knew and could see with their own eyes. (Yet Diotrophes seems to have been one whose right over his own Church was recognized by John—however tyrannously he was exercising it, 3 Jn 9-10.) The evidence of Clement of Rome and of Ignatius taken together and that of the rest of the second century clearly record that the Apostles transmitted the powers which they had received from Christ to those men who, one in each city, came alone to bear the name ἐπίσκοπος, and who were assisted in the execution of the various functions of their office by πρεσβύτεροι and διάκονοι subordinate to them. But this takes us outside the NT evidence.

The Local Ministry—The provisional character, however, of most of the ministry mentioned—casually, for the most part—in the apostolic writings, does not imply that they were unimportant for the particular stage of the Church's development in which we find them. Indeed there is no sufficient reason to doubt that some of the functions entrusted to them were considered permanent, even though their exercise remained in subordination to apostolic control, § 639f, g. We have already seen something of the activities of the Deacons, § 631d, but we know very little of their specific functions (the seven, Ac 6:1-6?—if so, then the preaching of Stephen, 6:8-7:60, and the missionary activities of Philip, 8:5-13, 26-40, seem far to exceed the 'serving of tables' to which they had been so solemnly appointed). The only explicit references to an office of διάκονοι are Phil 1:1 (coupled with ἐπίσκοποι) and 1 Tim 3:8-13 (chiefly concerned with the minimum qualifications for the post—which, however, implies incidentally that it was by Timothy or some other with like authority that they were appointed. We notice too that the accomplished deacon will be a man of acquired stability and of fearless eloquence, 13, which reminds us of Stephen again).

We know a little more about the πρεσβύτεροι (Presby- b ters). That they held a fully recognized position in the various communities, when Luke was writing, is clear from his not having felt it necessary to explain who they were when he first mentioned them, Ac 11:30. Paul appointed presbyters in the churches which he founded, Ac 14:22 (Luke took this as understood after the first mention, cf. 20:17). At least in Jerusalem, they had a big share in the affairs of the Church, though subordinately to the Apostles (cf. the Council, Ac 15:2, 4, 6, 22-23; 16:4; also 21:18). Spiritual functions are ascribed to them by St James, 5:14. However, there can be no doubt that it is to the presbyters that other titles likewise refer, and these tell us a little more of their functions. The Thessalonians (1 Thess 5:12-13) are told to appreciate those 'who labour among you' (τοὺς κοπιῶντας ἐν ὑμῖν, cf. 3:5; Col 1:29) 'and are over you in the Lord' (καὶ προϊσταμένους ὑμῶν, cf. Rom 12:8; both these characteristics are ascribed to the presbyters in 1 Tim 5:17) 'and admonish you' (καὶ νοθεύουσιν ὑμᾶς, as Paul himself was wont to do, e.g. Ac 20:31, 1 Cor 4:14). They should be the object of a particular love because of their responsible function. They, in their turn, must 'admonish c The idea of 'being over' the others recurs in various forms: οἱ ἡγουμένοι, Heb 13:7, 17 ('obey your superiors and be subject to them', WV), 24; it is implied of 'the house of Stephanas' at Corinth, 1 Cor 16:15-18; it became canonized in the word ἐπίσκοπος 'overseer', from which is derived our own word bishop as well as the French évêque. It is now almost universally admitted that ἐπίσκοπος and πρεσβύτερος at that time were designations of the same persons; the evidence is Ac 20:17, 28; Tit 1:5, 7, and Tit 1:6-9 compared with 1 Tim 3:2-7. As bishops appointed over the flock by the Holy Spirit, they are to 'shepherd the Church of God'; they are to be prepared for the attacks of wolves from without (cf. Mt 10:16; Jn 10:12), and guard against perverse teaching even within, Ac 20:28-30 (cf. Mt 7:15: our Lord's warning against false prophets as being wolves in sheep's clothing). This care for the Church of God over which they are to rule—as does a father over his home—is again enjoined on them by St Paul in 1 Tim 3:4-5; as is also sound teaching and the defence of their flock against perverse doctrines, Tit 1:9-16 (cf. 'some as shepherds-and-teachers', Eph 4:11, WV. For a more detailed treatment, cf. C. Spicq, Les épîtres pastorales [1947], Introd. ch 4 and 84-91; also §§ 918-25).

d The word 'presbyter' and not 'priest' has been used here to represent πρεσβύτερος, because the fact that they were 'priests' is not implied by the Greek word and can only be deduced indirectly, chiefly from evidence later than the NT. We can exclude the idea that any and every Christian could celebrate the Eucharist, and on the other hand it is clear that others besides the Apostles did so. Thus, besides the obvious importance of 'the Lord's Supper' and the a priori probability that it was celebrated in all the churches, we know that it was celebrated at Corinth at a time when Paul was not there, nor apparently any of his close companions, 1 Cor 11:20 ff. It is but a step to say that those who presided at the rite were of the number of those to whom had been entrusted the care of the local church itself. Hence the justification of the translation 'priests' in DV and WV.

e But were they not perhaps bishops, too, in our modern sense, at least as far as Orders were concerned? If opinions are still divided on the point, generally it is denied, and for several reasons. If 1 Tim 4:14 suggests that Timothy had been given the 'charisma' of his office 'by prophecy with imposition of hands of the presbyters', this is not decisive, because, as we saw above, § 639f, in 2 Tim 1:6 Paul speaks of the same grace as being in him 'by the imposition of my hands'. Moreover, the commission to Titus to appoint 'presbyters' in Crete, Tit 1:5, suggests that these had not themselves the power to create other 'presbyters'. Confirmation of this view may perhaps be found in the fact that St Paul's praise of such as 'desire the office of a bishop', 1 Tim 3:1, is more easily understood if it is the lower order of the priesthood that is in question: certainly the tradition of the Church has always looked askance at those who seek after prelacy; cf. U. Holzmeister, Bi 12 (1931) 41-69. The same would apply to 'the house of Stephanas and of Fortunatus and of Achaicus', who were the 'first-fruits' of the Church of Corinth, and who seem to have volunteered their services, 1 Cor 16:15. And we may well have a reference to them in that other letter to the Corinthians written by the Church of Rome forty years later, in which the Apostles are described as instituting in the districts and cities which they had evangelized, 'bishops and deacons' selected from 'the first-fruits' of their labours. For it is clear that these 'bishops' had not the power to transmit their office to others, since it came only as an afterthought to the Apostles that these, in time, might have to be replaced—and they made provision accordingly, entrusting this power to certain 'outstanding men', 1 Clem 42:4; 44:2-3. This may well refer to such men as St Paul's close companions whom he frequently sent to act in his name in the churches 659c which he had founded, e.g. Timothy, Titus, Epaphroditus, Phil 2:25; Epaphras, Col 1:7. Of these we have seen that the first two had the power to create presbyters, though neither as yet was attached to any single church, as were the monarchical bishops later.

All this is in keeping with the missionary conditions 1 which prevailed in NT times. Without later evidence, we could not tell in what form the special powers accorded to the Apostles and especially to Peter were to be preserved. Jerusalem may have been taken as the model: it is there that with James, the presbyters and the Seven, we see the first outlines of that structure: 'Bishop—Priests—Deacons' which became the universal rule for local churches from the second century on. (Cf. the WV appendix already referred to.)

VII SOME ASPECTS OF EARLY CHRISTIAN LIFE

Reference has already been made (§ 655b) to the 660a theory that Christ taught that the end of the world was near and that the counsels which he gave to his disciples should not be treated as principles intended for a Church which was to endure for centuries, but as 'Interim-Ethics', i.e. directions of conduct to be observed during the 'interim', the few years at most, which separated them from the great cataclysm and his Second Coming. This 'consistent' Eschatology, as the theory is called, supposes that the early Christians lived on the tip-toe of expectation, so that their outlook was coloured by a sense of the futility of all earthly happenings, and normal life was for them a thing of the past. No doubt, their new faith profoundly altered both their outlook and their conduct, but the evidence which we have of their social outlook, of their attitude to the family, to property, to slavery, to the State, goes to show that their understanding of our Lord's teaching was not connected with any fevered expectation of the world's dissolution. The questions which they ask St Paul generally spring from the ordinary problems of life; his answers blend the highest spiritual conceptions with a fund of sound commonsense: he does not invoke 'eschatology' at every turn.

Actually the evidence for the social life of the first 1 Christians is sparse and scattered. But this fact is of itself significant. The NT writers say little of the externals of their social life for the simple reason that there was little to say: Jews continued to observe their customs, and Gentiles too, save where these involved manifest sin or offended against Christ's 'new' precept to love one another. Whatever certain modern writers have maintained, Christ was no advocate of social revolution in the accepted sense. The fire which he came to cast on the earth was a new spirit which might bring about great changes in time, but which could from the first burn brightly in Caesar's household and among the slaves of testy masters as well as among the saints in Jerusalem. Hence for any complete survey of their practice in ordinary life, our records would need to be supplemented by what we know of the Jewish and Gentile social customs of the period (cf. §§ 584-603): here we shall only make some gleanings from what happens to be recorded in the NT. What is valuable to us is the new spirit that is there revealed, a spirit which transformed men's lives without any previous change in the conditions in which they were placed.

(i) The Family—Apart from the possibility of divorce 2 and re-marriage, there was nothing to change in the essential structure of the Jewish home. Taught by nature itself and by their Scriptures, the Jews already had a religious conception of the relations existing between the various members of the household. The position of the father as the loving master of the family is sufficiently indicated by our Lord's using it to illustrate God's dominion and providence over all men:

660c 'If you, evil as you are, know well enough how to give your children what is good for them, is not your Father in heaven much more ready to give wholesome gifts to those who ask him?' Mt 7:11, KNT; 'thus, therefore you shall pray: "Our Father . . ."', Mt 6:9. And the dignity and responsibility of human fatherhood was all the more emphasized when after years of familiarity with our Lord's poignant teaching on the nature of God's Fatherhood, the faithful were told by St Paul that it was after him that all other fatherhood was so named, Eph 3:15. Affection and charity in the father required no abdication of authority: his was the responsibility of the good ordering of the home, 1 Tim 3:4; indeed failure in this was a disqualification from any office in the Church: 'for if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?' 1 Tim 3:5; cf. 3:12.

d The wife, then, is subject to her husband, Eph 5:22; 1 Tim 2:12; 1 Pet 3:1, yet shares with him the ordering of the home, 1 Tim 5:14; Tit 2:5. He may be a pagan, but in any case she can lead him to esteem the Christian life by her loving reverence for him and the quiet modesty with which she fulfils her duties. These inner virtues rather than artificial adornment will win her husband over to Christ, 1 Tim 2:9-10; 1 Pet 3:1, thus will even the pagan husband be sanctified by the Christian wife, 1 Cor 7:14. So far are the early Christians from regarding conjugal relations as sinful (cf. 1 Tim 4:3-5) or as forbidden in view of the 'shortness of the time', 1 Cor 7:29, that child-bearing is regarded as one of the means whereby a mother works out her salvation, 1 Tim 2:15—to mention but one instance of the NT teaching on marriage; cf. § 654d-g.

e Together the parents have the responsibility of bringing up their children and providing for their future, 2 Cor 12:14. If love for them is characteristic of the mother, Tit 2:4, the father's authority must be tempered by a loving prudence: 'Fathers, do not irritate your children, that they may not lose heart', Col 3:21, WV; 'You who are fathers, do not rouse your children to resentment; the training, the discipline in which you bring them up must come from the Lord', Eph 6:4, KNT. On this model, St Paul would have his disciples see in himself a father, who loves them even when he corrects, 1 Cor 4:14-15, 21. This training and correction of the young, with all that it involves of repression and pain, is taken as a matter of course: it serves in fact as an illustration of the trials of life being but part of God's education of us in sanctity, Heb 12:4-13. On their part children must learn that to honour and obey their parents is the road to happiness, Eph 6:1-3, besides being the way to please our Lord, Col 3:20. Jewish parents in particular will have felt it their duty to warn them of our Lord's displeasure at casuistic evasions of the fourth Commandment, Mt 15:3-6.

The continuity of tradition in a Jewish family turned Christian, may be illustrated by the place which the OT retained in the upbringing of children. Though Timothy's father was a pagan, Ac 16:1, he had, as a child, learnt from his Jewish mother Eunice to esteem the Sacred Scriptures, and she no doubt had so been taught by her own mother Lois, 2 Tim 1:5; 3:15-17. The value which St Paul attached to that early training, and the indispensable light which the OT throws on our Lord's life and work (as he himself had so often shown; cf. esp. Lk 24:25-27) suggest that the 'argue, obsecra, increpa', 2 Tim 4:2, which St Paul addressed to his beloved disciple included exhortations to parents to use the OT in fostering their children's 'faith in Christ Jesus'. The place of the OT in the life of the post-apostolic Church makes it probable that such training was also adopted in Gentile-Christian homes from the first.

f That the acceptance of the Gospel might lead to the break-up of homes was fully understood from Christ's own warnings; cf. Mt 10:34-37; Lk 12:52-53; 14:26. Even a beloved wife or husband might have to be given up, and we have indirect evidence of this occurring from St Paul's permission to the new Christian to remarry when his or her former partner refused to acquiesce in the change, 1 Cor 7:12-16; cf. § 654i on the 'Pauline privilege'. We have to wait for later times for evidence of Christians being delivered to death by their own family. But as far as possible the old relationships were to be preserved.

According to what the Lord has assigned to each, in whatever state God's call found him, therein let each one pursue his course', 1 Cor 7:17, Allo. Nevertheless, this introduced, paradoxically enough, one great change in the Christian social outlook owing to the new attitude towards continence.

Its origin was undoubtedly the attractiveness of Christ's own purity and that of his Mother, and also his recommendations of an ideal offered to volunteers who would and could take it, Mt 19:12. But St Paul's own practice and his exaltation of virginity for both sexes (without prejudice to marriage also being a God-given charisma, 1 Cor 7:7), and his own practice (ibid.) not only imply a general repudiation of sins of the flesh in a world which even divinized them, but, together with many other indications, show that from the first there existed those who, as if by instinct, were so taken up with the things of the Lord, how they might please him, cf. 1 Cor 7:32, that marriage or remarriage had by comparison lost its appeal. (That their number was considerable is clearly implied in Apoc 14:1-5.) One can easily understand how in pagan cities especially (cf. § 602a, b), this new idea of itself sufficed to mark off the Christians as odd people even in the circle of their personal friends; it also created a new problem among the Christians themselves. The men would naturally offer to help the Church leaders, and some would in time enter their ranks themselves as deacons or presbyters; but many of the young women or even the elderly ladies may at first have been at a loss what to do. Few would be able to accompany the missionaries and see to their wants in their travels; cf. 1 Cor 9:5, also Rom 16:1-2(?). At home they might divide their time between the functions of a Martha and a Mary, Lk 10:38-42, but many would be restless and wish to assert themselves at the conferences and meetings of the Ecclesia, even more perhaps than did their married sisters; cf. 1 Cor 11:3-15; 14:34-35; 1 Tim 2:12.

We know a little more about the Christian widows h than about the virgins of the time. Their needs early led to the appointment of the Seven, Ac 6:1-6, in Jerusalem; and at Joppe they were the special object of Tabitha's industrious charity, 9:39. St Paul's recommendation to them not to remarry was not intended to be binding, 1 Cor 7:8-9, 39-40; in fact later he preferred young lonely widows to do so, especially if they had no one at all to support them, and that because they tended to become gossiping busy-bodies, relying on the support of the faithful instead of doing some helpful work, and sometimes giving no small disedification to non-Christians. But those who had genuinely set their hope in God and dedicated themselves to prayer, were to be the objects of respect and solicitude, so that the Church must relieve such as were in need. From among the older of them (over sixty, St Paul says) would be enrolled those who were officially designated 'the Widows', ladies who, by the way they had brought up their children, and their open hospitality and personal devotion to those in distress had won the respect of all, 1 Tim 5:3-16; cf. Spicq in loc. To them especially was entrusted the care of the other widows and of the poorer homes in general, and also the instruction of the young married women in their domestic duties; cf. Tit 2:3-5.

(II) Slavery—Slaves, for all who could afford them, I were an integral part of home life (cf. § 601i), and nowhere does the slow, leavening power of Christianity manifest itself better than in the history of slavery. St Paul could say 'there is neither bond nor free . . .

660l for you are all one in Christ', Gal 3:28, without proclaiming Emancipation. But he laid down such principles as would at once mitigate the lot of the slaves of Christian masters, gradually lead the State to recognize a slave's inherent rights, and finally abolish the institution wherever Christian civilization has had its way and has not yet been repudiated.

At first then, the general rule stood: 'Let every man abide in the same calling in which he was called. Wast thou called, being a bondman? care not for it', 1 Cor 7:20-21; and, according to the more common interpretation (Allo in loc.), he even recommended the slave not to avail himself of a chance of manumission. But deep were the changes which Christ's adoption of the form of a slave made in the outlook of masters and slaves alike. Where both were Christian, the reciprocal duties could be performed as between conscious members of Christ. The slaves were to obey fully, as thereby fulfilling God's will for them; not, therefore, only in their master's presence as if there were only him to please, nor in a slovenly way or to the master's loss, but with a will, and with a single eye serving the one Master, Christ, from whom they would not fail of their reward, Eph 6:5-8; Col 3:22-25. The same spirit must guide their masters: the slaves had rights, whatever the world might think; accordingly they must be treated with justice—nay more, with equity; to tyrannize with fierce threats was to forget that master and slave alike had the same Master above, who was no respecter of persons, Eph 6:9; Col 3:25; 4:1. Unheard of as it was in the pagan world, this new bond between them was but the minimum for Christians; the generosity possible in a Christian towards a stealing, runaway slave is outlined in the delicate and warm-hearted appeal which St Paul addressed to Philemon.

But masters were not always Christian, nor were even these always kind. Harsh and unjust punishment was to be accepted without outburst of curse or threat; let the slaves glory to be following in Christ's footsteps who, guiltless as he was, meekly submitted to cruel injustice in atonement for the sins of all and as an example to themselves, 1 Pet 2:18-25. In so doing, and indeed in all their conduct as loyal, trusty servants, they would actually be apostles of Christ by manifesting the attractiveness of the Saviour's teaching, Tit 2:9-10. Service of God, imitation of Christ, the conversion of their masters—the implanting of such ideals in the hearts of slaves, was a greater triumph for Christianity than any immediate campaign for the abolition of slavery could have been. Indeed the sudden destruction of an institution of so many centuries' standing would have scarcely been less unjust and immoral than its maintenance without any qualification, cf. Prat, I, 275-9.

k (iii) Property and Poverty—Here, if anywhere, the influence on the early Christians of Christ's own teaching and example is manifest. What they knew of him must, then, first be summarized if we are to appreciate their outlook on worldly possessions, on the rich and on the poor. Our Lord's teaching on the subject focussed his two main preoccupations—men's attitude to his Father, and their attitude to their neighbour: the two great commandments of the law. Rich and poor alike needed that detachment from worldly goods which is the obverse of the filial trust in God's providence which he hymned with such loving art, Mt 6:24-34; Lk 12:22-33. Thus would they earn the blessing of the 'poor in spirit', Mt 5:3. He never condemned wealth as such, and could count some who were rich among his friends—Joseph of Arimathea, Nicodemus, the family at Bethany, Zachæus. For all that, he kept warning his disciples of the dangers inherent in riches, and his condemnation of the vices of the rich was second only to his denunciation of hypocrisy. 'The care of this world and the deceitfulness of riches and the pleasures of this life' were the thorns which choked the word and made it fruitless, Mt 13:22; Mk 4:19; Lk 8:14; the woe against the rich, Lk 6:24, and the parable of Dives and Lazarus, Lk 16:19-31, were both directed against those who looked for their 'consolation' in riches alone—God did not enter the picture: they had given all their love to Mammon and become its slaves; cf. Mt 6:24; Lk 16:13. The irony of the parable of the rich fool adds the reminder that no man can count on the morrow to enjoy his riches, be they never so great, Lk 12:13-21. And so 'how hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!' And lest any ever forget it, 'it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle . . .', Mk 10:23-25. So did he emphasize the dangers of wealth, if divorced from a dominating docility to God's grace, 10:26-27; cf. BEJC, 165-71—'disponibilité'.

Such docility was contained in his exhortations to his disciples 'not to be solicitous'; it would secure their being ready for any sacrifice which conscience might demand, Mk 8:36; Mt 18:8-9. But there was a further step possible, suggested to the generous, whereby, apart from any such demand, they permanently renounced the security of any regular income which might be theirs, in order to devote themselves undividedly to the cause of God. In favour of this voluntary poverty there was his own example, Mt 8:20; Lk 9:58, and he expected it of those who, during his public ministry, attached themselves most closely to himself. So with the fishermen, Mt 4:20, 22, so with Matthew, Lk 5:28. This is especially clear from his invitation to the rich young man that, 'if he would be perfect,' he should 'sell what he had and give to the poor and come follow me', Mt 19:16-23; Mk 10:17-25; Lk 18:18-25. It meant living on casual alms, as he and the Apostles did, cf. Mt 10:8-10; Mk 6:8-9; Lk 9:3; 10:4, 7-8; Jn 12:6, and, since they must be prepared for rebuffs, it called for a more acute sense of their dependence on God for all they needed, Mt 6:11. They could thus sympathize, as he did (cf. 2 Cor 8:9) with those who were poor by force of circumstances, but who might yet be taught to find a special blessing in their condition by the heightened trust in God which it called for (so the first beatitude according to Lk 6:20). They would learn by experience what it meant to 'seek first the kingdom of God and his justice', Mt 6:33; they would also learn to love their neighbours as themselves, Lk 10:27.

This second commandment was likewise 'fulfilled', m Mt 5:17, by our Lord, and he had every right to call it his very own 'new commandment', Jn 13:34; 15:12. For he extended the scope of the word 'neighbour' to include even one's enemies, Lk 10:29-37, and that of the word 'love' by emphasizing the range to which disinterestedness could go. It is within this setting that falls the use of worldly goods in succouring the poor. The ideal was to give without hope of any return, Lk 6:30-35; 14:12-14, and whereas the Jews already showed sensitiveness for the feelings of the poor and recommended that charity should be dispensed secretly lest they be put to shame, our Lord went further by recommending not only the sacrifice of the admiration which almsgiving would evoke, but even that of the self-satisfaction which the act of kindness might engender, lest it detract from the single-minded love which had prompted it: 'When thou dost alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doth', Mt 6:3. Generosity in giving he inculcated in every way: never more persuasively than when he promised to take any kindness done to others as done to himself, Mt 25:35-41; cf. 10:40-42. If that was the spirit in which they were to give away what was their own, it was clear enough that there must be no thought of remuneration when they were dispensing what was not their own but God's: 'Preach . . . "The Kingdom of heaven is at hand". Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out devils: give as you have received the gift, without payment', Mt 10:7-8 KNT. They were not forbidden to receive alms or hospitality: these were only to be expected, for 'the labourer has a right to his maintenance', 10:10; cf.

660m Lk 10:6-7. And, in fact, having set out with no provision for themselves save trust in providence, they wanted for nothing, and so learnt their lesson; cf. Lk 22:35-36a.

n Poverty and the Apostles—This outline of the Gospel teaching tells us already much of the Christian attitude to property in apostolic times. As the Apostles had learnt from our Lord, so they taught; and the chance references that we have in their writings suffice to show that it was an ideal which—with exceptions—the Christians tried to fulfil. The need of detachment and the dangers of riches are especially emphasized by St James, who underlines the transitoriness of wealth, Jas 1:10, the folly of counting on the morrow, 4:13-15, and the self-importance which it breeds, 2:1-7; 4:16. His seemingly unqualified condemnation of riches as such, paralleling that of our Lord, is in fact directed against those who were defrauding labourers of their pay, and against the self-indulgence which riches facilitate, 5:4-6. So too St Paul, while warning against the love of riches as being the root of all evils, 1 Tim 6:9-10, takes for granted in the same epistle, that some of the faithful are wealthy men, and gives them sound advice accordingly, 6:17-19; cf. P. H. Furfey, 'Plousios' and Cognates in the NT, CBQ 5 (1943) 243-63.

o In their preaching and the use of their powers of sanctifying and of healing, the Twelve continued to 'give as they had received the gift, without payment' (cf. Ac 8:18-24) and they depended on alms for their support, as the Lord had ordained, 1 Cor 9:4, 14; 1 Tim 5:18. The prominence given to Barnabas's action, Ac 4:36-37, suggests that he had heard the story of the rich young man—and not in vain, but had 'sold what he had and given to the poor', the better to follow Christ. Later, we find him in St Paul's company, both of them working with their hands and even waiving their right to be supported by the faithful, that their preaching might be both freer and more persuasive (1 Cor 9:6, 'Or is it I alone and Barnabas who have not the right to forgo work?' WV). The great-hearted Apostle himself lets us know what distress his missionary labours involved (cf. 2 Cor 4:8-18; 11:23-28) and how complete was his poverty, 6:10. Yet, in addition, he supported himself by his tent-making; for 'what I claim is yourselves, not anything you can give', and 'for my own part, I will gladly spend and be spent on your souls' behalf, though you should love me too little for loving you too well', 2 Cor 12:14, 15, KNT.

p An incidental effect of this untiring labour alongside his preaching was his being in a position to correct certain abuses as they occurred. Thus he could rebuke effectively those at Thessalonica who, on the pretext that the final consummation was at hand, refused to do any more work and relied on the support of the community, 1 Thess 4:11; 2 Thess 3:6-12—'if any man will not work, neither let him eat'. Again, to the presbyters at Miletus, he referred to his manual labour as having provided both for himself and for his companions, Ac 20:34, and he encouraged them: 'so labouring, you ought to support the weak' by recalling our Lord's words, 'It is a more blessed thing to give rather than to receive', 35. This possibility of helping others was the motive which he proposed even to the naturally light-fingered, when urging them to honest work, Eph 4:28. In this way he fought the pauperism and idleness which the general charity of the faithful might easily have induced in certain quarters.

q This charity, after all, was what was most striking in the life of the early Church, and most clearly reflected the 'new Commandment'. It is significant that the first practical thing which the converts of Pentecost did was to have 'all things in common'. Their possessions and goods they sold and divided them to all, according as everyone had need', Ac 2:44-45; cf. 4:32, 34-35. By thus freely selling what they had, and putting it all into the Apostles' hands—or whatever part they chose—for distribution, Ac 4:36-37; 5:4, they were giving reality to the central doctrines of Christ and manifesting that they were indeed his followers. From the first there was a 'daily ministration', 6:1, and the number of the disciples increasing, special officials were appointed, as we have seen, §§ 631d, 659a, 660a, to deal with it. The spiritual conception, which the Apostles had of this seemingly merely administrative work, is shown by the fact that they wanted for it only men 'full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom', 6:3.

It is usual to stress the fact that this voluntary kind of 'communism' (Ac 4:32, 'Neither did anyone say that aught of the things which he possessed was his own: but all things were common unto them') did not outlive the enthusiasm of the first days, and to suggest that the recurrent poverty of 'the saints' in Jerusalem was due to the initial recklessness. What seems far more important is that the spirit and the practical charity of this first experiment not only persisted in Jerusalem, but became characteristic of all the churches from then on. If Luke recorded the appointment of the Seven for the daily ministration of the poor, Ac 6:1-6, and the responsibility of the presbyters for the relief of the famine-stricken brethren of Judaea, Ac 11:28-30, this was not merely bygone history which had no counterpart in the life of the churches as he knew them. Paul nobly fulfilled his promise to James, Cephas and John to 'be mindful of the poor in Jerusalem', Gal 2:10; Rom 15:25-28, 31; Ac 24:17. We know how practical were the measures he took to collect contributions from Galatia, 1 Cor 16:1, Macedonia, 2 Cor 8:1-4, and Greece, 1 Cor 16:1-4, and how exquisite was the art of his persuasion which, while playing on their sense of rivalry, or their self-respect, or even their own interest, could appeal to the highest spiritual motives for generosity: 'our Lord Jesus Christ, being rich, became poor for your sakes', 2 Cor 8:9, 'God loveth a cheerful giver', 9:7 etc. (on 2 Cor 8-9 cf. Prat, I, 149-52, and E. B. Allo, La portée de la collecte pour Jérusalem dans les plans de S Paul, RB 45 [1936] 529-37. We notice, in passing, how he insists on the voluntary character of the offerings, cf. § 637a).

But all this implies the existence in each of the churches of a practical care for their own needy members, not only exercised by individuals, but regularly administered by the recognized officials. One need not appeal, as an illustration of this, to the Agape—understood as a common meal, connected with the Eucharist, when an opportunity was given to the well-to-do to succour the poor (it has been seriously questioned whether the practice existed at all in NT times; cf. L. Thomas, Agape in DBV(S) I, 134-53; cf. 652f). Rather is it to be recognized in countless scattered indications: the Apostles' exhortations to charity, the care of the members of Christ's Body for one another, the fact that the 'good works' characteristic of the faithful were predominantly those exercised in charity to the neighbour (e.g. Rom 12:8b, d, 9a, 13, 17, 20; Jas 2:4-17; 1 Jn 3:17); so for instance Tabitha, Ac 9:36, and especially in the Pastorals (Spicq Excurs. XIII, esp. 294), where Timothy is to exhort the wealthy 'to be rich in good works, to be open-handed and generous', 1 Tim 6:18 WV. These exhortations are no doubt primarily directed to the personal exercise of charity, but the existence of the deacons as officials in the Church (cf. § 659a) and the matter-of-fact reference to those, especially widows, who were a charge upon each Church, 1 Tim 5:16, are proof of ordered organization—too well known everywhere to need any further recording. But even if there were no such indications, the existence of such a 'social service' in all the early churches would have to be pre-supposed as alone explaining the universal practice of the Church as testified in post-apostolic times (cf. L. Prunel, Les Pauvres et l'Eglise, DAFC III, 1673-7). Such a practice cannot have grown up everywhere independently, but must be the continuation, with developments no doubt, of what was done from the first under the Apostles in response to the Master's teaching and example.

660s (iv) Attitude to the State—The early Christians were not 'politically-minded', nor was it proposed to them as an obligation to be so. For all that, Christ had introduced a revolution in political thought by distinguishing between the religious and the secular spheres (cf. § 633g). Hitherto, among Jews and Gentiles alike (if in different ways), the two had been inseparable, in principle at least; the exemptions which in practice the Jews enjoyed at the time, were real derogations from that principle. 'Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's'. If, in the context, Mt 22:16-22, Christ was primarily rejecting the opinion that loyalty to the true God demanded, or at least permitted, the refusal to pay tribute to the Roman State, he at the same time made clear that there was a religious sphere over which the State had no rights. 'We ought to obey God rather than men', Ac 5:29, was the first echo of this, repeated against the State's claims to omniscience by the martyrs of every century.

† But the novelty of this and the emphasis on 'liberty from the Law', especially by St Paul, called for instruction on 'the things that are Caesar's', lest liberty degenerate into anarchy. As Christ had said to Pilate 'Thou shouldst not have any power against me, unless it were given thee from above', Jn 19:11, so St Paul writes, 'Every soul should subject itself to the ruling powers, for there is no power except from God. Those that exist have been established by God', Rom 13:1 (Boylan). And when his life was at stake he (like his Master) recognized the Roman authorities by his appeal to Caesar, Ac 25:10-11 (cf. § 598b). Thus he insisted that it was not because of the sword which they held that the authorities should be paid taxes etc. (cf. § 598c-d), but as a matter of conscience, since they were acting as God's ministers, Rom 13:2-7; cf. Prat, II, 320-6. A further reason for civil obedience was given by St Peter: the edification of the pagans through the exemplary conduct of the Christians, 1 Pet 2:12-17. This also seems to be the main reason for St Paul's rebuking the Corinthians for haling their fellow-Christians before the pagan courts (1 Cor 6:1-6; cf. Prat, I, 103-5; Allo in loc.) and not, as Cullmann 660t suggests, any disparagement of those courts themselves—which even he recognizes as having been 'quite legitimate' (Christ et le Temps, 142, 145).

It was indeed part of the duties of Church leaders to admonish the faithful 'to be subject to princes and powers, to obey at a word, to be ready to every good work', Tit 3:1. If prayers for all men were to be offered by the faithful, 'kings and all that are in high station' were to be specially mentioned, since on them depended whether the Christians could live their lives in peace and quiet, 1 Tim 2:2. For the fact remained that, though they had their power from God, they could abuse it, and our Lord had foretold that 'synagogues, and magistrates and powers', Lk 12:11, and 'governors and kings', Mk 13:9; cf. Mt 10:18, would beat them and put them to death. But this was to be their opportunity: they were not to fear 'them that kill the body and are not able to kill the soul', Mt 10:28, they were not beforehand to 'take thought how or what to speak' for the Spirit of their Father would be speaking in them—thus would they be enabled to witness to the truth before kings and the whole pagan world, Mt 10:18-20. They had the example before them of 'Christ Jesus, who gave testimony under Pontius Pilate, a good confession', 1 Tim 6:13, and who through his death had given them a hope which overcame the fear of death itself, Heb 2:14-15.

Maybe, the Christians saw angelic powers—for good or ill—behind the authorities of the State; but these powers were all now subject to Christ's kingship, Phil 2:9-11, so that any victory of theirs was only apparent and temporary (cf. 1 Cor 15:24-28; Cullmann, op. cit. and Königsherrschaft Christi, 1946¹; for the satanic powers in the world cf. L. Bouyer, Le Problème du Mal, in Dieu vivant 6, 17-42).

This is graphically pictured in the Apocalypse: the beast may 'make war with the saints' and overcome them, 13:7, but the great army stretching unbroken from earth to heaven marches onward, hailing the Lamb, as it were slain, seated upon the throne.

b There are twenty-one canonical epistles in the NT, of which fourteen form the Pauline Corpus, viz. Rom, 1 and 2 Cor, Gal, Eph, Phil, Col, 1 and 2 Thess, 1 and 2 Tim, Tit, Phm, Heb. The first nine are often referred to collectively as The Epistles to the Churches; Eph, Phil, Col, Phm as The Epistles of the Captivity; 1 and 2 Tim, Tit as The Pastoral Epistles. The remainder (Jas, 1 and 2 Pet, 1, 2 and 3 Jn, Jude) are usually known as The Catholic Epistles.

THE EPISTLES OF ST PAUL

c Their Number—It is a curious fact that the Acts of the Apostles, our chief source for the life of St Paul, does not once refer to any of his Epistles. Out of all the letters and treatises that he must have composed during the course of his thirty years' ministry there have come down to us only fourteen which the Church accepts as genuine and canonical. That he wrote a great many more seems an obvious inference from his intense activity and solicitude, and we have certain knowledge of at least one other letter, now lost, addressed to the Corinthians prior to our 1 Cor (cf. 1 Cor 5:9); whilst he probably wrote yet another letter to them between our two canonical epistles (cf. 2 Cor 2:3-9; 7:8-13). It also seems likely that he wrote several epistles to the Philippians (cf. Phil 3:1), as St Polycarp assumed (Ep. ad Phil 3:2), and that he wrote an epistle to the Laodiceans (Col 4:16), unless this be, as some think, identical with the Epistle to the Ephesians. Some apocryphal correspondence was also foisted on to St Paul in the early centuries, e.g. letters to the Churches of Alexandria and Laodicea (which the Muratorian Canon says were written to aid the heresy of Marcion), an epistle of Paul and Barnabas to Cyprus, a series of letters between Paul and the Corinthians, and another between him and Seneca, cf. § 94b, h. But the Pauline Corpus as we now have it has been a clearly defined body of writings from at least as early as the middle of the 2nd cent. For St Polycarp quotes from nearly all the letters of Paul in his short letter to the Philippians (at the same time supposing their acquaintance with them; St Justin Martyr utilizes all, or nearly all, of them, and they were freely drawn on fifty years earlier by Clement in his Epistle to the Corinthians and by Ignatius of Antioch. Furthermore, they are all expressly mentioned in the Muratorian Canon (except Heb), and all except 2 Thess, the Pastorals and Phm are found in the recently discovered Chester Beatty papyri (3rd cent.), in which Heb occurs between Rom and 1 Cor.

Genuineness—A distinction is occasionally made d between the genuineness and the authenticity of the Epistles, in which case, their authenticity implies that their contents correspond to facts and are not fictitious, whilst genuineness means that their reputed author is the real author. Their authenticity is guaranteed by the fact that every Council of the Church which has dealt with the Canon of Scripture has included all fourteen epistles, cf. Council of Rome (A.D. 381), IIIrd Council of Carthage (A.D. 397); cf. also Letter of Pope Innocent I to Exsuperius (A.D. 405), Dz 84, 92, 96; cf. §§ 151, 941. The same Councils also accept the Pauline authorship, i.e. the genuineness of all fourteen epistles, though the IIIrd Council of Carthage makes a rather peculiar reference to Hebrews: 'Pauli apostoli epistulae tredecim eiusdem ad Hebraeos una'. For further treatment of the authorship of Heb see § 928a-f.

Outside the Church, however, the position in recent years has been quite otherwise. There was a period in the last century when the Tübingen school of critics (who, led by F. C. Bauer, denied the genuineness of all except Rom, 1 and 2 Cor, and Gal) exerted very considerable influence in England and America. The excesses of certain Dutch critics, who went so far as to deny the genuineness even of these, led to a healthy reaction among non-Catholic critics of all nations towards the recognition of the Pauline authorship of the majority. Chief among those who stemmed the initial force of rationalist criticism was the anglican Bishop Lightfoot, whose work deserves honourable mention here. Today there is almost universal recognition among non-Catholic scholars of the genuineness of all the Pauline Corpus save the Pastoral Epistles and Heb (q.v. for a fuller discussion).

Order in the Canon—The order of St Paul's Epistles e as found in modern Catholic bibles is not chronological but follows the order adopted by the Council of Trent (PL 34, 31), in which the epistles are ranked in descending order based on the dignity of the Church addressed and the length of the contents. The same order is to be observed in the Epistles for the Sundays after Pentecost in the Roman Missal, at least as far as the Epistles to the Churches are concerned. It is not known who first adopted this order.

Chronological Order—This is still much in dispute. f Whereas the majority of Catholic writers would still put Gal after 1 and 2 Thess, an increasing number would reverse the order and make Gal the earliest (c. A.D. 49), placing it between the First Missionary Journey and the Council of Jerusalem, cf. JRB 28 (1944) 154-74. There is general agreement that 1 and 2 Cor preceded Rom. Regarding the Epistles of the Captivity, the majority view is that Col, Phm 661f and Eph were all composed about the same time during St Paul's first imprisonment at Rome and entrusted to the same messenger, Tychicus, for delivery (Eph 6:21 f.; Col 4:7 f.; Phm 12), and that Phil was written about the end of it. Then came Heb, and then the Pastorals, probably in the order 1 Tim, Tit, 2 Tim.

g The form of the epistles is the same as that of the secular letters of the period, which normally contain an introductory paragraph giving the name of the writer, the name of his correspondent, and a greeting (χαίρειν, 'health'). Heb alone lacks this introduction; a middle portion containing the main message, and a concluding paragraph bidding farewell (ἐρωσθε) and giving messages from friends. But St Paul never concludes with the date as so many of the papyri letters do. Two brief examples of this common form are in Ac 15:23-29; 23:26-30. Paul, however, changes the pagan greeting 'health' into χάρις καὶ εἰρήνη, 'grace and peace' (1 and 2 Tim add ἐλεος, 'mercy'), and in the conclusion he alters the pagan 'farewell' into some variant of the valediction, 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you'. In the majority of his letters the main part is divided into two sections, the former dealing with points of dogma or with his relations to the Church in question, and the latter dealing with special difficulties proposed for his solution.

h Method of Composition—As a general rule St Paul followed the ordinary custom of the wealthy and educated classes in dictating his letters. In Rom 16:22, for example, his amanuensis adds a greeting of his own and reveals his name as being Tertius. A study of 1 Cor 16:21, 2 Thess 3:17, Col 4:18, shows that he was wont to add a sentence or two in his own handwriting at the end of a dictated epistle, both as a mark of special affection and as a sign of genuineness. Sometimes, however, he would write the whole epistle himself, as in the case of Phm (cf. 19). It has been calculated that it would have taken him a good two hours to dictate 1 Thess and more than eleven hours to dictate Rom (pro rata for the other epistles); and since it would have been impossible for him to have dictated for such lengths of time without suffering many interruptions, attempts have been made to discover by careful analysis where these pauses or interruptions occurred (cf. E. Stange, Diktierpausen in den Paulusbriefen, ZNTW 18 (1917) 109-17). For as Professor J. H. Moulton has well said, 'Paul's habit of dictation, combined with the casual character of his letters, made his writing practically identical with his speaking' (Peake's Commentary, 592). The process was carried too far by the German 'sound-analysis' school, which attempted to distinguish between the parts dictated by Paul himself and the conjectural interjections and additions of such bystanders as Silas and Timothy. Their researches have nevertheless served to emphasize the value of reading the Epistles aloud as an aid to understanding them. The time taken to compose them must have varied enormously; for whilst Rom would seem to have occupied the leisure moments of the Apostle for a considerable period, Galatians bears all the marks of haste as if it had been dashed off at a single sitting.

i What other aids to composition did St Paul have? It is more than likely that he followed the contemporary practice of keeping a copy of each epistle in a special letter-book and that he referred to it from time to time when composing later epistles. This would help to account for certain similarities of ideas and speech in, say, Gal and Rom, cf. Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, 4, 200. Express quotations from the OT (LXX) (as opposed to tacit quotations and allusions) are confined almost entirely to Rom, 1 and 2 Cor, Gal, and the freedom with which he quotes, adapts and combines texts from the LXX suggests that he usually quoted from memory. Quotations from the Heb are very rare, cf. Prat, op. cit. I, Note B. On the other hand Vaccari (Institutiones Biblicae, p 163) says

Did St Paul carry about with him rolls or codices of the LXX? The existence of first cent. codices has not yet been proved, but he may well have had a travelling chest containing the rolls of the LXX. In any case he would have had access to copies in the synagogues of such large cities as Ephesus and Corinth. It is the opinion of the present writer that St Paul also possessed a copy of St Matthew's Gospel in Greek, which he utilized in composing 1 and 2 Thess, cf. Bi 19 (1938) 19-42; B. C. Butler, St. Paul's Knowledge and Use of St Matthew, DR (1948) 367 ff.

662a Writing Materials and Methods—It seems probable that the secretaries, to whom Paul and the other Apostles normally dictated their letters, wrote with a reed in the Greco-Roman manner. The reed was cut exactly like the goose-quill of later times, and was dipped in ink prepared from charcoal or soot mixed with gum and dissolved in water when required for use. The material for writing was normally papyrus, though leather was used for writings requiring to be preserved, papyrus being perishable by nature. Papyrus was made from the fibrous pith of a water plant found in the Nile (though now no longer found in Egypt). Horizontal and vertical layers of thin strips of pith were fastened together by Nile water, glue and pressure, and were then polished. The recto side had the top fibres lying horizontally, and the verso had the top fibres lying vertically. The recto was the side primarily intended for writing, though not infrequently a papyrus roll was inscribed within and without (cf. Ezech 2:9). The sheets of papyrus were fastened together side by side to make a roll, the average length of which was about 35 feet with a depth of 9 or 10 inches, cf. § 21g, i.

At the beginning of a roll there was usually a blank column to permit handling, the writing then proceeding in columns of 2 to 3 inches width in the case of literary works. Letters, if short, would be written on a single sheet very much like a modern letter to look at, except for the absence of addresses. There was no separation of words one from another, little punctuation; there were few paragraphs, no capital letters or accents and very few breathings. Shorthand was certainly known and practised, but there is no proof that it was used in the NT documents (cf. art. Tachygraphy, Oxford Classical Dictionary, 1948). It should also be noted that whereas the roll seems to have been universal for secular books up to the 4th cent., the codex (or modern book) form seems to have predominated for the NT writings from the 2nd cent., probably on account of its easy mode of reference to all passages required in liturgical worship.

Vellum, a very enduring material for writing and made from the skins of calves, lambs and kids, was not used in NT times, and only came into use in the 4th cent.

The Jews had no organized post in the modern sense, and among the Romans the post was reserved exclusively for the Emperor and his officials. Private letter writers, therefore, like St Paul, had to rely for delivery on special messengers or on friendly travellers. Style and Language—German critics such as Deissmann have devoted much time to discussing the question whether St Paul's Epistles are really private letters, i.e. not intended for the general public, but sent in response to some particular message or to meet some particular situation, and specially directed to the needs of a particular person or group; or whether they are better regarded as literary products making use of the epistolary form as a convenient vehicle for conveying instruction to a nascent and struggling Christian community; though Deissmann, op. cit., p 232, concludes that they are 'real non-literary letters', they are, in fact, unique in so far as they combine both characteristics, though in varying degrees in particular cases. For on the one hand

662e they are most intimate, revealing his ardent affection for and devotion to his converts, and at the same time most practical in the answers they give to requests for help, advice and encouragement in the troubles and difficulties of the hour; on the other hand, it is quite clear that he intended them to be read to the whole Church, 1 Thess 5:27, and even to be communicated to other Churches, Col 4:16; and hence he deliberately worked much doctrinal instruction and close theological argument into them, cf. A. Steinmann, Der hl Paulus und seine Briefe, in Die Briefe an die Thessalonicher, Bonn, 1935. (Nevertheless it is very important to note that he does not give but presupposes a knowledge of fundamental doctrines, e.g. in Phil the divinity of Christ comes in incidentally as something known to the readers and serving merely to emphasize a lesson of humility; cf. also his references to the oral teaching he had already given to his readers, 1 Cor 11:2; 2 Thess 2:15; 3:6; 1 Cor 11:23; 15:3, etc.)

d St Paul wrote all his epistles in good idiomatic contemporary Greek (the so-called Koine or common dialect), of which he had a thorough command, cf. § 21a. His famous reference to himself in 2 Cor 11:6 as being 'rude in speech' (ἰδιώτην τῷ λόγῳ) merely meant that he made no attempt to impart to his writing or speech that Attic elegance and polish which his Corinthian critics seemed to revere. Actually, his language and style strike a successful mean between literary Greek and the common speech of contemporary life, and it was he who first adapted the Greek tongue to the sublime doctrine of the Christian religion, B. E. Allo, RSPT 23 (1934) 29-39. Precisely because his writing is practically identical with his speaking we often find in his letters that looseness of construction which is common in the ordinary converse of even the best educated. Hence there is no reason for surprise or disparagement if we find what the strict grammarians would label as blemishes of style, e.g. semitisms (the use of the abstract for the concrete, substantives for adjectives), transpositions of words (e.g. Gal 3:19), anacolutha (e.g. 1 Thess 1:8), strings of words to illustrate his meaning (e.g. Rom 1:29 f.), rhetorical questions, unheralded asides, parentheses and digressions (e.g. Rom 5:12-13; Gal 2:3-6). Hence we may very well agree with 2 Pet 3:16 that in St Paul there 'are certain things hard to be understood' even by his contemporaries who were in a far better position than we are to fathom his meaning. Nevertheless his obscurity should not be exaggerated, and though doubts will continue to remain over the meaning of texts here and there, the grand lines of Pauline theology are clear beyond all dispute, cf. Prat, op. cit. passim.

e Sources of his Teaching—It is sufficient here to state that there is no contradiction between his teaching and that of the Evangelists and St Peter. St Paul, the chosen instrument of divine Providence in the initial spread of the Gospel, framed the vast synthesis of Christian theology through the power of his great intellect, illumined by grace and trained in the schools of rabbinic theology. The elements of his synthesis were derived from (a) the direct revelation of Christ, cf. Gal 1:15 f.; 1 Thess 4:15; this element, however, should not be overstressed, for the great bulk of facts relating to the life and teaching of Christ he had derived naturally from (b) the teaching and converse of the Apostles and disciples, cf. 1 Cor 11:23; 15:3 f., (c) his study of, and meditation on, the OT in the light of the known facts about Jesus and the special personal revelation he had received, (d) the main stream of Jewish theology, in which he had been carefully educated by Gamaliel. The view, very popular some years ago, that his thought was much influenced and formed by hellenistic syncretism has now been largely abandoned, cf. E. Jacquier, DAFC IV 964-1013; Prat, art. Paul et Paulinisme, DAFC. Whilst he must have had some acquaintance with the pagan mystery religions and certainly used (in special connotations of his own) some of the words which they employed as technical terms, e.g. (γνώσις, μυστήριον, φωτισμός), yet his hatred of all pagan contamination was so thoroughly Jewish that he would have rejected with horror the idea of borrowing pagan doctrines or rites. Moreover he takes it for granted that Christian communities which he had not founded share his faith and characteristic doctrines, such as the mystical effects of baptism, Rom 1:12; 6:3; he expressly says that he preaches the same truths as the other apostles, 1 Cor 15:11; and that they had found nothing to reprehend in his doctrine, Gal 2:6.

THE CATHOLIC EPISTLES

The term 'Catholic' might mean either 'canonical' or 'addressed universally' to the Catholic body and not to a particular Church or person (in this case, excepting 2 and 3 Jn), but most likely it means an epistle 'accepted by the Catholic Church'. The term was also sometimes used of the genuine epistles of St Paul, but proved to be most convenient as a designation of the non-Pauline letters received by the Catholic Church. The term, which first appears in a mutilated portion of the Muratorian Canon in reference to Jude and 1 Jn, is first found in reference to all seven in Eusebius, HE, II, 23, 24 f.

Order in the Canon—In the most ancient codices and catalogues these seven epistles are always found together, and very often they are found bound up in a separate codex following Acts. But in the West they were as a rule placed after the Pauline Corpus. As regards the order of these epistles among themselves, the DV (following Vg) takes the order adopted by the Greeks in the 4th cent., which was perhaps based on Gal 2:9, though that adopted by the Council of Trent, which ranks them in order of apostolic dignity, viz. Pet, Jn, Jas and Jude, was at one time more usual in the West.

The Chronological Order may have been Jas, 1 Pet, Jude, 2 Pet, 1, 2, 3 Jn.

The authenticity of these Epistles is very little disputed at the present time except for 2 Pet (q.v.).

b Birth and Education—St Paul was born in the city of Tarsus at the dawn of the Christian era. Tarsus was the capital of Cilicia, Greek in language and Roman through the favour of Caesar. Distinguished for commercial advantages no less than for literary attainments, the town on whose coins civic pride had stamped the boast 'First and Fairest and Best' was 'no mean city'. Like most trading centres in the Greco-Roman world, it had its Jewish colony, and the future Apostle was born in the ghetto. It appears that the boy was given two names at birth, Saul, after the greatest man of his tribe, and Paul, in token of the Roman citizenship which he inherited. For a provincial such citizenship implied a very special privilege, conferred for service and goodwill to the Roman cause or purchased for a substantial figure. As became one born into a strict Jewish family, Saul's early formation was on traditional lines, and it is not likely that he attended the lyceums that were preparatory to enrolment in the Tarsus university. But he could not altogether escape the influence of a pagan and prosperous city. Temples and theatres abounded outside the quarter inhabited by his race; popular quotations occur in his writings; and the imagery of trade, athletics and war may partly be based on the memories of childhood. Together with two names, he had two languages from his youth—Aramaic being the home-language of the stricter Jew in Asiatic lands and Greek the language of the synagogue in the Mediteranean world. He would shortly become acquainted with Hebrew. 663b

For the purpose of graduating as a master of the Law in the ghetto of his native city he was sent to Jerusalem to complete his studies. Possibly some members of the family resided in the Holy City where at a later stage his sister's son saved his life. The Schools of Hillel and Shammai—two rabbis of the Herodian period—were then in the ascendant and Saul joined the former under the direction of Gamaliel I. He was fortunate in having as teacher one whom the Mishnah eulogizes and of whose repute St Luke preserves an echo, Ac 5:34. While more attention was paid in the schools to the utterances of men than to the word of God, yet Saul acquired, at the feet of Gamaliel, an incomparable knowledge of Hebrew lore and made his own the peculiarly Jewish methods of argumentation which he was later to employ with advantage in presenting the Christian message to his compatriots. And apart from progress in knowledge, he was to preserve from the home of Pharisaism a burning zeal for the integrity of doctrine and tradition and for a rigorous observance of the Mosaic legislation, 'according to the justice that is in the law, conversing without blame', Phil 3:6 b. It appears that he left Jerusalem some time before the Baptist inaugurated the movement which Jesus took over and dominated. The years of Pilate's procuratorship are obscure in the life-story of Saul. From scattered notices in his writings it is legitimate to conclude that he devoted his adolescence to acquiring a fuller knowledge of the Law and to advancing more and more along the path marked out for him by his teacher in Jerusalem. His zeal will have found an outlet in the school attached to the local synagogue and he may have been consulted as a legal expert by the Tarsus sanhedrin of which he was not a member on account of his age.

Conformably to the Talmud recommendation, 'He that hath a trade in his hand, to what is he like? he is like a vineyard that is fenced', he had been initiated into the occupation of his father, the local craft of making tents and cloaks out of Cilician cloth and he remained a manual labourer to the end. He supported himself in this way, even when he was actively engaged in preaching the Gospel (1 Cor 9:12 b), and may have wished to emphasize in his person the dignity of manual labour against the tendency of Roman society to relegate handwork to slaves. He never married (1 Cor 7:7). We have no knowledge of his personal appearance apart from the description in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla: 'a man of little stature, thin-haired upon the head, crooked in the legs, of good state of body, with eyebrows joining and nose somewhat hooked, full of grace, for sometimes he appeared like a man, and sometimes he had the face of an angel'. Many writers think that they find, in St Paul's writings and in St Luke's account of him, evidence that he suffered from shortness of sight or from some affliction of the eyes. The 'stake in the flesh' of 2 Cor 12:7 connotes a form of physical illness, about which it is difficult to be precise. The Latin Fathers suggested headaches while modern writers are divided between epilepsy and malaria. But whatever the malady was, it is

664a Conversion—While Saul tarried in Tarsus, epoch-making events took place in Palestine. The long-awaited Messiah came, preached for the appointed time and was rejected by his own. His disciples, dispirited by the death of their master, were comforted by his reappearance and transformed by the effusion of the Holy Spirit. In the knowledge that the Jews had made a tragic mistake in rejecting the Messiah, they set themselves to the task of repairing the error and of converting Israel to its Lord and Saviour. But the leaders of the Jews were in no mood to accept the advice of Galilean fishermen and, moreover, were disturbed at the increasing success of the new Gospel. The preaching of a young deacon set a seal on their opposition to its progress. It is interesting to notice that among the Jews represented as disputing with Stephen were some from the synagogue of the Cilicians, and Saul may have been among them and may have lent himself to the campaign which culminated in the trial before the council. The speech of Stephen on this occasion is drawn from the very writings which he was charged with discrediting and is unique among the discourses in the early chapters of Acts. It throws conciliation to the winds and impeaches Israel without reserve: 'You stiffnecked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, you always resist the Holy Ghost. As your fathers did, so do you also' (7:51). His death—whether as a result of a sentence passed by the sanhedrin without competence or as an act of mob violence which the leaders did nothing to prevent—was the signal for a violent persecution which resulted in the scattering of the infant Church and continued to rage until Pilate's successor was securely invested in office. Saul kept the garments of those who stoned Stephen and he 'was consenting to his death' (7:59). The pogrom saw him emerge in the role of chief inquisitor, raiding the synagogues and invading the sanctuaries of domestic life in a grim determination to extirpate the new religion. Nor was he satisfied with a local extirpation: he would reach as far as Damascus whither, it was thought, some Christians had fled to escape the fury which reigned in Jerusalem. Armed with letters of credence from the high-priest and an escort, he hastened northwards and was struck down by a miracle in the midst of his frenzy and converted to the faith he persecuted. That St Luke regarded this event as of capital importance in the life-story of St Paul is evidenced by the circumstance that he tells it three times, once in his own words (9:1-19) and twice in those of St Paul (22:3-21 and 26:9-19). Too often have these parallel passages been examined in a captious spirit. In fact, the differences to be noted in them are merely circumstantial and far from raising any doubts about St Luke they are rather an index to his veracity for a suspicious writer would have taken care to remove them.

d The supernatural character of the conversion is placed beyond all reasonable doubt by the various historical details and statements of Acts as well as by the testimony of St Paul and the tradition of the Church. Rationalist critics, avowed opponents of the supernatural, are compelled to find an explanation for the episode in harmony with their preconceived opinions and many adopt the view made popular by Renan, to wit, that Paul merely recognized that Jesus was the Son of God. Others contend, with more reverence but not more reasonableness, that Saul imagined, under the stress of emotion, that he saw him who, the Christians believed, had risen from the dead. Neither St Paul, however, nor his biographer retain any vestige of this alleged emotional urgency. Saul was 'ignorant in unbelief' (1 Tim 1:13) and was firmly convinced that he had to do many things against Jesus (Ac 26:9). Ananias openly claims that Jesus had appeared to Saul on the way (Ac 9:17) and Barnabas tells the Apostles how 664d Saul saw the Lord and how the Lord spoke to him (Ac 9:27). Saul himself is certain of having seen Christ, arguing thence to his status as an Apostle (1 Cor 9:1) and to equal rank with Peter, James and the Twelve (1 Cor 15:8). If Christ did not really appear to Saul on the way to Damascus, then Saul who says that he saw Jesus either wished to deceive his hearers or was himself deceived. No one suggests that he was a deliberate liar, and the case for self-deception is excluded by the factual statements of Acts as well as by the strength and consistency of his post-conversion career. It would be strange indeed if illusion could have created or conserved the life of the Apostle of the Gentiles. Much has been written about the psychological preparation of the Apostle, as if he had long been impressed by the beauty of Christianity and recently touched by the heroism of Stephen. But whatever the influence of Stephen's prayers—'Si Stephanus non orasset Ecclesia Paulum non habuisset'—it is difficult to attach any great importance to this 'psychological preparation' in view of the concordant testimony of Acts and Epistles which represents the conversion as something sudden, startling and unforeseen.

In the city of Damascus whither he was led by his companions Saul received a commission: he was set apart to carry the name of Jesus 'before the Gentiles and kings and the children of Israel'. At this early stage he perceived that the name of Jesus was the only saving name. The jealous champion of the Law saw in a flash its utter helplessness as an instrument of salvation and became convinced that men could not be saved except through faith in Jesus Christ who had been crucified in the name of the law. It is interesting, too, to notice that the words which he heard on the road to Damascus—'I am Jesus whom thou persecutest' (Ac 26:15)—enshrine the doctrine which he made peculiarly his own, that the faithful make up one body of which Jesus is the head, continuing through time the work of redemption.

g When he had recovered from the ordeal in the house of Judas and had been baptized by Ananias, he withdrew for a time to Arabia (Gal 1:17). Returning to Damascus he preached the divine sonship and Messianic character of Jesus in the synagogues. But the Jews were unwilling to be taught by a renegade and in an effort to kill him sought help from the soldiery of the Ethnarch of Aretas. It was then that the disciples took him and let him down in a basket from a window in the wall. He went to Jerusalem to see St Peter and had difficulty in overcoming the suspicion in which he was held by some Christians. But Joseph Barnabas, 'a good man', vouched for him to the Apostles, and a fifteen-day association with their leader clearly demonstrated that Saul also was among the prophets. A vision accorded to him in the temple enlightened him further in respect of his future career and he left for Tarsus. The length of time that was allowed to pass between his conversion and his official summoning to the work of heralding forth the Gospel gave him an extended insight into the way of providence on the one hand, and on the other hand into the workings of grace in the human heart, thus constituting a suitable preparation for the office of preaching to a world which ignored Providence and had become insensible to divine inspirations.

h The beginnings of the apostolate to the heathen world are curiously interesting. St Peter, appropriately, had taken the first steps in this direction, receiving Cornelius the Centurion into the Church, but that he had done what Jewish Christians found hard to bear is proved by the circumstance that he had to justify his action on his return to Jerusalem. At Antioch-on-the-Orontes, one of the chief cities of the Greco-Roman world, refugee Christians, unauthorized, proceeded to address themselves to the heathen, and with a fair measure of success. Barnabas was sent from the Mother-Church to foster the beginnings of the predominantly Gentile community, and on being satisfied that there was a 664h wide field of apostolate, he secured the services of Saul whom he had befriended a few years before and of whose destiny he was not unaware. Under their combined fostering the word of the Lord increased and the disciples became numerous enough to attract the attention of the public. It was here that they were first called 'Christians'. Perhaps it was at this time that Saul, during an errand of mercy in Jerusalem, became the recipient of the visions and revelations to which he refers in 2 Cor 12:1-4. But Antioch was to be his base and thence, set apart by order of the Holy Ghost, he sailed on the first missionary journey.

665a First Missionary Journey—The itinerary was through Cyprus (the home-island of Barnabas), Perge in Pamphylia, and the Galatian towns of Antioch, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe. It ought to be noted that in the course of the expedition the leadership of the party, hitherto directed by Barnabas, passed to Paul, the name which his biographer uses from this point onwards. St Jerome reckoned that the change of name commemorated the victory over Sergius Paulus in much the same way as Scipio was called Africanus from the conquest of Africa. The failure of the Jews to accept the Gospel was borne in on Paul at this early stage of his missionary endeavour: 'To you it behaved us first to speak the word of God: but because you reject it and judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life, behold we turn to the Gentiles' (Ac 13:46). Despite opposition, the work of the missionaries was not without fruit for God stood by them and rendered witness by miracles to the words that proclaimed his grace. They revisited the communities which they had established and consolidated the work by appointing priests in every Church.

b Circumcision and Mosale Observances—The applause which greeted the return of the delegates to Antioch was short-lived, for 'some, coming down from Judea, taught the brethren: That, except you be circumcised after the manner of Moses, you cannot be saved' (Ac 15:1). It is difficult to state in precise terms the facets of the problem which now embarrassed St Paul and continued for a decade (but see Comm. on Gal., §893c-f) to disturb his churches. He had founded communities in southern Asia Minor on the basis of the absolute equality of Jew and Gentile, for to become a full member of the Christian Church faith and baptism alone were necessary. Others—the name 'Judaizers' has been coined to indicate them—held that such membership was not complete and that circumcision was necessary as well as baptism for the full possession of the privileges of the Christian state. The point of view might easily be current in Palestine: the Palestinian Gospel—that according to St Matthew—represents Jesus as perfecting, not abrogating, the Law (5:17). Jesus himself was circumcised: and the Church of Jerusalem, under the guidance of the pious James, had not ceased, in spite of persecution, to hope to win the Jews to Christianity on the sole basis of accepting Jesus as the Messiah. 'It was one thing to let a small group of Gentiles be received into the Church without circumcision in consequence of a manifest divine intervention, but quite another to have multitudes entering the Church upon the simple condition of faith all over the world' (WV 2, 218).

c For Paul the question was one of policy as well as of principle. To accept the Judaistic claim was to make nugatory his whole mission to the Gentile world, and to renounce the hope of gaining that world for Christ. But above all, the thesis of the Judaizers struck at the nerve-centre of the Gospel, denying by implication the intrinsic merit of the Cross. To set up national or racial prerogatives within the Christian Church was an outrage to his conviction that Christ died for all without distinction and, in the light of his intimate experience, both before and after his conversion, he was satisfied that a religion, whose motive-power was Law, would never bring men to God.

d To remove the occasion for disquiet, it was deemed expedient to go to Jerusalem and consult the Mother-

Church. Paul and Barnabas represented the Antioch community that stood for freedom from the Law (cf. Comm. on Gal for discussion of mutual relation of the visits mentioned in Ac 11 and 15, and Gal 2, §895c). In the Holy City the Apostles recognized Paul's title to apostolic rank and approved the method employed by him in preaching to the Gentiles.

At an official assembly St Peter took the initiative and spoke in favour of gentile freedom, 'why tempt you God to put a yoke upon the necks of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we have been able to bear' (Ac 15:10). He was supported by St James, the alleged patron of the Judaizing party, who sought confirmation of the ruling in the OT. Yet James thought it wise to add certain prohibitions with a view to respecting the feelings of Jews in mixed communities. On these lines, as the rescript sent to the churches shows, agreement was reached and the commendation of Paul and Barnabas together with the repudiation of their opponents made it clear that the victory was theirs. The choice of Judas and Silas to be bearers of the apostolic decree may have confirmed all this, for in Silas Paul found such a kindred spirit that he chose him, in place of Barnabas, as his chief companion on the second missionary journey.

f Second Missionary Journey—They traversed Syria and Cilicia and the Galatian towns evangelized on the first journey. Forbidden to preach in Proconsular Asia, they struck north to the frontier of Bithynia. This district they were not allowed even to enter, so they turned west again, skirting Mysia and reaching the coast at Troas where a heavenly vision called them to Macedonia. At this point in the narrative of Acts occurs the first 'we-section', indicating that St Luke was already in the party; Timothy had been taken on at Lystra. They reached Europe at Neapolis, the terminus of the well-known Egnatian highway, and hurried to Philippi which was the foremost town in that part of Macedonia. The ministry there had three phases: 1, the preaching at the river bank with the conversion of Lydia; 2, the expulsion from a slave girl of a divining spirit followed by the flogging and imprisonment of the preachers; 3, the conversion of their jailer. The Philippi ministry is significant in that it was here, in a Roman colony, that Paul first insisted so strongly on his Roman citizenship. The converts mentioned specifically by Luke differ in social rank and religious education and serve to illustrate the Pauline maxim that in Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female. And the sequence of their conversion is symbolical of the progress of the Gospel outside Palestine—through the ghettos of the dispersion on to the Greek world and to Rome, the centre of civilization. Paul and Silas moved west along the main road to Thessalonica, the Macedonian capital, and here they preached for a short time and with some success among the heathens. But the hostility of the Jews forced them to flee to Berea and we find Paul for a brief moment at Athens—sorrowful and alone—before making Corinth, on the maritime route between Rome and the East, the real centre of missionary endeavour at this time. The exordium of his discourse to the Athenian philosophers survives to show that he could use the language of the higher culture when occasion required, but anxiety to be of service to all was checked, in his relations with paganism, by an innate repugnance for anything to do with the worship of idols. He spent eighteen months at Corinth, plying with Aquila and Prisca the trade of tent-maker, by which means he avoided becoming a burden to the converts and running the risk of being equated in their minds with the travelling sophist or sordid politician. On meeting with opposition from the synagogue, he changed, under divine inspiration, a Jewish mission for a predominantly Gentile and fruitful one: 'And the Lord said to Paul in the night, by a vision: Do not fear, but speak. And hold not thy peace, because I am with thee and no man shall set upon thee, to hurt thee. For I have much people 665g in this city' (Ac 18:9-10). It was from the capital of Achaia that he wrote the two Epistles to the Thessalonians.

666a Third Missionary Journey—After his return to his base on the Orontes, the third journey was undertaken almost immediately. He passed through 'the country of Galatia and Phrygia' and sought out Ephesus where he held disputations in the synagogue for three months and later in the house of a certain Tyrannus for upwards of two years. The circle of believers slowly widened and the Gospel, thanks to the new converts, was carried into the valley of the Lycus with the formation of Christian groups in the cities of Colossae, Laodicea and Hierapolis. To this period are assigned the major Epistles—Galatians to the beginning, unless it be assigned to a date before the Council of Jerusalem (cf. §893c-f), Romans to the close, and the Corinthian Letters in between. All are occasional writings with the exception of Romans which is a treatise setting forth with clearness and distinction the fruit of his meditation on the central problem of the time—the relations between the Church and the Synagogue. At the end of the Ephesian ministry, Paul 'purposed in the spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying: After I have been there, I must see Rome also' (Ac 19:21). The work of evangelizing the East had been completed. From Jerusalem to Illyricum (Rom 15:19) he had fully carried out the preaching of the Gospel in the eastern world, and now he was determined, when he had handed over in Jerusalem the money contributed by the Gentile Churches to the poor of the Mother-Church, to seek a field of preaching in the extreme west where Christ had not been known. Paul obviously attached much importance to this subsidy for the benefit of the poor of Jerusalem, no doubt as a concrete proof of the loyalty of Gentile Christians to their fellow believers in Judaea. He little guessed that his visit to Rome would be delayed for some years, and that ultimately he would arrive thither, as a prisoner, on appeal to Caesar. Yet the future was casting its shadows before. At Ephesus a notable disturbance almost cost him his life (Ac 19:23-31); at Corinth a change of plan was rendered necessary by the knowledge that the Jews were plotting against him (Ac 20:3); and in the course of the return journey from the Aegean the Holy Spirit, in city after city, testified that bondage and affliction awaited him (Ac 20:23).

d Arrest and Imprisonment—He arrived in Jerusalem in time for the feast of Pentecost and as he was completing with others a ritual purification, undertaken on the advice of James, Asiatic Jews stirred up the multitude and 'laid hands upon him, crying out: Men of Israel, help: This is the man that teacheth all men everywhere against the people and the law and this place; and moreover hath brought in Gentiles into the temple and hath violated this holy place' (Ac 21:27-28). And they would have beaten him to death but for the timely intervention of the Roman Tribune. From the steps of the fortress of Antonia Paul addressed the mob in the vernacular, recalling his education at the feet of Gamaliel, his zeal for the Law of Moses, how he had persecuted the Christians, and how he had been converted. His subsequent reference to the divine commission to preach the Gospel among the Gentiles, though he himself pleaded to be allowed to preach in Jerusalem, roused the Jews to fury, whereupon the Tribune gave orders to bring him into the fort and to examine him under the scourge.

e This was a contravention of the 'Lex Porcia', and the Tribune, on being made aware of the circumstance, found himself in an embarrassing situation, not unlike that of another Roman in the presence of a greater than Paul. To escape from it he presented the prisoner to the sanhedrin, without result, and Paul, for his part, was comforted by a voice from heaven: 'Be constant; for as thou has testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome' (Ac 23:11). At this point a plot to kill the Apostle was discovered, whereat the Tribune had Paul spirited away by night to Caesarea, the residence of the Roman Governor.

666b Palestine had been re-attached to the Province of Syria at the death of Herod Agrippa I in 44, and it was unfortunate that at this time the Governor should have been a wicked man and a time-server. Tacitus notes with cruel precision the character of Felix before whom Paul now stood: 'Antonius Felix, per omnem saevitiam et libidinem, ius regium servili ingenio exercuit' (Hist 5, 9). After some days the high-priest arrived in Caesarea with a pleader, Tertullus, who led the prosecution and urged that Paul was a disturber of the peace which Felix had been at pains to establish in Palestine. Paul denied having caused any disturbance in Jerusalem and while admitting that he served God 'according to the way which they call a heresy' (Ac 24:14) affirmed his belief in the Law and the Prophets, and the general resurrection, and stressed his endeavour at all times to have a conscience void of offence in regard of God and man. The Governor, though he had no doubt about the prisoner's innocence, adjourned the case giving orders that Paul be kept in bonds but treated with indulgence. He would later come to appreciate the wisdom and independence of the prisoner but in the hope that a ransom would be paid for the freedom of one so influential he kept the Apostle in chains. On his removal from office two years later things began to happen under the determined and energetic rule of his successor. Flavius Josephus contrasts Festus favourably with his predecessor (BJ 2, 14) and his prompt handling of the present case compares to advantage with his predecessor's dilatory tactics. The NT portrait of his character reveals that curious combination of contempt and fear which Roman officials usually exhibited in their relations with the Jews. To the Jews of Jerusalem Festus replied that the prisoner was in custody at Caesarea and that there he would remain. Yet, when the accusations broke down in Caesarea, he showed himself willing and even anxious to oblige them. But Paul, sensing a danger to his life, of which Festus must have been unaware, appealed to Caesar, thus overriding the jurisdiction of the Governor's court. Soon after this the prisoner had an opportunity of which he gladly availed himself to state his case and his mission before a distinguished audience, King Herod Agrippa II and Berenice. The apologia is a model of moderation and prudence, remarkable for the respect shown to his hearers and to the Law which he venerated but whose domination was now at an end: 'But being aided by the help of God, I stand unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying no other thing than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come to pass: that Christ should suffer and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead and should show light to the people and to the Gentiles. And as he spoke these things and made his answer, Festus said with a loud voice: Paul, thou art beside thyself: much learning doth make thee mad. And Paul said: I am not mad, most excellent Festus, but I speak words of truth and soberness. For the king knoweth of these things, to whom also I speak with confidence. For I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him. For neither was any of these things done in a corner. Believest thou the prophets, O king Agrippa? I know that thou believest. And Agrippa said to Paul: In a little thou persuadest me to become a Christian. And Paul said: I would to God that both in a little and in much, not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, should become such as I also am, except these bands' (Ac 26:22-29).

666i Rome, where 'he remained two whole years in his own hired lodging'. His imprisonment was no bar to the progress of the Gospel. The 'word' spread among the jailers and even into the imperial residence, and the prisoner became well-known throughout the whole Pretorian camp. It was a period, too, of literary activity, four Epistles named from the imprisonment having survived. To the Philippians, a dear and docile congregation, he writes out of the fullness of his heart of the peace and spiritual joy which he wishes his children to share. In Ephesians he celebrates the Trinity of Eternal Love coming forth for man's salvation, and hymns the primacy of Christ and the grace-plenitude that flows from him to the Church. Colossians is a less objective exposition of Christ's pre-eminence, for in the Lycus valley philosophy had made an effort to draw the Christian Faith within its own sphere and to absorb it as it had done with so many pagan mythologies—hence the frequent warning against the danger of being cheated by plausible speech or deprived of their rights by philosophy and vain deceit. Alone among his extant writings the letter to Philemon is addressed to a private individual on a personal matter. It bespeaks from him a kindly welcome for an unprofitable slave. While an extraordinary freshness and charm make it, in the literary order, a pure gem, it has an enduring value in that it gives an insight into Paul's approach to social and political evil. To this period, also, belonged the preparation of the hieratic dissertation called Hebrews which was later dispatched from Italy.

667a Release and later Journeyings—He was released at the end of two years and Spain may have had the benefit of his preaching, if only for a brief space. A visit to the extreme west is recorded in the first-century Epistle of Clement (5:5-7) and St John Chrysostom echoes the tradition in Epist. ad Hebr. Praef. From scattered references in the Pastoral Epistles it is possible to fix some of the stopping places in Paul's last missionary tour eastward. At Crete he left Titus behind to set in order what was still defective; Ephesus was to have the benefit of Timothy's kindly rule. From Macedonia he wrote to these delegates counselling them to be good ministers of Christ Jesus, able to exhort with sound doctrine and to rebuke the gainsayers. He wintered in Nicopolis, sending thence Titus to Dalmatia after his successful work in Crete. On the return, he touched at Troas, remaining some time with Carpus; at Miletus where Trophimus had to be put ashore on account of illness; and at Corinth where Erastus remained. During the journey to Rome or on arrival there he was rearrested, and the honourable custody of a few years before gave way to imprisonment in one of the city's dungeons where it was none too easy to locate him. The temper of the times had changed so much in Rome that Christians were in mind and spirit like people besieged; in the press of contemporary events faith alone sustained them. Paul's last surviving letter—to the well-beloved Timothy whom he besought to come to him with all speed—gives us to understand that he is awaiting the end, without that expectation of release which we find in the Epistles of the captivity, but with the quiet assurance that 'there is laid up for me a crown of justice which the Lord the just judge will render to me in that day' (2 Tim 4:8).

e Martyrdom—Tradition has it that he was beheaded at Aquae Salviae, a few miles outside the walls of Rome, and that friends had him buried in a cemetery half-way back to the city. Over the cella memoriae erected by an early Pope a Roman Emperor built a vast basilica in the fourth century and we still possess Constantine's laconic epitaph: PAULO APOSTOLO MART. . . .

d Paul's Relations with the Twelve—At the same time and in the same city, though by a different method, St Peter suffered martyrdom, and throughout the centuries Rome combines the cult of the two and jealously guards their tombs. It is sometimes alleged that this posthumous association is not justified by their relations during life and that the Antioch 'incident' (Gal 2:11-14) is only one of many which might have been recorded. But the 'incident' creates no difficulty if properly understood. More serious is the charge that Paul, being cast in a different mould, never became quite one with the other Apostles and that, being a Hellenist, he was obviously tempted to introduce pagan conceptions into a Christianity that was still unformed and defenceless. Such a theory is a distortion of the facts. Paul was a Jew by race, 'circumcised the eighth day, of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews' (Phil 3:5) and despite the straying of Israel and the misfeasance of her leaders he cherished to the end a strong and tender love for his kinsmen according to the flesh (Rom 9:1-5). And if it is wrong to cut him off from his race and his upbringing, it is pernicious to suggest that he was independent of Christianity in its earliest form. Paul did not differ from the other Apostles in his appreciation and preaching of the Gospel: 'For whether I or they, so we preach: and so you have believed' (1 Cor 15:11); 'And I went up according to revelation and communicated to them the Gospel which I preach among the Gentiles: but apart to them who seemed to be something: lest perhaps I should run or had run in vain' (Gal 2:2). It would make this section too long to outline the arguments for the view that 1 Thess echoes the rhythms of the primitive catechesis which was a source of the Gospels. The connexion of baptism with the death and resurrection of Christ is taken by many to indicate a 'Hellenizing' tendency, but the proof that the viewpoint is not exclusively Paul's is that he takes for granted that the symbolism is familiar to the Romans and Colossians, who were not his converts. The evidence of the Epistle to the Romans is decisive, for that Epistle implies the possession by the Romans of the full tradition of Christian teaching, even in regard to abstruse points. This highly didactic document closes with a warning against false teachers who arouse dissensions and set up obstacles 'contrary to the doctrine which you have learned' (16:17). If, on occasion, as in Gal 2:6-7, Paul uses language which appears to be uncomplimentary to his predecessors in the apostolic office, it behoves us to inquire if this was not occasioned by the employment of their names by Judaizers in the interests of party propaganda and as a drag on the wheels of progress.

Missionary Methods—Paul had an advantage over his fellow Apostles in that he had an early and reliable biographer. Not that Acts is a biography in the strict sense; it is rather an apologia defending St Paul from the criticisms of his detractors. Its summary character is made clear by a perusal of the Epistles to Corinth, where the author recalls the true circumstances of the apostolic life and wherein 'the word overflows from the fulness of love and contemplation': 'For I think that God hath set forth us Apostles, the last, as it were men appointed to death. We are made a spectacle to the world and to angels and to men. We are fools for Christ's sake, but you are wise in Christ: we are weak but you are strong: you are honourable but we without honour. Even unto this hour we both hunger and thirst and are naked and are buffeted and have no fixed abode. And we labour, working with our own hands. We are reviled and we bless. We are persecuted and we suffer it. We are blasphemed and we entreat. We are made as the refuse of this world, the offscouring of all, even until now' (1 Cor 4:9-13). 'Of the Jews five times did I receive forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods: once was I stoned: thrice I suffered shipwreck: a night and a day I was in the depth of the sea' (2 Cor 11:24-25). Of these humiliating experiences, Luke recalls only a few (Ac 14:18; 16:22-23) and of other obstructive influences, he barely preserves an echo. Yet, thanks to him, we are made familiar with the method of evangelization conceived 667g by the master, and catch a glimpse of the genius displayed in its execution. It was Paul's policy to concentrate, after the manner of a general, on strategic points, organize them thoroughly, and make them a base for further operations. He was in the habit of revisiting the scenes of his former labours and when prevented from doing so, kept in touch by letter or by chosen delegates.

h The dispersion of Israel has been looked on in the light of a providential preparation for the Gospel. The synagogues of the Hellenistic world gave him a platform whence he could reach not alone his kinsmen according to the flesh, but also that fringe of the Gentile world which had been attracted to the religion of Yahweh. It is possible to trace in Acts the story of the failure of the Jews to believe, in view of which failure they ought not to have complained when the missionaries turned to the Gentiles: 'To you it behoved us first to speak the word of God: but because you reject it and judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life, behold we turn to the Gentiles' (Ac 13:46; cf. 17:5-9; 18:6; 19:9; 28:24-29). While he announced the revelation of the Son of God to all, his message took on different aspects with different audiences. To the Jews, he spoke of the history of salvation, how Israel had been chosen to be the carrier of the Messianic Hope, and how that Hope had been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth (Ac 13:16-41). To the Gentiles, he dwelt on the eclipse of religious truth, pointing out the folly of idolatry and its attendant vice, and the necessity of turning in worship to the One True God who in those days had called men to their primal obligations through an accredited representative, his Son Jesus Christ (Ac 14:14-16; 17:22-31). The teaching is found in more developed form in the Epistles that carry his name and that are sometimes called 'the foundation-documents of Christianity'. While these Epistles were written for a definite purpose and to meet particular needs, it is obvious that they presuppose general instruction. They follow on what he and others had already orally taught, assuming a knowledge of much of which they themselves say little, and in that assumption creating difficulty for commentators. It is essential, therefore, to place them against a background of Church life and in a setting of Christian tradition which was in existence before they were written. A direct appeal to that tradition is made twice in 1 Cor, the first, 11:23, being of peculiar interest, because it shows that the Mass was being said and Holy Communion received for some twenty-five years before the abuses in Corinth provoked this written account of the institution of the Eucharist. We should resist the tendency to regard these letters as systematic formulations of Christian belief, for most of them were occasional, in the sense that they were prompted by, and written with reference to, a particular situation. It is a tribute to the genius of their author that writings so produced should constitute a heritage of perennial value. Concerning his status as a writer it ought to be observed that ancient classic literature offers no precise parallel to the Pauline letters, either in structure or in tone. There is a freedom and variety in them that have no ancient analogy except in the letters which the discovery of Egyptian papyri has recently disclosed. Though the style has not been universally admired, owing to its anacolutha and parenthetic interruptions, it carries an impression of power and sincerity that a more polished diction would not secure. An attentive reading of the Pauline 'corpus' compels the conclusion that the author, while remaining a stranger to the figures and forms of the rhetoricians, was fully alive to the possibilities of the plastic speech of Hellenism. His was a talent remarkable for lyrical utterance combined with an ability, sometimes displayed, to match the graceful order of ideas with a formal beauty of expression.

668a Fellow-workers—Paul was careful in the choice of collaborators. It seems, indeed, that loyalty to him and use of his methods were demanded of all those in close association. Many-sided men, like Barnabas, did not feel at home with one whom nature had fashioned for the first place. Talented speakers, like Apollo, must have thought it strange to see eloquence set aside in order that the Christian Thing might stand forth for what it was, a 'showing of the Spirit and power' (1 Cor 2:4). Among those of whose services he constantly availed himself were: the timid and affectionate Timothy, his 'truly-beloved son': Titus, a stronger character, highly valued because ready for every kind of work: Silas, of whom we know little beyond the circumstance that he shared with his leader the double privilege of Jewish blood and Roman citizenship: and Luke, the 'beloved physician', who shielded the master from criticism. These men, whatever their natural talents, became under inspiring leadership lieutenants of very high quality. Trained under his eye and profiting by his example they were able to extend his work and, if need be, to take his place. It is interesting to notice in connexion with these fellow-workers that some of them, if not all, were the converts of other men, and this confirms Paul's strong unity with those who went before.

Character and Genius—However much we admire the impetus given to early Christianity by the missionary labours of St Paul, it would be unjust to allow the greatness of the work to obscure for us the character of the worker. St John Chrysostom, having commented on the Pauline writings with a mastery and an eloquence that have never been surpassed and seldom equalled, composed seven panegyrics on the Apostle. The keynote of Chrysostom's admiration is struck in the opening panegyric where he declares that no tongue is adequate to sound the praises of St Paul. In an enthusiastic passage at the end of the commentary on Romans, he prostrates himself in spirit before the tomb of the Apostle at Rome and eulogizes the remains which guard that city 'more powerfully than tower or rampart' (in Epist. ad Rom., hom 32 (PG 60, 679)).

No writer in English has written more beautifully about St Paul than J. H. Newman. Under the caption 'St Paul's characteristic gift', he says: 'To him specially was it given to preach to the world, who knew the world: he subdued the heart, who understood the heart. It was his sympathy that was his means of influence: it was his affectionateness which was his title and instrument of empire'. In virtue of this gift of sympathy the Apostle was able to spread about his person an aura of fragrance and to exercise on his fellows a kind of magnetic attraction: 'For whereas I was free as to all, I made myself the servant of all, that I might gain the more. And I became to the Jews, a Jew, that I might gain the Jews: To them that are under the law, as if I were under the law (whereas myself was not under the law), that I might gain them that were under the law. To them that were without the law, as if I were without the law (whereas I was not without the law of God, but was in the law of Christ), that I might gain them that were without the law. To the weak I became weak, that I might gain the weak. I became all things to all men, that I might save all' (1 Cor 9:19-22). Human nature, even in its unregenerate state, was an open book to him. Though he had never been a heathen and was no longer a Jew, yet he was a heathen in imagination and a Jew in the history of the past. Scattered throughout his writings there are specimens of the tender affection which his great heart had for all his kind, and what a mixture of admiring love and plaintive denunciation did the thought of his own race inflict upon him! (Rom 9:1-5).

The consciousness of exalted office—dealing in priestly fashion with the Gospel of God—was to him a personal humiliation, for he realized that he himself was weak and one of the sinful race for whom Christ died: 'But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the 668d excellency may be of the power of God and not of us' (2 Cor 4:7). As a consequence he used his awful apostolic power only at the call of duty, rejoicing to exhibit himself on that footing of human weakness which he shared with his hearers and converts. That is why he found himself in a position to conceive such great love of the brethren. After the pattern of Almighty God and in imitation of Jesus Christ he cherished to a high degree the virtue of compassion, and a character which was impetuous and unyielding by nature became gentle and affectionate under the influence of grace. The affection in which he held his own converts was as tender as it was strong. With the unselfish love of a mother he brought forth the image of Christ in the souls of the Galatians (Gal 4:19); with the devoted sympathy of a nurse he cherished the Thessalonians and recaptured the language of infancy in order the better to be understood (1 Thess 2:7); with the strong solicitude of a father he exhorted and adjured all to walk worthily of the God who called them to his kingdom (Eph 4:1). How he rejoiced at the orderly array of the Colossians and grieved at the thought of their being cheated and led astray! (Col 2:4-5). 'His mind', says Newman, 'was like some instrument of music, harp or viol, the strings of which vibrate, though untouched, by the notes which other instruments give forth'. How he deplored divisions and abhorred enmities in the Christian body! (1 Cor 1:10-12). These he conceived as an offence against nature, and above all as injurious to the Saviour who died to restore the unity of mankind. Fraternal charity was always in his thoughts, and no man hymned it as well or practised it so assiduously: 'If I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. And if I should have prophecy and should know all mysteries and all knowledge, and if I should have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. . . . Charity is patient, is kind', etc. (1 Cor 13). Christian altruism owes its noblest expression to him: 'Let each esteem others better than himself; each one not considering the things that are his own, but those that are other men's' (Phil 2:3-4); and Christian humanism its motto: 'For the rest, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever modest, whatsoever just, whatsoever holy, whatsoever lovely, whatsoever of good fame, if there be any virtue, if any praise of discipline: think on these things' (Phil 4:8).

669a. Such high and noble sentiments flowed spontaneously from St Paul's appreciation of the Christian Mystery. His mind worked by intuition, and he saw more clearly than others the universal efficacy of the redemption. If salvation is for all men, and if in Christ there is neither Jew nor Gentile, it is because the power that works salvation is not the Law of Moses but faith in him who 'was delivered up for our sins and rose again for our justification' (Rom 4:25). The Law of Moses was holy and just and good, but it was powerless to save. And how unequal to the struggle with sin were those who had nothing but that law to help them Paul explained by a vivid description of the conflict between the higher and the lower self occasioned by the commands of God's positive legislation (Rom 7:14-25). In further setting aside the claims of Jewish propaganda he stressed the primacy of the life of grace over external observances, and showed himself more deeply acquainted with the spirit of the Gospel than many of his contemporaries. Christians, therefore, though freed from the Mosaic Law, were not free from all law, for they were subject to the law of the Spirit and had to keep their minds fixed on the things of the Spirit. The freedom of the sons of God is another intuition which appears constantly in his writings. The death of Christ set men free from the tyranny of sin and the grave, and the Christian lives a new life in union with the Risen Christ. In virtue of that union the Christian gives glad and willing service, 669b inspired and borne along by the Holy Spirit. The 'slaves of Christ' are the only men who are truly free, for 'where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty' (2 Cor 3:17).

'Slave of Christ Jesus' was the title which he himself loved beyond all others. From the time that his eyes were opened after the blinding experience on the road to Damascus, he saw only Jesus. Henceforth faith in a crucified Lord was the power that charged his energies, the star that shaped his course, the wings that gave him flight. In a striking passage in Colossians, he recalls the primacy of Christ with the object of confirming the teaching given to that Church by Epaphras: 'In whom we have redemption through his blood, the remission of sins; who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature: for in him were all things created in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones, or dominations, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him and in him. And he is before all, and by him all things consist. And he is the head of the body, the church, who is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead; that in all things he may hold the primacy. Because in him it hath well pleased the Father that all fullness should dwell; and through him to reconcile all things to himself, making peace through the blood of his cross, both as to the things that are on earth, and the things that are in heaven' (Col 1:14-20). What an impression the passage gives of the deep religious life that is centred in Jesus! Existing before the world of men and of angels, present to his followers from the beginning of this life and their goal in the next, Jesus was the object of Paul's heartfelt praise and undying love:

'Who shall separate me from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation or distress or famine or nakedness or danger or persecution or the sword?' (Rom 8:35).

'For to me, to live is Christ: and to die is gain' (Phil 1:21).

'With Christ I am nailed to the cross. And I live, now not I; but Christ liveth in me' (Gal 2:19-20).

'But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified to me and I to the world. . . . From henceforth let no man be troublesome to me; for I bear the marks of the Lord Jesus in my body' (Gal 6:14-17).

'If any man love not our Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema' (1 Cor 16:22).

To think so magnificently of Jesus, to be wise with that wisdom which is none other than Jesus and him crucified, to be urged on by an enthusiasm and a personal love for Jesus that still burns and inflames across the centuries: all this was granted to Paul, so much so that the phrase 'in Christ Jesus' occurs as a refrain in his writings and recapitulates all his thoughts. Old age did not wither nor custom stale the beautiful relationship. From the darkness of a Roman prison he spoke of the light that the Saviour brought, shedding rays of life and immortality through the gospel which he had been appointed to herald (2 Tim 1:10). And though he felt that the end was at hand, he was not put to the blush, because Jesus, to whom he had given his confidence, was no stranger to him, and had the means to keep his pledge safe (2 Tim 1:12). The imagination is busy with the picture of the old man Paul in prison. Did the memories of thirty years of toil in the service of the Lord crowd in upon him? some painful, appeals unheeded, invitations spurned and grace rejected: others consoling, so many of the same mind, cherishing the same bond of charity, and the peace of God watching over their hearts and minds in Christ Jesus. One thing is certain: he had fought the good fight, had finished the race, and had redeemed his pledge. He could look forward to the future with calm and serenity: 'The Lord hath delivered me from every evil work: and will preserve me unto his heavenly kingdom, to whom be glory for ever and ever, Amen' (2 Tim 4, 18).

b That Jesus Christ, the Son of God Incarnate, will come gloriously at the end of the world 'to judge the living and the dead' is as established a dogma of Catholic Theology as is the dogma that he has already come and has redeemed mankind. To the Catholic exegete the definiteness of these two dogmas is of great help. It limits for him the field of established truth in which to concentrate the energies of his study, and spares him from investigating theories which are clearly condemned as false. His is not the task to deny with Wrede that Jesus was the Messiah; nor to suppose with Wellhausen that Jesus could not determine whether he was or was not the Messiah; nor to ponder with some moderns on just what occasion the Messianic consciousness of Jesus first asserted itself and what psychological phenomena initiated that consciousness. He concerns himself little with the theories of the so-called Eschatological School which in substance maintains that Jesus, who neither was the Messiah nor claimed to be such, would become the Christ only in the future when he would found his Kingdom in glory. There are, of course, varying opinions within this school sustained each in their own fashion by Baldensperger, J. Weiss, Loisy, Bousset, Wernle and others. c The Catholic scholar, though recognizing what worth they have, will not wholly ally himself with the teachings of Karl Barth who, influenced by Kierkegaard's subjective cognizance of objective reality in preference to an appreciation of historical incidents, would so exaggeratedly impregnate time with Christ that he would ignore if not dissolve the resurrection of the dead, the Second Coming and the historic Judgement of the world into a kind of evolutionary process which is going on today whereby the human race is being resurrected in Christ who is always resurrected and being approved by God's judgement in the fact that Christ has yielded himself to the judgement of God and has taken away all malediction in a constantly flowing stream of reality amongst men. Barth does not seem to sustain that the Second Coming is to be an historical incident (Karl Barth, Dogmatics in Outline*, SCM Press, London 1949). Dr Oscar Cullmann's Christ and Time* (Westminster Press, Philadelphia 1940), on the other hand, while fundamentally agreeing with Barth's position as to the time-compensating meaningfulness of religious dogma, and the stress on Christocentricity, seems to allow the Second Coming to remain as an historical event to come. It is obvious that the Catholic scholar will agree neither with orthodox Judaism—that the personal Messiah is still on his way to establish the Kingdom of Israel—nor with liberal Jews who suppose that the Parousia is the general dispensation of God's Providential Presence in the affairs of mankind. There is indeed much confusion and disagreement in modern non-Catholic thought concerning the Second Coming of Christ. The Catholic is spared much of this confusion. 670c

However the very definiteness of the dogma of the Second Coming may tempt the Catholic exegete to pronounce too readily in favour of the Parousia while he is interpreting texts which are, by the intention of both God and the hagiographer, left objectively obscure. Consequently he may be confused, if not shocked at what seem contradictions to him expecting a clearly enunciated programme of future events where he finds but vague and incompletely revealed truths. Paramount amongst these confusing texts is Christ's Eschatological Discourse over the destruction of Jerusalem Mt 24; Mk 13; Lk 21.

The Coming in the OT—It is not our purpose here d to discuss just which OT prophecies refer strictly to a personal Messiah; but there are indications in the ancient Scriptures which do at least typically imply that he is to come into the world, Arising from Bethlehem Ephrata the Messiah will be the ruler of Israel, Mic 5:2, Wonderful, a Counsellor, God the Mighty, the Father of the world to come, the Prince of Peace, Is 9:6. He will come in the clouds of heaven, Dan 7:13, in majesty and glory, Agg 2:8, 10, and yet riding on the foal of an ass, Zach 9:9. He will strike the earth, Is 11:4, and move its foundations, Agg 2:7, for he will manifest wrath and come in judgement, Is 2:4. The day of his arrival will be one of darkness and fire, a terrible day, Jl 2:30, 31; Mal 4:1. And again it will be a day of peace, Is 2:4; 9:7; 11:6-9; Os 2:18; Agg 2:10, and of sweetness, Jl 3:18, at which men should rejoice, Soph 3:14, 16. It will be a day of light, Is 9:1, 2, 6; 11:10, 12, of law, Is 2:3; 59:21, of justice, Is 11:4, 5; Os 2:19, of wisdom, Is 11:2. Yes, he will be in our midst, Soph 3:17; Zach 2:11, to save us; Jl 2:32; Abd 17, 21; wash us of sin, Zach 13:1, 2, and care for us as a shepherd, Zach 13:7, and gather a remnant together, Soph 3:13; Zach 13:9, and this forever, without end, Is 59:21; and yet, shoot of Jesse that he is, Is 11:10, born of a maid, Is 7:14, he will be pierced, Zach 12:10, and Elias will precede him, Mal 4:5, 6.

No prophecy explicitly states that he will come to the world twice; and whatever else the people of the Old Dispensation may have derived from these prophecies, they never concluded that he would establish a purely spiritual kingdom amidst suffering and trial, that he would then depart into heaven to sustain his triumph in the hearts of men through long and laborious centuries, and that finally he would come anew to establish his universal victory at the Parousia. The Coming and Christ's Contemporaries—Like their forefathers Christ's contemporaries both expected a Messiah and were confused about how he would come, how establish his kingdom. Herod the Great, Mt 2:4, 670e John the Baptist, Jn 1:20; Lk 3:15; Andrew, Jn 1:41, the Samaritan woman, Jn 4:25, the very enemies of Jesus, Jn 10:24—all give testimony to that expectation. The perplexities which they harboured with that expectation are also recounted in the NT texts. Some, obviously with Mic 5:2 in mind, thought he was to come from Bethlehem, Jn 7:42, while others contended that 'when the Christ cometh no man knoweth whence he is', Jn 7:27—an idea implying perhaps that he would appear suddenly in the clouds of heaven or from the sun, as the apocrypha, 4 Esd and the Apoc of Baruch, suggest. There certainly seemed to be a rather common conviction that at his coming, God's Kingdom would be restored to the Jews with material prosperity as well as with spiritual peace, Mt 3:2; Lk 19:11; Mt 20:21, and that the Messias would rule that Kingdom, Mt 2:2; Lk 19:38; Jn 1:49; 6:15.

f The Coming and Christ's Disciples—That the disciples of Christ too kept awaiting some such prosperous Messianic Kingdom on earth is manifest throughout the gospel narrative; and only gradually did Christ reveal his plans to them, leaving the while many perplexities to obscure their minds till the day of Pentecost. In what we might call the first phase of his public life he seems to support and foster their expectations. He was manifesting his glory and the disciples believed in him, Jn 2:11, 23, believed that he was the 'king of Israel', Jn 1:49. He asserts his authority at the first cleansing of the temple: 'Destroy this temple (shrine) and in three days I will raise it up', Jn 2:19—a challenge, taken at the time, as the boast of a powerful monarch, Jn. 2:22. Miracles, exorcisms, cures of various kinds follow so that 'all men seek thee', Mk 1:37. He proclaims an exquisite doctrine and outlines a plan of triumph in which the poor, the meek, the afflicted will be liberated from their miseries, in which law will be happily and perfectly fulfilled and the members of the kingdom will be as secure as a house built on rock, Mt 5-7. Those who will not belong to this kingdom will, on the last day of the current age, be cast out into eternal punishment and the loyal adherents of the triumphing King will shine as the sun, Mt 13:41-43. Storms he conquers, the dead he raises to life, Mk 4:39; 5:41, 42, food he increases, Jn 6:11-15, and promises even better bread which will give his followers an endless life in his Kingdom, Jn 6:54-59. At least twice did he send out his disciples to proclaim his Kingdom and shower men with its blessings: 'And going, preach, saying: The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out devils; freely have you received, freely give', Mt 10:7, 8; Lk 10:9, 11. If we continue the reading of Mt here, Mt 10:17-23, it is on this occasion that Jesus made the following statement: 'You shall not finish all the cities of Israel till the son of Man come'. All commentators, Catholic and non-Catholic, agree that the coming to which reference is made is puzzling. They fluctuate. Some think that the text means that the Apostles will not cover all of Israel on this mission before Jesus comes to recall them from their work. 'No thorough work can be done till—a universal gospel for humanity has begun to be preached' is Lutteroth's interpretation cited in the *Exp. Gk Test., while Durand suggests that the destruction of Jerusalem as the first phase of the supreme triumph may be here hinted.

g For about three-fourth's of his public career Christ stressed the blessings of the triumphal Kingdom which he was establishing, and the disciples cherished the thought that their expectations of a victorious Messias were being fulfilled. But 'from that time Jesus began to show to his disciples, that he must go to Jerusalem, and suffer many things from the ancients and scribes and chief priests, and be put to death, and the third day rise again', Mt 16:21; Mk 8:31. This we may call the second phase of the public life, the phase in which Christ proclaims that his triumphant Kingdom will not be established before his death. Peter and the other disciples are thoroughly shocked at this disappointment to their hopes, Mt 16:22, 23; Mk 8:32, 33. To confirm their confidence in a triumphing King, Christ is transfigured before them. How gladly would they encamp with this victorious Messias, flanked by Moses to perfect the Judaic religion, and by Elias who was to usher in the new age 'before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord', Mal 4:5. But what followed upon the vision presented them with the problem of when that victorious reign would begin; they had to readjust their expectations since these would be fulfilled after the Messias' death—but when after his death?

h At the Resurrection?—Immediately after the vision on the mount Jesus said to his disciples, 'Tell the vision to no man, till the Son of man be risen from the dead'. Would the triumph perhaps begin at the Resurrection? The disciples 'were questioning together what that should mean: When he shall be risen from the dead'. Now the Pharisees and scribes believed that the dead would rise to the Messianic age, that God's enemies would then be destroyed, and that Elias would usher in the new era. Were the Pharisees right and was this transient appearance of Elias what Malachi had foretold? Christ answers that the Pharisees are partly right, 'Elias when he shall come shall restore all things'. Yet neither were the Pharisees entirely correct nor were the disciples in imagining that this was the prophesied return of Elias. 'But I say to you that Elias is already come, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they had a mind. So also the Son of man shall suffer from them. Then the disciples understood that he had spoken to them of John the Baptist'. (For these various texts, see Mt 17:1-13; Mk 9:1-12.) John the Baptist, then, whose work the Pharisees did not recognize, was Elias ushering in the Kingdom; John died; Christ too will die; but he will rise again. His Resurrection, then, will likely inaugurate the new age when all men will rise to share the glory of the King. Indeed the Kingdom of God is close at hand!

i Succeeding passages in the gospels corroborate the theory that the disciples misapprehended not only the nature of the Kingdom's triumph but also the occasion on which that triumph would be ultimately disclosed; the same passages indicate that Christ was gradually revealing more clearly the spiritual nature of the Kingdom without reassuring them what would be the progression and sequence of events by which its spiritual triumph would advance to its complete manifestation. The Apostles were eager to know when the material victory would appear; Christ insists that the spiritual victory is being won in every event of time. All that he said was true; yet when applied to the fulfilment of their human aspirations, all that he said was poorly understood.

They were ambitious to be great in the kingdom they anticipated. 'And when they were in the house, Jesus asked them: What did you treat of in the way? But they held their peace, for in the way they had disputed among themselves which of them should be the greatest', Mk 9:32, 33. How well too Christ's words in Lk 12:37, speaking of the master's return from a wedding feast, fitted their misconceptions: 'Blessed are those servants, whom the Lord when he cometh, shall find watching. Amen I say to you, that he will gird himself, and make them sit down to meat, and passing will minister unto them'. When Christ tells the Pharisees that 'the kingdom of God cometh not with observation', that it is 'within you', that he must first die and then be revealed with the majesty and extensiveness of the lightning flash, Lk 17:20-37; when he says to the Apostles, 'Amen I say to you that you who have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on the seat of his majesty, you also shall sit on twelve seats judging the twelve tribes of Israel', Mt 19:28; when he told them of a certain nobleman who 'went into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return' (Lk 19:12-27)—they could always stimulate their hopes that when he and the rest

TEACHING ON THE SECOND COMING

6701 of men should arise from the dead the new age of the world would begin; they could fire their ambitions that they would be head officials in that glorious reign. Not only does the mother of the sons of Zebedee, but James and John themselves, give expression to their expectations: 'Grant to us, that we may sit, one on thy right hand, and the other on thy left hand, in thy glory', Mk 10:37, 'in thy kingdom', Mt 20:21.

j Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem was that of a conquering king; and his very words convey the idea that after his death will follow the glory. The final conquest of his enemies will be the last day of the prevailing disorder. 'The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified. . . . Now is the judgement of the world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth (in the crucifixion) will draw all things to myself. He that despiseth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him; the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day', Jn 12:23-50. Nor did Christ's Eschatological Discourse dispel the misapprehensions about his Resurrection and the End of the world being coincident. It only added the further misapprehension that the temple's destruction would be the first of the victories signifying that the revived Messiah was beginning his reign in a rejuvenated world.

k Common Catholic Opinion on the Eschatological Discourse—All exegeses find Mt 24, 25; Mk 13; Lk 21 somewhat distressing to analyze because the gospel accounts seem to fluctuate back and forth between the exposition of Jerusalem's destruction and the Second Coming at the end of time. We shall here summarize the perplexing texts in their sequence and the usual interpretation of those texts.

It is supposed that at least in Mt 24:3 the Apostles asked about two distinct events: 'Tell us when shall these things be (the destruction of the temple)? And what shall be the sign of thy coming (parousia) and the consummation of the world?' Christ answers:

- (1) Watch before each event, Mt 24:4; Mk 13:5; Lk 21:8.
- (2) False christs, wars, opposition between nations and kingdoms, earthquakes, famines, terrors and great signs from heaven will be the beginnings of sorrows, Mt 24:5-8; Mk 13:6-8; Lk 21:8-11. Comment: These occurrences are harbingers certainly of the Parousia, but probably, in a minor degree, of the temple's ruin.
- (3) Before 'all these things' you will be persecuted; but whoever perseveres to the end will be saved, Lk 21:12, 13; Mt 24:9-13. Comment: Before the harbingers mentioned above you will be persecuted, and he who perseveres to the end of his life, or to the end of the persecutions will be saved.
- l (4) The gospel must be preached to all nations, and then will come the end, Mt 24:14. Comment: This is a transitional sentence introducing the change of theme from the end of the world to Jerusalem's destruction. When the gospel has begun to be preached to all nations Jerusalem will be destroyed; and when it has been preached to all, the end of the world will come.
- (5) The abomination of desolation will indicate the end of Jerusalem's religious domination, Mt 24:15-21; Mk 13:14-19; Lk 21:20-24.
- (6) For the sake of the elect those dreadful days will be shortened, Mt 24:22; Mk 13:20. Comment: The dreadful days pertain first to the siege of Jerusalem; but since this is a sentence which makes a transition back to the world's destruction, the dreadful days contemplate too the end of the world.
- (7) Then beware of false christs. For as lightning comes out of the east and appears even to the west, so shall the coming (parousia) of the Son of man be. Wherever the body shall be, there shall the eagles also be gathered together, Mt 24:23-28; 6701 Mk 13:21-23. Comment: 'Then' may mean at the end of the world; or if translated with the meaning of 'after that' it signifies after Jerusalem's destruction without specifying how long after. The 'parousia' is Christ's Second Coming which will be as obvious as the presence of a carcass where birds of prey are wheeling aloft. The carcass in this case may imply the dead and corrupting world.

- (8) And immediately after the tribulation of those m days, Mt 24:29, in those days, Mk 13:19, there shall be signs, Lk 21:25—the sun, moon, stars will be affected and the powers of heaven shaken. Comment: The 'immediately' probably refers back to Mt 24:22, 23 and the passage is speaking of the end of the world.
- (9) And then the sign of the Son of man will appear in heaven. Your redemption is at hand, Mt 24:30, 31; Mk 13:26, 27; Lk 21:27, 28. Comment: This is the Second Coming.
- (10) Even so when you see all these things, know that it is at the door. This generation will not pass away till all these things have been accomplished, Mt 24:33, 34; Mk 13:29, 30; Lk 21:31, 32. Comment: Authors here are thoroughly divided. All these things may, they maintain, refer to either destruction or to both. If it refers only to the temple's destruction 'generation' is to be taken literally; if it refers to the end of the world, 'generation' is figurative for either the Jewish race or Christ's enemies or his followers.
- (11) But of that day and hour no one knows . . . but the Father only. As in the days before the flood . . . even so will the coming (parousia) of the Son of man be, Mt 24:36-39; Mk 13:32. Comment: The Second Coming is meant.
- (12) Mt 24:40, 41 has here the passage of the two men and two women: one will be taken and the other left. (Lk has it, perhaps in a better context—Lk 17:34, 35). Comment: At the end of the world one will be taken to be rewarded; the other left for punishment.
- (13) That day will come as a snare upon all who dwell on the face of the earth. Watch for you do not know at what hour your Lord will come, Mt 24:42-51; Mk 13:33-37; Lk 21:34-36. Comment: This is the Second Coming.
- (14) Here Mt 24:45-51; 25:1-30 has three parables: The Householder, the Virgins, the Talents. Comment: The first probably is explaining the coming at the particular judgement, the second applies probably to the Second Coming, the third may refer to either the particular or the general judgement. (Lk has the parable of the Talents in 19:12-27.)
- (15) Mt 25:31-46 is definitely a description of the Last Judgement.

Modern non-Catholic Opinion—Modern non-Catholic n opinion has veered away from such strict analysis and adaptation to two distinct incidents. This fact is exemplified by the comments of the Expositor's Greek Testament which we shall use in our summary of non-Catholic thought.

The disciples 'accept the fate predicted for Jerusalem, and now desire to know the when and how?' Consequently their question 'took for granted that all three things (the temple's destruction, the parousia and the completion of the prevailing age) went together' (pp 288, 289). Christ answers, therefore, in accord with the meaning of the question:

- (1) Be watchful;
- (2) False christs etc. will antecede the temple's destruction;
- (3) And before it is destroyed you will be persecuted;
- (4) The gospel must be preached to all nations before the temple's downfall;

TEACHING ON THE SECOND COMING

- 670n (5) The abomination of desolation will be the sign that it will fall ;
 (6) But those dreadful days will be shortened for the sake of the elect ;
 (7) Then, at Jerusalem's destruction, beware of false christs, for his judgement on that occasion will, like the lightning flash, be clearly manifest, definitive and true ; and when the eagles of the Roman armies gather together over Judaism, it will be a carcase beyond redemption ;
 (8) And immediately after Jerusalem's destruction the very powers of heaven will be shaken. Physical imagery here represents social and religious upheavals. Thrones, temples, all God's establishments of the past, will fall in one vast national ruin ;
 (9) Then the sign of the Son of man will appear. On what the sign is commentators do not agree ; but the statement as such is not indicative of a physical event so much as a comforting assurance that when Jerusalem falls Christ's victoriousness will manifest itself.
 (10) When you see all these things know that Jerusalem's downfall is at hand.
 (11) Of when this will happen there is no communicable knowledge, but be comforted, for the victory over Jerusalem will come to the unexpectant Jews as the judgement of the flood came upon the care-free contemporaries of Noe.
 (12) In this catastrophe one will succumb and another be spared.
 (13) But watch for you know not when the Son of man will come to destroy Jerusalem in judgement.
 (14) Lessons of the parables : The Householder—whenever Christ comes in judgement he is as unexpected as the master of a house returning from an expedition ; the Virgins—also refers to any judgement of Christ ; the 'long delay' in the parable of the Talents teaches that the judging presence of Christ may not manifest itself in punishment for a great period of one's life.
 (15) Mt 25:31-46 is a story picturing the fact that Christ is a victorious judge. It is not the prediction of an historical event.

- o The modern non-Catholic tendency is to avoid taking this discourse as prophetic of an historic Second Coming.

[In recent years Professor *Dodd has replaced *A. Schweitzer as the leader of the 'eschatological school of Protestant writers', and his theory of Realized and Futurist Eschatology demands a note.

Professor Dodd argues that the apostolic Kerygma asserted a Realized Eschatology, i.e. the message of the first days of the Church was that the Last Things (the Eschata) are already upon us, that we are living already in the Last Times ; and he goes on to argue that the Futurist Eschatology, the doctrine of the Second Coming of Christ at the end of history, was only put forward, if not invented, later on when the first hopes of the imminence of the final transformation and resurrection had been disappointed.

Now in the former assertion there is indeed a great truth. We are really living in the Eschata, in the Last Age (cf. 1 Jn 2:18), the Kingdom has come down upon earth, and the whole life of the Church is eschatological. The Mass itself is in a real sense a pledge of the Second Coming. We are already 'come to the heavenly Jerusalem, . . . and to God the judge of all and to the spirits of the Just made perfect' (Heb 12:22-23). Nevertheless, it is quite false to assert that the Apostolic Kerygma did not include the doctrine of the temporal Second Coming of Christ as the central fact which will sum up and conclude this Last Age. For these facts are clearly embedded in Mt 24, 25 ; Ac 17:31 ; 1 Cor 15 ; 1 Thess 4:15-5:11 ; 2 Thess 1:3-2:14, as well as in the constant teaching of the Church. Professor Dodd's view has to ignore the plain fact that sane men like St Paul not only knew that 670o Christ had come but also expected him again historically at some unknown but possibly imminent date in the future.

But a Realized Eschatology that leaves room for the Second Coming is a valuable factor in Christian thought and life, which is in frequent danger of being neglected. There is no doubt that the apostolic Kerygma did stress the importance of the Second Coming for the Christian Life. Though it is true that for the first generation of Christians the perspective was confused by the foretold destruction of Jerusalem (itself a Coming of Christ in power), yet for St Paul and for his generation, the only thing that mattered for every Christian was readiness to meet Christ at the Last Judgement, cf. Introd. to 1 Thess, § 914g-l. And it is the same for us today.

There is thus no need to explain away or diminish the force of texts which stress the imminence or importance of the Second Coming and Final Judgement, for this is the one moment of history towards which the life of every Christian must be oriented. The Apostles and the Church neither were themselves deceived nor have they deceived others ; but being in ignorance of the time of the Second Coming of Christ in Judgement they constantly directed the faithful (as the Church still does) to the precept of Christ : Wherefore be you also ready, because at what hour you know not the Son of Man will come (Mt 24:44)—Gen. Ed.]

A Proposed Solution—No Catholic can ignore the Second Coming of Christ (cf. Tridentine Profession of Faith, DB 994 ; response of Bib. Comm., June 18, 1915, DB 2179 sqq.) ; no Catholic can doubt that some of the details mentioned by Christ in this discourse will be fulfilled at this Second Coming. But no exegete should make little of the fact that here as indeed in all his teaching, Christ's chief concern is not to stress the moment of temporal occurrences, but rather to emphasize the spiritual meaning of all events in history and to encourage men to live out that meaning when the various events take place. He does not state when Jerusalem will be destroyed nor when the present age of the world will end ; he does reveal that the destruction of Jerusalem and all other historic events signify that he is conquering the world by the fact that he is present in it—Christ is triumphing while all history rolls on to the glorious manifestation of that triumph in the Messianic Age. Since his victoriousness preeminently began with his death and resurrection and since he did not explain to his followers that he would first ascend into heaven and then return to proclaim his triumph, they sustained the hope that onward from the time he and mankind arose again, he would, while present with them, expand his Kingdom, conquer his enemies and majestically proclaim himself Lord of all on earth forever.

Because the expression 'all these things' occurs several times in this context, it is well to consider what the expression meant to the Apostles. 'All these things' should mean, everything as it is. To the Jew it meant not only the entire pile of masonry, all the paraphernalia of the temple—the altars, the shew-breads, the incense, the various courts, the vestments of the priests, the veil before the Holy of Holies, the sacrifices ; but it also meant the whole Providential economy of Jahweh over his people and man's proper response to that economy—a religious response expressed openly by this material establishment which God himself had ordained. 'All these things' meant religion, life lived in the service of God in the arrangement of things during the current age. It was so easy for the Apostles to hope that the Messianic Kingdom with its new life would arise when all these things fell. Upon the collapse of Judaism must come the triumph of the Messianic King.

When, therefore, Christ told them that the temple would be completely destroyed, they asked two questions about what they thought would be one event : When will Judaism collapse and what special indication

TEACHING ON THE SECOND COMING

671b will there be to show us that the close of the age is the beginning of your triumph? 'Tell us when shall these things be? And what shall be the sign of thy coming (παρουσία—presence) and of the consummation (συντέλεια) of the world (τοῦ αἰῶνος—of the age)?', Mt 24:3. 'And what shall be the sign when all these things shall begin to be fulfilled?', Mk 13:4; Lk 21:7. Christ's discourse follows:

- e (1) Let us under all circumstances watch.
- (2) Here are the circumstances which will arise throughout history, one phase of that history being the temple's destruction: wars, opposition between nations and kingdoms, earthquakes, famines, terrors and great signs from heaven. (For these events at the siege of Jerusalem, see Josephus, Ant. 20, 8; Wars, 6, 5.)
- (3) Before 'all these things'—all the existing economy is ended—before not only Jerusalem's destruction but also before the whole mode of life which prevails today is destroyed, you will be persecuted. He who perseveres to the end of the persecutions and trials or dies in them will be saved, will have the security of my Kingdom.
- (4) After the gospel is preached to all nations the end of the world's domination will come, and I shall reign triumphant. In the process of triumphing and spreading the gospel you will be hated by all but God will always provide for you.
- (5) The abomination of desolation will be the sign of triumph over Jerusalem.
- (6) That my faithful followers may continue the triumph, the destruction wrought upon Jerusalem will not become universal; the days will be shortened and human affairs will become normal again.
- (7) Then, when Jerusalem has been destroyed and a state of normalcy and quiet triumphing has ensued in men's affairs do not be led astray by any false christs no matter what wonders they perform, because my triumphing presence will always be as widely and obviously manifest as the lightning flash is across the sky. Wherever the world's enmity against me has died there will lofty souls be gathered together to celebrate the victory.
- d (8) And as soon as those days in which I was winning the victory amidst oppression are over the cataclysm of the world will follow.
- (9) At the time of this cataclysm which spells the end of the prevailing age, the sign of the Son of man will appear. He will assert himself as glorious judge. Then the fact that you have been redeemed from the slavery of this world into the household and kingdom of God will be magnificently manifest.
- (10) And in a manner similar to the sprouting of the fig tree all these things which I have been telling you portend my success—it is near, even at the door. By success, here—the 'it'—Christ does not mean necessarily the final manifestation of the victory but rather the progressive winning of it. Therefore when you see Jerusalem destroyed, when you endure persecutions, when the gospel is being spread and earthquakes and famines prevail—recognize that I am advancing the victory. And when the final cataclysm ends this age, appreciate that I have won. All history has this one meaning: Christ triumphs. This generation, mankind, will not pass by without experiencing that I am victorious in all the upheavals of time. Heaven and earth are passing arrangements; what I am teaching you will not pass away.
- (11) But of the day and hour when all these various victorious incidents will occur, no one has communicable knowledge; that is not to be revealed beforehand. And as ordinary as were the days when Noe was working with God, preparing to save his family, so will my Presence keep producing its effects amidst the ordinary affairs of 671d human life; and as in the days preceding the flood, so men will continue the ordinary course of their worldly lives without acknowledging that my Presence is within the world quietly effecting its victory toward the final manifestation.

- (12) While it is so progressing here are some examples of how quietly it works: of two men in a field one welcomes my Presence to himself, and one keeps himself free of it (παράλαμβάνεται and ἀφίεται are probably middle, not passive voice). Similarly the case of two women.
- (13) Lk 21:34—Take care not to have your hearts overcharged with drunkenness and the cares of this life lest that day—the period in which I am quietly effecting my victory—catch you off-guard; that you may be able to keep your stance facing the Son of man. Keep awake, therefore, because you do not know under what circumstances your Lord keeps coming along the pathway to his victory. Like a householder on guard against a thief, however he may come, be you watchful that if I come suddenly to inquire whether you are striving victoriously with me, you may be ready to assure me that you are doing your part. Mk 13:33–37—The reference here is likely to Christ's coming at death to the individual.
- (14) The parables of the Householder, of the Virgins and of the Talents are best explained if they are taken not to refer primarily to the Second Coming because in each parable there are significant details which cannot be verified at the end of the world. The 'coming' spoken of in the parable of the Talents likely refers to some crises in history, like the Reformation, when Christ multiplied the supernatural gifts in his saints to increase their beneficent influence whilst others who had not used the grace he had given them, lost it.
- (15) And whenever the Son of man finally reaches the majestic celebration of his triumph amidst the angels, when he is finally enthroned as victorious King of all mankind in history, then he will judge all men of all nations; and those who have co-operated in his campaign will inherit citizenship in the glorious Kingdom. Whatever was done in favour of or against others was done to him because throughout history he was always present amidst the affairs of men, Mt 25:31–46. Those who were dissident will not share the endless life of happiness in his Kingdom.

In this long discourse Christ only partially answered f the problems which were bothering the disciples. He did say that Jerusalem's destruction would be but the beginning of a period of suffering and struggle during which every disintegration of hostile power would be the sign of his continuing conquest, enduring till the glory of his Kingdom would be completely manifested. He did not tell them at what time relative to his resurrection the triumph would come. They still hoped that it would be when he and mankind arose from the dead.

Christ's Subsequent Revelations—Nor did any subsequent statement of his make that point clear. Everything he said and did left open the possibility of their prejudiced hopes. We may paraphrase thus:

'I shall not eat the pasch again until it be celebrated in its completed form in the Kingdom of God, nor drink of the fruit of the vine until I drink it fresh when the Kingdom flourishes', Lk 22:15–18; Mt 26:29; Mk 14:25.

'I am now giving you my blood which is being shed. It is the blood of the new kind of Dispensation. I am disposing my Kingdom to you that you may enjoy its blessings and govern the whole of Israel. Now (when my death is impending) I am beginning to be glorified, and God will glorify me at once', Lk 22:20, 29; Mt 26:27; Mk 14:24; Jn 13:31, 32.

671g 'From heaven (after my death) I shall send you the Advocate of truth to help you carry on. I keep coming to you, too; not the world but you will keep seeing that I am living and you will keep living. You will know in the day while the triumphing is in process that the Father, I and you are in one another. Indeed if anyone love me in this wise I shall keep manifesting myself to him; he will know of my triumphing presence. Hence I am leaving peace, a harmony of order, with you. I am on my way to my Father and yet I keep coming to you as victor; you really should be glad that I am going to my Father. I told you this that when we are so advancing victoriously you may believe that everything was planned by me just as it occurs', Jn 14:1-31.

b 'As the branches grow by the strength of the vine, so you will fructify by my power because I am the vine. Your abiding in me and bringing forth fruit is the glorification of the Father and your joy', Jn 15:1-11.

'It is expedient for me to depart in death so that the Spirit of Truth come to help you to glorify me', Jn 16:7-15. Now the disciples ask what Christ means when he says, 'A little while and you will not see me; and again a little while and you will see me'. They can understand by the first 'little while' that he is soon to die; but the second 'little while' after which they will see him puzzles them. Hitherto the Apostles seem to have taken the three days between Christ's Death and Resurrection in a figurative sense to represent a period of time, an age of the world, an economy of things, as 'day' is frequently taken in the NT (e.g. Mt 26:29; Lk 1:80; 6:23; Jn 8:56; 2 Cor 6:2; Eph 4:30; 1 Thess 5:5,8; Heb 3:8; 4:7-9 etc.). Was Christ here indicating that the time between his death and resurrection was to be literally three days? They ask him what he means by that 'little while'—and he answers merely that when he returns they will rejoice. He did not tell them that his resurrection would take place after three days, to be taken literally, that it would not be contemporaneous with the time when all men would rise from the dead. Indeed the fact that the disciples did not believe that he arose literally on the third until they had actually seen him, seems to indicate that they continued to consider the three days figuratively since he did not now tell them what he meant by the 'little while'. The disciples admit on this occasion of the Last Supper that Jesus is clear on one point—namely, that he comes from God, and is returning to him—and to this Christ adds, 'Have confidence, I have overcome the world', Jn 16:16-33.

1 Nor does the last prayer of Jesus explicitly inform them of his ascension and Second Coming: Begin glorifying thy Son, O Father, and keep glorifying him by his success in winning over humanity while he reigns in heaven. These men have understood that I came forth from thee and they have believed that I am thy Messiah even though I came otherwise than as they had expected. I do not ask that thou lift them out of the world into some sort of glorious kingdom, but that thou sanctify them in truth in the midst of the world as it is. Let them thus carry on the victory, until it is won. I pray that all believers may share my glory—the unity of love binding thee, Father, and me into one; may they share that love with us, Jn 17:1-26.

Nothing which occurs or which he says before his death tends to dissuade the disciples that their pre-conceptions of the Kingdom are wrong. Christ says, in Mt 26:32, that after he is risen again he will go before them into Galilee—but he does not assure them that his resurrection would antedate the new age when all men would be risen from the dead. In Mt 26:64 and Lk 22:69 Jesus asserts before the high-priest and the council that he will come in glory hereafter—but hereafter might be at his resurrection. Before Pilate he explains that his Kingdom is not of this world—which could mean that it is unlike any kingdom which now flourishes; a Kingdom, that is, characterized by truth, Jn 18:36, 37. Indeed that perplexing text inserted in the narrative at the time of Jesus' death,

Mt 27:52, 53: 'And the graves were opened: and many bodies of the saints that had slept arose: and coming out of the tombs after his resurrection, they came into the holy city, and appeared to many' may be indicative of the satisfaction which the disciples derived when they saw that their expectations were not entirely unfulfilled. What their hopes had been and how completely those hopes had been frustrated by the fact that the Body of Christ seemed to have been lost, is expressed by the disciples on the way to Emmaus before they acknowledged that Jesus had risen: 'But we hoped that it was he that should have redeemed Israel: and now besides all this today is the third day since these things were done'—and even his Body is gone, Lk 24:21-24. The only comfort they got from Christ's response was that Christ ought to have suffered these things and so begun his glorious reign, Lk 24:26.

After Christ's Resurrection—Once the resurrection became a proved reality to the disciples and as the resurrection of mankind had not yet taken place, they had to make a new adjustment in their expectations: he would now establish the flourishing Kingdom amidst unresurrected mankind. What he told Magdalene: 'I am not yet ascended to my Father. But go to my brethren, and say to them: I ascend to my Father and to your Father, to my God and your God', Jn 20:17—that statement seemed to imply that he would establish his triumphant reign on earth now after his resurrection and only then return to his Father.

Again, that important meeting in Galilee of which he had spoken before his death, Mt 26:32; Mk 14:28, which the angel had announced to the holy women at the tomb, Mt 28:7, with the request that Peter be present at the meeting, Mk 16:7, the assembly which Jesus himself had planned when he appeared to the women—was not that to be the formal inauguration of his Kingly reign on earth? In a sense it was such an inauguration—but not quite in the sense which the Apostles had anticipated. He said that Peter would be led captive and die. (As to his words about John's fate, see commentary on Jn 21:22.)

Yet their experiences in Galilee did somewhat confirm the disciples in their hopes of Israel's proximate restoration. Though some at first hesitated to pay him the homage of the Messiah King setting out on his triumphant march, nevertheless he assured them that such he was: 'All power is given to me in heaven and in earth. Going, therefore, teach ye all nations . . . teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and behold I am with you all days even to the consummation of the world'—the Gk of which (ἕως τῆς συντελείας τοῦ αἰῶνος) rather conveys this idea: until the present age (either which I am inaugurating, or in which we are now living) has realized its destiny of perfection, Mt 28:18-20. Mk 16:15-18 explains the security and characteristics of the age now beginning: devils will be cast out, new tongues spoken, serpents and poison will cause no hurt, and the sick will get well. Shortly before this incident Jesus at Emmaus explained that all that had happened to him up to the present happened according to the plan of his campaign: 'Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer and to rise again from the dead the third day'. The future plan was that the disciples should preach and extend the power of his reign the world over, once they were endued with power from on high, Lk 24:46-49. Eager to have their hopes soon fulfilled, the disciples at the Ascension asked him: 'Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom of Israel?' And Jesus responded that that secret they were not to know, Ac 1:6-7.

What continued faith these men had sustained in the Messiah amidst many disappointments! They had first expected the kingdom of Israel to be restored to its glory by him when Jesus began his teaching career. He revealed that he must die, but will rise again on the third day. They trusted this new revelation but misunderstood its true significance. The first age of the Messiah having closed with his death, a second period 6711 would ensue, a time for them of struggle and suffering while he was reigning from heaven. The downfall of Jerusalem would be the beginning of the second period during which the battle for certain victory would be won. And then (they thought) the third stage, Christ's third day, when he and all mankind would rise from the dead and he would proclaim his triumph in the glorious kingdom on earth. But he rose literally on the third day and not all mankind rose with him. With unflinching trust they made their readjustments. Now the risen Christ would establish himself gloriously on his throne amidst unresuscitated mankind. But he departs from them into heaven and they are stunned. Then the last revelation about his victory is made: 'This Jesus who is taken up from you into heaven shall so come as you have seen him going into heaven', Ac 1:1-11. Now the plan is clear, the meaning of redemption unfolded. There will be a Second Coming which will usher in not a material Israel but the restored spiritual Kingdom of God. This is the eternal glorious Kingdom of Heaven which the Messiah has been promising and which he opened up to his followers by his teaching, his life, his death, his resurrection, his ascension. This now is the completely revealed truth which they must teach. Mankind must prepare for the Second Coming at the end of time, when Jesus will come to judge the living and the dead.

m The Apostles explain—This truth concerning the Second Coming of Christ, clarified and developed through the years by contemplation and progressive divine revelation, the Apostles shared with their followers, making it for posterity a prime topic of the Church's deposit of faith. Peter and Paul and James and Jude and John in their writings often refer to it—some times explain its details, 1 Cor 1:8; 2 Cor 1:14; Phil 1:6; 2:16; Col 3:4; 1 Thess 1:10; 2:19; 2 Tim 1:12, 18; Tit 2:13; Heb 10:25; Jude 1:14, 15; 1 Pet 1:5, 7; 4:13; 5:4, 6; 1 Jn 2:28; 3:2; Apoc 16:14. We do well to study what they say. When?—At the close of the last age of the world, the Messiah, they taught, will come again. The period of Christianity when, as Joel says, 'Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams' (Jl 2:28 quoted in Ac 2:17); the age when grace shall abound and completed revelation prevail, when men while waiting for the redemption of the body shall enjoy 'the first-fruits of the Spirit', Rom 8:23, when, sanctified by truth, men shall be some beginning, Jas 1:18, of the creature God ordained them to be; the time which John figuratively calls a thousand years when the devil shall 'no more seduce the nations', Apoc 20:3 (in that not heathenism but Christ's principles will flourish amongst the peoples); the years between Christ's ministry on earth and the end of the world—this era was considered by the Apostles, in the divine dispensation of the economy of salvation, to be the last age of the world, Gal 4:4; Eph 1:10; Col 1:26; Heb 1:2; 1 Pet 1:20; 1 Jn 2:18. At its close, after the vicissitudes of time shall have been accomplished 'in the dispensation of the fulness of times' God will re-establish in Christ all things that are in heaven and on earth, Eph 1:10.

On this occasion the dead will rise and the general judgement take place, Ac 4:2; 10:42; 17:31, 32; 23:6; 24:15, 21; Rom 2:16; 14:10; 1 Cor 3:13; 4:5; Phil 3:11; 2 Thess 1:7-10; 2 Tim 4:1; Heb 6:2; 10:27; Jas 5:3; 1 Pet 4:5; 2 Pet 2:9; 1 Jn 4:17; Jude 1:6, 14.

n Not soon—But the Apostles admittedly did not know when this will ensue because the date was never revealed to them, Ac 1:7. St Paul said that that day would come as a thief in the night, unexpectedly, 1 Thess 5:2; that apparently it is not close at hand: 'Be not easily moved from your sense . . . as if the day of the Lord were at hand', 2 Thess 2:2.

And yet there are texts which seem to teach an early advent: 'The time is short', 1 Cor 7:29; 'for yet a little while and a very little while and he that is to come, will come, and will not delay', Heb 10:37; 671n 'behold the judge standeth before the door', Jas 5:9; 'I come quickly', Apoc 3:11; 22:7, 12, 20. But when read in their contexts these statements explain themselves.

In 1 Cor 7 Paul is not discussing the Parousia at all. He is answering the Corinthians' question whether celibacy is required for the service of God. Though personally Paul prefers celibacy because of its many advantages, v 8, yet he recognizes that 'the Lord hath distributed to every one' his individual way of life—'as God hath called every one, so let him walk', v 17. Indeed every social or physical condition in life can be a means of serving God—being circumcised or uncircumcised, bond or free, married or single. 'Brethren, let every man, wherein he was called, therein abide with God', vv 18-25. Now follows a sentence, v 29, to introduce the assurance that sorrow, joy, commercial entanglements, marriage or celibacy, whatever one's lot may be (μεμρίσται in v 33)—all eventualities of life, if properly accepted and employed, can and should help a man (v 35) 'to attend upon the Lord without impediment'. This sentence reads in English 'the time is short'; the Gk, however, has ὁ καιρὸς συνεσταλμένος ἔστιν and may be correctly translated as 'the opportunity (of serving God) has been arranged'. Whatever the state and circumstances of one's life, they offer an opportunity arranged by God to help one attend upon the Lord; they are not an impediment. Clearly in this context St Paul is not teaching the proximity of the Parousia.

The context of Heb 10:37 offers an equally simple solution to the difficulty it seems to engender. The sacrifices which could not delete sin are past; the one sacrifice of Christ which wiped away sin and makes grace possible to those who believe in him has been offered. 'Let us draw near (to Christ) with a true heart in fulness of faith', v 22, and 'Do not lose your confidence which hath a great reward', v 35. To confirm such persevering confidence in his readers, the author of Hebrews stresses the fact that the trials of life and its persecutions are after all brief in comparison with the eternal and assured reward with Christ (cf. 1 Cor 2:9): For yet a little while, indeed a very little while and he that is to come will come—it really will not be long. It is disputed whether the author is speaking of the shortness of time of an individual's life or of the brevity of history in comparison with the eternity of reward. The point is unimportant; but telling is the fact that he is not teaching that the Second Coming of Christ is historically close at hand.

Jas 5:9 also gathers its significance from its context. The Apostle is exhorting the poor who are being oppressed by the worthless rich to be patient because 'the coming of the Lord is at hand', v 8—ἡ παρουσία τοῦ Κυρίου ἤγγικεν—the Lord has come close, abides with you; and as Judge, he likewise is present with the oppressors, estimating their wickedness: 'Behold the judge standeth before the door'. It is because the ever-watchful eye of Christ is with men that in the gold they unjustly garnered the rich have stored up wrath against the last days, Jas 5:3.

Of the Apocalypse texts, 'I come quickly', Apoc 3:11; 22:7, 12, 20, little need be said. Apocalyptic prophecy is characterized by a lack of chronological perspective; it stresses rather the supernatural, eternal significance of events, frequently under glaring figurativeness. The ἔρχομαι ταχύ, therefore, is probably emphasizing the prompt eagerness of Christ to bring to accomplishment the eternal meaning of the human history which the treatise has been discussing in varied forms, but always without consideration of time sequence or time proportions.

ANTECEDENTS OF THE PAROUSIA—No matter how inadequate the explanation of the preceding few texts may seem, a glimpse at the many and great antecedents of the Parousia which the Apostles taught in addition to Christ's predictions, Mt 24:5-12, 29-31,

Man of Sin—St Paul, 2 Thess 2:3, 4, tells us that before the last day a revolt must come first 'and the man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition, who opposeth and is lifted up above all that is called God, or that is worshipped, so that he sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself as if he were God'. What this apostasy is and who is the man of sin has been the subject of much dispute (Prat, II, 372). Many commentators favour some outstanding revolt, led by some individual man. That may be correct; it is unwise, however, to close one's mind to other possible interpretations. Probably St Paul, employing compenetrations in his prophecy, is synthesizing into one picture the heresies and all anti-God movements of the ages which Christ had foretold, Mt 24:10-12, 24, even as John seems to have done in Apoc 13. Perhaps St Paul too is epitomizing mankind, drenched with sinful pride and rebellion against God, into one typical heresiarch or atheist. St John certainly seems to have epitomized when he asserted that every spirit which denies Jesus is the spirit of the Antichrist 'of whom you have heard that he (or it) cometh and is now already in the world' (Gk of 1 Jn 4:3). Again he writes (2 Jn 7): 'Many seducers are gone out into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh: this is a seducer and an antichrist' (but the Gk has 'the seducer and the Antichrist'). Nor in the Apocalypse does John necessarily individuate the beast, which may be Antichrist, by ascribing to it the number six hundred and sixty-six, the number of a man, Apoc 13:18. Varied and perplexing as the explanations of this number are, it is probable that the digits 'six' represent the completeness of man's perfection in the natural vegetative, animal, and intellectual order, whereas the digits seven would indicate man's entire perfection including elevation through faith and effective grace into the supernatural state. The rebel, then, would be represented as man highly developed in nature, but so proud of his acquired perfection as to spurn God and substitute himself for God.

q Cosmic Manifestations—Of the cosmic cataclysms which are to precede Christ's Second Coming this may be said: The Apostles were merely reiterating what Joel had prophesied, Ac 2:20, or what Christ had foretold, Mt 24:29; Mk 13:24; Lk 21:25, when they spoke of the sun's becoming black and the moon's changing into blood and the stars' falling from heaven, Apoc 6:12, 13. Although the sun's darkening may figuratively imply the rejection of God's revelation throughout history, and the moon's becoming blood typify the persecutions of the Church, which, like the moon to the sun, reflects God's revealed light, yet it may be that these physical catastrophes are literally to ensue at the close of time's drama. [Nevertheless it is now generally agreed that these expressions are conventional apocalyptic language descriptive of the cataclysm of Judgement and Renewal at the End, and that we are not to expect their literal fulfilment as historical events!—Gen. Ed.]

The Final Resurrection: How?—Somehow or other the corporeal condition of man will then be spiritualized. St Paul, 1 Cor 15:35-57, describes this transformation in the faithful as follows: As a seed sown in the ground gives up its seminal vitality and is changed and developed into a product with a new kind of life, so too the weak, natural body is laid to rest to corrupt dishonourably as an earthy, mortal substance but will rise celestial, supernaturalized, incorruptible, glorious as a heavenly orb, powerful and immortal.

r Will all die and rise?—It seems quite clear that not all men will die before the general judgement. The Greek of 1 Cor 15:51-53 makes precisely this point: 'We shall not all fall asleep (die) but we shall all be changed. . . . For this corruptible body must needs put on incorruption and this mortal body immortality'. 1 Thess 4:15, 16 conveys the same idea, cf. WV, III, 221-3; Prat, I, 140. Although Heb 9:27 and

Rom 5:12 assert that all men must die, they are merely stating the general principle that everyone is mortal without proclaiming actual death in the case of each individual even under unique circumstances. [The Apostles' Creed confirms the Church's belief that there will be some persons living at the Second Coming in the words: From thence he shall come to judge the living and the dead.—Gen. Ed.]

Will the Wicked rise?—To this the Apostolic answer is affirmative. Firstly, several texts, Ac 10:42; 2 Tim 4:1; 1 Pet 4:5, speak of the judgement of 'the living and the dead'; and while it is true that these texts may mean the physically living and dead, they do not exclude the notion of the morally good and wicked. The just are said to be alive in Jn 5:24; 6:47; Rom 6:11, 13; 8:6; 11:15; 2 Cor 2:16; 4:10, 11; 1 Jn 3:14; 5:12, 13, 16; and the sinful are said to be dead in Rom 8:6; Eph 2:1, 5; Col 2:13; 1 Tim 5:6; 1 Jn 3:14, 15; 5:12; Apoc 3:1; 20:5, 12. Secondly, Jn 5:28, 29 says explicitly: 'And they that have done good things shall come forth unto the resurrection of life; but they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of judgement'.

The Parousia described—It remains only to find a more detailed description of Christ's Second Coming, if we can gather one from the NT. When 'the kingdom of this world is become our Lord's and his Christ's, and he shall (begin to) reign for ever and ever', Apoc 11:15, when earth and heaven shall have fled away, Apoc 20:11, when 'time shall be no longer', Apoc 10:6, and 'the mystery of God shall be finished', Apoc 10:7—the mystery of the Providential economy of salvation which was Christianity's dispensation of grace and life to men—Christ will come with the souls of 'all his saints', 1 Thess 3:13, ready to unite themselves to bodies re-formed and 'made like to the body of his glory', Phil 3:21. He will appear as the 'King of kings and Lord of lords, who only hath immortality, and inhabiteth light inaccessible', 1 Tim 6:15, 16, 'sitting on the right hand of the power of God and coming in the clouds of heaven', Mt 26:64. 'And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven . . . and they [all men] shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with much power and majesty. And he shall send his angels with a trumpet and a great voice: and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from the farthest parts of the heavens to the utmost bounds of them', Mt 24:30, 31. He will appear announced 'with the voice of an archangel and with the trumpet of God', 1 Thess 4:15, and 'in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet . . . we shall be changed', 1 Cor 15:52.

The Trumpet of the Archangel—This picture can be amplified. In the OT trumpets announced the ark of the covenant 2 Kg 6:15; 2 Par 5:13, announced the king 4 Kg 11:14; 3 Kg 1:34, 39 etc., and the coming of the Lord, Ex 19:16, 19; 20:18. They were sounded at festivals, Ps 80:4, proclaimed victory, 2 Par 20:28, expressed joy, 2 Par 23:13, declared grief and destruction, Os 5:8; 8:1; Jl 2:1; Am 3:6; Soph 1:16, initiated Day of Atonement, Lev 25:9; Is 58:1; Jer 4:5; Jl 2:15, assembled the people, Num 10:1, 2. It is befitting, then, that a trumpet-call should announce the final coming of the King, should summon mankind—initiating an eternal festival of victory for the just, declaring grief and destruction and endless expiation for the wicked. Fitting too it is that the voice of an archangel should make that proclamation with the trumpet of God. Whoever this high herald may be, he will perform a function similar to that of the precursor of the glorified Messiah of whom Mal 4:5 says: 'Behold I will send you Elias the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord'—Elias whose second coming John the Baptist prefigured when the Kingdom of God was proclaimed for the first time, Lk 1:17; Mt 11:14.

The Sign of the Man—Ancient writers favour the idea that this sign is a luminous cross. We 671u venture to suggest that the return of Elias, forerunner as he is to be, may be the sign indicating that the Son of man is about to appear.

The Kingdom delivered up—And then after the passing of this world, the only real significance of which is to be a reflection of the Word—'and all things were made through him, and without him was made not a single thing that was made', Jn 1:3—when the whole world shall have been judged whether it made all things reflect the Word through the mediating grace of Christ who personally linked humanity to divinity in the Incarnation and, as a Mediator, bound the material, passing creation to the unchangeably eternal God—then the marriage of the Lamb will ensue, Apoc 19:7-9, directly to God. St Paul well describes the consummation of Christ's mediatorship by this direct union with God in 1 Cor 15:24, 28: 'Afterwards the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God and the Father, when he shall have brought to nought all principality, and power, and virtue. . . . And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then the Son also himself shall be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all'.

v The Millennium—The question may arise: Is this beatific state the thousand years of which Apoc 20 speaks? Such a deduction is impossible because the period of the Apocalypse is not eternal. Satan is represented as bound for that span of time; the faithful are to live and reign with Christ as his and God's priests while the rest of the dead live not till the thousand years are finished. This is the first resurrection. But when the thousand years are finished Satan will be loosed and do battle all over the earth. Finally he and his aides will be vanquished and cast into the pool of fire and brimstone.

It is the misunderstanding of this passage of Apoc together with notions gathered from some apocrypha which caused a rather widespread and crude doctrine to originate and even flourish in many Christian communities in the early days of the Church. Urged by the hopes which the Apostles themselves had originally cherished of the restoration on earth of a glorious Messianic Kingdom of Israel, and not having, as had the Apostles at the Ascension and Pentecost, those hopes transformed into an appreciation that Christ's conquest and reign was to be entirely of a spiritual character, men like Cerinthus and his followers of the 1st cent. A.D. envisioned a reign of a thousand years of sense pleasure and earthly happiness. Papias is said to have been a millenarist in this sense and St Irenaeus himself was also infected by similar tenets. Tertullian and the Montanists were exponents of this belief and there are indications of its existence amongst others in both East and West until the age of Jerome and Augustine when millenarianism became patently untenable within the Church.

In these early years its advocates coloured the belief with varying details of their own fancying: some would have it come after six thousand years, equivalent to the six days of creation; others would have it begin in a less distant future. Again there were those who would not insist on a thousand years' duration, while the less imaginative took the number literally. The faithful would participate in its joys and only after it had run its course would the second resurrection of all mankind and the universal judgement take place.

In more recent times some Protestant sects had revived w millenarianism in variously modified forms. Amongst these may be mentioned the Anabaptists, Zionists, Mormons and Adventists. At present when religious vagaries abound and apocalyptic ideas flourish some fanatics like Jehovah's Witnesses are tainted with all sorts of chiliastic confusions including a belief in the literal battle of Gog and Magog. The Church completely spurns crass, sensuous millenarianism in all its forms as vacuous speculations nor may a Catholic align himself with any such erroneous movements.

But what is to be said of a kind of 'spiritual millenarianism?' The Rev. Raphael Eyzaguirre (Apocalypsoes Interpretatio Litteralis, Rome 1911) has recently attempted to revive a modified and spiritual as opposed to an historical and material millenarianism [but his views have failed to find support.—Gen. Ed.].

But Father R. J. Loenertz, O.P. (The Apocalypse of St John, tr. H. J. Carpenter, O.P., New York 1948) has x what seems to be a better and more common interpretation of this chapter of Apoc. According to him (pp 134-6) the age of Christianity from its earliest years till the end of the world is the thousand years, when Satan is chained and restrained, working as he does through his dupes but checked by the grace of Christ which is sanctifying mankind (cf. 2 Thess 2:6, 7). This bringing of mankind back to the life of grace is the first resurrection; the second will be the resurrection of the body at the end of time. 'Towards the end of the Messianic era', he says, 'in the very last days, the predominance of Evil over Good in the world will be appalling' (p 135). Then will follow the manifest triumph of Christ at the last judgement and in eternal beatitude.

Conclusion—Throughout the Christian era Christ y keeps coming to men in many ways—at the individual's death in the particular judgement, with special graces in the crises of life and of history, in moments when sacraments are received, in the quiet of profound and loving prayer. All this Jesus foretold when he spoke of his coming and lasting presence amongst men. He provided that his followers be consoled with the truth that his constant victoriousness will culminate in a Second Coming. But just as he had only gradually unfolded the divine plans to his Apostles, so he has left many details of the Second Coming still to be revealed to mankind on the last day. 'It is not for you to know the times or the moments, which the Father hath put in his own power', Ac 1:7. Why does the Messias still keep the glories of his Second Coming partly veiled? That our faith may grow more firmly rooted in the truths which are revealed; and, above all, that throughout our lives we may be spiritually on the watch, dominated not by the fear of death so much as by the hope of Life, the hope of the Parousia.

THE 'BRETHREN OF THE LORD'

b Introduction—Much controversy has arisen over the references to the 'brethren' of our Lord in several passages of the NT (e.g. Mt 12:46; Mk 6:3; Jn 7:3; Ac 1:14; 1 Cor 9:5). It is the purpose of this article to show, in the light of Scripture and tradition, that these 'brethren' of our Lord were not his full brothers, sons of Mary and Joseph, nor even his half-brothers, sons of Joseph by a former marriage, but at the most his cousins.

The word brother is used in a very wide sense in Sacred Scripture. When applied to relations, it is not restricted to meaning brother german or half-brother, but is also used of a nephew or cousin. Thus Lot is described as the 'brother' of his uncle Abraham (Gen 14:14) and Jacob as the 'brother' of his uncle Laban (Gen 29:15). The sons of Cis are described as the 'brethren' of their cousins, the daughters of Eleazar (1 Par 23:21-2). When 4 Kg 10:13 speaks of forty-two 'brethren' of king Ochozias, it would seem to embrace more remote degrees of kindred. The reason for this ambiguous usage lies in the fact that neither Hebrew nor Aramaic had a special word to signify 'cousin'; they either used the word 'āh (brother) or a circumlocution such as 'son of (paternal) uncle' or 'son of the brother of the mother'. Hence to avoid excessive clumsiness the word 'brethren' was indispensable for denoting a group of cousins of different origin.

c The NT writers, schooled in the primitive Aramaic catechesis, would find it natural, like the authors of LXX, to render the word 'āh in all its various meanings by the one Greek word ἀδελφός. It is obvious, therefore, that where this word occurs its meaning must be determined by the context or by other sources in Scripture or tradition. Now there is nothing in the contexts in which the phrase 'brethren of the Lord' is used to make us suppose that it means brothers in the strict sense. On the contrary, such a supposition gives rise to a host of difficulties in other parts of the NT narrative and is quite irreconcilable with the firm tradition of the first four centuries as to the perpetual virginity of our Lady.

d The 'Brethren' are not the Children of Mary—When the angel came to Mary to seek her consent to becoming the mother of Jesus, her first question was: 'How shall this be done, because I know not man?' (Lk 1:34). This has been taken from earliest times as an indication that she had made a vow or at least a firm resolve to preserve lifelong virginity, even in marriage. Even Loisy (Les Évangiles Synoptiques, I, 1907, 290) admits the reasonableness of this, the common interpretation, which alone brings out the full meaning of Mary's words.

A careful perusal of the Gospels makes it clear that Mary kept her resolve, having no further children after the virginal birth of Jesus.

In the account of the finding of our Lord in the temple, for example, it appears that at the age of twelve he is her only child (Lk 2:41 ff.). To the inhabitants of Nazareth he is known, seemingly in an exclusive way, as 'the son of Mary' (Mk 6:3). And it is significant that this title is reserved to him alone in the Gospels; though others are referred to as his brethren, they are never referred to as sons of Mary.

Again, the whole attitude of his 'brethren' to our Lord suggests that they are his elders. They give him advice as to how to make his public life a success (Jn 7:3, 4); they seek, for his own benefit, to restrain his activities (Mk 3:21). Such behaviour among Jews is understandable only on the supposition that the 'brethren' of Jesus are senior to him in age. But this necessarily implies that they are not the children of Mary, for Lk 2:7 describes Jesus as her firstborn.

Another strong indication that Jesus is Mary's only son is the fact that when dying on the Cross he entrusted her to the care of St John (Jn 19:26, 27). It is hard to see why he should have made this provision for his Mother if his 'brethren', of whom at least four—James, Joseph, Simon and Jude—were alive at the time, were also her natural sons. As Lightfoot puts it, 'Is it conceivable that our Lord would thus have snapped asunder the most sacred ties of natural affection?'

Two objections drawn from the Gospel accounts of the birth of our Lord have been urged against interpreting the phrase 'brethren of the Lord' in any other than the strict sense. The first is based on a literal translation of Mt 1:25: 'And he (Joseph) knew her not till she brought forth her first born son'. It is argued that the natural inference is that Mary and Joseph afterwards lived together as husband and wife, so that it is their children, the natural fruit of their union, who are known as the 'brethren' of Jesus. Such an interpretation, though in itself possible, is by no means necessary. Many instances could be quoted from Scripture of the use of the word 'until' without any implication as to the future. Thus in 2 Kg 6:23 it is said that 'Michol, the daughter of Saul, had no child until the day of her death'; the implication is not that she had children then or afterwards. Or again, when 1 Mac 5:54 speaks of the Maccabees offering thanksgiving sacrifices 'because not one of them was slain till they had returned in peace' it does not imply that any of them were slain afterwards. Other examples can be found in Gen 8:7, Deut 34:6, Jdt 12:9, etc. All that can be gathered from Mt 1:25, therefore, is that Joseph played no part in the conception of Jesus. KNT is supported by many modern translators (e.g. Joüon, Buzy) in rendering the passage simply: 'and he had not known her when she bore a son'.

The second objection concerns the use of the word 'firstborn' in Lk 2:7. Jesus could not be called Mary's firstborn, it is argued, unless other children—his 'brethren'—followed him. But this is to insist on giving the word a meaning which it need not possess, for, in the well-known words of St Jerome, 'primogenitus est non tantum post quem et alii sed ante quem nullus' (Contra Helvid. 10). In Lk as in LXX πρωτότοκος is equivalent to the Hebrew b'kōr, which does not imply any relation to younger brothers but is used in an absolute sense for 'that which openeth the womb' (Ex 13:2, Num 3:12, 672g etc). Thus the first male child of a marriage was called the 'firstborn' immediately after its birth, and it retained that name even if it remained the only child. This usage of the word is illustrated in a Greek inscription found in 1922 on a stele at Tell el Yehoudieh in Egypt, and probably dating from shortly before the birth of Christ, which tells of the death of a woman, Arsinoe by name, in bringing her 'firstborn' into the world (cf. Bi 11 [1930] 373-90).

h The Scriptural witness to the fact that Jesus is Mary's only son remains, therefore, unshaken. But there is in addition the strikingly unanimous witness of Christian tradition. From the very beginning of the Christian era Mary's virginity was recognized in the name universally given to her—the 'Virgin Mary'; so that St Epiphanius could write in the 4th cent.: 'Has there ever been anyone who pronounced the name of holy Mary who would not immediately add, "the Virgin"? . . . The name of virgin has always been given to her, nor will it ever be changed; for she remained ever undefiled' (Adv. Haer. 78, 6, PG 42, 705). Any suggestion to the contrary was stigmatized by the early Fathers as 'madness', 'sacrilege', 'heresy'.

i The tradition of the first four centuries is well brought out in the controversy between St Jerome and Helvidius who, writing about 380, had attacked the perpetual virginity of Mary by asserting that the 'brethren of the Lord' were sons of Mary and Joseph, born after the virginal conception of Jesus. St Jerome at first refused to reply to a doctrine that was 'novel, wicked and a daring affront to the faith of the whole world'; but when he was finally prevailed upon by friends to write his masterly treatise De Perpetua Virginitate B. Mariae (PL 23, 193-216) against Helvidius, he was able to show the falsity of the latter's teaching not only by convincing exegetical arguments (some of which have been outlined above) but by an appeal to the testimony of 'Ignatius, Polycarp, Irenaeus, Justin Martyr and all the other learned men going back to Apostolic times' who had written on the subject. Helvidius claimed the support of two writers—Tertullian and Victorinus of Pettau; but St Jerome showed that even these were of no avail, for Tertullian was a heretic and Victorinus had been wrongly interpreted. Helvidius was effectively silenced and never ventured a reply. Indeed, little more was heard of his theory, until it was revived in modern times.

673a The 'Brethren' are not the Children of St Joseph—In the same way, little more was heard until recent times of the theory of Origen, Clement of Alexandria, St Epiphanius and some other early writers who, in defending the doctrine of the perpetual virginity of our Lady, had maintained that the 'brethren of the Lord' were our Lord's half-brothers, sons of St Joseph by a former marriage. St Jerome condemned the holders of such a view as 'following the ravings of the apocryphal writings'. One can hardly imagine him speaking thus if the theory were widely held or supported by a well-defined tradition.

Mary, the mother of James and Joseph, was alive at the time of the Passion (cf. Mt 27:56, Lk 24:10). But if James and Joseph are the sons of St Joseph (of which, as St Jerome pointed out, there is no indication in Scripture), we should have to conclude that this Mary was his divorced wife. This, in view of the character of St Joseph as portrayed in the Gospels ('a right-minded man', Mt 1:19, etc.) is quite unthinkable. It is not surprising, then, that the sensus Ecclesiae is certainly that St Joseph preserved perpetual virginity and had no wife except Mary.

b It remains to show that The 'Brethren' of our Lord were his Cousins. This has been the view most commonly held since St Jerome's time; but it must not be thought to have originated with him. The Christians of his day, and he himself, had no doubt that what he taught was the true tradition, which had been inarticulate until the attack on it by Helvidius.

Only four of the 'brethren' are explicitly named in the Gospels—James, Joseph, Simon and Jude (Mt 13:55; Mk 6:3; cf. Gal 1:19). Of these, we may concentrate for the moment on James. In the account given by the Synoptics of the women who were present at the Crucifixion, we learn that his mother was named Mary (Mt 27:56; Mk 15:40); and it would appear from the obviously parallel account in Jn 19:25 that she is to be identified with Mary (the wife) of Cleophas.

A difficulty urged against this is that elsewhere (Mt 10:3, etc.) James is described as '(the son) of Alphaeus'; how, then, could Mary his mother be wife both of Alphaeus and of Cleophas? One solution is that she was twice married. The more usual solution, however, is that Alphaeus and Cleophas (or, as the Greek has it, Clopas) are the same person; the Aramaic name Halphai could have different renderings (just as the French name Louis is rendered in Latin by Ludovicus or Aloysius); or Alphaeus could have taken a Greek name closely corresponding to his Jewish name (just as Saul took the name Paul).

It may be regarded as probable, therefore, that James is the son of Mary and Cleophas. Now Mary may well be the sister of our Lady (see Table 1, note), which would make her son the cousin german of our Lord. But in any case, if the witness of Hegesippus, the 2nd cent. historian, is correct, we can trace a relationship between our Lord and James through Cleophas. Eusebius, writing in the 4th cent., quotes a statement of Hegesippus in which Clopas is described as the paternal uncle of our Lord; this would mean that Cleophas is the brother of St Joseph, and, indeed, Eusebius quotes Hegesippus elsewhere as asserting this (Hist. Eccl. 4:22, 4; 3:11, 1). James would thus be the nephew of Joseph and cousin of Jesus, Joseph's putative son.

The Relationship of James to Joseph, Simon and Jude—James and Joseph are clearly uterine brothers (Mk

Suggested relationship between our Lord and James through Mary of Cleophas:

Note—This table is based on the supposition, made by many commentators, that Jn 19:25 identifies our Lady's sister with Mary of Cleophas. Other commentators object that it would be strange, if not impossible, for two children of the same parents to possess the same name, Mary.

Suggested relationship between our Lord and James through Cleophas:

Note—It will be seen that it is not impossible for both Tables 1 and 2 to be correct; two sisters, Mary the Mother of Jesus and Mary the Mother of James, could have married two brothers, Joseph and Cleophas. There is, of course, the tradition that Mary and Joseph were related before their marriage.

THE 'BRETHREN OF THE LORD'

673a 15:40, 47; 16:1). The position of Simon and Jude is not so clear. However, they are always named together, next to James in the list of the Apostles and next to James and Joseph in the list of the 'brethren of the Lord'; Simon is called by Hegesippus the son of Cleophas (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3:11, 1); and Jude gives himself the title 'brother of James' in the first verse of his own epistle (cf. also Lk 6:16). It is, then, at least probable that they are full brothers of James and Joseph, having the same parents, Mary and Cleophas, and therefore bearing the same relationship of cousin to our Lord.

If the four outstanding 'brethren' can thus be shown with great probability to be really cousins of our Lord, it would seem a legitimate inference that the whole turba (to use St Jerome's term) of those who are called 'brethren of the Lord' deserve that name only in a broad sense—they are related to our Lord at the most as cousins. 673e

Such an explanation is the only one which safeguards both the dogma of the perpetual virginity of our Lady and the tradition of the Church as to the perpetual virginity of St Joseph. It is in accord with the Scriptural use of the word 'brethren', is based on strong Scriptural arguments, and has the great majority of ecclesiastical writers to support it.

THE CHRONOLOGY OF NEW TESTAMENT TIMES

By T. CORBISHLEY, S.J.

b Note—Final certainty in this matter is still unattainable. The table on p 848 gives the conclusions which seem most naturally compatible with all the evidence. Certain alternative views preferred by the editors have been added as an Alternative Chronology.

It should be explained that the traditional B.C.—A.D. dating is late and incorrect. It was calculated by the monk Dionysius Exiguus (c 520), apparently on a hasty deduction from Lk 3:1 and 3:23. The consequence is that, since he decided that the year of Rome 753 was the year of Our Lord's birth, whereas that event took place some years earlier, we are compelled to make the paradoxical statement that Our Lord was born several years 'B.C.'.

c Bibliography—In addition to the works referred to in the course of this article, the following should be mentioned. Holzmeister: Chronologia Vitae Christi (Rome, 1933) is a complete handbook to the whole problem of Gospel Chronology. All the ancient sources and all modern works bearing on the subject, with very few exceptions, are listed or referred to there. Most of the discussions on individual points are to be found in the ordinary periodical literature and in the standard commentaries and dictionaries, especially, HDB: Chronology; DBV(S) 'Chronologie'. The article on Chronology, Biblical in the Catholic Encyclopaedia is still valuable in the NT sections. A recent work, The Chronology of the Public Ministry of Jesus, by George Ogg, Camb. Univ. Press, 1940, has its value.

. A. Pivotal Dates from Secular History

675a 1. The Death of Herod the Great—This took place (Josephus, Ant. 17:191; BJ 1:665) after he had reigned thirty-four years from the death of Antigonus (A.U.C. 717), and thirty-seven from the time when his claim to the throne had been acknowledged by the Triumvirs at Rome (A.U.C. 714); therefore his death cannot have been later than A.U.C. 751, and the date 750 seems more probable, in view of the ancient method of addition and subtraction; this would also square more easily with other chronological indications in Josephus.

b 2. The Governorship of Pilate—This lasted ten years, and came to an end some months before the death of Tiberius (March 16, A.D. 37), cf. Josephus, Ant. 18:89. It is not clear whether the beginning of Pilate's period of office falls in A.D. 26 or 27.

c 3. The 'Fifteenth Year of Tiberius'—Augustus died in August, 14 A.D.. It is true that Tiberius had been associated with him in some vague capacity, described by Tacitus as 'collega imperii' (Ann. 1:3), but the scene described in Ann. 1:11 suggests that his succession to the imperial power was by no means automatic, and it is generally agreed that, as Fotheringham puts it: 'All our evidence points to one conclusion, that the regnal years of Tiberius throughout the whole Empire were reckoned from his succession to full imperial authority [Sept. 17, A.D. 14], not from his co-regency with Augustus' (JTS 35 [1934] 150). The most probable view seems to be that the 15th year of Tiberius runs from the autumn of 28 to the autumn of A.D. 29. This would be the normal Roman way of reckoning. Tacitus, Ann. 4:1 ('C. Asinio, C. Antistio consulibus nonus Tiberio annus erat') makes it possible to hold that the 15th year of Tiberius = A.D. 29. On the other hand, in the neighbourhood of Syria, it is possible that the first year of Tiberius = the fraction between his accession in September and October 1, A.D. 14, since the Syrian rulers dated their regnal years generally in this way. Fr Sutcliffe (A Two-Year Public Ministry, p 143 f.) accepts this view, and concludes that the 15th year of Tiberius ran from Oct. 1, 27 to Sept. 30, A.D. 28. It may also have run from Nisan 28 to Nisan 29.

4. The Death of Herod Agrippa I—The usual date given for this event is A.D. 44. If that is correct, it must have occurred very early in the year. Josephus (Ant. 19:350) says that Herod died in the (54th year of his life and the) 7th of his reign. In Ant. 19:351 we are told that the king had reigned for four years under Gaius Caesar. This cannot be four full years, since Gaius himself reigned from March 37 to Jan. 41. Again in Ant. 19:343 Josephus tells us that when he died Herod had completed three years as king of all Judaea, and in Ant. 19:351 we learn that the king reigned three years under Claudius. Presuming that the same system of reckoning was employed throughout the reign, it seems to follow from all the foregoing evidence that Herod Agrippa's first year ran from his accession in late March or early April, A.D. 37, presumably after Nisan 1, to Nisan 1, A.D. 38. In this way, his fourth year will have run from Nisan 40 to Nisan 41, so that when Gaius died in Jan. 41, Herod Agrippa had completed most of his fourth year. (If we reckoned that his first year ran from his accession to Oct. 1, 37, then, when Gaius died, Herod Agrippa would be well on into his fifth year.) Whether he began a new reckoning on his taking over Judaea in Jan. 41, we cannot tell. If he did, then he would have completed three years at the beginning of Nisan 43, since his first year would run from Jan. to Nisan 1, 41. The 'seven years' of his whole reign would in that case be about six on our reckoning. But if the calculation was carried right through from the beginning, then his seventh year would be concluded by the beginning of Nisan 44. In any case, then, his death occurred early in 44, if not soon after Nisan 1, A.D. 43. (Prima facie, Ac 12:3 ff. suggests that the death of Herod Agrippa occurred soon after the Passover; but the διέτριβεν of 12:19 may imply an indefinite length of time.) (Traditionally, of course, the imprisonment of Peter is ascribed to A.D. 42.)

5. The Famine under Claudius—Cassius Dio (60:10, 11) tells us that there was a serious famine in Rome in A.D. 42. Josephus refers to a famine in Judaea at some period in the procuratorship of Fadus and/or that of Alexander. Niese reads ἐνι τούτων which would make the famine fall under Alexander, who succeeded Fadus apparently in A.D. 46. But the MSS read ἐνι τούτοις, which was apparently read by Eusebius and Cassiodorus. Niese, presumably on grammatical grounds, prefers the reading of the 10th cent. Epitome. If we restore ἐνι τούτοις we may suppose the famine to have begun in Judaea under Fadus, who became procurator on the death of Herod Agrippa I, in A.D. 43 or 44.

6. The Proconsulship of Gallio—An inscription exists f which makes it certain that there was a Gallio govern-

675f ing Achaia in A.D. 52. (It is impossible to discuss it briefly, but a full account is to be found in The Beginnings of Christianity by F. Jackson and K. Lake, Vol V, note xxxiv.) The more probable conclusion is that Gallio entered on his term of office in the summer of A.D. 51, the normal term being one year.

B. The Chronological Indications given in the NT Documents

676a 1. The Birth of Christ—We know that this occurred before the death of Herod the Great, i.e. before 750 A.U.C. A more precise dating depends upon the view we take of Lk 2:2. Lagrange (ad loc.) holds that Lk is here distinguishing the census connected with the Nativity from the one which we know to have taken place in 759 A.U.C. (= A.D. 6), when, on the deposition of Archelaus, Judaea was turned into a Roman province. (This latter census is the one referred to in Ac 5:37; cf. Josephus, Ant. 18:1 ff.) Lagrange's argument is that we must take πρώτη in Lk 2:2 as having a comparative force. This is possible Greek, and if we accept that rendering then the passage ceases to have value for any chronological argument. I have argued elsewhere (Klio 27 (1934) pp 122-48) for the view that P. Sulpicius Quirinius (= 'Cyrinus' of Vg) was governor of Syria from 743-46 A.U.C. There remains the odd fact that Tertullian (Adv. Marcionem 4:19) connects the Nativity census with the name of Sentius Saturninus, governor of Syria from 746 (?)—48. The most natural interpretation of all the evidence seems to be that Our Lord was born in the year shared by Quirinius and Saturninus, his successor, viz. 746 A.U.C. (= 8 B.C.).

b 2. The Duration of the Public Ministry—The interminable discussions on this topic suggest that finality cannot be attained by the internal evidence of the Gospels themselves. In default of such conclusive evidence it seems more satisfactory to try to establish the termini a quo and ad quem. The terminus a quo is, of course, the fifteenth year of Tiberius, discussed above. The terminus ad quem is the Crucifixion. Now, according to Fotheringham's well-known article (JTS 12 [1910-11] 120), the only possible years for the Crucifixion during the whole period of Pilate's government are A.D. 30 and 33. The argument is based on astronomical considerations, showing that it is only in these two years that Nisan 14 can have fallen on Friday. As between the years 30 and 33, the following seem to be the deciding factors.

(a) The earliest date at which John the Baptist can have begun his preaching, even if we take the minimum interpretation of the 15th year of Tiberius, is the spring of A.D. 28. It will therefore be impossible to fit the Baptism of Christ and the Forty Days' Fast in before the Passover of that year. Therefore the earliest date for the First Passover of the Public Ministry will be that of A.D. 29. If we accept 30 as the date of the Crucifixion, this can only be done by returning to the generally discredited view of a one-year Ministry.

c (b) 'Geminis consulibus'. There is an old tradition dating back to the middle of the 2nd cent. A.D. that the Crucifixion took place 'Geminis consulibus' sc. in the consulship of C. Fufius Geminus and L. Rubellius Geminus. At first sight this would suggest that the astronomical evidence is worthless and that we must accept A.D. 29 as the date of the Crucifixion. But the tradition may have another significance. The ancients did not possess our scientific interest in problems of chronology, and were usually content with a vague indication of time; 'suffered under Pontius Pilate' is all that the early Christian officially professed. Now we have seen above that the year 'Geminis consulibus' corresponds roughly to the 'fifteenth year of Tiberius' (if indeed it is not actually identical with it), and it is reasonable to hold that 'Geminis consulibus', as an alternative for 'the fifteenth year of Tiberius', was early regarded as the date of the 'accepted year of the Lord'. Whether or not that year was to be regarded as a strict calendar year or not would seem to them unimportant. Without pressing the matter, then, it seems fair to conclude that 'Geminis consulibus' strengthens the case for the identification of the 'fifteenth year of Tiberius' with at least the major part of A.D. 29.

(c) There is an interesting passage in Josephus (Ant. 18:113 f.) which may bear on this question. At a date which cannot be earlier than 34 and may be as late as 36, Herod the Tetrarch is at war with Aretas IV, the father of Herod's first wife. One reason which precipitated hostilities was the repudiation of that wife in favour of Herodias. In the passage in question, a disaster which befell the arms of Herod is attributed to divine justice avenging the execution of the Baptist. It would seem desirable, in view of this passage, to accept the latest possible date for the death of John, to bring it as close as may be to the events of 34.

On the whole, then, the more probable date for the Crucifixion would seem to be A.D. 33; according to Fotheringham, the precise date would be April 3. But A.D. 30 is a possible date.

One or two further points remain for elucidation. • What of Lk 3:23—'Jesus had now reached the age of about thirty' (KNT)? On any system which takes account of all the evidence, it must be admitted that Lk cannot mean that Christ was precisely thirty at the time of his baptism. Nor does he say so. The expression is vague, and may mean no more than that he was, as we say, 'in the thirties'. Actually, if we accept the end of A.U.C. 746 for the date of the Nativity, and April 786 A.U.C. for that of the Crucifixion, our Lord will have been in his fortieth year at the time of his death, a fact which may shed a little light on the mysterious passage in Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. II:32:5): 'From his fortieth or fiftieth year a man verges upon maturity (declinat iam in aetatem seniore); and Our Lord possessed this when he taught, as John declared, according to the witness of his Gospel and of all the elders who conversed in Asia with John, the Lord's disciples'.

There remains the difficulty of Jn 2:20—the 'forty-six years' of the Temple's building. Owing to the difficulty of determining with certainty the terminus a quo for the calculation of this period, the passage is not yet valuable for determining the precise date of this, the first Passover of the Public Ministry. (Rev. E. F. Sutcliffe, S.J.: A Two-Year Public Ministry [1938] pp 149-53; argues for A.D. 28. Fr E. Power, S.J. [Biblica (1928) 257 ff.] has argued for A.D. 30. On somewhat different grounds, I came to the same conclusion [JTS 36 (1935) 22 ff.]. But until the chronological scheme of Josephus' account of the reign of Herod the Great has been finally established, any conclusion based on his writings must remain provisional.)

3. The Date of St Paul's Conversion—Attempts have f been made to establish this from the reference to the 'ethnarch' of Aretas at Damascus. Some would argue that that official can only have been in existence after A.D. 37, when Caligula put Damascus under the jurisdiction of the Nabataean king. But the status of Damascus and the extent of the power of the Nabataean king during all this period are far from clear. The passage in Gal 1-2 is still a cause of perplexity. The famous second visit, 'after fourteen years' (from conversion or from the former visit?) must presumably be either the 'Famine Relief visit' of Ac 11 or the 'Council of Jerusalem' visit of Ac 15. Dom Bernard Orchard (JRB 28 [1944] 174) has collected the authorities for the view that the Relief visit occurred in A.D. 46/47, but in Ac that visit seems to be so intimately associated with the death of Agrippa that I find it hard to separate the two events by as much as three years. Moreover, since we know that the famine was felt at Rome as early as A.D. 42, it is not unnatural to think that, even apart from the prophecy of Agabus, the inhabitants of Palestine would have received some warning of an impending shortage, and that the

CHRONOLOGY OF NEW TESTAMENT TIMES

676f Christians would be making preparations before the actual incidence of the famine, so that St Paul might easily have gone to Jerusalem some little time before the actual famine there, even if this did not occur before 45.

g With some reluctance, I feel that we are on safer ground in identifying the second visit referred to in Gal 2:1 with that of Ac 15, leaving the question open whether the 'fourteen years' refer to the interval after conversion or since the first visit. I would myself put the conversion in 34: the events of Ac 1-8 cannot have occupied more than a year. If 3,000 were converted at Pentecost, it would surely not be long before the numbers rose to 5,000, Ac 4:4; and the material needs of the community must have been felt fairly soon (Ac 6: appointment of deacons); nor need we suppose that a long interval elapsed between Stephen's appointment and his execution. Paul's escape from Damascus (after three years—Gal 1:18) will thus have occurred in 36 or 37. It may be possible to associate the precautions of the ethnarch of Aretas with the war then raging between this king and Herod. We know that at this time the Nabataeans controlled the easterly trade-routes to Damascus from the south (cf. A.H.M. Jones: The Cities of the Eastern Roman Provinces, p 292) and the growth of their power at this time was sufficient to warrant a full-scale campaign by the governor of Syria. This was scheduled for A.D. 37, but was not undertaken because of the death of Tiberius (Jos. Ant. 18:124). But the whole incident is too mysterious to serve as a solid basis for argument, cf. Ac 9; Gal 1:15-2:10; Ac 11:25-30; 2 Cor 11:32; Ac 15.

4. The Council of Jerusalem—The Gallio inscription referred to above makes it probable that Paul came to Corinth in the spring of 50, which provides a clue to the date of the Council of Jerusalem a few months earlier.

The rest of the dating of the story of Ac depends largely on the dates of the different procurators of Judaea mentioned by Josephus. He is vague on the subject, but the years given in the table may be taken as probable.

b I Authority and Authorship of the First Gospel;

1 Early Witness to its Authority—Already at the end of the 1st cent. and during the first years of the 2nd, the gospel we know as Matthew's had won special prominence. The allusions of Clement of Rome (1 Ep. ad Cor., A.D. 95) of the Epistle of Barnabas (A.D. 100–30), of Ignatius of Antioch (d. A.D. 115), of the Didache (c. A.D. 100), clearly reflect the text of the First Gospel. Nor are these reflexions confined to the discourses (logia) of our Lord (e.g. Ignatius, Ep. ad Smyrn. 1:1; cf. Mt 3:15). The authority of Mt's text is even underlined by the phrase 'as it is written' (ὡς γέγραπται) which is technical for the canonical writings of the OT (Ep. Barn. 4:14, alluding to Mt 22:14). Though the name of the Apostle is not yet used in connexion with these texts this early preference for the First Gospel, in Rome and in Antioch, does not favour a recent or obscure origin.

2 Early Witness to Matthean Authorship—From the mid-2nd cent. at least, and probably from its beginning, the title 'according to Matthew' (κατὰ Ματθαῖον) was current; there is no trace of any other name in connexion with the First Gospel. Explicit evidence comes from Irenaeus writing before the end of the 2nd cent.: he declares that Matthew not only preached to the Hebrew (i.e. Aramaic) speaking public but also produced for them a written gospel in their own tongue (Adv. Haer. 3:1; quoted by Eusebius, HE 5, 8, 2). Origen (writing c. A.D. 233), severe critic though he was, accepts the truth of the already rooted tradition (ὡς ἐν παράδοσει μαθῶν) that the apostle-publican Matthew wrote the First Gospel in Hebrew characters for converted Jews (cf. Eus., HE 6, 25). This witness becomes a commonplace in the 4th cent. (Eus., HE 3, 24, etc.; Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. 14, 15; Epiphanius, Haer. 30, 3, 6; 51, 5, etc.; cf. texts and references in Lagrange, Mt xi–xv).

διαλέκτῳ τὰ λόγια συνετάξατο (?συνεγράψατο). Ἡμῖν γενέσθαι δ' αὐτὰ ὡς ἦν δυνατὸς ἑκάστος (quoted by Eus., HE iii. 39): 'Matthew wrote an ordered account of the oracles (logia) in the Hebrew tongue and each interpreted those oracles according to his ability'. This is the earliest known explicit witness to the Matthean authorship of the First Gospel. It comes from Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, who wrote a five-volume work: Explanation of the Lord's Discourses (or: of the Oracles about the Lord). The date of Papias' birth was probably A.D. 60 (Chapman) or 70 (Lagrange) and his book is commonly dated c. 125. He was in touch with the immediate disciples of the Apostles (Irenaeus). The precise sense of his term logia 'oracles' has been much disputed (e.g. WV I xviii–xxii) but it is becoming increasingly recognized that Papias was not attributing to Matthew merely a collection of our Lord's words (the hypothetical document originally dubbed 'Q' in critical circles). It may be that Papias chooses the term logia because the discourses are to form the theme of his book (though see WV I. c.), but it by no means follows that Papias denies to Matthew anything more than discourses. There is a growing reluctance to credit the existence of a document containing our Lord's words without any factual background and, moreover, its existence was not even suspected by those who originally used Papias' evidence. From his context it is quite clear that Eusebius took it [the term logia] to mean the Gospel according to St Matthew. The same is true of Irenaeus. This interpretation seems the most satisfactory one, especially as we know that the Gospel was used by Ignatius some twenty years before Papias wrote. Nor can the ascription κατὰ Ματθαῖον be later than Papias' time. Hence the presumption is that Papias by τὰ λόγια means our Gospel, Kilpatrick, 3. Cf. also § 607f.

For those, therefore, who deny that the Apostle Matthew wrote a gospel at all it remains only to refuse the witness of Papias. This is done on the alleged authority of internal evidence. Before we examine this internal evidence and the legitimate conclusions to be drawn from it we should do well to make some preliminary and cautionary observations. In the first place, Papias' is not the only evidence that remains to be explained away. Even granted that Irenaeus was its unwitting victim we are still faced with the conviction of the critical Origen who claims not Papias only, but a whole tradition in its support; Eusebius, too, mistrustful of Papias on other points, accepts his evidence on this without question. Secondly, in questions of this kind both internal and external evidence must be respected and not manipulated. Thirdly, the historical evidence is stubborn on two points which are not necessarily connected—Matthean authorship and Aramaic original; the 'critical' hypothesis must reject both, however, if its arguments are to hold; in fact it argues from the Greek to the non-apostolic authorship of the same. Here there is danger of confusing the issue because the traditional view is not tied down to the detailed identity but only to the substantial identity of the Greek translation with its apostolic, Aramaic, original. Fourthly, the firm tradition insists that our Greek Matthew is a translation. If it is right in so doing we are already in presence of a complex problem to which we might reasonably f II Original Language of the Gospel—Papias, Irenaeus, Origen, Eusebius, Jerome, all bear formal witness that the First Gospel was written by Matthew 'in the Hebrew tongue' or 'in his mother-tongue'. It is fairly clear that by 'Hebrew' is here meant not the classical Hebrew of antiquity, but the cognate Aramaic, the contemporary Palestinian vernacular. For this use of the term, see the early ecclesiastical writers and, in the NT, Ac 21:40; 22:2; 26:14; Jn 19:13, 17, 20. Hebrew, indeed, would have been inaccessible at this time to all but scholars. Intrinsic evidence also excludes a Hebrew original since, in that hypothesis, quotations from the OT would have been taken verbatim from the Hebrew text (see below). A development of the argument for an original Aramaic Matthew may be found in Chapman, 182-214.

Despite this evidence the existence of a Semitic original is commonly denied on the ground that our Greek Matthew is manifestly not a translation. The arguments are not convincing. The Greek is clear but inelegant and repetitive: it may well be that of translation; occasional ingenuities of phrase (e.g. 21:41) are not beyond the powers of a translator; the handling of OT quotations points rather towards an Aramaic original than away from it. This last point calls for some elaboration: it is argued that the First Gospel makes use of the Greek Bible, the Septuagint, thus betraying its Greek origin. It may be answered, first, that this phenomenon too may be ascribed to the fact that the translator leans towards his familiar Greek OT. It may be argued further with Lagrange (Mt. cxvii-cxxiv; and cf. Chapman, 261-93) that the First Gospel's use of the OT is in fact an indication of Semitic origin. The form of ten of Mt's quotations betrays the influence of the Hebrew text and in six of these cases, 1:23; 2:6, 18; 12:18-21; 13:35; 21:5, no adequate reason can be assigned for such recourse to the Hebrew other than the fact that it, and not LXX, was already used in the work which lay before the translator's eyes. The most natural explanation of such citations, notes Lagrange, is that 'Matthew (i.e. the Apostle) writing in Aramaic had before him the Hebrew text with which he was familiar and which he uses with a certain freedom'. At times the translator reproduces this characteristic of his original, at others (especially when the quotation is paralleled in the other Synoptics) he prefers the LXX form.

678a III Date of Original and of Translation—That Matthew was the first of the four to write his gospel is the firm persuasion of antiquity. This puts the Aramaic Matthew before A.D. 62 (the date of Luke). External evidence does not allow of any further precision: the testimony of Eusebius (HE iii. 24. 6) is too vague and that of Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. iii. 1. 1) too uncertain of interpretation (cf. WV I xvii-xviii) to admit of a conclusion. The Greek Matthew was probably written several years before A.D. 70, see below. If therefore we allow twenty years or so for the development of our Gk Mt from its Aramaic original, A.D. 40-50 would be an appropriate date for the latter.

The Gk Matthew was certainly well established in the first years of the 2nd cent.: the seven letters of Ignatius (A.D. 115 or earlier) use the Gk text as we know it. On this score alone it is difficult to believe that the translation was made later than A.D. 90. The arguments of Kilpatrick, especially pp 101-23, for A.D. 90-100 are not compelling: the situation which our gospel was designed to meet was already developing before the Synod of Jamnia in A.D. 90. In view of the fact that our Gk Matthew contemplates the Jewish catastrophe as something still to come a date some time before A.D. 70 is probable. The translator who, as will be seen, uses a certain freedom (cf. 21:39 note), would doubtless have allowed his language to be influenced by that event had it already taken place. Indeed, recent comparative studies of Matthew and Paul have suggested a date earlier than the latter's first epistles (i.e. before A.D. 51) for a Gk translation of Aramaic Matthew; see Chapman, DR (1937) 432 ff.; Orchard, Bi (1938) 19 ff.; Butler, DR (1948) 367 ff.; cf. Dodd, ET (1947) 293 ff. Whether this translation or one of these translations (cf. the evidence of Papias) is identical with our Gk Matthew or whether it is only the precursor and source of the same will have to be decided on other grounds. If we accept the argument for our Gk Matthew's dependence upon Mark (cf. § 679a) we shall have to put Gk Matthew after A.D. 60 (probable date of Mark) and thus reject the identification.

IV Pertinent Replies of the Biblical Commission—b (19th June, 1911); § 50a-g.

1. The Apostle Matthew is truly author of the Gospel that bears his name.
2. Tradition amply shows that Matthew wrote before the other evangelists and in the language of the Palestinian Jews.
3. The date of the original Matthew is not later than the fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70) and tradition is best satisfied if we place it before Paul's coming to Rome (c. A.D. 60).
4. Matthew did not compose merely a collection of our Lord's discourses, but a gospel in the strict sense.
5. Our Gk Matthew is substantially identical with the original. This is the legitimate conclusion from the fact that the Greek text was treated as canonical by the Fathers and ecclesiastical writers and by the early Church herself.

V Structure of the Gospel—It has been truly said that 'if any passage or section is to be found in our Gospel as well as in another, our Gospel is the one in which it may most easily be found'. This is the result of Matthew's highly systematic arrangement. Prescinding from the prologue (the Infancy narrative of chh 1-2) and from the epilogue (the Passion and Resurrection account of chh 26-28) the Gospel appears to fall naturally into five great parts. The evangelist marks these divisions with the repetition of a stereotyped formula (or its near equivalent) used nowhere else in the Gospel: 'And it came to pass when Jesus had ended these words . . .', 7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1. Each part has its predominantly narrative section followed by a long discourse for which the narrative forms an apt preparation thus:

1. i. Narrative chh 3-4 (The indispensable preliminary mise en scène).
- ii. Discourse chh 5-7 (Inaugural Discourse: the 'Sermon').
2. i. Narrative chh 8-9 (Opening of our Lord's ministry; miracles).
- ii. Discourse ch 10 (Instruction for Apostles' ministry).
3. i. Narrative chh 11-12 (Opposition to the 'Kingdom').
- ii. Discourse ch 13 (Kingdom's mysterious nature explains opposition).
4. i. Narrative chh 14-17 (Formation of disciples and of Peter).
- ii. Discourse ch 18 (Duties of the disciples).
5. i. Narrative chh 19-23 (Mounting opposition of Judaism).
- ii. Discourse chh 24-25 (Messianic Judgement on Judaism, etc.).

VI Characteristic Theme—One might hesitate between d two possible titles for our Gospel: the 'Gospel of Fulfilment' or the 'Gospel of the Kingdom' but, in effect, these are but two aspects of the one theme. The coming of the Kingdom is a fulfilment of the old promises and the Kingdom itself is not an entirely new thing, but a perfecting of the old. There is true continuity here as Mt insists in one sentence which he alone quotes: 'The kingdom of God shall be taken 678d from you, and shall be given to a nation yielding the fruits thereof', 21:43.

The Gospel of Fulfilment—Mt sees both Kingdom and King not as unforeseen and unprepared phenomena, but as the supernatural climax of a divine plan announced and developing in the history of Israel. On twelve occasions the evangelist formally asserts that the old Scriptures were 'fulfilled' in Jesus and his work (1:22; 2:15, 17, 23; 4:14; 8:17; 12:17; 13:35; 21:4; 26:54; 27:9; cf. 3:15 note). From the first verses of the Gospel this is evident. The descent of Jesus from Abraham, not traced back to Adam as in Lk, implicitly links our Lord with the promise of Genesis (Gen 13:15; 17:8; cf. Gal 3:16) and the Infancy narrative is punctuated with OT references eagerly sought out to reduce the surprise of the early opposition to the Messiah, 2:15, 17, 23. Alone among the evangelists Mt, 4:15, sees the opening of our Lord's public preaching as the shining of the great Messianic light already spoken of by Isaiah (9:1), and the first works of healing as the prophesied function of the Isaian 'Servant of God', Mt 8:16-17. This second passage with its hint of suffering prepares the reader for the remaining OT citations chosen for circumstances more sombre: our Lord's withdrawal from the opposition of his people's leaders, the blindness of the people themselves, the flight of his own disciples, the mortal treachery of one of them—even these are not the frustration of the divine plan, but its fulfilment, 12:17; 13:35; 26:54, 56; 27:9.

• As for the new order itself, it too is a fulfilment of the old and not its destruction, 5:17; ritual laws may pass, but the ancient moral code is protected, 15:3-6, and reinforced with a strong inner spirit, 5:20-48; though the new era is on a higher plane the old had looked towards it, 11:11-13. The message of the new Kingdom is addressed first to the subjects of the old, 10:5 f.; if it passes from Israel it is through Israel's fault, 21:28-44, and even our Lord's farewell words to his people hold a hint of hope for the nation elect of old (23:39 note). The very refusal of its Messiah by Israel is no break with the past, but rather the climax of its melancholy history: Israel's response to God's invitations was never generous, 23:35, and Matthew's readers, largely converts from Judaism, need not be surprised nor scandalized that their own nation as a body has rejected the new offer, 23:34.

† The Gospel of the Kingdom—51 times (as against 14 in Mk, 39 in Lk) Mt speaks of 'the Kingdom', but whereas Mk and Lk consistently use the expression 'Kingdom of God', Mt uses it, at most, 5 times only and prefers (32 or 33 times) 'Kingdom of the Heavens'. This last is almost certainly the formula used by our Lord himself (Lagrange, Mt, ci, cv-cvi), the plural form of 'heavens' reproducing Aramaic (and Hebrew) usage and the term itself being the contemporary respectful equivalent for 'God', 1 Mac 3:60; 4:24. Since the two expressions are in practice synonymous it follows that the phrase 'Kingdom of the Heavens' does not necessarily imply a kingdom in another world than this. Nevertheless the expression lends itself of its very nature to a certain ambiguity and the context will have to decide the exact formality of its use in any given passage. Sometimes it is the Messianic kingdom of God on earth, sometimes the apotheosis of that kingdom in heaven, sometimes the recognition of God's royal rights by the individual soul. The perspectives will often merge since the kingdom on earth is designed as the antechamber to the kingdom in heaven, e.g. 8:11-12. In some cases the distinction will be clear as when the kingdom of the Son (the kingdom on earth) is distinguished from the kingdom of the Father which is in heaven (cf. 1 Cor 15:28); this is most deliberately done in Mt 13:41-43. Thus to the kingdom of the Son refer 13:41; 16:28; 20:21, and cf. 19:28; to the kingdom of the Father: 13:43; 25:34; 26:29. On occasions the characteristics of the kingdom are such as to exclude a formal reference to heaven; thus, in the case of the parables of ch 13, the coexistence in the kingdom of good and bad, the hidden nature of the kingdom, its slow and secret growth. Similarly the disciples' ambition in 18:1-4 clearly has an earthly kingdom for its object; the same may be said of the request of the sons of Zebedee, 20:21. Likewise when the kingdom is said to have come, 12:28, or when it is given a human authority, 16:17-19, the aspect of a kingdom on earth is foremost. It is upon this aspect that Mt's emphasis lies because, for him, the kingdom is successor to God's ancient kingdom which was Israel, a kingdom of God upon this earth. The kingdom is on the threshold when the Baptist speaks, 3:2, and his words are echoed by our Lord, 4:17, with whose ministry the day of Sion's kingdom had dawned (11:5; cf. Is 35:5; 61:1). It has manifestly come with the great work of exorcism, 12:28, and is a matter of present experience, 13:16-19. But its 'coming', though hidden and constant like the great works of nature, may break through into observable history in spectacular fashion from time to time; in this sense it may have many 'comings'. Such a thrust is said to be near at hand, 16:28; 24:34; when the old temple falls the new kingdom will be known for its excelling successor (ch 24 notes). Matthew's gospel is therefore in some sort a theology of history, a sustained reflection upon the origin and nature and fortune and final destiny of the permanent and permeating force which God, through Christ, has infused into the affairs of the world. The Epistle to the Romans sees this revolutionary thing as the saving justice of God manifested in his Son, the gospel sees it as God's kingdom established by the Son; its theology is less elaborate than St Paul's, but it is no less profound and its arrangement admirable. The skilful synthesis and distribution of our Lord's discourses provides the reader with a growing understanding of the Kingdom which is Mt's central theme. His first discourse describes the true subjects of the Kingdom and their spirit; his second instructs its missionaries; the third illustrates its hidden but irresistible power; the fourth the mutual obligations of its citizens; the fifth its establishment in power upon the ruins of Judaism—nor does this last discourse end until the king ushers his faithful subjects into the lasting kingdom of his Father. It is small wonder that the marked preference for the gospel of Matthew in the early Church has remained to this day, because it is the gospel of God's kingdom on earth, the 'ecclesiastical gospel', the gospel of 'the Church'.

VII The Composition of Greek Matthew—The Two-Source Theory (Two-Document Hypothesis) with varying modifications is accepted in non-Catholic critical circles as a demonstrated thesis. Rejecting the historical evidence of an original Aramaic gospel it affirms two principal sources of Gk Matthew: (1) Mark's gospel, incorporated almost in toto; (2) A written document containing principally the sayings of our Lord (document 'Q') which is the supposed source of non-Markan matter common to Mt and Lk. Harnack maintained that Q consisted almost exclusively of our Lord's discourses, but it is more commonly held today that Q contained narrative matter also, that it was an embryonic gospel. In addition to these two sources at least one other is usually postulated for those parts of Gk Matthew not found in either Mk or Lk—a source of Semitic origin. The Two-Source theory has been rejected by the Biblical Commission, § 51a-b, which notes that it lacks historical foundation. The Commission, however, permits free discussion of all hypotheses which respect the points mentioned in its decree of 1911, § 50a-g.

Catholic scholars, fully aware of the problem and equally respectful of the data of historical tradition are not agreed upon the solution of the problem. The Oral Tradition Theory considers the Synoptic phenomenon adequately explained by the uniformity of the original spoken gospel. This was 'a traditional outline of the life of Christ and of his chief sayings, current at Jerusalem both in Aramaic and Greek'. It is claimed that the hypothesis is confirmed by the language of the 679b gospels themselves which displays a colourless uniformity in sections common to the three Synoptics as opposed to the marked individuality of other passages. The tenacious oriental memory is credited with the preservation of the order of events and content of discourses found to be the same in the three Synoptics. Stress is laid upon the differences which, it is said, the theory of written sources finds it difficult to explain. 'Memory explains both the likenesses and the differences in the Synoptic gospels, but the hypothesis of documents does not sufficiently explain the differences such as we have them in the concrete'; cf. WV I 371-82. The Aramaic gospel of Matthew and, through it, the Greek preserve for us the Aramaic form of the original spoken gospel.

c The majority of Catholics think this explanation insufficient to account for a similarity which is striking and sustained. In addition to the part played by oral tradition they invoke some form of Mutual Dependence of one written gospel on another. Within this school of thought are two widely differing opinions. The first is a return to Augustine's view that Mk is, in effect, an abridgement of Gk Mt. 'The Gk Mt served as Mk's chief source in the sense that Peter, when preaching in Rome, had the Gk Mt before him, and adapted it in his own way to his hearers' needs', Chapman, xxi. Mark was Peter's stenographer, ibid. 89-92. In this theory Gk Mt is considered as an independent translation of the Aramaic original and a discussion of its 'composition' lies outside the range of the Synoptic Problem.

d The second of the two 'Mutual Dependence' theories is adopted here. It enjoys the advantage of combining the historical data with what appear to be the more assured findings of recent inquiry into the internal evidence. The following summary of the theory, which is offered as a probable solution, is based upon the outline-presentation of Père Benoit O.P., 12-30. The source which the critics call 'Q' is no other than the original Aramaic gospel, discourses and events, of the Apostle Matthew. This gospel presented the Jerusalem catechesis which was the framework of Peter's preaching, the preaching which Mark committed to writing. Composed in Aramaic, as its Semitic flavour often suggests, it was very soon translated into Greek (cf. § 678a: the alleged dependence of Paul on Gk Mt). There were, doubtless, many such translations (Papias). These translations were used by our three evangelists each of whom adjusted his source to his purpose. Thus Mark, for example, omitted many sayings of our Lord, notably the opening discourse, and arranged the narrative-matter in his own way. In this Luke followed him fairly closely but filled in many of his omissions of discourse. The Gk Mt completely reorganized the narrative-sequence and, to some extent, the discourses—though apparently his arrangement of five great discourses is due to his source, the Aramaic Mt.

e The vindication of this hypothesis cannot here be pursued in detail and a few general remarks must suffice. The theory rightly insists that the Two-Source position has a fatal weakness: its rejection of the distinction between our Gk Mt and an Aramaic original vouched for by firm historical evidence. It agrees, however, that oral tradition alone is not capable of explaining the similarity between Mark and Gk Mt (the latter has all of but little more than Mark's narrative; its order from Mt 14 is identical; 45 verses of Mk, one-fifteenth of his gospel, are remarkably similar in form to their counterpart in Mt; 23 rare words are found only in the parallel places of Mk and Gk Mt). It agrees also, and in this it is opposed to the former of the Mutual Dependence opinions, that the form of narrative in Gk Mt is dependent upon Mk and not vice-versa (its less vivid and more correct style, its signs of transposition, its doublets, etc.). Attention is called, on the other hand, to contrary phenomena—the Gk Mt is more Semitic in character than Mk who also shows signs of having abridged the Mt-narrative in places. This cannot be due to a dependence of Mk on Gk Mt, as has been shown; it must therefore be due to Mark's dependence upon the common source (the Aramaic catechesis). The same apparently contradictory phenomena occur in the discourses and lead to the same conclusion: dependence of Greek Mt on Mk and dependence of both on a common source. It is regarded as fairly probable that Mk knew and used the catechesis not only through the medium of Peter's preaching but also in its written form in the original gospel of Mt. As for the translator of Mt, he too 'knew this primitive tradition in the Aramaic gospel of Mt which was probably already translated. He undertook to present this gospel more fully than Mk, his predecessor, of whose work however he made considerable use. Employing this Gk text of Mk he adjusted it when his prudence suggested, omitting those descriptive details which did not further his essential purpose which was doctrinal and at times preserving the flavour of his Aramaic original. He made use also of Mark's sequence which was, to a great extent no doubt, the sequence of Aramaic Matthew; this he sometimes followed, sometimes manipulated. From the original gospel of Mt he took over the discourses in their entirety, even adding to them with the help of other traditions', Benoit, op. cit., 20-1.

f As for the relationship of Gk Mt with Lk, it seems impossible to suppose any direct dependence of either upon the other in view of their notable differences (e.g. the Infancy narratives, the genealogies, the wording of the Our Father, etc.). Their similarities are, therefore, best explained by a common written source of their non-Markan material containing (as we have noted) not only discourses but also events. This source is the early translation, or better 'translations', of the original Matthew. In addition to this source a second is postulated which Luke took bodily into his 'great intercalation', Lk 9:51-18:14, but which the Gk Mt quarries for the structure of his great discourses.

If this conception of the facts is approximately correct it follows that our Gk Mt is not a mere translation of the Apostle's original Aramaic gospel; nevertheless it maintains the same fundamental structure and the same substantial teaching. Indeed any hypothesis which rejected the substantial identity of our Gk Mt with the apostolic work would collapse before the historical evidence. It is undeniable that the earliest ecclesiastical writers unanimously accepted our Gk gospel as the reliable presentation of the Apostle's Aramaic work. It may be added that they received the Greek text as sacred and canonical.

g Inspiration of Mt.—It seems probable that the immediate, though not necessarily exclusive, object of the Church's pronouncements relative to 'sacredness and canonicity' is the Greek version, since this is the form of the Gospel in ecclesiastical use from the first century onwards, the well-known 'evangelium Matthaei'. If this view is exact then we possess a work inspired in its entirety and not simply a translation substantially identical with an inspired original.

For further discussion see The Synoptic Problem, §§ 610-15; also §§ 604d-f, 607a-g.

A. 1:1-II:23 Prologue: Infancy of the Messiah. 680a

I 1-17 Genealogy of Jesus the Messiah—1. A brusque opening in headline-form introduces the Gospel. It refers perhaps to the whole gospel (WV 'book of the coming'), more probably to the genealogy only (KNT, 'record of the ancestry') or to the genealogy together with the conception-narrative; cf. 1:18. The use of 'Christ' (not 'the Christ') as a proper name became common after our Lord's death (it is frequent in St Paul). The term is the Greek equivalent (χριστός) of the Aramaic m'šihā (Gk transliteration Meōsiās) meaning 'anointed', technical at this time for the prophesied King. The most popular title of this King, representing his basic characteristic, was 'Son of David', 2 Kg 7:12-17; Is 11:1 ff., etc. Its vindication for Jesus is the goal of Mt's genealogy. 'Son of Abraham',

b 2-6a First Series: Abraham to David: Patriarchal List—Cf. 1 Par 1:27-2:15 where, as here, the list is incomplete since only three names occur between Phares and Naasson to cover the period (at least 215 years) of the Egyptian sojourn.

c 6b-11 Second Series: Solomon to Jechonias: Royal List—Cf. 1 Par 3:5-16 where, unlike here, the list is complete, placing Ochozias, Joas, Amasias, between Joram and Ozias (or Azarias) and naming Joaqim as also Sedecias. The historical situation summarized in 11 f. is this: about the time of the deportation to Babylon, 598, Josias, 638-608, was succeeded by his son Joachaz, 608, whose successors were Joaqim, brother of Joachaz, 608-598, Jechonias (or 'Joachim') son of Joaqim, 597, finally Sedecias brother of Joachaz, 598-587. Jechonias, aged 18, was taken captive to Babylon in 598 and was released 37 years later. Zorobabel, 12 f., headed the returning exiles in 537.

d 12-16 Third Series (Jechonias to Jesus): Dethroned Davidic Family—For Salathiel and Zorobabel cf. 1 Par 3:17-19; Esd 3:2. From Abiud onwards Mt's source must have been family archives, carefully preserved in Jewish circles and easily challenged by hostile readers. 17. Three series of fourteen generations are punctuated by two national crises: the inception of a divinely guaranteed Davidic dynasty in the 10th cent. and the Babylonian exile in the 6th.

e Notes on the Genealogy—(a) Purpose. The genealogy does not prove Messiahship, but vindicates for Jesus its prerequisite condition, viz. Israelitic stock traceable to the patriarch of the whole race and, in particular, royal Davidic descent. But the singular manner of our Lord's conception, 18-25, introduced a special difficulty: though Mary was evidently of Davidic family herself (cf. Rom 1:3; Prat, I, 77), ancient (and particularly Jewish) genealogical usage ignored descent from the female line. Mt, therefore, gives the ancestry of Joseph, reputed and legally registered father through whom alone the Davidic descent of Jesus could be juridically established. (b) The term 'begot'. Used of mediate natural generation in e.g. 8 ('Joram begot Ozias') and possibly of legal ('levirate'; 22:25 note) generation in 12 ('Salathiel begot Zorobabel' cf. Esd 3:2 with 1 Par 3:19). (c) The women in the genealogy. Contrary to usage and therefore with a purpose four women are named: Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Bethsabee; cf. Gen 38; Jos 2; Ru 1-4; 2 Kg 11. Their common quality is apparently that of alien blood: Rahab Canaanite, Ruth Moabite, Tamar probably Canaanite, Bethsabee probably 'Hittite' like her first husband. Their mention prepares us for an association of the Gentiles with God's designs—an association subsequently emphasized by the incident of the Magi (ch. 2).

f (d) Fourteen generations. The number is taken from the OT record of the first series and deliberately, 17, applied to the second and third as a symmetrical aid to memory. It may have been a further recommendation (or happy accident?) that 14 is the first multiple of the sacred number 7 (favoured by Mt) and the numerical equivalent of the Hebrew consonants of David's name (DWD, 4 + 6 + 4). (e) Defect of the third series. The third series is apparently one name short unless we count Jechonias twice—as king, 11, and as dethroned civilian, 12, Augustine, PL 34, 1076 and WV note to Mt 1:17. Alternatively (Buzy) Jechonias need not be counted as beginning the third series if Mary be reckoned one of the fourteen; this is not improbable in view of the singular quality of her motherhood. A third solution (*Allen; Lagrange) reads Joaqim for Joakin (Jechonias) in 11 (translator's carelessness?). Besides solving the numerical question, this gives point to the mention of 'brethren', 11, since two of Joaqim's brothers reigned. (f) The conclusion of the genealogy. The evangelist studiously avoids the phrase 'Joseph begot Jesus': Joseph figures only as the legal husband of Mary. The text is critically certain. The Syriac variants (all careful to insert the word 'virgin' with 'Mary') are the result of subsequent effort to combine the legal paternity of Joseph and the virginal motherhood so clearly asserted in 18-25. The Sinaitic Syriac reads 'Joseph to whom was betrothed Mary the virgin begot Jesus'. That it intends no more than a legal begetting is clear from its care to render the Greek of 1:18 ('before they came together') by 'at a time when they had not come together', thus safeguarding the perpetual virginity of Mary even more scrupulously than the Gk; cf. RB 19 (1920) 349-52. (For the conciliation of Mt's genealogy with Lk's, Schmid [Das Evangelium nach Matthäus, Regensburg 1948] rejects the 'levirate law' solution and invokes the defects in the family tables implicitly cited by Mt and Lk.)

18-25 The Virginal Conception of the Messiah—This passage more clearly explains the situation suggested in 16. Joseph appears as witness of two things: first, of his own assumption of legal paternity (this fact alone justifies the presence of Joseph's genealogy in Mt); second, of his virginal relationship with Mary and of his heaven-sent conviction of the virginal conception. 18. Betrothal (qiddūšin) in Jewish law conferred the status of husband and wife (hence the terms of 19 f.). A child conceived during this period was regarded as legitimate unless disowned, but the marriage was regarded as incomplete until the husband formally 'took possession' (the nisū'in) of his bride by taking her to his home. This he was free to do at any time, 2 Kg 3:14; cf. Edersheim, I, 353-5. After Mary's return from her cousin's house, Lk 1:39-56, but before Joseph had taken her to his home her condition became clear ('she was found' or, in the weakened sense of the Heb. verb, 'she became', Joūon). Mt adds with reverent haste what was revealed later, 20, that the child was God-begotten. 19. That denunciation was a legal duty in the circumstances cannot be proved; nor does the text suggest that Joseph sacrificed legal scruples ('and'—not 'but'—'not willing to make her case public'). It suggests rather (Lagrange) that precisely because Joseph was 'just' (i.e. aware of duties to God and neighbour and, in this case, to Mary) he did not place the matter before the village-court. Such a course, though not necessarily involving condemnation (a woman might be pronounced blameless in such cases, Deut 23:25 f.) meant publicity for Mary, unwelcome and evidently incompatible with Joseph's 'justness'. Why incompatible? Presumably because ignorance of the facts coupled with knowledge of Mary's character made of mere publicity an injustice. St Joseph's attitude is to be observed: there is no word of complaint or even of inquiry. The evangelist leaves us with the impression of a patient instrument of God. Another course remained open: to give Mary her freedom by a bill of divorce before two witnesses (19:7 note) without the publicity of the court. To this course Joseph was inclining. His delicacy is admirable—communicated to him, no doubt, from his knowledge of Mary. He cannot believe her blameworthy; he knows nothing of the Annunciation (Mary had been silent and absent for three months, Lk 1:39 ff.); he can think only of some unknown cause, perhaps supernatural, certainly consistent with Mary's character. 20. There remained a third possibility: to celebrate the nisū'in and thus acknowledge the child as his own. From this, evidently, Joseph shrank; perhaps because it would put him publicly in a false position. The angel reassured him. He could now without scruple adopt this third course because the child, though not his, was his more than any man's. It was the child of his betrothed. His patience and obedience make Joseph a model of Christian men; his unique relationship to the child makes him our powerful intercessor. 21. Joseph is to assume the duties of parent (cf. Lk 1:31, 63) and impose the name 'Jesus' (in Heb.: Y'hōšua' or Yēšua'). The name means 'Yahweh is Salvation'. The salvation is to be not from Herod nor from Rome but 'from sin'. We are warned from the outset that the child's kingdom is not of this world, Jn 18:36,

- 680j contrary to the popular Messianic idea which our Lord was to find so difficult to eradicate. This same work is assigned to God himself in Ps 129:8 (Lagrange)—one of many hints (e.g. 23 with note) preparing us for a greater revelation of the child's true dignity. 22-23. All this has taken place, says Mt (for whom the Incarnation is an abiding thing) in such a way as to fulfil the prophecy of Isaiah, Is 7:14. Over seven centuries before, the prophet had announced a Davidic king to be born of a young woman (a 'virgin' LXX) by divine intervention, Is 7:14. His contemporary, Micheas (Mic 5:3-5, cf. § 535h) had alluded to the same event. Mt recalls this quality of the Messias which had been allowed to fall into the background in Jewish Messianic tradition (Lagrange, Le Messianisme, 223). The incompatibility of virgin-birth with physical descent from the Davidic male line is resolved in Mt by legal descent through Joseph's adoption. The child's name is to be Jesus, but he is to be 'called' (i.e., in Semitic idiom, the true description of his mission, or even of his personality, is to be) 'Immanū' El, or 'With Us (is) God'. Of all the numerous OT theophoric names (e.g. Josue 'Yahweh is Salvation'; Johanan 'Yahweh has been Gracious') this name, found applied only to the Isaian child, Is 7:14; 8:8, is the one most strangely suitable to describe the real personality of Jesus. In order to bring it down to the level of other theophoric names it has to be reduced by paraphrase (though this is not impossible) to, e.g., 'God is by our side to help'. Mt (for his Aramaic-speaking readers) or his translator b (for Greeks) interprets the Hebrew term. 24-25. Though the nissū' in took place very soon, perhaps on the following day, this marriage was not consummated. Mt makes this statement of the period which directly concerns him, his purpose being to safeguard the virginal nature of the conception and birth of Jesus. Of the period following the birth he says nothing. His sentence would be best paraphrased: She brought forth a son without having relations with Joseph. The Semitic turn of phrase (DV 'till') while denying the action for the period preceding the verb 'brought forth' implies nothing for the period which follows it; cf. Gen 8:7; 1 Tim 4:13, etc. 'These words cannot be taken to imply that it (the virginity of Mary) was not afterwards preserved', *Green, 106. For the word 'firstborn', unauthentic here, cf. Lk 2:7 note.
- c II 1-12 The Magi—1. Mt's first indications of time and place are given incidentally as if already known to readers, but recalled with a view to the subsequent story. The child was born during the reign of Herod the Great, 37-4 B.C., at Bethlehem of Judaea (scene of David's birth and anointing, 1 Kg 16:13; 17:23), 6 m. S. of the capital. The Magi (DV 'wise men') were originally a Median priestly tribe of clairvoyants who retained their functions under their Persian conquerors. The term later became general, Dan 1:10; Ac 8:9; 13:8, for astrologers, sorcerers, etc. of all nationalities. We may translate 'sages', since Mt clearly does not intend a derogatory sense. Their homeland ('the East') is most probably the district just beyond Jordan and the Dead Sea, i.e. Nabataean Arabia which at that time reached as far north as Damascus. (For this use of 'the East' cf. the early Palestinian writers: Justin, Origen, Epiphanius.) Here Jews and Arabs speaking similar dialects formed a mixed population. The nature of their gifts confirms their Arabian origin: Arabia was renowned for its gold, 1 Kg 9:28, incense, Jer 6:20, and myrrh, Pliny, Hist. Nat., 12, 30-5. The time of the Magi's visit is to be put after the Purification, Lk 2:33-38, which took place forty days after our Lord's birth, since Joseph plainly would not have taken his charges to the capital after the warning of 13 (see note). It was probably not more than a year after the nativity d (16 note). 2. The appearance of a new and brilliant star in the eastern sky (ἀνατολή in the sing. as in g, not plur. as i) sends the Magi in a westerly direction to the Jewish capital. Evidently they were aware of the high pitch of Messianic expectation among their Jewish neighbours (witness the many pseudo-Messiahs after Herod's death). Possibly also (though Mt is silent) the Magi received a special revelation. The 'star' (ἀστὴρ) cannot mean a group or conjunction of planets (ἀστρον); this excludes Kepler's conjunction in 7 B.C. of Saturn, Jupiter, Mars. Halley's comet, 12 B.C., is apparently excluded by its date. The comet-hypothesis in general (Origen, Contra Celsum, 1, 58, cf. Patrizi, De Evangeliiis, 3, 309-54) is difficult to reconcile with the description of the star's behaviour in 9 unless (with Lagrange) we grant that Mt intends no more than a popularized account of an extraordinary but natural phenomenon. For the majority of Catholic exegetes the star is a special creation as, indeed, the text most naturally suggests. 3. The common, general stir (DV 'trouble') no doubt takes the form of anxiety in Herod, of excitement in the populace. 4. The Sanhedrin, the supreme Jewish advisory body of 71 members, was composed of three groups in approximately equal force: the chief priests, i.e. the high-priest in office, the deposed high-priests and the heads of the twenty-four priestly classes; the 'scribes' ('doctors of the Law'), Pharisee in persuasion, specialists in the Mosaic Code and instructors of the people; the 'ancients' or prominent laymen. Since these last are not mentioned here, it is probably not a formal meeting of the Sanhedrin, rarely consulted by Herod and unnecessary to his present purpose. Herod's question does not imply his faith in the prophets, but his appreciation of the dangers of the popular belief. Any pretender, especially with an appearance of prophetic backing, was seen as a peril by Herod, who did not over-estimate his own popularity. 5. The answer to the question may not have come as promptly as appears from the brief account of Mt. The birthplace of the Messias was the subject of diverse opinions (cf. Jn 7:27, 42) among the people and presumably among their teachers. In Jewish written tradition there is no evidence of the Bethlehem birthplace before the 3rd cent. A.D. (Lagrange, Le Messianisme, 222). The prophecy (Mic 5:1, 3; cf. § 535f-g) was doubtless quoted verbatim by the scribes. Mt is content with substantial fidelity; moreover he adapts the text to the circumstances. For him Bethlehem is no longer 'insignificant among the clans of Judah' because the Messias has been born there; when Micheas wrote, the greatness was still to come. 7-8. Herod betrays a superstitious anxiety though he is careful to make his further inquiries in private—there is excitement enough already. 3. He attaches importance to the time of the star's appearance, evidently presuming that it coincides (if it has any significance at all) with the time of the birth. His plans are already made, but his assumed appearance of leisure, 8, ultimately defeats its own end. 9-10. The star reappears (cf. 'and behold')—it had evidently not led the Magi to Jerusalem. It stands now in the southern sky in the direction of Bethlehem. Mt's text, literally interpreted, gives the impression of a light visibly advancing southwards (unless we translate, with Patrizi, 'had gone before them'). This impression is heightened by the apparent implication that it was the star which showed the actual dwelling (though read 'over the place' KNT, rather than 'over the spot' WV). If this is correct, the 'star' is a luminous body in the lower atmosphere. 11. The Magi enter the dwelling (οἰκία). This is either a new abode or possibly still the cave-stable (cf. the 2nd cent. tradition recorded by Justin, Contra Tryphonem, 78, 5), not an unusual home for Orientals. Joseph though he may have been present is not mentioned; with this delicate touch, Mt recalls the virginal conception and Mary's incomparable closeness to the child. Note the similar indications of 2:13 f. The verb 'adored' (προσκυνέω), frequent in Mt, does not necessarily imply divine honours; yet the emphasis of the expression 'falling down they adored' is suggestive, and the offering of incense, usually reserved to the divinity even among the pagans, strengthens the suggestion, Prat, I, 105 f. The gifts are probably products of the Magi's native land (cf. Gen 43:11)—indispensable for visits to a king. The g II 13-15 Flight into Egypt—13. The circumstances (delay would have been fatal) and the terms ('behold' following the aorist participle and preceding the historic present: 'appeareth'—cf. the same construction in 2:91) suggest that the flight took place very soon after the Magi's departure, probably the same night. Five or six days' travelling would take the holy family to the frontier of Egypt, now an Imperial Prefecture with a Jewish population of about one million concentrated especially in Alexandria and Heliopolis. As a refuge from oppression at home Egypt was convenient and traditional, 3 Kg 11:40; 4 Kg 25:26. 14. Mt's narrative, not being an edifying fable, preserves a sober silence (unlike the apocryphal gospels) on the details of the journey. There is no ancient, constant tradition relating to their new home. 15. Mt implicitly anticipates the return the better to space his OT quotations, 15, 18, 23. It might be noted here that, as in 18, rather than 'the incident being made to fit the quotation' (*A. J. Grieve, Peake's Commentary on the Bible) it would be less false to say that the quotation, Os 11:1, is made to fit the incident. The original text (not LXX which reads 'his [Jacob's] children'—unsuitable to Mt's purpose) refers in the strictly literal sense to the end of the Egyptian exile for Israel (God's 'son', cf. Ex 4:22 f.). The text is not a formal prophecy since the tense of the verb, faithfully preserved by Mt, is past. Mt, therefore, introduces the original situation merely as a providential rehearsal of the present event, thus calling our attention to a fuller sense of 'son' than Osee could have imagined.

682a II 16-18 Massacre of the Innocents—16. The sacrifice of a few children to the safety of his throne meant nothing to Herod (for a summary of his appalling record, see Schürer, 2, 1, 401-16); his own sons had suffered in the same cause. Bethlehem and district (the term excludes neighbouring villages, cf. RB 8 [1899] 422; 9 [1900] 435) had a population of about 1,000 (now over 7,000) which, allowing for the high infant-mortality rate, would bring the number of children of two years and under to about 20. The age of the victims indicates that the star had appeared not more than two years before—probably about one year, Herod callously leaving a safety-margin on either side.

b 14-18. The text, Jer 31:15, quoted here ad sensum, poetically presents Rachel (mother of Benjamin and of Joseph, the father of Ephraim) lamenting the fate of her children on their way into exile. She mourns from her tomb near Rama in Benjamin, 1 Kg 10:2 f. Rama lies 5 m. N. of Jerusalem and was the mustering place for the exiles on their way to Babylon, Jer 40:1. For Mt the circumstances are similar—the maternal lament of Rachel is echoed now in Bethlehem. Nevertheless, he does not allege a literal fulfilment of prophecy, otherwise he would have omitted 'in Rama'. The quotation receives added point from another tradition (represented by what is probably an ancient but incorrect gloss in Gen 35:19) which places Rachel's tomb near Bethlehem; cf. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine (Paris 1938) 425 f.

c II 19-23 From Egypt to Nazareth—19. Herod died shortly before the Pasch (April 12 in that year) of 4 B.C. For his last days cf. Schürer I, 1, 462-7. Archelaus (the elder of his sons by Malthace) was assigned Judaea and Samaria and named king in Herod's will, being saluted as such on his father's death, Jos., Ant. 17, 8, 2. He had to wait perhaps six months for the confirmation of Augustus (U. Holzmeister, Chronologia Vitae Christi, Rome 1933, 49) who granted him the title of ethnarch 682c only. The length of the Egyptian sojourn during the period between the Magi's visit and the accession of Archelaus was probably at least six months because at the time of the Magi's visit there is as yet no sign (cf. 2:8) of Herod's fatal illness contracted probably in Sept. of 5 B.C. (Holzmeister, op. cit., 25). That the sojourn was not prolonged after Herod's death seems clear from 19 (cf. 2:13) and perhaps accounts for the use of 'reigned' (22: βασιλεύει) which possibly suggests that Archelaus's title of 'king' had not yet been formally reduced to that of 'ethnarch'. 20. The word 'they' (though possibly a plural of generalization, Joüon) is perhaps best explained as a deliberate reference to the similar situation of Moses in Ex 4:19 f. 21-22. Joseph evidently intended to return to Bethlehem, if not to settle there at least to order his affairs. He was doubtless on the coast-road (Egypt-Gaza-Azotus) when he heard of the accession of Archelaus who had a bad reputation, not undeserved (Schürer, I, 2, 40). Judaea was still no place for a Messianic claimant and Joseph proceeded to his old home in Galilee. This was Nazareth, Lk 2:4, lying in the hills on the northern fringe of the plain of Esdraelon, c. 20 m. W. of Tiberias. The insignificant village, mentioned neither in Josephus nor Talmud, is the Nazra (not Nazra) of the Syriac versions. (For a similar Gk transcription of the sibilant cf. the Zogora of LXX with the Heb. Sō'ar in Gen 13:10). The place was known to Julius Africanus (c. A.D. 160-c. A.D. 240). Nazareth was to be the scene of our Lord's childhood and youth. 23. The term 'Nazarene' (Ναζωραῖος) d might be more exactly transcribed 'Nazoree'. Its termination thus suggests a member of a sect (cf. Pharisee, Sadducee) rather than an indication of origin; cf. Magdalene, i.e. of Magdala. It is probable that the term 'Nazoree' was first applied to the disciples after our Lord's death, Ac 24:25, with a measure of contempt for the provincial origin (cf. Jn 1:46) of the founder of the 'sect'. When the word became common its hostile sense would diminish (cf. 'Quaker') and it might well have become synonymous with the strictly geographical term 'Nazarene' originally used of Jesus himself (Prat, I, 110)—hence its use throughout Mt, Ac, Jn (Mk uses 'Nazarene'). Nevertheless, it was always possible to recall the original, contemptuous flavour of the expression, and it is probable that this is Mt's intention here (Lagrange). If this is so, he wishes to say that the obscurity of his Master's home, though now a subject of derision, should not be unexpected to those who knew the prophets. These, rightly read, had spoken of a Messias humanly inglorious, Is 53, Ps 21. It is perhaps less probable that the term 'Nazoree' contains a verbal reference to the 'sapling' (nešer; DV 'flower') from the Davidic root, Is 11:1. This would make the 'prophecy' little more than a punning coincidence and would scarcely justify Mt's plural 'prophets'.

B. III 1-IV 11 The Messianic Prelude.

III 1-12 Herald of the Messias (Mk 1:2-8; Lk 3:1-18) e
—1-6. 'In those days' (Mt's vague formula is given precision in Lk 3:1) an ascetic who achieved fame and respect among his compatriots (Jos., Ant. 18, 5, 2; 21, 2, 6) inaugurated his penitential message in the mountainous, arid district east of the Jerusalem-Hebron road. He demanded a change of heart (μετανοεῖν) as the necessary disposition for receiving an imminent divine gift—'the kingdom of the heavens' ('of God' throughout Mk & Lk, but Mt's form is probably the Baptist's and our Lord's; cf. Lagrange 47). This realm and rule of God is the goal of Messianic prophecy (cf. § 678d). John preached penance preparatory to the kingdom because he was the divinely appointed herald to the king. He personified the disembodied voice, Is 40:3, that heralded the return from pagan Babylon and the establishment of the new religious era of Judaism, itself a foretaste of, and preparation for, the new era declared by John. 4. The 682e garb suggests the prophet. John's outer garment is woven of camel-hair; cf. Zach 13:4. He wears a loin-cloth (possibly 'girdle', RSR 23 [1933] 589-98) of skin; cf. Elias, 4 Kg 1:8. His food is of the simplest: the easily caught locust (a winged insect some two inches long, eaten still by Bedouin) and the insipid tree-gum (perhaps of the tamarisk, common on the Jordan banks). He baptizes in the Jordan near Jericho, of easy access from the capital. It was his impressive proclamation of the kingdom that drew the crowds, Jos., Ant. 18, 5, 2. His baptism was not the Jewish ceremonial bath removing Gentile defilement, a rite too narrow for John's horizon (cf. 9); nor had it the ipso facto efficacy of Christ's sacramental baptism. It held a place between the two, characteristic of its period which was one of transition from 'ceremonial washings' to the 'better times' of inner, sacramental, re-birth; cf. Heb 9:10. By accepting it the Jews acknowledged, in formal ritual fashion, their conviction that the kingdom was at hand and their willingness to admit and (implicitly) to remedy past guilt. Thus they became subjects of the era of preparation announced by John and this act of willing submission would earn God's grace. 7-10. Mt, having given, 2, the two themes of John's preaching, now proceeds to expand them in the Baptist's own words. The first theme, penance, is urged against the Pharisees and Sadducees. Neither of these two parties could afford to ignore the popular religious movement. The Pharisees (i.e. Separatists—from the common herd by reason of their legalistic punctilio) stood for the Law and for the traditions that had accrued to it. They held no official religious or political position in the Jewish State; as professional and orthodox 'holy men' their influence with the people was enormous. The Sadducees (i.e. 'sons of Sadoq', representative of the priestly line; cf. 3 Kg 2:35; 1 Par 6:8-15; Esd. 3:2, Ez 40:46) were the rationalists of the day, Mt 22:23, and, as such, unpopular. Nevertheless, almost all members of the priestly families, including the high-priest himself, were Sadducees. Both parties were concerned in the Jewish governing body, the Sanhedrin (more powerful now than under Herod). The high-priests were members of that assembly and the Pharisees exercised a strong influence in it through the scribes (see on 2:4). The Pharisees though loathing the occupying Power prudently repressed their nationalism; the more cynical Sadducees were indifferent to any regime provided it left them in office. The Pharisees were, perhaps, more concerned with the religious aspect of the Baptist's movement but, like the Sadducees, they would fear its taking a political turn disastrous alike to the State and to their own interests. h They come, therefore, as spies not as devotees and John knows it. He ironically asks: Who can have taught the Teachers? They have clearly come with subtle and venomous intent ('vipers', cf. Ps 13:3). They cannot escape the coming wrath of the Messianic judgement without a profound change of heart with its appropriate change of life ('fruit corresponding to repentance', Joüon). Provoked, evidently, by their pompous attitude the Baptist interjects: 'Bear not the appearance of those inwardly saying "We are the sons of Abraham!"' They are priding themselves on a divine gift in receiving which they were as passive as the stones on the river bank. He then, 10, resumes the invitation of 8. The axe of the Messianic judgement already threatens the fruitless trees but there is still a short time for repentance. The 'fire' that awaits the felled trees is not explicitly the fire of hell but a metaphor indicating in general the punishment reserved for those who do not take the present opportunity. 11-12. John now turns to address the crowd (cf. Lk 3:15 f.) who conjecture his Messiahship to assure them that he and his baptism will not bear comparison with the real Messiah and the baptism to come. John is less than a slave, unworthy to bear his shoes. His baptism is only an expression of, and stimulus to, repentance; the baptism of the coming Messiah will be a steeping in the Holy Spirit, a profoundly purifying fire (cf. the Messianic purification of Mal 3:2 f.), not merely touching the surface like water. 'And fire', (being without the preposition, is explanatory of 'Holy Spirit'). John thus foretells the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, Ac 2:3, of which the sacrament of Baptism is one means. This purifying action on the individual soul produces a distinction between those who accept and those who refuse it. Hence the Messianic action is like a winnowing-fan (or fork): the grain is thrown into the air and the wind carries off the light chaff. The perspective is final: those not purified by the fire of the Spirit will be consumed by the fire of the wrath of God, Is 66:24.

III 12-17 Baptism of the Messiah Son of God (Mk 683a 1:9-11; Lk 3:21 f.)—Our Lord comes from Nazareth, 2:23, to associate himself by baptism with all who thus expressed their readiness for the Messianic era. As his kinsman, Lk 1:36, John very probably knew him personally. He is evidently aware of the sanctity of Jesus and (as Mt suggests, cp. 11, 14) of his Messiahship. Of this last, however, John was not formally assured until after the Baptism, Jn 1:33. The strange inversion of roles shocks John (Mt only), but our Lord assures him that for this occasion (ἀπρί) it must be accepted since it is the divine will ('Justice': δικαιοσύνη, i.e. observance of the due order established by God). 'Why had the institutor of the new Baptism to receive the old. . . ? This is precisely the question that Mt answers and the one that lies at the root of his gospel. It is not by a coincidence that this same evangelist has here, 15, used "fulfil" as in 2:15, 17, 23; 5:17. Jesus did not come as a revolutionary innovator, he came to perfect the old order. Just as he submitted himself to the Law, so he accepted the conditions preparatory to the Messianic age—the principal condition appearing as a baptism of repentance. It was God's design for a period of transition', Lagrange. 16-17. Where others had delayed in order to confess their sins, 6, the innocent Christ does not, but, being baptized, 'forthwith' leaves the water. The heavens (the clouds?) were torn apart, Mk 1:10, like a veil before him to give passage to the descending and approaching Spirit. The shape of a dove is fitting for the brooding and creative Spirit (Gen 1:2 note). Its appearance at this decisive moment in conjunction with the voice of the Father and the person of the Son would symbolize, for a Christian writer familiar with Baptism and its formula, the second creation—the re-birth through water and the Holy Ghost. Whether the dove was seen and the voice heard by the bystanders is not clear, but the Baptist's function as herald of the Messiah and his own words, Jn 1:32-34, suggest at least that it was John alone who saw the full significance of both. The words of the Voice, cf. Is 42:1 but note the significant substitution of 'Son' for 'Servant', do not imply that the divine sonship of our Lord dates from the Baptism. Had this been Mt's intention he would aptly have completed his echo of Ps 2:7 ('Thou art my son') with its following words: 'This day I have begotten thee'. It is the voice of the Father testifying to John (and the bystanders?) and at the same time encouraging his incarnate Son with a new expression of his love. The descent of the Spirit is the Son's investiture for his heroic office; cf. Is 42:1; 61:1; Lk 4:18.

IV 1-11 The Messiah challenged: the Temptations e (Mk 1:12-13; Lk 4:1-13)—1-2. The Spirit who had appeared at the Baptism now leads Jesus to his encounter with the personal power of evil, naturally hostile to the Messianic plan. The single combat is to be engaged on the devil's own ground—the desert; cf. 12:43. According to a tradition dating back to the 5th cent. this is the lonely, barren, mountainous district between Jerusalem and Jericho. 3-4. First Temptation. Our Lord's unbroken fast of forty days (model of our Lenten fast, and cf. Moses in Ex 34:28; Elias in 3 Kg 19:8) provides the occasion for the first temptation. The devil has evidently heard the Voice, 3:17, because he echoes its phrase: Son of God. His words 'If thou be the Son of God', though perhaps only half-understood, are only an affectation of doubt. They seek to goad our Lord to a self-assertive and unnecessary (11) display of power. The word 'tempt' (lit. 'to put to the test') is therefore here to be understood in its usual sense of stimulating to evil rather than in the possible sense of seeking information, 22:35 note. Our Lord, who later was to create bread for the multitudes, refuses to work such a miracle in his own interest and declines to demonstrate his powers to the devil. He is content with a quotation from Holy Writ, Deut 8:3, to show his perfect detachment from everything but God's will. The text in its original setting declares that the manna had shown that God could dispense with the ordinary means of sustenance when necessary; its basic lesson is calm trust in God. Our Lord refuses to anticipate God's providence and later, 11, his trust is amply vindicated. In the circumstances, his retort, unlike the dictum of Jn 4:34, refers rather to physical life than to the life of the spirit. 5-7. Second Temptation. The devil now takes our Lord to Jerusalem, c 20 m. from the traditional site of the first and third temptations. He causes him to stand (ἐστήσε, cf. 18:2) on a projection of the temple roof (περὶ ῥύγιον)—probably on the SE. corner of the outer temple about 300 feet above the valley of the Kedron. Jesus has already used a Scriptural text to express his confidence in God; the devil adroitly joins issue on this very point. But the situation ('cast thyself down') would turn the confidence of the psalm quoted, 90:11, into presumption. Our Lord counters with a quotation (Deut 6:16 referring to the incident of Ex 17:7) which supposes that the Son will not thus seek to wrench a miracle from the Father. Miracles must not be the condition of our trust in God: such an attitude is 'tempting' God, i.e. 'putting him to the test'. 8-11. Third Temptation. Satan stakes all. The traditional scene is Djebel Qarantal, a few miles NW. of Jericho. This mountain, walling-in the plain of Jericho, looks eastwards across Jordan to the hills of Moab. The devil now appeals to earthly ambition and his boast of political power (cf. 2 Cor 4:4) does not today appear empty. 10. But this is the only power he can offer and our Lord refuses it. His kingdom is not of this world. He names the devil for what he is—Satan. (In Heb. satan—rendered διάβολος in Gk—means an enemy, 1 Kg 29:4, or legal accuser, Ps 108:6, and in post-exilic literature the arch-enemy of man, 1 Par 21:1, and his accuser before God, Job 1:6-2:7.) Jesus quotes the great principle of Hebrew monotheism, Deut 6:13, anticipating his own declaration that it is impossible to serve two masters, Mt 6:24. Satan leaves him 'for a time', Lk, to return in other guise, Mt 16:22 f., Lk 22:3, 53. The 'ministry' of the angels appears in Mk 1:13 ('were ministering', WV) to extend over the forty days' fast. It is evidently not a ministering of food. In Mt also it is possible that the service (διακονεῖν) is to be taken in the more general sense, 25:44, of a support which rendered food unnecessary.

f Notes on the Temptations. (a) Messianic Significance.—There are three occasions of temptation, but the underlying suggestion is one: to take the crown without the cross. But since this is directly opposed to the divine plan (cf. Is 53:2-12; Zach 12:10 ff.) the crown can only be an earthly one. The devil, fully aware of the Messianic atmosphere, seeks to make the approaching attack on his kingdom harmless. Experience had taught him all he had to lose when men took the hard way and the prophets had pointed this way to the establishment of the Messianic kingdom. It was for him to urge the easy and deceptive way. There is a crescendo in his temptations. He suggests first the reasonable satisfaction of bodily needs (certainly not gluttony after forty days' fast) by means of a miracle before one witness only. The second is an invitation to a more spectacular display of power. The choice of the distant temple for the scene of the second temptation evidently has point: it suggests the achievement of popular Messianic acclaim by means of a public prodigy worked in the sacred precincts. In each case our Lord is called upon for an unwarranted provocation of God's power. The instinct of the tempter is sound: he probes for the defects which normally accompany human qualities, assuming that where he finds great trust in God he will find presumption. Having failed, in the first two temptations, to reveal presumption he begins to suspect the strength of the quality of which it is usually the defect. The third temptation, therefore, attacks the quality of trust. It invites to total apostasy from God and reliance upon Satan himself. (b) Mode of the Temptations. It seems clear that the evangelists intend to describe temptations with the three distinct, objective actions mentioned. They do not convey the impression of a general 'psychological struggle from which Christ emerged with a clearer and higher idea of his Messianic mission'. But how did Satan communicate his suggestions? The texts hint (but do not formally state) that Satan was visible—probably in human form (cf. παραλαμβάνω, i.e. to take as companion, 4:5, 8). The vision of 'all the kingdoms of the earth' appears to be presented as a miracle worked upon the imagination, Lk 4:5. On the other hand, the journey to the temple seems more than visionary (though see Lebreton in DBV(S) 4 991). There is, however, no suggestion of levitation in Satan's action. The verb παραλαμβάνω, like its Aramaic equivalent d'bar, in no way implies taking hold of another physically, by the hand for instance (Joüon). (c) Nature and further Purpose of the Temptations. By reason of the hypostatic union our Lord was incapable of sin nor, being without original sin, could he be tempted from within by concupiscence (i.e. by the inordinate desire consequent upon original sin). He could be tempted, therefore, not by the lower nature itself, but only by the exterior suggestion of the Enemy; cf. ST 3, 41, 1, ad 3. The devil's proposition could be presented to our Lord's senses or imagination and so to his judgement. But, in virtue of the hypostatic union, the judgement being affected by no intrinsic unbalance would unerringly perceive, and the will inflexibly reject, the inordinate suggestion. In allowing even this satanic approach our Lord warns us that the holiest may be tempted but leaves us a model of firmness in dealing with Satan. Lastly, he draws as near to our condition as his sinlessness would permit so that, through human experience, he could 'sympathize' with us, Heb 4:15; cf. ST 3, 41, 1 corp.

C. IV 12-XIII 58 The Messianic Light shines on Galilee. 684a
IV 12-25 Introductory.

IV 12-17 Capharnaum and Opening of the Ministry (Mk 1:14-15; Lk 4:14-15)—Mt briefly introduces us to the Public Ministry with a glance at its first scene, 4:12-17, its first collaborators, 4:18-22, its first acts and their initial effect, 4:23-25. The Temptations had followed immediately upon the Baptism, but some months now elapse (for the events of this interval, cf. Jn 1:19-3:36) at the end of which Jesus withdrew from Judaea to Galilee. The immediate occasion of this withdrawal was the arrest of the Baptist (cf. 14:3-12); the silenced herald is succeeded by his Master and the work of the kingdom goes on. 13. By way of Samaria, Jn 4:3 ff., and Cana, Jn 4:46 ff., our Lord went back home to secluded Nazareth; cf. Lk 4:16 ff. He soon left there to make his headquarters in Capharnaum (Tell Hum on the north-west shore of the 'sea' of Galilee) a busy little market-town on the Damascus-Egypt highway and situated in the old tribal district of Nephthali which bordered on that of Zabulon; both districts lie north and west of the Lake. 14-16. Mt solemnly announces the advent of the Messianic age. He calls attention to the Messianic (Emmanuel) section of Isaiah from which he has already quoted, 1:22 f. The text, Is 8:23-9:1, contrasts the Assyrian devastation of northern Palestine, in 734 B.C., with the future Messianic deliverance. 'The way of the Sea' (ὁδὸν θαλάσσης: better 'on the sea-road' KNT) probably describes, in the original text, the district of Zabulon and Nephthali through which the road (the 'Via 684b Maris' of the Crusaders) passes from Damascus to the Mediterranean Sea at Acre. For Mt, however, thinking of Capharnaum-on-Sea (καπαθαλασσία, 13), the 'searoad' is apparently that which runs along the west coast of the 'sea' of Galilee. The district called 'Beyond-Jordan' is doubtless the province of Gilead on the east side of Jordan facing Zabulon and Nephthali; this too was overrun by the Assyrians. 'Galilee of the Gentiles' (the Isaian g'ill, i.e. 'district' of the Gentiles had become a proper name) probably refers to a non-Jewish district of western Galilee. These precisions are of Isaiahs rather than of Mt who quotes the prophecy as a whole, content to see it broadly verified in the fact that our Lord's ministry opens formally in Galilee.

17. The Messianic age (our Lord uses the same words as the Baptist in 3:2) has passed from prophecy to fulfilment. It is 'at hand'—a phrase probably equivalent in itself (as certainly in the context, cf. Mk 1:15 'the time is accomplished') to 'is here'.

c 18-22 Call of the First Four Disciples (Mk 1:16-20; Lk 5:1-11)—Mt here (though cf. 8:14-17) passes over the first miracles, Mk 1:23-34, being content with a general reference, 23 f. But he evidently regards the call of the Four (introduced parenthetically) as a necessary part of his summary introduction to the Galilean ministry. The ready obedience of the Four is more easily explained if we bear in mind their previous familiarity with Jesus, Jn 1:35 ff. For the detail, cf. Mk 1:16-20 notes.

d 23-25 Epitome of our Lord's Missionary Activity (Mk 1:39; 3:8-10; Lk 4:44; 6:17-19)—The verses are a summing-up, and in part an anticipation, of our Lord's missionary activity before the evangelist proceeds to present the great charter of the new kingdom, 5:1-7:29, and the power of its founder, 8:1-9:34. 23, repeated almost exactly in 9:35, appears to prelude the personal work of Jesus as 9:35 introduces the mission of the apostles (Lagrange). His activity, doctrinal and miraculous, spreads from Capharnaum throughout Galilee and his reputation as a wonder-worker beyond the borders of Israel ('Syria'—probably the non-Jewish district to the south of Hermon). The preaching is the good news ('gospel', εὐαγγέλιον) of the kingdom. The miracles were of all kinds: 'too numerous and too varied to be explained by faith-healing. It is incredible that all the sick laid in the streets were neurotic patients', *Plummer. Attempts to ascribe the miracle-narratives to the pious inventive genius of the later Christian community are not only gratuitous, but overlook the fact that the miracle-narratives formed part of the very earliest Christian teaching, e.g. Ac 10:38. 25. By way of immediate introduction to the Sermon Mt suggests the audience. Crowds follow our Lord; they come not only from Galilee, but from the Ten Towns ('Decapolis'). This last was a confederation of Greek-speaking cities, all east of Jordan facing Galilee except Scythopolis; cf. Schürer, 2, 1, 94-6. They come also from Judaea, even from its capital, and from the district (Peraea) which faces it across Jordan.

685a V 1-VII 29 Sermon on the Mount.

Structure and Content—The discourse, four times as long in Mt as in Lk, appears to have been expanded by the evangelist according to a fairly recognizable plan. Internal criticism and comparison with Lk's gospel indicate Mt's deliberate insertion of some passages of our Lord's discourses spoken on other occasions. This is in accord with the evangelist's habit of synthesis (cf. Introduction, §678c). But Mt has not been haphazard; though the connexion in some places be loose, the discourse as it stands is a connected whole and Mt proposes it as such. According to Lagrange the imported passages are as follows: 5:13-16 (Lk 14:34 f.; 11:3); 5:18 (Lk 16:17); 5:25-26 (Lk 12:57-59); 6:7-15 (Lk 11:2-4); 6:19-34 (Lk 12:33 f.; 11:34-36; 16:13; 12:22-32); 7:7-11 (Lk 11:9-13); 7:22-23 (Lk 13:26 f.). The Sermon, pronounced in substance in the first few months of the Galilean ministry, sounds the keynote of the new Age which our Lord has come to introduce. The new spirit (and with this our Lord is chiefly concerned) is to be gentle, 5:3-12, generous, 5:21-24, 38-47, thorough, 5:27-30, simple, 5:33-37, and above all sincere, 6:1-6, 16-18. It must not be arrogantly censorious, 7:1-5, but rather mistrustful of self, 7:13-14, yet sober, prudent, discriminating, 7:15-20, and, finally, energetic, 7:21-27. In short, the spirit of one always consciously imitating his perfect and watchful Father, 5:48. Since this fatherhood of God pervades the discourse, 6:4, 9, 15, 18, 26, 32; 7:11, implicit appeal is made throughout to filial love. Love is to be the mainspring of the new era—and love can ask more than fear can command. God, through his prophets demanded less of a people that had to be mastered by awe; when the time was ripe he, through his Son, asked more of those who were made free by love; cf. Augustine, PL 34, 1231. The new spirit is thus at variance with the Pharisaic ideal by reason of the emphasis laid upon the spirit at the expense of the letter of the Mosaic Code and of the casuistry that had gathered about it. The Law does not pass, on the contrary its moral commands remain, but the fullness of time demands a new perspective. The Law, of its nature, could not go deep enough into the heart of man; its Pharisaic interpretations had spread too widely over his external actions. Hitherto there has been a wrong emphasis and an imperfect law. On our Lord's attitude to the Law cf. the interesting study of *P. Lestrangant, Essai sur l'Unité de la Révélation Biblique (Paris 1942) 44-62.

Analysis. (1) The New Spirit: Basic Qualities and Rewards, 5:3-12—The selfless outlook, having little to attract externally, must first be presented with prospect of heavenly reward (Beatitudes). 13-16 are a parenthetical warning to the preachers of the new spirit. (2) The New Spirit and the Old Law: perfecting, not opposing, 5:17-48. (i) The principle laid down, 5:17-20. (ii) The principle explained by examples, 5:21-48. (a) Murder and 'internal' murder (anger), 5:21-26. (b) Adultery and 'internal' adultery (impure thoughts etc.), 5:27 f. (c) Divorce once restricted now abrogated, 5:31-32. (d) Oaths once regulated now declared unnecessary, 5:33-37. (e) Strict justice gives way to mercy, 5:38-42. (f) Limited charity to break its old bounds, 5:43-47. (3) The New Spirit and Hypocrisy, 6:1-6, 16-18. (i) Example taken from almsgiving, 6:2-4. (ii) From prayer, 6:5-6; followed, 6:7-15, by a development on the subject of prayer. (iii) From fasting, 6:16-18. (4) Interlude on the Demands of the New Spirit, 6:19-34. These verses occupy a central place in Mt's arrangement. They describe the outlook that the new spirit demands—the single heart and the will confidently surrendered to the Father. (5) The New Spirit in Action, 7:1-27. (i) Its social manifestation (charity, prudence), 7:1-6, 12. (ii) Its difficulties and unpopularity, 7:13-14. (iii) Its opponents, 7:15-20. (iv) Its true possessors, 7:21-23. (v) Reward of action; penalty of lethargy, 7:24-27. Note: 7:7-11, absent from Lk's sermon, on the efficacy of prayer, have no clear connexion with the context.

V 1-12 Introduction and Beatitudes—1-2. 'The mountain' which served as our Lord's pulpit was evidently a hill near Capharnaum (cf. 4:13; 8:1, 5) dominating the plain of Genesar. It is perhaps near et-Tabgha, about half an hour's walk from Capharnaum (DBS 1, 947-50). Among the audience were many besides his more regular followers, 7:28. 3-12. The sermon opens with a series of magisterial pronouncements which, in rhythmic prose, describe and approve the new spirit that our Lord is to preach. The form chosen ('Blessed', Latin: 'Beati'; hence 'Beatitudes') is biblical; Ps 1:1; 111:1; Prov 3:13 etc. The qualities mentioned are so clearly the product of one, consistent, spiritual outlook ('many facets of one diamond') that the shades of difference are at times very faint. The number of Beatitudes is reckoned variously as 7 (by elimination of 4), 8 (retaining 4), 9 (reckoning all the 'Beati' formulae, even that of

685d 11), 10 (as a new 'Decalogue'). The last is the least probable and the choice probably lies between 7 (Lagrange) and 8 (Pirrot, Buz). 3. The 'poor in spirit' of Mt (i.e. lowly in their own estimation) renders the sense of Lk's 'poor' (probably the original form of the dictum) since 'poor' in biblical language indicates all in adversity (rich and poor) who humbly turn to God; cf. *Plummer 64. It is for such that the kingdom, even now awaiting them in heaven, is designed; cf. Is 61:1. 4. The term 'meek' (πραεῖς) in its OT background seems to imply much the same as 'poor' (πτωχοί) but lays more emphasis on manly resignation to adversity and less on the adversity itself. The reward in its original setting (Ps 36:11, almost verbatim) is of prosperity in the land of promise. In this context, however, 'the land' is a reward as spiritual as the kingdom of heaven, 3, or the vision of God, 8, and indeed the qualities our Lord demands (meekness etc.) are unlikely to win political success. 5. The third blessing (reckoned in the second place by many ancient manuscripts and modern authorities, cf. WV) is for those who have cause to lament (without complaint, as is clear). It is a challenge and an answer to the problem of suffering. The promised 'comfort', as the atmosphere of the promises shows, will far exceed the sorrow, Jn 16:20. 6. The eager desire for 'justice' will be more than satisfied. This 'justice' may be the state of the soul described in the Sermon ('justness' WV) or possibly the manifestation of divine justice when God is to reward the poor, the meek, the afflicted; cf. DBS 1, 935. 7. The 'merciful' (i.e. forgiving, sympathetic, etc. to others) will obtain God's pardon which, to meet man's needs, must be and is infinitely greater than man's; cf. 18:23-25. 8. From the heart come (in Heb. metaphor; cf. RB 31 [1922] 493-508) thought, plans, memory, affections; its 'cleanness' (cf. Ps 23:4) means, therefore, a freedom from blemished purpose. This purpose is, as the reward shows, the search for God. Nothing short of the direct vision of God will be its recompense, envisaged already in the OT, Ps 16(17) 15 (HT), more clearly in the New, 1 Cor 13:12; 1 Jn 3:12. 9. The 'peacemakers' are those who by patience and, if necessary, by judicious intervention spread their own inward peace about them. These shall be called (i.e. 'shall be', in Heb. idiom) children of God—made in the likeness of the God of peace, 1 Thess 5:23, whose Son by nature is 'the Lord of peace', 2 Thess 3:16. 10. Persecution endured for the sake of the religion of which our Lord is the founder and object (cf. Lk 6:22, 'for the Son of Man's sake') is pronounced a blessing (cf. Ac 5:41) because it establishes a claim to the kingdom of heaven. This last phrase (10b) echoes that of 3b; if this is the Semitic literary device known as 'inclusion' (the ending of a discourse as it began, cf. 15:2-20; 16:6-11; 18:10-14; 19:4-8; 19:13-15), it is probable that the Beatitudes finish here. 11-12. An expansion of the last beatitude with the warmth and appeal of personal address and the added consolation of suffering with God's chosen prophets. 13-16. dealing with the responsibilities arising from the world-importance of Christian discipleship (cf. Mk 4:21; 9:50; Lk 14:34-35; 8:16; 11:33) have no close connexion with the context. The world ('the earth') is henceforth dependent for its moral well-being on the preservative influence of the Christian disciple. If this 'salt' become insipid (as the impure salt of common Palestinian usage could), there is nothing in the world to restore its savour. It is so much rubbish to be cast out into the street (the oriental refuse-bin). Even the world as it passes spurns the disciple who has lost his fervour. The comparison changes to light, like salt a necessity of life. The disciples have the social obligation (not incompatible with personal humility, cf. 6:1, 5, 16) of lighting the way to the Father by their example for a world in darkness. If they shirk this responsibility they thwart their public purpose; they will be as useless as a lamp hidden behind the flour-bin ('bushel'; μόδιος actually means one peck in dry measure; here used for the jar that contains it). The comparison of the hill-town is surprising here and may be a separate saying of our Lord inserted in this place for convenience. The image recalls Mt 16:18.

V 17-48 New Spirit and Old Law.

V 17-20 The Principle—20. The solemnity of our Lord's opening pronouncements and his clear intention of inaugurating a new religious movement make it necessary for him to explain his position with regard to the Mosaic Law. He has not come to abrogate (καταλύνειν) but to bring it to perfection (πληροῦν), i.e. to reveal the full intention of the divine legislator (cf. 22:40 note). The sense of this 'fulfilling' will become apparent from the few samples he chooses, 21-48; the object of it is the total expression of God's will in the old order ('the Law and the Prophets'). Here, as the context shows, the emphasis is rather on the moral life in the new kingdom than on the fulfilment of prophecy in the person of its founder. 18. Far from dying (our Lord proceeds, in this parenthetical verse) the old moral order is to rise to a new life, infused with a new spirit. Not its tiniest letter (the letter yod = i, in the square alphabet of our Lord's time) nor 'flourish' (KNT) of a letter (narrowly distinguishing letters like kaph and beth) is to pass away. It is as durable as the heavens and the earth themselves (cf. Lk 16:17, εὐκοπώτερον). 19, pursuing the statement of 17 (cf. 1 'therefore') insists that this re-born Law will be enforced with no less rigour. The Christian disciple is perforce always a teacher by his example, 13-16: neglect even of the minutiae will be noticed and will do damage. The new order is to be distinguished by the perfection of its inward spirit, 21-48, but it will not dispense with external works. By its exacting standards the careless disciple will be accounted less than his more scrupulous brother. The 'kingdom' in this and the following verse would appear to be the new kingdom of Christ on earth in which the Law and the Prophets find their goal and their deepest sense. 20. Membership of this kingdom imperatively demands a sanctity more generous than that of the leading exponents of the Mosaic Law because its ideals are higher and its spirit more profound.

V 21-26 First Example of the New Spirit: Thou shalt not kill—21.

For the prohibition cf. Ex 20:13; Deut 5:17 and, for its sanction, Ex 21:12; Lev 24:17. The old Law, being a law, could control effectively only external acts. The new spirit reaches down to the innermost part of man and its sanctions are of the spiritual order. This double truth is expressed in Semitic fashion by our Lord in three parallel and synonymous sentences without crescendo, but with cumulative effect. For internal anger or a sharp, angry word man is to be accountable before the tribunal of God (ἐνοχος τῇ κρίσει . . . τῷ συνεδρίῳ) and thus liable to divine punishment (ἐνοχος εἰς τὴν γέεναν). The tribunals mentioned (DV 'the judgement' and 'the council', i.e. Sanhedrin—perhaps respectively local and central courts) are terms symbolic of God's judgement as the last sanction (hell-fire) shows and as the context demands. The Aramaic word 'Raca' (réqa or 'empty-head') means much the same as the 'fool' (μωρός) of the later part of the verse. The Aramaic Gēhinnām (DV 'hell'; γέεννα), i.e. 'Valley of Hinnom', a ravine touching Jerusalem on the south, was the ever smouldering rubbish-dump (cf. 2 Kg 23:10) of the city. In some pre-Christian Jewish writings it becomes the place of punishment for the wicked. Used symbolically it is opposed to eternal life by our Lord himself, 18:19. The shock of the phrase in our context is lessened if we remember that our Lord is simply saying in striking language that the smallest faults of enmity are matter for accusation before a divine tribunal in whose competence lies even the extreme spiritual penalty. Naturally the tribunal will judge of greater or less. Nevertheless our Lord seems to imply that even internal anger can be murderous and so of mortal guilt (cf. ST II, 2, 158, 3 ad 2). The virtue of charity, therefore, comes before all ceremonial pieties, even that of sacrifice ('gift').

685k 25-26. It is a matter of spiritual prudence, too, as our Lord parabolically explains (cf. Lk 12:58-59). We owe a debt of charity; the prudent debtor will attempt an amicable arrangement before the matter comes to court and so to imprisonment. The solemnity of our Lord's warning suggests the spiritual application of the parable.

686a V 27-30 Second Example: Thou shalt not commit Adultery (Mt 18:8 f.; Mk 9:43, 47)—The prohibition (Ex 20:14; Deut 5:15; cf. Lev 20:10; Deut 22:22) in the polygamous society of Moses' day attached to the wife but not to the husband (over whom none of the wives had exclusive rights)—unless, of course, he sinned with the wife of another. Hence the punishment of Lev 20:10; Deut 22:22 is appointed only for a wife and her accomplice. Our Lord, who is directly addressing men, again condemns the internal act even if unaccompanied by external effect (DV 'to lust', πρὸς τὸ ἐπιθυμῆσαι, i.e. 'to the point of lusting'). He is the first to point this out (the Rabbis quoted in this connexion, SB 1, 299, are post-Christian). The energetic language in which our Lord warns against the occasion of sin must not be taken literally, such language has its freedoms: the left eye, for instance, is no less a danger than the right. 'Right eye' and 'right hand' clearly mean all we hold most dear. If these are a trap (σκανδαλον) in the moral path they must be put aside.

b V 31-32 Third Example: 'Let him give her a bill of Divorce' (Lk 16:18; Mk 10:11 f., Mt 19:9)—Deut 24:1-4 mitigated the evils of divorce by demanding of the husband a formal renunciation of rights in the interest of the dismissed wife. Our Lord, attacking the matter radically, roundly denounces divorce itself as incompatible with the new spirit. The whole tone of the Sermon and the magisterial 'But I say to you' lead us to expect a fundamental reform. Clearly our Lord is not simply taking sides in a rabbinic dispute. Rather is he robbing those disputes of meaning. (See § 708b-d, 19:3-12).

c V 33-37 Fourth Example: 'Thou shalt not forswear thyself' (Mt only)—The Old Law, Ex 20:7; Deut 23:21; Num 30:3, forbade perjury and infidelity to solemn vows made to the Lord. This was good so far as it went, but such external vehemence should be unnecessary in the new regime of inward sincerity of mind and honesty of purpose. Henceforth, therefore, it will involve a disrespectful use of God's name amounting to a usurpation of what belongs to God. The disrespect is no less if the Name be casuistically avoided, as when the Pharisees swore by heaven and by the temple. They even sustained the validity of oaths made to the detriment of justice as when, e.g. a husband vowed to deprive his wife of conjugal rights. (This last practice was so common that it may account for the juxtaposition of Divorce and Oaths in the Sermon, Lagrange.) Man, therefore, has no right to pledge what is God's. He must not swear even by his own body, for over this, too, God has dominion, not man: the youth cannot make his dark hair grey, nor the old man his white hairs black. Our Lord asks for a simplicity of speech that reflects the equable spirit: 'Let your word "Yes" be "Yes"; your "No", "No".' (cf. Jas 5:12). Extravagant vehemence proceeds from a disordered state of human relations ('is of evil') and has no place in the new order. In this, it should be noted, our Lord is giving a general rule of Christian life; moreover, his clear-cut phrases must be interpreted with the finesse that all aphorisms demand. Thus, for example, it was no less clear to him than it is to us that some answers cannot be 'Yes' or 'No' without misleading. Thus, also, he is not attacking juridical procedure in which oaths are calmly and respectfully taken. Yet even here the necessity for such oaths issues from a defect which, though characteristic of human societies, should be absent from the kingdom whose charter our Lord defines.

d V 38-42 Fifth Example: 'An eye for an eye' (Lk 6:29 f.)—The Mosaic code (Lev 24:19 f.) sanctioned the existing practice of vendetta, but restrained it by the principle known in Roman Law as talio (cf. Lat. 'talis', Eng. 'retaliation'): the compensation was not to exceed the damage. This principle of personal vindication, effective in primitive conditions and the unpoliced State, had probably taken the shape of pecuniary compensation in gospel times. Our Lord, again speaking for the individual Christian soul and not for governments, subordinates strict justice to generous charity. Four little examples illustrate his point. Here again allowance must be made for the vigour of his language: he himself did not literally 'turn the other cheek', Jn 18:23, but his prayer, 'Father forgive them', Lk 23:34, shows what he means. The second picture, 40, is of the law-court where a man is sued for his undergarment—'Let him take thy cloak, too!' The third, 41, is of a man (or his beast) temporarily requisitioned for State service by way of errand or transport (ἀγγαρεύσει DV 'force', is technical in this sense). Let such a one overcome his natural resentment by doing more than he is forced to do. As for the borrower (the fourth picture, 42), our Lord recommends neither the worldly prudence of a Polonius nor (for the whole context would protest) the investments of a Shylock.

V 43-47 Sixth Example: 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thy enemy' (Lk 6:27 f.)—Only the first half of this sentence is found in the OT, Lev 19:18. Bearing in mind the sharp Semitic antithesis, the occasional Heb. use of the word 'hate', Gen 29:31; Mal 1:2 f., and the hint of 'permission', often contained in the future tense, we may thus render the second half of the sentence: 'but need not love thy enemy' (Joüon). The old Law, addressed primarily to a nation, secondarily to individuals, was perforce at war with pagan foreigners inasmuch as they were a menace to the purity of race and religion, Deut 23:6. Moreover, by the lex talionis, § 686d, it committed to individuals the punishment of enemies ('hate' in the juridical order). For the OT and the Rabbis, the 'neighbour' is the Israelite. For our Lord (cf. Lk 10:36) the word admits of no exception. 'Jesus was the first to teach mankind to regard everyone as a neighbour and to love him' (SB I, 354). Our Lord recommends not tolerance but positive beneficence: 'Love your enemies and pray for them that persecute you!' This shorter version of 44 is to be read with the best manuscripts; cf. WV. 45. In this we shall be in the likeness of God—demonstrably his children—because he (not 'who' DV), with his sun and rain, feeds the lands of friend and enemy alike. If we refuse this, in what are we superior to the despised publicans (9:9 note) or the pagans? If we salute only those of our clique, what generosity is this? (τί μερισμὸν ποιῶμεν). (For the Aramaic flavour of 43-48, cf. *Black, 137-9.) 48. By way of conclusion to his programme of the new perfection our Lord refuses to set bounds to the ideal. The children are asked to aim at the completeness of their spiritual capacity. When, in their measure, they achieve this they will be like their Father who possesses (though he eternally and of necessity) the fullness of his being.

VI 1-6 (7-15) 16-18 The New Spirit and Hypocrisy—f The essential inwardness of the new era does not exclude the practice of external works with their danger of ostentation. Our Lord, therefore, warns his followers: Do not perform your acts of piety with a view to admiration. This intention robs the act of its spiritual value. For illustration our Lord takes three practices: alms, prayer, fasting, characteristic of Jewish piety, Tob 12:8. Each illustration is constructed on the same clearly marked plan: the practice, its abuse, condemnation of the abuse, advice; 2-4; 5-6; 16-18. 7-15, a self-contained instruction on prayer, break the sequence of these illustrations and have apparently been drawn into this place by the mention of prayer in 5-6 (Buzy, *Klostermann, Lagrange). This hypothesis is confirmed by the fact that they are grouped about the 'Our Father' which is elsewhere in Lk, 11:1-4.

2-4. Almsgiving. The hypocrite (ὁμοκριτής, actor)

686f has many subtle ways of publishing his philanthropy ('sounding a trumpet' is metaphorical). Such conduct assumes the character of a mere transaction: he has bought public admiration; the business is finished; he has signed the receipt (the common technical sense of ὑπέχω; DV 'has received'); he can expect no more. The striking and original picture of secrecy (the right hand hiding its beneficence from the left) even suggests the unhealthiness of reflecting upon one's own good deeds. But nothing goes unseen of the Father (DV 'seeth in secret', i.e. seeth what is secretly done) and the reward will come. 5-6. Prayer. Jesus does not condemn the practice of praying in public assemblies, Lk 18-19—the words of 6 are as hyperbolic as those of 3. Nor does he condemn the practice (in use among Moslems) of praying in the streets. He condemns the practice of deliberately striking a pious attitude for public notice.

7-15. Digression on Prayer (Lk 11:1-4)—First a warning, 7-8, then the ideal prayer, 9-13. 7-8. There must be no gabbling over empty formulae. This is superstition like that of the pagans who feared to omit from their prayer the name of one god or the mention of one request. The Christian is not forbidden to lay his needs before God (though he already knows them) but he should do so in simple, general terms, and in a trustful spirit. Needless to say, repetition of such simple prayer as the Rosary is by no means discouraged provided it does not become mechanical. We use repetition not to secure God's attention, but to sustain our own. 9-13. The Ideal Prayer. Mt's text of the 'Our Father' is longer than Lk's. There are three prayers for the glory of God ('hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done') with an expansion ('as in heaven so on earth') and three personal requests: for food, forgiveness, freedom from temptation, with an expansion of this last ('but deliver us from evil'). Lk has neither of the expansions and omits 'Thy will be done'. The Jewish colouring of Mt's text (observed in Lk's, cf. *Allen, 58) and its Semitic balance powerfully suggest that Mt represents the original form of the prayer, abbreviated and simplified by Lk. Lk, however, has probably given the prayer its exact chronological setting. Most of the phrases of the prayer are to be found in Jewish sources (cf. SB 1, 406-25) but its simple brevity and the deliberate exclusion of the spirit of Jewish nationalism (markedly present, e.g. in the great Jewish prayer, the Tephillah or Shemoneh Esre) prove that though the body may be Jewish, the soul is Christian (Buzy). The tenderness and trust of the whole prayer are revealed in the bold word 'Father'. The phrase 'our Father' draws our

h Lord's followers together as children of one family. It is fitting that the first ejaculations should be addressed to the Father's honour which, however, is always inseparable from man's benefit. The Christian prays that the holiness of the divine 'name' (i.e. in Semitic expression, the person as known and revealed) may be recognized. Since this 'holiness' is not only God's sacred remoteness, Lev 10:3 etc., but his absolute moral perfection, Ez 36:21 ff., the recognition means man's practical acceptance of his Father's commands. 10. The second petition implies the same recognition but, this time, rather of God's kingship establishing itself increasingly in the hearts of men. The third ('thy will be done') declares clearly what is latent in the first two: effective acknowledgement of God as Father and King is accomplished by filial and loyal subjection. May this be as perfect as that of the angels! (Ps 102:19 ff.; Lagrange). 11. The second half of the prayer also has three members which, unlike those of the first half, are direct petitions for our needs. Of these, the first ('Give us this day our supersubstantial bread': τὸν ἄρτον ἡμῶν τὸν ἐπιούσιον δὸς ἡμῖν σήμερον) is a request for the simple necessities of life, embraced in the term 'bread'. The word 'supersubstantial' (Vg translation of ἐπιούσιον which, however, it renders 'daily' in Lk 11:3) suggests 'excellent', 'special' (ἐπιούσιον) as it did for Jerome (PL 26, 43; cf. Prat II, 35 note) and favours a Eucharistic reference. Nevertheless, the word ἐπιούσιος (so far found only once elsewhere and with meaning uncertain, cf. JTS 35, 377) will not bear this translation. Etymologically it means either 'necessary for subsistence' (ἐπι + οὐσία) or 'for the day that lies before us' (ἐπι + ἰούσα, i.e. 'belonging to the coming' day, cf. Prov 27:1, LXX). This second meaning, though in itself more probable, makes the phrase 'this day' redundant. It may therefore be preferable to accept a third explanation (*Black, 149-53) and read 'Give us our bread day by day' as a more exact rendering of an Aramaic idiom (wrongly translated in the Gk) which runs literally 'of today and the following day'. 12. The next petition is for forgiveness of sins, called 'debts' in Mt and in common Jewish parlance (Lk has simplified to 'sins'). We ask forgiveness on conditions that must make us reflect on our own conduct towards those who have injured us (cf. 14 and 18:32-35). 13 is probably one petition put negatively and positively (the latter being omitted by Lk). It asks that our Father should not 'lead' us into temptation. Since God tempts no man, Jas 1:13, the phrase 'lead us not' may be understood 'permit us not to go' (in the Semitic manner, cf. Joüon & WV note). Nor does the word 'temptation' necessarily imply a direct invitation to sin; it may indicate circumstances which, for us, prove to be an occasion of sin. The prayer ends with a final cry for deliverance from all moral evil (probably—in view of Mt's usual sense of τὸ πονηρὸν—not 'from the evil one'). The word 'Amen' is a later, liturgical addition. So also are doxologies like: 'For thine is the kingdom . . .', probably added (*Plummer) to avoid ending the prayer with the word 'evil'. 14-15 explain and underline in antithetic parallelism (cf. § 313e) the condition of divine forgiveness implied in the petition of 12.

16-18. Fasting. The last of three illustrations contrasting true with merely professional piety. The time will come when our Lord's disciples will, like the Pharisees, form a compact body of religious men. Like the Pharisees they will fast, 9:15. Our Lord warns them against the faults into which many of the Pharisees fell. Far from wearing gloomy looks and pulling long faces (ἀφανίζω 'to disfigure', or possibly 'to hide' with a veil as in certain Jewish fasts) the disciple should take the greatest care to disguise his piety. The image used by our Lord even suggests the appearance of one on his way to a banquet!

19-24 Deep Root of the New Spirit: Absolute Trust 687a (Lk 12:33-34; 11:34-36; 16:9-13; 12:22-31)—It is not improbable that Mt has gathered to this place various sayings of our Lord. Nevertheless they constitute here a compact discourse pervaded by the one ideal: abandonment to the Father and the futility of all else.

19-21. Experience shows the uselessness of trust in worldly goods. Hoarded stuffs are the prey of moth and 'rust' (βρώσις, lit. an 'eating'; more probably a variety of moth, or possibly 'decay'); hoarded valuables are the prey of thieves. Not so (continues our Lord with elaborate Semitic antithesis) the treasure earned on earth, banked in heaven—real but intangible. Why not amass material goods? Because, says our Lord, 21, such conduct shows that the heart is not set on God alone. His reasoning assumes that his hearers recognize this last duty at least. 22-24. This sense of due proportion comes from a sound mind ('heart'; cf. 5:8 note) which guides the soul as the sound (ἀκροῦς) eye, like a lamp, shows the body its way. But if the eye itself be diseased (or 'evil', since the moral atmosphere hangs over the terms of the parable), 'then what darkness!' It is already implied, 21, that exclusive choice must be made between God and gold. Each is in practice a jealous master. The slave of two masters is in an impossible position. Their interests are sure to clash: he will have to declare openly for one or the other ('hate', 'love') or, at least consult the interests of one (DV 'sustain' ἀντρέχουμαι, cf. 1 Thess 5:14) and slight the other. 25-24. Because this divided service is im- b

687b possible, we must renounce not only the anxious pursuit of wealth as an insurance against future need but also anxiety about our present wants, for even this divides the heart. The central idea of the passage is therefore freedom from anxiety (μέριμνα, preoccupation) and the word keeps recurring, 25, 27, 28, 31, 34. ('Mammon', more accurately 'mamon', is a Greek transliteration of the Aramaic māmōnā, frequent in the Palestinian Talmud and cf. Ecclesi 31:8 where māmōn, late Hebrew, means 'wealth'. The Semitic form—instead of the usual Gk word πλοῦτος—is left here possibly because 'Mamon' is personified, Joüon). 25. The two primary needs are food and clothing. Food keeps the soul (life, ψυχή) in the body, clothing protects the body itself. Our Lord's argument is briefly expressed. It implies that, since soul and body are 'greater gifts' (KNT) than their necessities, God who gave the gifts can and will surely sustain them by providing for their needs. Naturally, this does not exclude placing our needs trustfully before God; cf. 6:11; 7:11. Jesus goes on to demonstrate his point from God's conduct towards even his lesser creatures—the birds (proving the 'food' point; 27 belongs to this little section) and the flowers ('clothing'; 28–30). 28. Even animals make prudent provision and our Lord does not condemn them. He is attacking only worry—an exclusively human failing and inexcusable because man alone is conscious of a Father in heaven and of his own rank in the Creator's order. 27. If this argument does not convince, appeal may be made to the obvious uselessness of being anxious (μεριμνῶν as in 25; DV 'taking thought'). This will not add to life a single span. ἡλικία, DV 'stature', may equally mean 'age'; πῆχυς, DV 'cubit', i.e. the Hebrew measure c 1½ ft, may be used metaphorically for a span of life-time; cf. Ps 38:6. 'Age' is certainly more probable in the parallel place in Lk 12:25 by reason of the preceding parable, Lk 12:16–20; it is perhaps more probable here also (cf. 25) especially as length of life, not of figure, is the common anxiety.

d 28–30. The 'lily of the field' (called 'grass' or 'herb' in 30) is a simple flower (not, therefore, the gladiolus etc.). It is possibly the wild narcissus or the mayweed with its daisy-like flower (anthemis); cf. RB 54 (1947) 362–4. These are more beautiful in their God-given simplicity than Israel's richest potentate in his man-made splendour; 3 Kg 10. If the Creator so cares for his creature, how much more the Father for his children! Man's years outlast the season of the flowers and, at the end, he is to be gathered into the granary of eternity, 13:30, whereas the dead herb is destined only to serve man's humbler needs. The inference is obvious: only those (so many!) with less than a modicum of trust could fail to see it. 31–33. Bringing to a close his attack on these daily anxieties our Lord tells his Jewish audience that such preoccupation reduces them to the level of heathens and, moreover, insults the providence and love of the Father. The kingdom and its justness must be the first object of daily care. The kingdom in this connexion is the way of life God requires of his subjects—a way that our Lord has been explaining; cf. 5:20. Provided (and this is understood) man calmly pursues his labour, God will provide. 34. Do not add today's anxiety to the morrow's sum of worry; the morrow will have anxieties of its own (WV). God's providence allows a certain daily measure of difficulty; the prudent proportion should not be upset. Since 34 speaks of difficulties in general—κακία, DV 'evil'—and not merely of anxieties; since also it speaks not of the present but of the morrow, it has a viewpoint rather different from 25–33. This, plus its omission by Lk possibly indicates that the words were originally spoken in another context.

e VII 1–27 The New Spirit in Action—Before the concluding exhortation to action, 13–27, our Lord gives two pieces of advice for those to whom he has explained the new spirit. The first, 1–6, concerns the relationship of the Christian with his fellows; the second, 7–11, of the Christian with God by prayer. There is no clear connexion of the sections within the chapter nor of this chapter with the preceding. 687e

1–6 Judge not! (Lk 6:37–42)—Condemnation of our neighbour (like forgiveness; 6:12) brings a like answer from God. In this sense (but cf. Lk 6:38 note) the rabbinic saying 'measure for measure' is true, SB 1, 444 f. But even on the human plane such procedure is unjust and absurd. By a remark involuntarily echoed in our own conscience our Lord shows it. Psychologically we are quick to see (and to magnify) our own faults in others ('lynx to our neighbours, mole to ourselves', La Fontaine, Fables, 1, 7; cf. Lagrange). We see the splinter (κάρφος, a dry particle of sawn wood) in his eye and miss the plank in our own—this is the true proportion and it escapes us. Yet we kindly (and hypocritically) offer to remove what we are too blind to see. 6. Yet a discreet assessment of our fellow's dispositions is sometimes necessary as when, for instance, there is danger of sacrilegious profanation. Indiscretion in such matters may turn indifference to malevolence, thus uselessly harming our neighbour, injuring ourselves, wasting what is precious and sacred. Our Lord speaks, as it seems, of prudence in expounding the mysteries of the kingdom; he himself later, 13:10–15, shows the example. The principle was applied in the early Church (cf. Didache, 9, 5) to the question of non-admission of the unbaptized to the Holy Eucharist. Our Lord compares the indiscretion to that of offering sacred (sacrificial meat?) or precious things to mere brutes which turn on the giver with disappointed ferocity. The comparison is a general one. We should not seek therefore to identify the 'swine', e.g. with pagans, nor the 'dogs' with lapsed Christians, nor to regard the terms as a pointed insult. The animals together represent the religiously unappreciative; their distinction is merely graphic and stylistic in the manner of Semitic parallelism. This parallelism will be all the more marked if we accept the not improbable suggestion (adopted by *Black, 146–8) that the Aramaic has been mistranslated or subjected to interpretation and originally read: 'Give not a precious ring (Aram. q'dāšā') to dogs'. Our present text (τὸ ἅγιον, DV 'that which is holy') supposes an original Aramaic qudšā'.

7–11 Prayer Sure of a Hearing (Lk 11:9–13)—In Lk 6 this passage is not included in the Sermon, and it is unexpected in this place in Mt, though it would aptly follow 6:33. 7–8. It is a constant divine law that prayer is never unanswered. Provided we pray as our Lord taught his disciples, 6:9–13, a door will be opened to us (by God, as in the similar use of the impersonal in 2, 19). 9–11. To doubt this would be to insult our Father. Even human fathers, with all their imperfections, are capable of perfect paternal love. How much more the heavenly Father who is perfection itself! He will not disappoint the hungry children with a stone that looks like bread nor with a serpent (equally useless for food) which has perchance been netted with the fish; cf. RB 55 (1948) 195–8. The 'serpent' may be identified with the tropidonotus tessellatus, sometimes hooked, and presumably netted, in the Lake of Galilee. Hence (in the absence of any similarity, comparable to the bread-stone similarity, between the 'serpent' and any known Galilean fish) the fish-serpent juxtaposition. 12. The Golden Rule (cf. Lk 6:31)—The whole message of the ancient Scriptures which our Lord had come to fulfil (5:17 note) is summed up: In all things that concern our fellows (practical charity, forgiveness, kindly judgements, etc.) our best available standard of conduct is the treatment we should like to receive (though perhaps do not) from him. This eliminates the interest we have in ourselves or rather shares it with our neighbour, thus restoring the balance. Mt evidently takes this love of neighbour to include the love of God which is its true motive, 22:34–40. For a negative form of the Golden Rule cf. Tob 4:16. The original setting of the maxim is perhaps, as in Lk 6:31, after the 'retaliation' section, 5:38–42, though it would as suitably follow the 'Judge not' passage, 7:1–5. The falling cadence at the end of the verse and the echo of 687h 5:17 give the impression that the Sermon proper is now at an end. This prepares us for the concluding exhortation to serious action.

688a 18-27 Call to Action—The Christian must not follow the majority, 13-14, nor run after every specious teacher, 15-20, nor be content with mere professions of loyalty or even with the grace of miracle-working, 21-23. He must do the will of the Father as declared by the Son, otherwise his efforts are wasted, 24-27. 18-14. (Lk 13:23 f.). Our Lord does not minimize the difficulty of the Christian way of life, but laments the fewness of those who in fact follow it. He uses images familiar to Jewish teachers (SB 1, 461 ff.). The 'city-gate' (πόλη), or possibly 'defile' (Joüon), through which we enter upon the way is as narrow as the path is narrow ('strait') to which it leads. That there are few who walk this way is a fact of experience. It does not follow that only these reach the goal—who can calculate the mercy of God? Our Lord does not intend to define the number of the 'elect'—a question which he refuses to answer in Lk 13:23 f. It is the practical solution that counts: Strive to enter by the narrow door, Lk 13:24. The answer to the theoretical question is not useful to man; God reserves the knowledge to himself, ST 1, 23, 7 corp. We know that 'God wishes all men to be saved', 1 Tim 2:4, and this is solid foundation for our hope. 15-20. Beware of false guides! cf. Lk 6:43-44. Again there is no close connexion with what precedes, but the passage has been drawn into this place by the idea of finding the right way, 14. Our Lord here deals not with the personal morals of those who falsely claim to bear a message from God (false 'prophets'), but with the damaging effects of their teaching. Doubtless he has the Pharisees in mind, but he is providing for the more distant future, too. These false teachers will bear the appearance of belonging to the flock of Christ, hence the danger. Heresies live on their modicum of truth. But underneath that skin, error devours the duped victim. Yet how recognize the false teacher? A little patience and the effect of their work ('fruit', by an abrupt change of metaphor) will betray them. That grapes and figs do not appear on thorns and thistles is a commonplace of experience. And so indeed it is with any tree (DV 'even so, every'). It does not, 17, nay cannot, 18, produce fruit alien to its nature. The rotten tree (σάπρος, decayed, or corrupt in the moral sense cf. Eph 4:22) will bring forth 'evil' (πονηρός, wicked) fruit. The adjectives, which are susceptible of a moral interpretation, have been chosen with a view to the application of the comparison. 19. Parenthetically Mt prophesies the punishment of these false teachers (or possibly the certain elimination of their teaching) in the words of the Baptist, 3:10; cf. Lk 3:9. 20. The passage closes as it began (cf. 16a), summing-up what has been said ('inclusion'). 21-23. Lip-service etc. insufficient; Lk 6:46; 13:26 f. Our Lord is passing to his concluding appeal for serious action. He has just spoken, 15-20, of false teachers; he speaks now of the danger of self-deception—the danger of presuming upon the privilege of belonging officially to the fellowship of Jesus. 21. (Lk 6:46). The gates of heaven do not open to the urgent cry: Lord, Lord! (cf. 25:11 note) but to those who do the will (good pleasure) of God. Jesus, with quiet assurance, uses the phrase 'my Father', as again in 26:39, 42. He teaches the disciples to say 'our Father', 6:9, but studiously avoids the phrase himself—his sonship is not of the common sort. 22-23. (Lk 13:25, 27). Not even preaching on the authority of Jesus (DV 'prophesied in thy name') nor exorcism nor miracles worked through that same authority will, in themselves, qualify preacher or wonder-worker for entrance when he comes to stand at heaven's gate. Unless such a one has also 'done the will of the Father', our Lord will openly declare that even while working these prodigies the man was never truly of his company, Jesus himself significantly assumes the power of expulsion from the kingdom of those who, ignoring the will of the Father, have worked nothing but iniquity (ἀνομία, cf. Ps 6:9). 24-27. Concluding Appeal (Lk 6:47-49). Two parables in elaborate antithesis. The man who hears and acts upon our Lord's teaching has a firm dwelling. The torrential winter rains, the streams in flood, high winds (like those that brought houses down in Jericho in 1912, Lagrange) will not disturb it. Not so the man who builds on thin, crumbling earth (ἄμμος). 28-29. Mt rounds off the Sermon with the formula he reserves for the end of his five great groups of discourse, 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1. All were amazed at the matter of the discourse and the manner of the Teacher. They were used to the Scribes and Pharisees who repeatedly appealed to the authority of Scripture and of the teachers of repute who had preceded them. But our Lord had interpreted, even modified, the Scriptures, 5:21-47, and this without appeal to any authority (DV 'power') but his own.

VIII 1-IX 34 The Messias at Work in Galilee—The light that dawned on Galilee, 4:15 f., with the teaching of Jesus, chh 5-7, now shines also through his works, chh 8-9. Mt selects as samples ten miracles. He recounts them in one group though (after the first three) with significant interruptions. Between the leper, 8:2-4, the son of the centurion, 5-13, Peter's mother-in-law, 14 f., there is no pause in the narrative. Mt then makes general mention of many miracles, 16 f., and tells of the sobering demands made by Jesus of two enthusiastic would-be followers, 19-22. Our Lord and his disciples then cross to the east side of the Lake, 23, and three more miracles are narrated: the calming of the storm, 24-27, the Gadarene exorcisms, 28-34, and (back in Capharnaum) the paralytic, 9:1-2. This last is followed by the disputes on forgiveness of sins, 3-8, and, after Matthew's call, 9, on our Lord's association with sinners, 10-13, and, finally, on the fasting question, 14-17. The last four miracles: Jairus's daughter, 18-19, 23-25, the issue of blood, 20-22, the blind men of Capharnaum, 27-30, the dumb demoniac, 32-33, are interrupted only by comments on the effect of our Lord's miracles, 26, 31, 33-34. Mt, indeed, makes a point of noting the human reactions to this prodigious display of power. The confidence of those in trouble, 8:2, 8, 16; 9:2, 18, 21, 28, the astonishment of the multitudes, 8:27; 9:8, 26, 31, 33, and, on the other hand, the cavils of some, 9:3, 11, 24, culminating in blind hostility, 9:34. In this section, therefore, we have not merely a list of miracles arranged systematically to prove our Lord's powers. The miracles are narrated not, as it were, statically, but with a view to the dynamic development of our Lord's ministry in itself and in its impact upon the public. As for the exact placing of the events in time, Mt's general procedure and the fact that he is here selecting only samples of our Lord's miracles forbid us to expect rigid chronological sequence. This last, however, is not entirely ignored. Matthew's vocation, for example, is doubtless placed in its actual setting. The order of events is vastly different from Mk's (cf. *Allen, xiv-xvii). For Mt's independence of Mk, cf. §§ 610-15. For more ample historical detail on the miracles of chh 8-9, cf. commentaries on Mk and Lk.

VIII 1-4 The Leper (Mk 1:40-45; Lk 5:12-16)—By placing the miracle in this setting (after the Sermon) Mt illustrates the power of Jesus, and at the same time his respect for the Law; cf. 5:17. 1. This verse may perhaps be reckoned as part of the conclusion of the preceding account of the Sermon. In any case, it implies no close chronological connexion with the miracle, which took place probably before the Sermon. 2. The term 'leprosy' was used of skin diseases of many degrees some of which were curable, though the cure had to be certified by the priests, Lev 13:2 ff. For description and distinction of various forms of 'leprosy' cf. Lev 13-14. Leprosy in the ordinary sense of the word, however, was the incurable disease eating away the extremities and covering the body with running sores until eventually the flesh rotted away. This second sense seems to be demanded here by Luke's 689b 'full of leprosy', Lk 5:13. The leper had no right to approach: the precautions of the Law required that he live apart and never appear in public without warning. 3. Our Lord's pity overlooks the legal fault. Moved by the man's faith he touches the repulsive body. Aware of his own authority and of his power to heal, he fears neither legal contamination, Lev 15:7, nor physical. The cure is immediate. 4. Careful as ever, 9:30; 16:20; 17:9, to preclude popular excitement our Lord binds the man to silence; vainly however, Mk 1:45. The injunction does not necessarily exclude the presence of the 'multitudes' (8:1, though see note) who may have been at some distance; or possibly our Lord forbids only a formal declaration made before the priests had pronounced. Indeed, though the man was cured he was not legally pure before such pronouncement. The Law must be respected: first, medical examination by the priests in Jerusalem, then the complicated ritual of purification. The 'gift' (sacrifice) was, for the poor, of one lamb or two turtle-doves; cf. Lev 14:1-32. The purpose of this last command is to afford to the official representatives of Judaism the opportunity of recognizing both the power of Jesus and his scrupulous respect for the Law.

d VIII 5-13 The Centurion's Servant (Lk 7:1-10)—Mt tells in summary fashion the more detailed story of Lk. The incident took place after the Sermon; cf. Lk 7:1-2. 5. The centurion (commander of one hundred men, approximately 'sergeant-major') though not a Jew, 10-12, was well-disposed to Judaism and had contributed to the building of a synagogue in Capharnaum, Lk 7:5. He was an officer, perhaps, of a Roman garrison at Capharnaum or possibly of the army of Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Peraea. 6-8. A valued servant had been struck with paralysis (a general term covering, e.g. arthritis, meningitis). Having heard of the miracles of Jesus (cf. 4:23) the centurion enlists Jewish friends to ask him to visit the sick man (Lk; Mt's account is shorter). Repenting his own action with its appearance of a brusque summons he hastens to forestall the visit and (through his friends; Lk) professes his unworthiness. The humble words of the pagan soldier have passed to the lips of the Christian priest. 9. The soldier knows what discipline is: he takes orders and gives them, and obedience is unquestioned (a man 'under authority', one used to the atmosphere of military discipline). It is possible, however, that the original Aramaic read less awkwardly 'a man that hath authority, and soldiers are under my charge', *Black, 116f. 10. As man, our Lord was capable of wonder: 'although nothing was hidden from Christ yet a thing could come freshly to his experiential human knowledge, and so produce wonder' (ST 3, 15. 8 ad 1). Israelites had shown their faith in him, 4:24, but the centurion's quiet conviction of his power to heal at a distance was a new experience. 11-13. Cf. Lk 13:28 f. The faith of this Gentile recalls to Mt the words of our Lord (used probably on the occasion assigned to them by Lk) lamenting the fate of 'the sons of the kingdom', of those who would naturally be expected to inherit the blessings of the Messianic age. The images of the banquet (for 'sit down with' translate 'feast with' WV) and of the darkness are familiar in Jewish description of the world to come. Nevertheless, Mt's formula 'kingdom of the heavens' (i.e. 'of God') does not exclude the kingdom on earth; nor does it appear to do so in this place—especially as there is an allusion to those 'from east and west' who, Mal 1:11, are to become subjects of a kingdom of God on earth. Many of the Gentiles will inherit the promises made to the patriarchs and finally share their reward. Ironically the very children of the patriarchs will, as a body, be excluded. In the darkness that lies outside the kingdom shall be despair and fear: the weeping and the chattering (i.e. from fear, rather than 'gnashing' from disappointed rage; cf. Lagrange, Comm. Lc., 390) spoken of in the Jewish eschatological literature. Though, in that literature, the phrases are used in connexion with a future, entirely transcendent order, we are not thereby forced to restrict our Lord's thought to the same limits. For him the 'kingdom' inherited by the Gentiles is the kingdom of which he is the centre here and hereafter.

f 14-15 Peter's Mother-in-law (Mk 1:29-31; Lk 4:38 f.) —In the interests of his logical plan Mt, unlike Mk and Lk, ignores details of time and circumstance. Actually the miracle preceded those of the leper and the centurion's servant. Simon (Mk; Lk) called 'Peter' (Mt; cf. 4:18) though a native of Bethsaida, Jn 1:44, lived with his brother Andrew (Mk) in Capharnaum. The brothers invited our Lord (with James and John; cf. Mk) to take refreshment in their home. The woman, cured in the height of fever (Lk), prepares a meal for him (ἀντρώπου). This detail is mentioned in Mt's summary account not as a picturesque circumstance, but to prove that the cure was instantaneous and complete.

g 16-17 Various Cures and Fulfilment of Prophecy (cf. Mk 1:32-34; Lk 4:40-41)—After sunset, as soon as the Sabbath with its enforced rest was over (Mk; Lk) the people flocked thither with their sick. The miracle at Peter's house was soon known in the village. Our Lord's exorcisms, unlike the elaborate Jewish ceremonies, were worked by a simple command. Of the 'Servant of God' who was to suffer the prophet had said: He has taken our sufferings upon himself and has burdened himself with our sorrows, Is 53:4. Mt (who quotes here from the Heb. text and not from LXX) applies the words, as the context clearly shows, to the removal of human sufferings. It is not clear that Mt means that our Lord undertook to endure these sufferings himself since the text as used here might be satisfied by our Lord's taking it upon himself to annihilate the suffering. Yet the Isaian prophecy means that the Servant himself assumed the suffering due to others (thus expiating human sin) and this sense would not escape the Christian reader fully aware of the Passion and its spiritual significance. Under the obvious sense of the quotation in this passage there lies, therefore, a profound dogmatic sense; cf. Lagrange.

h 18-22 Demands of Discipleship (Mk 4:35; Lk 8:22; 9:57-60)—The date of the departure across the Lake and of the two miracles, 8:23-27, 28-34, is uncertain but it is placed much later in the Ministry by Mk and Lk. The incident of the two would-be disciples, 19-22, is perhaps correctly placed in Lk 9:57-60. 18. The 'multitudes' surrounding Jesus are not necessarily the people of 16. Indeed, there is a ring of finality in 17 and, in any case, Mt does not mention the time of departure for the eastern side of the Lake. 19-20. On the way to the boat (Peter's?) a scribe (cf. 2:4 note) enthusiastically offers himself as a permanent disciple. Our Lord while not rejecting the offer warns him of the consequences of discipleship. It means sharing the homeless existence that Jesus is now embarking upon. Even the marauding fox and the wandering bird have their headquarters. Not so 'the Son of Man'. This is Mt's first use of this strange title; he uses it 33 times in all. The expression (cf. Ps 8:5 where 'a son of man' means 'a mere human being') is used by our Lord on about 40 occasions to emphasize his humanity and at the same time to surround it with a mysterious dignity. Its Messianic implication will appear only when it is placed in the setting of Daniel's prophecy; cf. 26:64 note. Probably our Lord took the expression from Daniel (where 'one like a son of man' is the symbol of the coming kingdom), giving it definition ('the Son of Man'). It is possible, too, that our Lord chose this title because he 'perceived the last consequences of the Messianic synthesis of lowly Servant, Is 53, and glorious Son of Man, Dan 7:13 f., thus accepting what Judaism in its retrospect upon its own prophetic history had refused to see or failed to grasp' *W. Manson, Jesus the Messiah, London 1943, 117. On the 'Son of Man' title; cf. §§ 621h, 728b, 740h, 746d, 829f; also Lagrange, Ev. Mc., 1929, cxlix-cl; Joüon, 601-4; *Plummer, xxv-xxviii; *T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus, 211-36; 258 ff.; A. Charue, L'Incrédulité

- 690a des Juifs dans le Nouveau Testament, Gembloux, 1929, 40-6; *C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom, London 1935, 81-110. 21-22. Of the scribe's reaction to our Lord's words we know nothing. Now another person, one of the disciples (Joüon) and therefore expected to accompany Jesus on his journey, asks leave to stay and bury his father. The respite he asks is evidently short since, in Palestine, burial follows very soon after death. But when God calls neither comfort must be considered, 19-20, nor even the most sacred human ties: Leave the burial of the dead to those who are not alive to the greater interests of God: (WV note).
- b 23-27 Still the Tempest (Mk 4:36-41; Lk 8:22-25)—Storms come suddenly on the Lake of Galilee. Itself more than 600 ft below sea-level, it is surrounded by high hills. The differences of temperature produce sudden, high winds from the north-west. The waves rose high over the ship (KNT) but Jesus, taking the opportunity of a brief rest, was undisturbed. When the frightened disciples awakened him, he first (Mt) calmly rebuked the lack of faith shown in the cry 'We are perishing!' They should have known they were safe with him, awake or asleep. Erect on the pitching boat he rebuked winds and sea as if they were unruly servants. Mt says that 'the men' marvelled—a strange expression to use of the disciples (though cf. Joüon citing Heb. use for 'the men' = 'they'). It is possible, therefore, that Mt is rounding-off his account of the miracle, as in 9:8, 26, by noting its effect upon the general public who would be informed by the disciples. Mt is more systematic and less picturesque throughout than Mk. For details, therefore, cf. Mk 4:36-41.
- c 28-34 The Gadarene Demoniacs (Mk 5:1-20; Lk 8:26-39)—They disembark in the district of Gadara (Mt 'of the Gadarenes'; Mk 'Gerasenes'; Lk 'Gergesenes'), a town of the Decapolis on a height c 6 m. SE. of the Lake (now Um Qeis). It was a well-known town, even called 'the metropolis of Peraea' by Josephus (Bell. lud. 4, 7, 3 and cf. Schürer, 2, 1, 100-4) and perhaps for this reason Mt (or his translator) uses the name to indicate vaguely the place of disembarkation on the 'lakeside'. This place was probably at a spot called Moqā Edlō where, after thirty yards of shore, the bank rises sharply to hills in which are natural caves possibly once used as tombs, 28. A mile or two to the north lies the deserted hamlet of Chorsia (el-Korsi cf. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, Paris 1938, 2, 300), doubtless the 'city' of 33 f. It lies on the east side of the Lake facing Magdala; its name probably accounts for Mk's 'country of the Gerasenes'. 28. Mk (followed by Lk) mentions only one demoniac, presumably the more violent of the two and around whom the account, as Mk received it, had centred. Mt has evidently an independent source of information. 29. The devils resent the pressure of the power that confronts them (Mk; Lk). They cry, through the possessed: Why dost thou meddle with us? (KNT). They complain that our Lord has invaded their territory before 'the time' of their final expulsion to hell. Meanwhile they claimed the right to exercise their malignity on earth without interruption (cf. the Jewish apocalyptic writings, e.g. Book of Jubilees, 10:8; Henoch 10, 12-14). 30-31. In this predominantly pagan district the Talmudic prohibition against the rearing of pigs would be, as elsewhere, ignored. In any case, it is not said that their owners (much less their consumers) were Jews. For lack of a nobler object of their essential malignity the spirits ask to be sent into (or 'among', Joüon) the herd (2,000, Mk) of swine. 32. Our Lord worked no second miracle to restrain the devils from the pigs. He was concerned with the salvation of human beings. Moreover, his rights over property were sovereign and the demoniac action, which he at least tolerated, was calculated to emphasize both the blind malignance of evil and his own mastery of it. These lessons, had they been learned, were more precious to the inhabitants than all their pigs. 33-34. But the lessons were not learned, though the scared herdsmen took the story straight to the village. Fear

(Lk) lost the villagers their great chance, and they asked our Lord to go. Here again Mt's account is summary. He has not the vivid description of the demoniac's violence, Mk 5:3b-5, nor the subsequent history of the exorcized, Mk 5:15-20. He is concerned with the fact of the miracle and with its effect upon the public.

IX 2-8 The Paralytic (Mk 2:1-12; Lk 5:17-26)—The series of miracles is continued and Mt still notes the wonder of the people, 8, 26, 31, 33. Yet a discordant note is now struck—the opposition of the Jewish religious leaders, 3, 11, 34. Mt, like Mk, connects the three incidents that follow (the paralytic, the call of Matthew, the fasting-question) but, unlike Mk, narrates them before the Jairus's daughter miracle. Mt's scheme is not chronological; moreover he is as usual less detailed than Mk. For his dogmatic purpose he tells only the essentials.

1. Our Lord re-enters the boat and again (Joüon) sails across the Lake back to 'his own town' Capharnaum, which he had chosen as his centre (cf. 4:13) on the western shore. 2. The house was packed (Mk) and the bearers of the paralytic were forced to carry him up the outside staircase on to the flat roof. Part of this they removed, lowering the man through the gap (cf. Mk 2:4). Our Lord was touched by the faith of the paralytic and his friends. This faith, manifested by their extraordinary conduct, is more obvious in Mk than in Mt who omits the 'roof' incident. It seems from our Lord's first words that the paralytic's hopeful courage is failing him at the thought of his unworthiness. The belief probably prevailed then (as later, cf. SB 1, 495 and Jn 9:2) that sin was the cause of disease and that pardon must therefore precede cure. 3-4. The declaration that the man's sins are even now being forgiven (ἀφίενται) or are forgiven from this moment (ἀφεύρωται) is actually a remission (cf. 3, Mk 2:7). The thoughts of the Scribes (and of the Pharisees; Lk) are not merely troubled by our Lord's words, but actively and spontaneously hostile ('evil' 4). His words, they consider, do an injury to God (βλασφημεῖ) since only the Offended can forgive the offence (Mk). That our Lord reads their thoughts is only the beginning of their discomfiture. Note that whereas 'Pharisee' is the term for a school of thought, 'Scribe' is that of the profession of students and teachers of the Mosaic Law. Not all the Scribes were Pharisees (some were Sadducees) nor all the Pharisees Scribes. From the time of the Babylonian exile (6th cent. B.C.) the study of the Law intensified and the profession of Scribe grew steadily in importance. With the Law as his text-book he expounded what we should call dogmatic and moral theology (haggadah and halakah). The Scribe was not fully-fledged until, after study from childhood, he attained his fortieth year. He received the title of 'Rabbi' and his authority was said to be greater than that of the Law itself (cf. U. Holzmeister, S.J., Historia Aetatis Novi Testamenti, Rome 1932, 187-92. The qualified Scribe had his disciples who acted as preachers, instructors, etc. in the smaller towns, SB 1, 496-8). 5-7. The Scribes were thinking that it was easy to use a formula whose effectiveness no one could either verify or contest. It was impossible to prove that the sins were in fact forgiven; our Lord, therefore, proves that, where results can be checked, his formulae are not empty. Hence he deserves credence as God's envoy even when he speaks of the invisible world. He concedes that to pronounce one formula (forgiveness) is as easy as pronouncing the other (physical cure) but defies their incredulity in the first case by confronting it with startling results in the second. 'He claims the power to forgive sins without saying whether it is in his own name or in God's. Yet he does not say that he has received the power, but simply that he has competent authority. The most natural conclusion is, therefore, that he claims a divine prerogative', Lagrange, Marc, 37. The term 'son of man' (8:18 note) clearly does not mean in this place: Man (i.e. mankind in general, cf. Aramaic: bar 'nāšā') since our Lord is vindicating a special prerogative for himself, just as his miracle of 690g healing is a special prerogative. Nor is it, of itself, a Messianic title. Used in this context it means that our Lord, though a man among men, claims to exercise on earth the very authority that God wields from heaven. It is already a hint of the doctrine of the Incarnation. 8. The people are impressed by the miracle ('seeing it'), not by the invisible remission of sin. Filled with reverential awe they praise God for this miraculous power given to a 'son of man' like themselves. Unlike the Scribes, 3, they forget the more significant part of the episode—the claim to remit sin.

691a 9-13 Call of Matthew (Mk 2:13-17; Lk 5:27-32)—9. Capharnaum lay at the place on the busy Damascus road where the province of Antipas touched on his brother Philip's—hence the custom-house near the lakeside (Mk). Here were collected the tolls and dues. The publicans (τελώναι), in the Gospel sense, were agents of the head-publicans (ἀρχιτελώναι; cf. Lk 19:3) who in turn were the representatives of those who bought from the State (in this case, from Antipas) the right to collect taxes. The demands of their masters and their own greed caused the agents to exploit the opportunities offered by ill-defined taxation and the ignorance of their victims. This conduct together with their professional association with Gentiles explains the common Gospel-phrase 'publicans and sinners'. Matthew (Heb. Mattai, prob. abbreviated from Mattathiah or 'gift of God') appears in the lists of Apostles (Mt adds 'the publican'; cf. 10:3 note). There is no doubt that he is to be identified with the 'Levi' of the parallel places in Mk, Lk. Two names for one person (even two Semitic names, like 'Matthew' and 'Levi') were not uncommon (e.g. 1 Mac 2:2-5 and cf. Corp. Inscr. Sem., Aram. 158; 486 quoted by Lagrange, Marc. 42). The evangelist is not ashamed to make open reference to his old profession, but Mk (followed by Lk) uses the less-known name possibly out of consideration (Jerome). 10. To celebrate the great occasion Matthew invites his new master to a banquet (Lk) together with many old business-fellows and 'sinners', careless livers, at least in the eyes of the legalist Pharisees. 11. The Pharisees were certainly not sitting at table. It is possible that, in the fashion of the country, they stood at the door and watched; or perhaps they had the facts only on hearsay and their objections were put some time after. They did not venture (cf. 9:3-8!) to attack our Lord directly, but addressed their rabbinical scruples to the disciples. 12-13. Our Lord's answer was in proverb-form. Others may fear the contagion of legal or spiritual 'disease'—not so the One who had come (i.e. into the world—a hint of pre-existence, cf. Lebreton, History of the Dogma of the Trinity, Eng. trans. 1, 210 f.) to cure it. 'Read and comprehend the prophet', he says: 'It is devotion I desire and not sacrifice'. The quotation (Os 6:6; from the Heb. as in 12:7 where it recurs more aptly) is used to emphasize God's overwhelming preference for true inward devotion over the external observances even of the Law. The argument is the more cogent in that the prohibition of eating with Gentiles is found not in the Law, but in Pharisaic practice. The appreciation of this text should make them understand how much closer to God's mind is our Lord's conduct than their ungenerous cavils.

691c 14-17 The Fasting-Question (Mk 2:18-22; Lk 5:33-39)—14. It is not clear that the incident followed immediately upon the preceding (cf. Mt's usual vague 'then' and Mk 2:18 note) though it is aptly mentioned in this place. The prime movers are, doubtless, the Pharisees (cf. Mk), but 'the disciples of John' also take part. That our Lord's disciples do not fast is an opportunity of attack for the Pharisees; for the disciples of the Baptist it is perhaps only a difficulty. (On the prominent place given to fasting in Jewish piety cf. Bonsirven, 2, 281-6; Edersheim, 1, 662-3.) The question has a Semitic form (e.g. Is 5:4) better rendered 'How is it that thy disciples do not fast when we and the Pharisees fast so often?' (KNT). 15. Our Lord answers that fasting, which bears the aspect of sorrow, ill becomes the joy the disciples feel in the presence of 691e their master. Time enough for fasting (the first hint of the Passion) when the Master has been taken away from them (ἀπαρθῆ, cf. Is 53:8 aipeai). The image Jesus uses is that of a wedding-feast; cf. 22:2 note. The idea of the bridegroom would recall the Baptist's words, Jn 3:29, to the Baptist's disciples. The 'children of the bridal-chamber' (in this case, our Lord's disciples) are the b'ne hahuppah or friends of the groom charged with the supervision of the celebrations. 16-17. Our Lord's d defence of his disciples is driven home by two comparisons. Both point to the one conclusion, namely, the imprudence and impossibility of uniting incompatibles: the new and the old. The patch (τὸ πλῆρωμα: DV 'fulness') of undressed ('new') cloth tears away from the cloak. Wine that is not completely fermented bursts the wineskins (of sheep- or goat-hide) rubbed thin by long use. In either case the imprudence is disastrous to both new and old. This dictum of our Lord's is loaded with consequences, gradually appreciated by the Apostles when the time came for the definitive break with Judaism. For the present, however, the principle has immediate application only to the Pharisees' fasting-observance.

18-20 The Woman with the Issue of Blood. Jairus's daughter (Mk 5:21-43; Lk 8:40-56)—Mt uses a transitional formula (18; cf. 12:46) not to be taken as deliberately indicative of chronological sequence. The incidents in this section are (Mk, Lk) to be placed immediately after 9:16. 18-19. A prominent official of the Capharnaum synagogue (Mt ἀρχων; Mk and Lk: ἐκ τῶν ἀρχισυναγώγων) named Jairus (Mk, Lk) prostrated himself before Jesus asking a cure for his daughter, who was on the point of death (Mk, Lk) or (Mt—a celebrated difficulty) 'even now dead'. Our Lord and his disciples set out for Jairus's house. On the way (Mk and Lk only) news was brought that the girl had died, but Jesus reassured the father. Mt, according to his custom, telescopes the whole incident. This explains his divergence from Mk-Lk in reporting the words of Jairus. He is content to sum up the successive thought, fear, faith of the father in one sentence which he puts on Jairus's lips. Augustine, De Consensu Evangelistarum, 2, 28, 66, PL 34, 1110 f.: 'It is in the interests of brevity that Mt makes Jairus ask the Lord to do what in fact he did. . . . The two (Mk and Lk) give what Jairus actually said, Matthew what he wished and thought. . . . From examples of this kind we deduce a most useful and absolutely indispensable principle (of interpretation), viz. . . . that (a writer) does not lie if he makes a person say what that person wishes rather than what he actually said'. 20-22. f Meanwhile, before news is brought of the child's death, a woman with a chronic haemorrhage, Lk 8:43, comes stealthily and timidly, but with great faith to touch our Lord's cloak. To escape embarrassing notice, partly too because the malady conveyed a legal impurity, Lev 15:25-27, she touches the very edge of his outer garment—one of the multi-coloured tassels (sfirif) worn by pious Jews at the four corners of the cloak (Num 15:37-41; on our Lord's dress cf. Edersheim, 1, 620-6). She is immediately cured (Mk; Lk); not mere physical contact but her faith had already merited the miracle (Mt). But she has not escaped notice. Our Lord knows what has happened, Mk 5:30; Lk 8:45, though Mt does not suggest that this knowledge is supernatural. 23. With Peter, James and John (Mk; Lk) our Lord enters the house of the dead girl and encounters the confused noise of the wailing sympathizers and the dismal music of professional flute-players (indispensable at Jewish funerals; cf. SB 1, 521). 24. He dismisses all this apparatus ('Get ye hence'; WV) as useless. There is no cause for mourning; the girl is only asleep. Our Lord was to use a similar phrase of Lazarus, Jn 11:11. In each case he avoids the term 'dead' because neither the girl nor Lazarus was irreparably dead (the usual implication of the word). That she is not still alive, however, is perfectly clear, Mk 5:35; hence the mock-691f ing incredulity. 25. When at last the mourners are persuaded to leave, our Lord, in the presence of the father and mother and of his favoured three (Mk), took the dead child by the hand (Mt; Mk; Lk). 26. Our Lord had taken precautions against undue publicity (24 f. and Mk 5:43) possibly because such a miracle might have provoked a Messianic crisis (cf. Lagrange, Le Messianisme, 176 ff.) yet, as Mt is accustomed to note, the report spread through the district.

692a 27-31 The Two Blind Men of Capharnaum—(Mt only). The episode has, of its nature, certain similarities with that of the blind men of Jericho, 20:29-34, with which it is too confidently identified. The one common element that might be thought significant is the 'Son of David' cry which (if it be not imported from 20:31—Lagrange) is natural enough at a time when miracles were inducing a Messianic atmosphere. 27. As Jesus leaves the house of Jairus, two blind men (two for mutual support—a not uncommon sight in Palestine) hail him as Son of David, i.e. as Messiah; cf. 1:1 note. 28. It is perhaps for this very reason that our Lord does not acknowledge their cry (cf. note to 26) but waits until he reaches 'the house' (probably Matthew's; cf. 9:10) before he speaks to them. The 'pity' they have asked of the Son of David is clearly the gift of sight and our Lord asks only if they believe in his power to heal. They answer 'yes', adding a term of profound respect ('Lord'; Gk: κύριε; Aramaic: māri). 29. The cure proves they have not lied. It will be noticed, however, that the faith though perfect did not work the miracle, but was our Lord's required condition. 30. Jesus most strictly enjoins secrecy—the more strictly, no doubt, because they had already openly proclaimed his Messianic character. But Mt notes (again!) that they could not resist the temptation.

b 32-34 The Dumb Demoniac (cf. Lk 11:14-15)—When the two cured of blindness had left the house there was brought in a man whom diabolic possession had made dumb. The exorcism was effortless (contrast the Jewish exorcisms; Edersheim, 2, 770-86). The remark of all: 'Never was the like seen in Israel', is the result of this last of a series of miracles. It makes a fitting and characteristic epilogue to chh 8-9, yet Mt is forced also to note the wicked obstinacy of the spiritual leaders of the people. Their remark, too, is doubtless typical of their attitude to all the preceding miracles, and our Lord later exposes its intellectual dishonesty (12:22-37, see notes).

35-38 The Need for Missioners (Mk 6:6b; Lk 10:2; cf. Jn 4:35-38)—From our Lord's work amongst the people Mt is now passing to his preparation of the Apostles. The Twelve had already been chosen before the Sermon (cf. Lk 6:12 ff.) and had witnessed our Lord's work among the people—too much for a single human being. 35-38. Experience in Galilee (and beyond?) showed the desperate case of the people. Our Lord was deeply moved (ἐσπλαγχνισθήν) for they were harried and abject (KNT) like shepherdless sheep; cf. 18:12-14. Their spiritual pastors had failed them. 37-38. The metaphor changes (cf. Lk 10:2 which perhaps retains the words in their true chronological place) but, shepherds or harvesters, men are needed for the work. Otherwise the sheep will perish and the harvest rot where it stands. As with his other gifts, so with this: God will provide if we ask. By the Incarnation the divine Son accepted certain human limitations. The world has a duty to pray for men to help our Saviour. It is his own command.

• X 1-42 Missionary Instruction—Our Lord calls together the chosen Twelve (1-4) to regulate their conduct on their first, and local, missionary journey, 5-16; 40-42; further instructions, 17-19, relate to a more distant future and a wider mission where they will meet not contempt only but inexorable and universal persecution, 17-23. Conscious of the Son's example and of the Father's loving vigilance the disciple must not capitulate, 24-33; his old life may be torn up by the roots, but he shall find a new, 34-39. Mt's well-knit discourse is probably a synthesis of our

X 1-4 The Twelve (Mk 3:13-19; Lk 6:12-16; cf. d Ac 1:13)—Mt does not narrate the call of the Twelve (cf. Mk 6:7; Lk 9:1) but presupposes it and mentions their names in passing. The section is but a summary introduction to the discourse. Here alone Mt calls them 'Apostles' (i.e. 'envoys'), elsewhere 'The Twelve'. The number is chosen evidently because it suits our Lord's plan of campaign but it has the further advantage of symbolizing the twelve patriarchs of the new Israel. All four lists of the Apostles (Mt; Mk; Lk; Ac) agree in placing Simon, Philip, James ('the Less') at the head of each group of four. The members of each group are the same in each list, but within the group the names are interchanged in the various lists. Mt gives the names in pairs (cf. Lk), suggesting that this was the order of their sending. Mt (only) describes Simon Peter as 'the first'—a phrase unnecessary at the head of a list unless it indicates pre-eminence of dignity, *Plummer, 147. The name Peter (cf. 16:18 note) was probably conferred (Knabenbauer, Lagrange) and explained (Lagrange) on this occasion; cf. Mk 3:16. Andrew (like Philip) bears a completely Greek name, evidently not an uncommon custom in 'Galilee of the Gentiles' where Greek was freely spoken. Had other considerations not intervened, Andrew should have appeared at the head of the list because he was the first to come to Jesus, Jn 1:40. James and John both bear Hebrew names. James (Jacob) 'the Greater' was martyred under Agrippa I in A.D. 44, Ac 12:1 f.; John ('the beloved disciple') lived to write the Fourth Gospel towards the end of the century. Philip, like Peter and Andrew, was a native of Bethsaida, Jn 1:44. Bartholomew (Bar-Tolmai, i.e. son of T.) is commonly identified with the Nathanael of Jn 1:45 on the grounds that Nathanael is associated there (as Bartholomew here) with Philip and because Nathanael is grouped with the Apostles in Jn 21:2. Thomas (Aramaic: t'ōmā; Greek: δίδυμος, Jn 11:16, 'the twin') precedes Matthew (unlike Mk; Lk) possibly for politeness' sake; modesty may account, too, for Mt's insertion of 'the publican' (and see note to 9:9). James of Alphaeus (possibly James, son of Cleophas, cf. Jn 19:25) is called 'the Less' or 'the Small', Mk 15:41, to distinguish him from James, son of Zebedee. He is probably to be identified with the Apostle, 'brother of the Lord', first bishop of Jerusalem (cf. Gal 1:19; Ac 15:13). Thaddeus is apparently an Aramaic name ('stout'?) and another name for Jude (brother) of James, Lk 6:16. The surname Thaddeus (Mt; Mk) or the addition 'of James' (Lk) distinguishes him from Judas the traitor. Simon the Cananean, better 'the Zealous' (Aramaic: qana'na) or possibly 'the Zealot' (WV), i.e. former member of the active Jewish nationalist party. Judas Iscariot, i.e. 'man of Qeriyōth', a soubriquet derived from his father, Jn 6:71. Qeriyōth is an unidentified village of Judah, Jos 15:25. Judas himself probably lived in Galilee like the other Apostles. 5-16 Instructions for the Local Mission (Mk 6:8-11; f Lk 9:2-5; cf. Lk 10:4-12; Mt 11:24)—5-8. In the divine plan Israel was to be first beneficiary of the Messianic offer, Rom 1:16; the Apostles, therefore, are not yet to walk the roads leading to non-Jewish districts ('the way of the Gentiles')—neither northwards to pagan Syria nor south to Samaria, mixed in population and diluted in Yahwism since the Assyrian colonization of the 8th cent.; cf. Jn 4:7. The mission is confined to Galilean territory. Mk and Lk, writing for Gentile readers, delicately omit the prohibition. 7-8. The theme of the preaching is summed up in a sentence. It is the Baptist's theme (3:2 note) and our Lord's, 4:17. Miracles will guarantee the genuineness of their message. Their missionary purpose must not be obscured or defeated by the passing of money; the power of miracle and doctrine had cost the Apostles nothing. 9-10. Our Lord's advice for the journey is not 'practical' in the usual sense, but consists in a complete reliance on Providence. No need for gold, 692g silver, copper in their girdle-pouches (DV 'money in your purses'); nor food-satchel nor warm clothing (cf. Mk 6:9) but barefoot and unarmed ('nor a staff'). Mk. 6:8-9, allows shoes and a staff. It would be difficult to prove that Mk and Mt are speaking of different varieties of shoe and staff (cf. however, Knabenbauer in loc; Power, Bi 4 [1923] 241-66; WV note). It is more probable (Maldonatus, Lagrange, Prat, Buzy, Bover) that the general sense, and not the actual words, is preserved by each evangelist and worded according to his scope (cf. Augustine's words quoted on 9:18-19). Thus Mt's atmosphere is of complete detachment, Mk is more practical; the substance of each is the same, viz. no undue anxiety but reliance upon Providence. The supernatural powers of the Apostles cannot be sold or bought, 8, but for the labour involved in their exercise, and in the preaching of the gospel they deserve their upkeep (cf. Lk 10:7; 1 Tim 5:17-18; Gal 6:6; 1 Cor 9:13-14). Providence will see that this is provided.

h 11-15. Arrived at his destination the Apostle having found a respectable (DV 'worthy') house should lodge there until he leaves the town lest he appear restless or fickle or over-particular in material things. 'Peace!' (salôm) is the common oriental greeting, but on apostolic lips it takes a religious significance; it is efficacious if its recipients be worthy. In biblical writings, 'peace' is the sum of all blessings. This apostolic blessing (like God's own word, cf. Is 55:11) cannot be robbed of its intrinsic power by the unworthiness of the person addressed: it returns to the giver that he may confer the rejected benefit on some worthy house. The despised blessing even becomes a curse: the last Judgement will show that such rejection of the good news of the Kingdom is a crime greater even than the typical wickedness of 'the cities of the plain', Gen 19. Meanwhile, the Apostle will show symbolically that the unworthy house, though evidently Jewish, is no better than pagan territory. The gesture of 'shaking the dust from the feet' is exclusively Jewish, practised on return to the Holy Land after journeys on the 'impure' soil of paganism. It is ironical that the gesture should be turned against Jews (cf. also Paul in Ac 13:51); the Holy Land itself is not proof against uncleanness. It becomes clear that the old order of a confident national religion is passing; cf. 3:9. 16. The sombre possibility of rejection leads, through this transitional verse, to the prospect of active persecution. Good is not violent; evil is (the opposition is brought out symbolically by 'sheep' and 'wolves'); the only defence of the Good, therefore, is the prudence of the serpent quick to perceive attack and to elude it, together with the moral armour of innocence (of which the dove is symbol) which robs the attacking Evil of its pretexts.

693a 17-23 Persecution Prospect (Mt 24:9, 13; Mk 13:9-13; Lk 21:12-17, 19 and cf. Lk 12:11 f.)—The horizon widens and darkens and the tone of the passage suggests that Mk and Lk (as even Mt in summary fashion, 24:9, 13) have rightly placed its delivery at the end of our Lord's life. 17-20. The terms (kings, governors, testimony to the Gentiles) though possibly explainable of Jewish territory (cf. 10:5) hint at a wider field. Parenthetically, 19-20, the Apostles are assured that they may still rely on Providence in their official defence of the gospel-message. No anxious thought (μη μεριμνήσητε, cf. 6:27) will be necessary; the Spirit of their Father will suggest their line of defence. The readiness of the Apostles to face trial with courage will be a guarantee of their doctrine. We should notice how, in the remainder of this chapter, our Lord presents himself as the focus of devotion; cf. 'for my sake' etc., 18, 22, 32 f., 37 f., 39. The emphasis would be unique and intolerable in the mouth of a merely human prophet. 21-23. Domestic dissension (not the formal overthrow of the old authorities spoken of in 10:35 where Mic 7:6 is quoted) will result because it is a new and practical religion with a defined rallying-point ('for my name's sake') that is to be preached, not merely a philosophical system. Perfect endurance (cf. on 24:13) will alone secure salvation: hence the preacher must persevere though hounded from town to town. He need not fear that he will exhaust the cities, his places of refuge, before the 'Son of Man' intervenes on his behalf; cf. on 16:28.

24-33 Moral and Physical Violence; Intrepidity (cf. b Lk 6:40; 12:2-9; cf. Mk 8:38; Lk 9:26)—Fear of calumny must not prevent the preaching of the mystery of the Kingdom, 24-27; fear of death must not deter the confessors of Christ, 28-33. The tenor of the words suggests that they concern the period after our Lord's death. 24-25. A tiny parable, lightly ironical, warns the disciples that at least they may expect no better treatment than their Teacher. They should be satisfied with the same. Indeed, lacking their Master's personal dignity, the slaves may expect worse—he had already been accused of alliance with 'the prince of devils', 9:34. Vg, DV read 'Beelzebub', identifying the 'Beelzebub' of the Gk text with the name of the god of Accaron, 4 Kg 1:2 f.; 6:16. Beelzebub is probably the Heb. form of the Assyrian bēl dabābi (an opponent in a process of law). The name was chosen by the Philistines perhaps because this god was adored, in placatory fashion, as man's adversary (Heb. šatan) in the final judgement. The correct reading of all the Gk NT texts is 'Bee(1)zebul' which appears to be related to the B'zbl (actually zbl-B'l) of the Ras-Shāmra-Ugarit texts, i.e. the prince-god (prince, Ugaritic zbl, cf. Gen 30:20; god, b'l). Since the pagan gods are reckoned as demons, 1 Cor 10:20, the term Beelzebub becomes equivalent to 'the prince of devils' (cf. 9:34; 12:24; Mk 3:22; Lk 11:15). Cf. Zorell, Lexicon Hebraicum, 1947, Ba'al; z'bul. The name is therefore apt for the arch-enemy of the true God. 26-27. Repeated calumny may lead to self-doubt which, however, is excluded in this case by the knowledge that the perfect Master was thus attacked ('therefore fear them not'). Another reason for confidence in these circumstances is that the truth will prevail either when the gospel-message triumphs on earth or at least in the final account, 32 f. With this for comfort let the knowledge of the Kingdom, confided in the intimacy of the apostolic circle (cf. 13:11) be boldly and publicly declared! 28-31. God alone, not the devil (cf. Jas 4:7) is to be feared, for only with his permission can both soul and body be consigned to perdition (not to 'destruction', i.e. to annihilation, since the idea of the annihilation of the soul would be strange to Jewish theology; cf. Bonsirven, 1, 527-9). The apparent harshness of 28b is due to the vigour of Semitic expression which does not distinguish the permissive from the positive will of God; cf. 13:15 note. A second consideration to cast out fear is that the disciple is not lonely and abandoned among his enemies—he who creates and cares for the sparrows is his Father and cares for every fibre of his being. If the persecutor triumphs over the body (his only sphere, cf. 28) it is only because the Father permits it; such treatment is only a mysterious form of the Father's care. 32-33. By way of conclusion to the gist of the discourse (enduring loyalty to the Son and to his teaching, 17-31) our Lord sounds a personal note. On the basis of fidelity to his own person (a point of considerable theological importance) he is to be counsel for the defence or prosecution before the Father-Judge who, with the Son, will be watching from heaven.

34-39 The New Loyalty and the New Affection (cf. d Lk 12:51-53; 14:25-27; 17:33)—Our Lord introduces an important modification into the current hope of Messianic days: the peace he brings is between God and man, not between man and man, as the world might give, Jn 14:27, and as the Jews expected; cf. Bonsirven 1, 442-4. The dividing sword is his doctrine (cf. Heb 4:12); its supernatural edge cuts, if necessary, through the natural domestic loyalties (cf. Mic 7:6 where the words are a lament for the chaotic state of Samaria). For himself personally, not for his Father only, our Lord boldly claims man's whole heart, 37—it is the claim of God. Even the grim prospect of e 40-42 Sharing the Work and Reward of the Ministry (Lk 10:16; cf. Mt 18:5; Mk 9:37; Lk 9:48; Mk 9:41)—These concluding vv follow naturally upon 14: the 'reception' (cf. 14) is not so much a material welcome (cf. 42) as a docility to the apostolic message (cf. Lk 10:16: 'he that heareth you') which is that of Christ and his Father. It is a meritorious reception of one who speaks on behalf of God ('prophet') if it is accorded not from merely natural politeness but from a supernatural motive recognizing God's truth or God's sanctity in the person of his ministers ('in the name of', i.e. precisely as, because he is; cf. Joüon ad loc.). Even material help, 42, given with the same motive to an insignificant and weary Apostle will associate the giver with the work, and therefore with the reward, of the Apostle.

694a XI 1-30 The New Order: Its Reception—The Baptist's message, 1-6, evokes his praise as the usher of the Kingdom, 7-15, though neither he nor his Master could please the demonstrably ill-disposed, 16-19. This last thought make Mt place here, 20-24, the denunciation of the sophisticated who scorned the preaching of the Kingdom. The same thought leads by contrast to the praise of the Wisdom which chose to reveal the mystery of the Kingdom to the simple by means of the omniscient Son, 25-27. To all such the Son addresses his appeal, 28-30.

b XI 1-6 The Baptist's Message (Lk 7:18-23—1-2. The usual formula (cf. 7:28; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1) closes the discourse of ch 10 and the Baptist's question serves to introduce the theme of ch 11. John's arrest (cf. 14:3 ff.) had been the signal for our Lord's preaching of the Kingdom, 4:12; it was the end of the old order. Word had come to John of our Lord's Galilean activity and it is important to notice (in view of the interpretation of what follows) that it is this activity which provokes the Baptist's question. This question is put through the medium of two, Lk 7:19, disciples. 3. They ask: 'Art thou the Coming One?' (i.e. the one destined to come; cf. the underlying Aramaic participle, Joüon). It is not clear from either NT or Rabbis that the phrase in this form was 'a common Messianic title' (cf. the names of the Messias in Bousirven 1, 360-9) but the Baptist had already referred, 3:11, to Christ as 'the one coming after me' and had indicated him as the Messias. He certainly does not begin to doubt this now—he is no 'reed shaken by the wind'; nor, evidently, is he suspecting for the first time that Jesus may be the Messias. It remains either that the Baptist is hinting at the need for more incisive Messianic action (as, for instance, the outspoken denunciations of Mt 23) in accordance with John's own zealotous Messianism (cf. 3:10-12) or that, himself content with our Lord's gentle method, he sends his disciples for their own instruction. This last view is forced to suppose that when Jesus asks the disciples to 'tell John', 4, he enters into John's little plan. 5. The disciples are privileged to witness miracles, Lk 7:21, which our Lord himself significantly sums up in Isaian Messianic terms; cf. Is 26:19; 29:18 f.; 35:5 f. That the poor (i.e. the simple and docile, cf. 5:3 note) have the good news (εὐαγγέλιον; gospel) announced to them is another sign that the 'acceptable year' of the Lord has indeed come, Is 61:1 f.; cf. Lk 4:18 f. The Messias is in their midst; there is no room for John's disciples to doubt it nor for the Baptist to urge a more explicit Messianic declaration. 6. Our Lord's person and procedure, therefore, are justified in advance by prophecy; to those of goodwill (which sharpens understanding) they are no snare ('scandal') in the way of faith.

7-15 Our Lord's Panegyric of the Baptist (Lk 7:24-28) 694d

—The Baptist is praised not so much for his personal sanctity as for the part he has so faithfully played in the divine scheme. He is the strong bridge between the old and the new order. It is through no fault of his incorruptible temper and unassailable integrity if that bridge has not been used.

7-8. Galilee itself had been stirred by the Baptist's preaching (he had baptized as far north as Salim; cf. Jn 3:23) and Galileans like Andrew and Simon had been among his disciples, Jn 1:40. All knew well enough that John was an envoy of God otherwise they would not have sought the deserted scenes of his activity; clearly they did not go to admire the scenery of the Jordan banks (i.e. the 'waving reeds'—a feature of the scenery happily chosen to suggest, by contrast, the Baptist himself imprisoned now for inflexible principle). They sought a man, then? Yes, but they could not have sought him for any human dignity in him—otherwise, why the 'desert' and not the palace?

9-11a. They knew him, therefore, for one with a supernatural message, but they did not suspect as our Lord now assures them that of all the prophets John is the greatest, or indeed something greater than a prophet—a herald who proclaims the present king. John is the messenger ('angel' DV) of the Messianic age: the messenger announced by the last of the prophets (Mal 3:1; 'a commonplace of Messianic prophecy'; and cf. Edersheim 2, 736 f.). The Lord's words in Malachi's text (cf. § 558a) run: Behold I send my messenger and he shall prepare the way before me. By changing the pronoun Jesus significantly identifies his own coming with that of 'the Lord' in Malachi. In the order of prophetic preparation for the Messianic Kingdom none had such pre-eminence. That John worthily fulfilled the function is supposed throughout, but our Lord is not speaking of his sanctity; it would be idle, therefore, to introduce the question of, e.g. our Lady's excelling sanctity in connexion with the text of 11a. 11b-15. f

Yet (still in the order of dignity and not of sanctity) the members of the Kingdom (already in existence on earth as 11b certainly implies) are more highly privileged ('as sonship excels servitude, cf. Gal 4:4-7', WV note). 12. Now (δὲ) from the time of John's arrest (his 'days' are the days of his unhindered preaching) when our Lord began to proclaim the Kingdom up to the present moment of Christ's speaking these members have been and are occupying the Kingdom. And this by dint of earnest effort ('violence') for indeed it is a kingdom which yields only to attack by storm. It is possible to understand the 'violence' and the 'bearing away' in a hostile sense, e.g. WV, not KNT. The verse then becomes a denunciation of the Pharisaic opposition which seizes upon the Kingdom and bars its entrance to the simple folk who would come to it. Yet such an image is strained and the thought foreign to the context which is concerned with the praise of John's work. The interpretation would compel 12 to be read as a parenthesis since the idea of opposition does not enter until 16. 13. This is happening before their eyes because (γὰρ) the time for prophecy has ended (the 'days' of the Baptist, now over, were its last stage) and the prophesied Kingdom is now a reality. 14. This being so, the audience is asked to give a docile assent to the surprising proposition that the 'Elias', herald of the Kingdom in Mal 4:5 f., is none other than the Baptist; see on 17:11 ff. 15. This passing of one epoch into another is mysterious: the crisis must be attentively studied to be appreciated.

16-19 God's Wisdom misconstrued and vindicated g

(Lk 7:31-35)—The discourse on the Baptist and the Kingdom suggests a reference to the Baptist's reception and to that of the Kingdom, i.e. of our Lord, its representative. The reception of each by the élite of the nation was unfavourable (cf. Lk 7:29 f.; Mt 9:10 f.) and the attitude of our Lord's contemporaries ('this generation') reminds him of petulant children who refuse to join in any game of 'pretend' no matter how wide the choice offered—grave or gay. The com-

695a 20-24 Condemnation of the Sophisticated (Lk 10:13-15)—The chronological place of this discourse is doubtless towards the end of the Galilean ministry, but logically it follows admirably the attack made upon those who had rejected Wisdom's offer and introduces a description of those who accept that offer. 20. Matthew's vague 'then' introduces the condemnation. The towns are not attacked for their immorality (in the narrow sense of the word) as their unfavourable comparison with Sodom, Tyre, Sidon, shows. Their crime is spiritual obstinacy. God's offer, so clearly supported by signs, had brought no change of heart ('penance', cf. 3:2 note). 21. Corozain (Chorazin) and Bethsaida, towns of the lakeside, had seen much of our Lord. The ruins of the former (Khirbet Kerāzeh) stand on the slopes c. 2 m. N. of lakeside Capharnaum; Bethsaida (et-Tell) was near the lakeside on the east bank of the Jordan as it enters the Lake. On the question of two 'Bethsaidas' cf. Mk 6:45 and Abel, Géographie, 2, 279-80. Our Lord's miracles were signs of the imminence of the Kingdom, 11:4-6, and the necessary preparation for the Kingdom was penance, 4:17. The Kingdom (and, therefore, the miracles) were first offered to Israel, but Israel refused the penance. Tyre and Sidon themselves, coastal cities of pagan Phoenicia and typical of those beyond the pale, would not have so refused. 22. In the final assessment of guilt, therefore, rejection of a divine invitation will turn the scale. It is clear how far our Lord is from the national Messianism of his contemporaries and how exactly the Apostle of the Gentiles interpreted him. 23. Capharnaum, privileged to be the adopted home of the Messiah, 4:13, earns a separate condemnation and the most opprobrious comparison (Sodom!). Its pride (cf. e.g. Abd 1:4) is as high as its fall will be abysmal (cf. Is 14:13, 15). Yet this is not so much a prophecy of destruction, material and spiritual, as a declaration of exact and public assessment of worth when the time comes—the term 'hell' is here, like 'heaven', metaphorical.

b 25-30 Revelation to the Simple (Lk 10:21-22)—The Son thanks his Father that the revelation is given to 'little ones', 25-26. The essence of this revelation is the knowledge of the Father through the Son, 27. The Son, therefore, appeals for simple trust in himself, 28-30. The framework of the section recalls the more elaborate appeal for the wisdom of the Law in Eccles 51:1-17 (prayer of thanksgiving), cf. Mt 11:25-26; 51:18-30; the wisdom of the Law; cf. the knowledge of the Father in Mt 11:27; 51:31-38; the appeal, cf. 11:28-30. Nevertheless, the wisdom our Lord asks for does not come from study, however sacred, but from personal abandonment to him—to the Son who reveals more than the Law could ever give. The passage fits excellently into the context of the whole chapter though Lk probably gives it its historical place after the return of the Seventy-two (perhaps nine months after the Baptist's embassy). Certainly Mt's vague 'at that time' contrasts with Lk's precise 'at that moment'.

c 25-26. Our Lord praises (DV 'confesses to') his Father as the overruling Providence of the great plan now shown to be in action. The praise is not for the 'hiding' but for the 'revealing' (in the Semitic manner; e.g. Is 12:1). The simple folk, and especially the disciples, have humbly received both the Baptist and Jesus despite the objections lodged by the sophisticated and astute, 11:18 f. Their simplicity has earned an intuition from God that pierces the difficulties; cf. 1 Cor 1:19-31. 27. This verse has the tone of our Lord's words as reported by the fourth evangelist and has therefore been called 'the Johannine aerolite'; its undoubted authenticity is valuable confirmation of John's fidelity in reporting the substance of Christ's discourses. That the sentence is found also in Lk shows that it has strong roots in the Christian tradition, and its content is in complete accord with Mt's Christology. 'If we add the fact that a similar use of the Son—the Father occurs in Mk 13:32, this usage as a traditional saying of Christ is as strongly supported as any saying in the Gospels' (Allen, p. 123). The dogmatic force of the passage can hardly be overstated, especially if we remember that our Lord is implicitly identifying himself with the Wisdom of God (cf. his use of Eccles 51). The Son possesses the fullness of the Father's knowledge (πάντα παρέδοθην). The bold statement that only the Father is adequate to know the Son puts both on the same transcendent plane. Moreover, the Son alone knows the Father and uses his absolute discretion in making the Father known according to the capacity of his hearers. 28-30. The Great Appeal (Mt only). The Son asks for devotion to his own person and acceptance of his yoke as of his comfort. This is not the language of a prophet, but of the Son who holds unique relationship with the Father, 27. The 'yoke' (current metaphor for the Law; cf. Jer 5:5; Eccles 51:34; Ac 15:10) is that of the New Legislator. It is easier (χρηστός) because he perfects the Law, 5:17, making outward observance subservient to inward spirit and thus developing a law of love, available and attractive to all of goodwill, 5:3 ff. Being his yoke it brings, too, the gift of his help. He asks for obedient disciples (μάθετε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ, DV 'learn of me') because (not 'that') he is the perfect master—not overbearing nor of an exclusive caste (unlike the Pharisees) but gentle and of a lowly condition willingly embraced ('humble of heart').

XII 1-45 Divine Wisdom against Human Sophistication—Four incidents, 1-8; 9-14; 22-37; 38-45, furnish our Lord with an opportunity to show his divine wisdom in action against the 'wisdom' of this world; cf. 11:24-27. They show how simple and kind is the one, how tortuous and ruthless the other.

1-8 First Sabbath Question: the Ears of Corn (Mk 2:23-28; Lk 6:1-5)—1-2. To judge by the order of Mk and Lk (Mt uses his vague 'at that time', cf. 11:25; 14:1) it is shortly after the call of Matthew. Jesus and his disciples take a short Sabbath walk (about half a mile) through the fields. Reaping and threshing were two of the thirty-nine works forbidden on the Sabbath. Later rabbinic casuistry regarded plucking the ears as reaping, and rubbing between the hands (Lk) as threshing (Edersheim 2, 56, 783). The watchful Pharisees were already of this persuasion. 3-4. Refusing to enter into casuistical discussion Jesus solves the question on the principle that necessity excuses from such 'positive' law. He makes this principle irrefutable for his audience by citing the example of the great David, 1 Kg 21:1-6. From the anger of Saul David had fled to Nob of Benjamin where the Tabernacle then was. Achimelech the high-priest allowed him to eat of the twelve loaves called often 'of the face' (because placed in God's presence in the sanctuary) or 'of proposition' (προθέσταις, i.e. 'placed before'; cf. Lev 24:5-9). This offering was renewed weekly, the withdrawn loaves being eaten (by reason of their sacred character) by the priests. Yet David's necessity prevailed over this positive law and the exception had the high-priest's sanction. 5-6. Our Lord adds (Mt only) that the temple-sacrifice offered on the Sabbath, Lev 23:25; 24:8-9; Num 28:9, is a literal infringement of the sabbath-rest. A remark inviting the obvious retort: the temple service stands alone and clearly transcends all other duties. But the retort is boldly anticipated: There is something greater (μείζον)

696b than the temple here. The presence of Jesus turns the field into a sanctuary. The saying opens up limitless horizons (Lebreton). In conjunction with other sayings (notably Jn 2:19; cf. Dubarle, RB 48 [1939] 21-44) it offers the person of Jesus as the great substitute for the old sanctuary—a substitution already hinted in Messianic prophecy (e.g. Is 28:7-22; Mic 3:12-5:1; Ez 11:16; Dan 9:23-27; cf. Feuillet, RB 56 [1949] 70-5 and notes to Mt 24:30). 7. (Mt only). The quotation is telling (Os 6:6; cf. on 9:12-13, where it has been used already). These Pharisees have not penetrated the spirit even of the old Law. Otherwise they would not have allowed their legal scruples to oust prudent and charitable judgement of the guiltless disciples. 8. Why guiltless? Because their master, the Son of Man (§ 690a), is Master (κύριος) of the divinely instituted Sabbath and can dispense at will. 'Taken in the light of the preceding verses this claim to be "Lord of the Sabbath", like so much else in the gospel, cannot adequately be explained by anything short of Christ's divinity' (WV).

c 9-14 Second Sabbath Question: Withered Hand (Mk 3:1-6; Lk 6:6-11)—On another Sabbath (Lk in the synagogue (prob. of Capharnaum, cf. Mk 1:21; 3:1) a man with a withered hand was present, probably asking a cure. The scribes and Pharisees (Lk) are there to trap our Lord in act (Mk, Lk) and speech (Mt). In their eyes only danger of death could excuse the administration of extraordinary remedies on the Sabbath (Edersheim 2, 59-60). 11-13. (Mt only). Our Lord's reply (clear in sense but Semitic in form and awkwardly translated) is not explicitly abstract and final (unlike 8) but primarily practical and deterrent. It halts the Pharisees by making them see their scruples in due perspective. In the case of a beast, their own property, no Sabbath-scruples; in the case of a man, a mere individual to them, a singular delicacy of conscience! Underlying the argument however (and explicitly in Mk 3:4) there is also the principle that a good act is permissible at any time. Our Lord, far from condemning the procedure in favour of a sheep implicitly approves it as a dictate of common prudence. It is a frontal attack upon Sabbath-casualty, for which in general cf. Edersheim 2, 777-87. On our Lord's sorrow and anger on this occasion cf. Mk 3:5. 14. For the Pharisees this act of defiance following on the others (cf. 9:44 ff.; 9:11 ff.; 12:2 ff.) was the last straw. Already decided on our Lord's death they are now concerned only with procedure. This they discuss with the supporters of Antipas ('Herodians' Mk 3:6, see note).

d 15-21 The Gentle Messiah (cf. Mk 3:7-12; Lk 6:17-19)—Jesus knew (either naturally or supernaturally) the murderous mind of his enemies; he therefore withdraws to the country districts. When the appointed time came he would deliberately walk into the enemy camp (Mt 20:17-19; Lk 13:22, 33; Jn 11:16); meanwhile there was work to do; cf. 10:23. He did not intend that he should be 'made known' as the Messiah and popularly so acclaimed. He was no demagogue but the gentle 'Servant of God' described by Isaiah, Is 42:1-4; 41:9. In the form of this quotation Mt is influenced partly by the Heb. text, partly by LXX, partly by his own purpose in using it. Thus 'My beloved' ('my chosen one', HT, LXX) recalls the 'beloved son' of the Baptism; cf. 3:16-17 where the 'spirit' also appears. 'He shall not contend' ('provoke dispute') is a reasonable adjustment ('shout aloud', HT, LXX) to fit the withdrawal of our Lord, 15, from unseemly and useless dispute with the Pharisees. The 'Gentiles' of 21 (lit. 'nations', ἔθνη as in LXX) replace the 'islands' (i.e. 'distant lands') of HT; it is an equivalent but more suitable expression for a Gospel which is to close with the words 'teach all nations'. The general sense of the passage here, as in Isaiah, is that the 'Servant of God' will expound (God's) integral truth to the nations outside Israel ('shew judgement', 18; 'judgement', κρίσις rendering the Heb. mišpāṭ, a word which here embraces the whole revelation of God to his people, cf. Kissane, The Book of Isaiah, 2, 35 f.). 19. The triumph of this 'Servant's' mission will come not by noisy propaganda, 19, nor by harsh measures, 20. On the contrary, he will be tender with the (spiritually) weak and prudent with the souls in which the divine light is flickering out—the 'injured reed' and the 'smouldering wick' (DV 'smoking flax'). This is to be his firm policy right to the end when he shall establish God's truth victorious (by his Resurrection?). Thenceforward the whole world will find its hopes in his 'name'—in his Person as revealed by his works and by those who tell of them.

22-24 Exorcism and Pharisaic Calumny (Lk 11:14-15; cf. Mk 3:22)—22. The miracle is similar to that of 9:32-34 with the added detail (absent from Lk 11:14) that the possessed man was not only dumb but blind. It is possible that Mt returns to the same miracle here (in the context of the condemnation of the Pharisees) to tell of the controversy merely hinted at in 9:34. Alternatively (Prat, 1, 313) 9:32-34 may be an anticipation. It is possible that we have two distinct miracles but this hypothesis would seem to imply that our Lord did not reply to the grave calumny of 9:34. This would be surprising. 23. Among the crowd there are tentative murmurs: Is this man perhaps (μήτις—only half-incredulous) the Son of David? (the Messiah; cf. 1:1 note). 24. With the Pharisees are scribes from Jerusalem (Mk)—evidently the plot, 14, goes forward and the Jerusalem Sanhedrin is in action. 'This man', they say, scornfully echoing the crowd's phrase, 'is himself possessed by the prince of devils [Mk] who, through him, casts out the minor demons'. The accusation is desperate and (as our Lord will show) absurd. For 'Beelzebub' cf. 10:25 note.

25-30 Our Lord's Retort: Significance of his Exorcism f (Mk 3:23-27; Lk 11:17-23)—Jesus, supernaturally aware of the Pharisees' mind, first demonstrates the absurdity, 25-26, and dishonesty, 27, of the charge. He then passes to the positive conclusion to be drawn from his exorcisms, 28-29, and throws down a challenge, 30. 25. The general principle is axiomatic: a divided kingdom (as Israel knew to its cost) is devoured piecemeal by its foes; indeed civil dissension in even smaller communities (civic or domestic) is calamitous. 26. The particular and topical application is obvious. The great 'Adversary' (ṣāṭān; cf. 4:10 note) of all goodness is himself no exception. Our Lord appeals implicitly not to a single instance of exorcism (which Satan might instigate for his own subtle ends) but to repeated examples; cf. e.g. 8:16. If this were a set policy it would be the policy of a fool which Satan is not. Satan, therefore, does not cast out himself (i.e. his satellites)—the paradoxical expression underlines the contradiction in the Pharisaic argument. 27. The argument, moreover, issues from prejudice. The Pharisees were the spiritual leaders of the nation at large. Among their disciples, therefore ('children'—a Semitism) were some who at least claimed to enjoy a certain success in exorcism (Jos., Ant. 8, 2, 5; Ac 19:13-14; Mk 9:38). Why did not the Pharisees denounce them? Such exorcists are therefore living witnesses and (were the question put to them) perforce judges of their own spiritual teachers. 28. Satan excluded, there remains the one alternative—the spiritual power of God. That our Lord freely wields this power, without effort or restriction, is clear proof that he is the founder of a new era—the 'kingdom of God' (usually 'of the heavens' in Mt but here used to balance the phrase 'spirit of God'). 29. How can it be otherwise since our Lord is already pillaging Satan's kingdom? Satan, therefore, must be helpless. He is helpless not because weak or careless but because Jesus, stronger than he, has overcome him just as a robber may overpower a strong and vigilant householder. This victory has already taken place (with the Incarnation?); it remains only to gather the spoils. 30. It is a climax of history, a time for decisions. There are only two possible choices—God or Satan. Our Lord speaks with a calm assurance of dignity which recalls his manner of speech 696g in Jn. He will not accept tolerant neutrality nor benevolent suspension of judgement. The words are addressed probably to the waverers, hardly to the Pharisees who are clearly his enemies. The 'gathering' and 'scattering' metaphor is obscure. It is probably neither agricultural nor pastoral but general: all work is dissipation of energy when not united with the cause of Jesus.

697a 31-32 Blasphemy of the Spirit (Mk 3:28-30; Lk 12:10)—The meaning of 'blasphemy of the Spirit' is to be determined by the context. In the first place, it is blasphemy against (objective genitive) the holy Spirit; cf. 32. But, secondly, what precisely is the sin in question? The context (to which 31-32 are closely tied; cf. 'therefore' in 31 and even more explicitly Mk 3:30) is decisive. The sin referred to is one of which an example has just been furnished by the Pharisees. They have perversely attributed to Satan what is clearly the work of God. This is only one example of conscious, hardened rejection of God's proffered light—the root-vice of the Pharisees (cf. Jn 9:41; 3:19 f.) as of others. This is the direct affront of the Spirit of wisdom; cf. e.g. 1 Cor 2:10-13. It is the sin 'that remaineth', Jn 9:41. Why does it 'remain'? Why is it unforgivable? Of its very nature. Man cannot be saved without the gifts of God, one of which is forgiveness. If these gifts are perseveringly refused nothing can be done. 'It is called "unforgivable" because of its very nature it precludes those things (i.e. the dispositions) which induce forgiveness. However, we cannot thus exclude the power and mercy of God which can find a way of forgiveness . . . by which, as it were miraculously, he heals such sinners', ST II, 2, 14, a. 3. Even in this hypothesis of a 'quasi-miraculous' grace the sinner is presumed to accept it. At that moment and to that extent he ceases to affront the Spirit; he ceases to be a blasphemer of the Spirit because he has (though tardily) accepted God's light. Our Lord's statement is therefore literally true: it shall never be forgiven because it refuses to be forgiven. The 'word against the Son of Man' is, though grave, forgivable. To assail the human conduct of our Lord (e.g. 9:11 or even 16:22) is an insult to his compassionate humanity but it proceeds from a misreading of God's ways. It may presuppose a religious, if indocile, spirit. It finds some excuse in the fact that the Word has taken flesh and is, to that degree, veiled. But an attack upon the Son of Man when manifestly wielding the power of the Spirit is conscious malice—an attack upon the Spirit himself.

b 33-35 Attack upon Pharisaic Hypocrisy (cf. Lk 6:45)—33. A maxim already used by our Lord, 7:17-20, is now given a different turn. It is a direct assault on the Pharisees for their blasphemous words, 24, an appeal, in the spirit of 30, for a downright attitude and for clear issues. Nature knows no deception: from good fruit one may argue a healthy tree. Not so the Pharisees. From their customary pious discourses one would not guess at their inward corruption. They are as dangerous, therefore, as a brood of vipers. Let them reform inwardly or at least show their corruption outwardly in speech. The form of 33 is awkward. *Black, 148 f., suggests the Aramaic original: A good tree makes, i.e. produces, good fruit etc.—the participle for 'makes' having been read as an imperative. 34. They are an unnatural and repellent phenomenon because words are customarily the 'heart's overflow' (KNT) and if the store of the heart is good, the mouth dispenses what is good (35).

c 36-37 The Idle Word (Mt only)—In the present context our Lord's words sound a grave warning for the Pharisees. If every casual (ἀργός, i.e. do-nothing, lazy) word will be accountable for (the text does not necessarily imply 'condemned'), how searching will be the examination of considered pronouncements like the deliberate blasphemy of the Pharisees! 37 has the ring of a proverb, particularly as 'thou' replaces the 'you' of the previous verse. The 'words' are a sure criterion of acquittal ('justification') or condemnation since, if we except the Pharisaic monstrosity of 34, they 697c are the index of the heart, 34, 35.

38-45 Attack upon Pharisaic Unbelief (Lk 11:29-32) d —38. After the rebuff of the Pharisees, 24-34, others continue the conversation ('answered and said', cf. the Aramaic idiom 'aneh u'amar, i.e. 'spoke up and said', in which there is no suggestion of answering a question but merely of reacting to certain circumstances or words; e.g. Dan 2:26). They ask for a convincing proof of our Lord's Messianic mission—a 'sign' of their own choosing more startling than the miracles so far witnessed; see 16:1, § 703 f. 39. Ignoring the veneer of politeness our Lord directly attacks the questioners as representatives of an evil and 'adulterous' race, faithless to God, Israel's spouse; cf. Os 2; Ez 16, etc. A sign will indeed be given but, as a race, they shall reject it; cf. 41. 40. The sign is the Resurrection though the word is not spoken, and the allusion remains cryptic until the event unveils it. If we remember that analogies are not designed to be urged too far, the likeness is striking between the OT presentation of Jonas's story and our Lord's burial (though again the term is not used) and Resurrection. As the fish (κῆτος, sea-beast KNT) swallows Jonas so the earth shall swallow-up the Son of Man. The disappearance is 'for three days and three nights' in each case. In Jon 1:17 this phrase may or may not indicate 72 hours; Heb. usage makes the expression ambiguous (cf. e.g. Est 4:16 with Est 5:1 and the Jewish method of reckoning part of a day, month or year for the whole; SB I, 649). In our Lord's case it certainly does not indicate 72 hours as the evangelist, though faithfully recording the expression, well knew, 16:21; 17:23; 20:19. In any case, the general analogy is enough and this point should be remembered also when it is objected that Jonas was body and soul in the fish and our Lord's body only in the tomb or when it is urged that 'the heart of the earth' is as deep in the earth (and therefore Limbo?) as the 'belly' is in the fish. 41. The example of the Ninevites will rise accusing at the final reckoning. (It is possible, however, that the words 'in judgement' have been added by the Greek translator; the original Aramaic would then read simply 'shall rise with this generation', i.e. in the Aramaic idiom 'dispute with, reproach', Black, 97.) It will put the incredulous Pharisees to shame—their missionary was not a mere prophet but the Son of Man himself. 42. Cf. 1 Kg 10:1 ff. This fresh contrast is of another order: it suggests not the impenitence of the Pharisees but their refusal to recognize the true wisdom offered them. The queen of Sheba (in SW. Arabia, called the Yemen, i.e. 'the south') travelled far to hear one whose wisdom, though proverbial in Israel, did not compare with this. 43-45 Hypocritical and Cynical Pharisees warned of their Danger (Lk 11:24-26)—By means of a comparison suggested by the present exorcism incident, 22-24, Jesus warns his opponents against a false sense of security. There is peril in over-confidence—in the calm assurance of the Pharisees conscious of Israel's privileged status, unconscious of spiritual need. They cannot afford to refuse the help of Jesus who alone opposes Satan with the Spirit of God, 28-29. 43. The unclean spirit ('unclean' as opposed to the 'holy' Spirit) appears as a tenant not necessarily evicted but perhaps simply seeking a change of residence. 44. He finds the waterless countryside unsuitable and decides to return to his old home. To his delight it is still untenanted (σχολεύοντα), cleaned and decorated (κεκοσμημένον). 45. Anxious to share his good fortune (there is no suggestion of gathering forces for a battle) he invites a whole band ('seven'—the number of completion) of like-minded spirits. Packed with this unclean horde the house is made dirtier than ever. Applied to this 'wicked generation' the comparison invites it to consider the possibility that the God-favoured house of Israel may, through sheer indifference, be open—with vacant possession—to Satan. Such indifference will make the state of Israel more g 46-50 True Kindred of Christ (Mk 3:31-35; Lk 8:19-21—48. The episode has no obvious logical connexion with the rest of the section nor is it clear that it took place at this time: Mt's apparently precise indication ('as he was yet speaking') is, in reality, his own vague connecting formula, 9:18; 17:5; 26:47. Mt, who is primarily interested in our Lord's pronouncement, 48-49, does not say why his 'brethren' sought him (see Mk 3:21 where the 'friends' are probably relations, i.e. 'brethren'; cf. Mk 3:31-32). Of this passage Lagrange pointedly remarks: 'The presence of our Lord's mother on this occasion no more proves that she shares the sentiments of the others than does her presence at the foot of the Cross'. She is there simply because she wants to be near him. 47-48. The house (cf. 13:1) is full, Mk 3:20. Mary and the 'brethren' are outside. Our Lord is informed. (47 is unnecessary and absent from MSS B & S and from the early Syr. versions. It is excluded, probably rightly, by Hort and von Soden). Our Lord takes up the words of his informant to drive home a lesson. 49-50. With a gesture and a word he sets the example of complete detachment (enjoined on his followers in 10:37) in the interests of the Father. He acknowledges no kinship but with those who are obedient and therefore genuine children of the one Father. His mother was dear to him for the same reason, Lk 1:38. For such he uses the nearest and dearest terms—brother, sister, mother—but 'father' is reserved for his Father in heaven. The terms 'brother' and 'sister' in 12:50 do not necessarily define the word 'brethren' of 12:46 f. which (cf. Mk 3:32; 6:3) is actually to be understood of 'relations' in general. To indicate relationship of affection our Lord was restricted to the terms 'brother', 'sister' because the terms of more distant relationship ('cousin', 'aunt', etc.) would be absurd used in a figurative sense.

698a XIII 1-53 The Parables of the Kingdom—The foregoing chapter presented our Lord and the Pharisees; in ch 13 our Lord turns to ordinary folk. In contrast with the direct teaching of the Sermon, chh 5-7, his teaching is now in 'parables'. They are of various kinds, but the subject throughout this 'day of parables' is one—the kingdom of God, the great subject of our Lord's preaching, 4:17; 10:7; cf. Lk 4:42-43; 10:9; Ac 1:3. The term 'parable' (παράβολη) means 'comparison'. The Gospel parables may be defined as: fictitious though likely stories designed to clarify a moral lesson or doctrinal truth by means of comparison; cf. Prat, I, 320-1; 549-54. The parable is a comparison to be taken as a whole; its details are inserted merely to make the story live. In this it is distinguished from the allegory which is a chain of metaphors of which each link has its own significance. It follows that the lesson of the parable inclines to simplicity and clarity; the lessons of the allegory are multiple and tend to obscurity. Yet some allegories may be clear and some parables obscure by reason of the circumstances of their utterance or of the difficulty of the subject treated. The gospel parables, especially those concerning the Kingdom, often contain allegorical elements. This phenomenon has been used to prove that such parables have been decorated with allegory by the evangelists. Jesus, it has been claimed, would not have used allegory since it would obscure his message. In this theory the evangelists, anxious to explain to pagan and Jew the blindness of the Messiah's own people, have deliberately obscured the parables with allegorical elements. The theory is exaggerated. Allegory and parable are similar literary forms and the intrusion of allegory into parable is a natural process (*C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom, London 1936). Moreover, the mixture of the two is equally characteristic of the rabbinic 'parables' in the first centuries of the Christian era; cf. D. Buzy, Introduction aux Paraboles Évangéliques, Paris 1912, 148-54.

1-2 The Setting (Mk 4:1; Lk 8:4)—Mt's phrase 'the same day' may be as vague as his other phrase 'at that time', or (if intended to be exact) may apply only to some of the parables in the chapter. Leaving the house (cf. 12:46; on this 'house', Matthew's own with some probability, cf. Lagrange, Mt, lxxvi f.) our Lord goes down to the lakeside. So that all may see and hear he addresses the throngs from one of the boats moored there.

3-9 The Sower (Mk 4:3-9; Lk 8:5-8)—3-4. In Palestine the farmer sows after the first autumn rains (usually November). His hedgeless fields are bordered, and often traversed, by stony paths. Willy-nilly some seed, scattered from his basket, must fall on the track ('on' rather than 'by'—παρά is probably a mistranslation of the ambiguous Aramaic al; cf. Lk 8:5 where the seed is 'trodden under foot', Black 120). The greedy Palestinian sparrow is not slow to seize it. 5-6. Even in Galilee the stony soil lies thin on outcrops of rock. The very lightness of such soil favours too rapid growth (perhaps within a few hours) and the sun, still strong in November, will shrivel the delicate shoot unsustained by moisture from a deep root. 7-8. The Palestinian farmer prefers to cut his weeds. The result is disastrous: they stifle everything in the vicinity. As for the more fortunate seed, it is a mistake to look for botanical precision in a parable. Our Lord's figures are selected at random to illustrate the abounding virtue of the seed. In special cases one seed may produce (even in Palestine) two or three hundred grains of cereal (Bi 8 [1927] 84-5), but the ordinary Palestinian farmer (from whom our picture is taken) is content with an average yield of 12 to 1. 9. Far from wishing to puzzle his audience our Lord seriously asks them to reflect upon his words. His formula (again in 11:15; 13:43, cf. Deut 29:4 where the absence of the listening 'ear' suggests guilt) implies that in these matters goodwill facilitates understanding; cf. Jn 3:21.

10-17 Purpose of the Parables (Mk 4:10-12; Lk 8:9-10—10. The disciples (not only the Twelve; cf. Mk 4:10, WV) seem puzzled at this indirect method of teaching. Their question, however, was not put until they were alone with Jesus, Mk 4:10. 11. The notion of the 'kingdom of heaven' embodies the hidden design (μυστήριον) of God. The mass of the Jewish people were ill-prepared for a direct and sudden revelation of its profound nature. The indirect teaching by parable must for the time suffice; direct light would only blind. But the inner circle of disciples, willing to be taught and destined to teach, can and must be told. It should however be noticed that this inner circle was not a closed circle. It was open for all who heard the parables to show their goodwill by making further inquiries. 12. Our Lord observes that a worldly practice, common but not admirable, here finds its spiritual application. The rich are flattered with gifts, the poor suffer violence and loss. Those who accept and are rich in the gifts of God (which include docility, pliant will, generous heart) amass further treasures; cf. Jn 1:16. The spiritual pauper has only himself to blame (cf. 'Ask and it shall be given', 7:7)—and this explains how an axiom of unjust worldly practice can have its counterpart in the spiritual order. He is said, by a paradoxical hyperbole, to lose what he has—which is nothing. The application of this dictum to the present situation seems to presuppose some fault (as it does in 25:29 where it is used again) on the part of the people at large. 13. This fault is a lack of spiritual perception. Confronted with this, our Lord did not withdraw as he did from the actively malignant Pharisees, 12:15. He mercifully remained to do what he could in the circumstances. Like stupid children the people could learn only from little stories—analogies which, though helpful, could not plumb the depths of the mysterious 'Kingdom'. 14-15. Cf. Is 6:9-10. Isaiah had been thwarted by the same dispositions. His experience rehearsed that of the Messiah-Prophet as the OT history in general was a rehearsal of the Messianic

698d era. Mt reproduces the LXX version (translate : Assuredly you shall hear . . . assuredly you shall see but . . .). This softens the harsh (but heartbroken) irony of the Semitic imperatives : Hear and understand not ! See and comprehend not ! Harden the heart. . . (cf. Is 6:9 with notes). The words expand, by more literal quotation, those of 13 and like them they explain why our Lord is forced to use parables. Whether the purpose of the parables is of chastisement or of benefit is much discussed. In effect we cannot exclude either element. The difficulties of the texts, however, (especially Mk) must be resolved in the light of three certain facts. First : our Lord's own love for this people ; his mission is mercy not judgement ; he has come to save that which was lost, 18:11. Second : the parable is designed not to obscure but to clarify ; absolutely speaking, it is not the most direct and efficient form of teaching, but relatively to the capacity of the audience's mind and heart it may be the only possible one ; the only alternative would be silence. Third : graces refused become matter for condemnation. The question is treated at some length in, e.g. Buzy, Introduction aux Paraboles, 231-413 ; A. Charue, L'Incrédulité des Juifs dans le Nouveau Testament, Gembloux 1929, 141-4 ; Durand, ER 107 (1906) 256-71 ; Lagrange RB 7 (1910) 5-35 and L'Evangile de Jésus-Christ, Paris 1932, 168-71 ; Lebreton, Life and Teaching of Jesus Christ (Eng. tr.), London 1935, 239-53 ; F. Prat, Jésus-Christ, 1, 340-1 ; Skrinjar, Bi 11 (1930) 291-321 ; 426-49 ; 12 (1931) 27-40. 16-17. Our Lord does not praise the docility of the disciples, but invites them to be grateful for God's free gift. Born in less happy times men as just as they and even the prophets could only peer into the great dim future, 1 Pet 1:10 ff. In that future, now present, the disciples are privileged to live and not only to live but to be the pupils of the Master in the new era ; cf. 'therefore' in 18.

699a 18-23 The Sower Parable explained (Mk 4:13-20 ; Lk 8:11-15)—'You therefore', says our Lord, 'hear ye the parable'. Actually it is the meaning of the parable that they are about to hear, but in Aramaic there is no exact expression for 'significance, explanation' ; cf. similar defective phrases in Mk 4:10 ; 9:10 ; Lk 8:11 ; Joüon 86 f. The seed is the doctrine (λόγος) of the Kingdom, sown by our Lord and later by the Apostles. For three classes of men it remained fruitless. 19. In some it is a total lack of spiritual appreciation. The 'word' lies unregarded. Satan alone benefits. 'This is he that was sown by the wayside'. The various kinds of soil represent the various kinds of hearers. But since the fate of the seed really represents the spiritual fate of the hearers, the seed and the hearers are in part identified', WV. 20-21. In others there is a thin layer of spiritual perception, but the superficial are given to sudden and ephemeral enthusiasms. The quick growth is not of deep root and soon disappears ; the personal sacrifice entailed and even active opposition 'presently' (i.e. 'immediately', εὐθύς) prove a snare in the moral path of such men. 22. The third category is of those in whom the root strikes deepest. Yet here too the seed will not come to maturity if side by side with it grow preoccupation with the affairs of the world and particularly with the seductive glamour (WV) of riches. 23. Not all the successful seed bears the same fruit, but in all cases it is abundant ; cf. 8 note.

b 24-30 The 'Cockle' (Mt only)—The parable has a setting similar to the previous one and completes it. 24. From the outset our Lord makes it clear that he is speaking of the Kingdom ; contrast 3. But, in the rabbinic manner, the term of the comparison is said to be 'a man who sowed' when, in reality it is the whole situation which is thus compared ; cf. also 13:31, 33, 45, 47 ; 20:1 ; 22:2 ; 25:1. 25-28. The 'cockle' is the lolium temulentum (so named from its effect of dizziness on men and cattle)—more accurately not 'tares' (KNT) but 'darnel' (WV). It is sown secretly and in spite. The weed is indistinguishable from the wheat until its more slender ear appears. 27-29. This plant (rare in England) is common in Palestine, but the servants are astonished at the amount. The farmer himself immediately senses the hand of an enemy, but it is too late, or too early, to act : the roots of weed and wheat are intertwined. 30. He must wait until the ears are ripe and then the wheat, which grows higher than the weed, may be cut near its head while the sickle leaves the weed untouched. It is unusual to sheave weeds, but then it is unusual to sow them : it is an unusual operation to meet an unusual case. Nevertheless there may be allegory here though the sheaving is not mentioned again in the explanation ; 40 mentions only the gathering and burning. For the explanation of the parable see notes to 37-42.

31-32 The Mustard-Seed (Mk 4:30-32 ; Lk 13:18-19) e—Once again it is not precisely to the seed that the Kingdom is compared but to the whole situation ; see on 24. It would seem wiser, therefore, not to attempt to emphasize the pungency or other property of the seed except its apparent insignificance which is an integral part of the parable. This would be allegory without warrant. In the world of nature, as in the word of history, insignificant beginnings may be misleading. It is so with the world-event known as the Kingdom of Heaven. The human activity of our Lord was limited, its immediate results unspectacular. The mustard-plant is the brassica nigra of the botanists. The seed, proverbially tiny (cf. 17:20 and SB 1, 669) is not in fact the smallest known, but our Lord is not giving a lesson in botany. It is the smallest of the familiar seeds, DBV 5, 1601. Its bush is common on the banks of the Jordan and of the Galilean Lake, often reaching a height of 12 ft and therefore called a 'tree' by the Arabs ; cf. Biever, Conférences de Saint Etienne (1911) 281. That the 'birds of heaven come and dwell in its branches' recalls the prophecy of Ez 17:22-24 where the 'tree' (a cedar) is the future Messianic kingdom and 'every bird and winged thing' the people of all the nations. This reminiscence seems to warrant for the 'birds' the allegorical sense of all peoples.

33 The Leaven (Lk 13:20-21)—The preceding parable d stressed the contrast between small beginnings and enormous end ; the present one covers the intermediate process. The Kingdom's development is not a matter of almost inevitable, natural growth from its Old Testament beginnings. It is the issue of forces intrinsic to the element (the yeast) now for the first time implanted in the world. These forces work powerfully, secretly, in every corner. The yeast is small compared with the dough, perhaps one ounce to sixteen or seventeen pounds of flour nowadays in Palestine ; cf. Buzy, 178. The 'measure' chosen by our Lord for his parabolic purpose is the σάτον (Aram. sā'tā ; Heb. s'āh ; which is one-third of an ephah). The 'three measures' are therefore equivalent to one ephah, the unit of capacity slightly more than our 'bushel', RB 28 (1931) 212. This large amount is chosen to illustrate not the size of the kingdom (cf. previous parable) but the power of the 'yeast'.

34-35 Parabolic Teaching foreshadowed (cf. Mk e 4:33-34)—Mt again seizes the opportunity of pointing out the reflexion of the New Order in the Old. The psalmist in 77(78) 2, about to expound the mystery of God's way with his people, dubs his exposition a 'parable' (māšāl ; LXX παραβολή ; in this case a didactic poem). Struck by the word itself, so apt to the teaching he describes, Mt points to the divinely constituted precedent. He insinuates the uniformity existing between the teaching method in the word of God of old and that of the Son of God now. But he insinuates, too, as elsewhere when he quotes the OT, that the psalmist's words would be more profoundly true on our Lord's lips. This last point appears to be emphasized by the form in which Mt puts the second half of the quotation. Unlike the first half it is not identical with LXX but seems to be a more impressive translation of the Heb. 'Enigmatic things of old' (HT, LXX—referring in the psalm to the early days of Israel's history) becomes : 'Things concealed from 699a the time of the foundation' of the world; cf. 25:34. The psalmist ('Asaph' is named in Ps 77:1 and called 'prophet' in 2 Par 29:30) had a much more restricted purpose. Our Lord's doctrine is not contained within the temporal or spatial bounds of Israel.

f 36-43 Cockle Parable explained (Mt only)—Not all the elements of the parable are allegorical. The sleepers of 25, for example, are not careless pastors; nor does the 'binding' of 30 indicate that not one of the wicked shall escape. Such applications may be tentatively made, and were often made by the Fathers, but they were not made by our Lord. He explains the allegory of the main elements only. The conditions described in the parable are said to be those of the early Church, e.g. by *G. D. Kilpatrick, The Origins of the Gospel according to St Matthew, (Oxford 1946) 97; 107. The implication is that the parable, in its present form, is not traceable to Christ. This position, however, makes no allowance for our Lord's divine foreknowledge and refuses him even human foresight. It also ignores the fact (cf. 1 Cor 5:2) that in the early Church the 'cockle' was not always allowed to go unmolested until the 'harvest'. This attitude of the early Christians makes it evident that they did not consider our Lord as laying down exhaustive legislation for a fully constituted society. It makes it still more evident that the parable-allegory is not the invention of the early Church. Moreover, the objection forgets that the problem of God's tolerance (cf. note to 13:19) was not to rise only in the distant future—one of the Twelve was already a traitor, as Jesus knew; cf. Lagrange, Mt. 36. Dismissing the multitudes our Lord returns to the house; 13:1 note. The disciples, emboldened by his words, 11, ask a more detailed explanation of the parable of which, doubtless, they already have the general meaning. 37-38. The field is the world—or that part of it in which the Son of Man has sown. The seed is not now the Word, as in 19, but every 'citizen', every loyal subject, of the Kingdom (in Semitic phrase: 'child of the kingdom'). The 'cockle' is the offspring of evil (or 'of the Evil One'?) i.e. evil deeds and evil men alike; 41 note. 39. The Evil One himself is the spiteful enemy of the Son of Man, attacking him indirectly and by stealth. The explanation takes a leap to the end of the world; the intermediate period of growth is not mentioned, presumably because here it is not significant. It appears, therefore, that the object of the parable is not to define the duties of the leaders in the early Church but simply to explain God's tolerance of evil. The angels who execute God's judgements (Bonsirven 1, 235) gather the crop, wheat and weed. 40. The emphasis on the fate of the 'cockle' (40-42; the 'wheat' goes unmentioned) is in accord with the purpose of the parable: the exercise of retribution is only delayed. 41. The Son of Man must present a perfect Kingdom to his Father, hence it is he who executes judgement (cf. Jn 5:27) through his ministers. (This quiet assumption of authority should not go unnoticed.) These will cleanse the Kingdom of scandals (of acts constituting a moral snare for the faithful) and of those responsible for them (cf. the same distinction in 18:7; cf. also in HT, Soph 1:3 of which our Lord's phrase is probably a reminiscence: 'I will destroy . . . scandals together with the wicked'). 42. The cockle will be cast into the 'furnace of fire', a contemporary synonym for the place of the damned, Bonsirven 1, 537. The 'weeping and gnashing of teeth' sorts ill with the suggestion of burning, but the phrase is stereotyped in Mt (8:12; 22:13; 25:30; in which places it is more naturally associated with the 'exterior darkness'). 43. Finally a word of comfort for the disciples. Their future glory is expressed in terms familiar to Jewish thought (Dan 12:3; Wis 3:7 and the uninspired 4 Esd 7:97; and cf. Bonsirven 1, 520 f.). The Kingdom thus purified now passes from the hand of the Son and becomes the kingdom of the Father; cf. 1 Cor 15:24. For the concluding formula cf. 13:19 note.

44 The Treasure (Mt only)—Mt records this and the following parable without either preamble or explanation. Doubtless the two were proposed to all, like the previous parables. Explanation was scarcely necessary; they are already sufficiently clear. A man finds buried treasure, struck perhaps by his random spade, in another's field—not an unlikely experience in a country familiar with invasion and flight; cf. Jos., BJ 1, 7, 5, 2). He buries it again for security and in his joy (WV) goes off and sells his possessions (the significant trait of this parable as of the next). He buys the field, clearly without acquainting the owner (landlord or employer, presumably) of his discovery. The morality of his action need not be discussed: it lies outside the purpose of the parable which is to teach that the Kingdom is worth the sacrifice of all worldly possessions (cf. 10:37-39).

45-46 The Pearl (Mt only)—A pendant of the former parable with the same moral. The parable naturally finishes with the acquisition (again, at all costs) of the single and valuable pearl. The merchant may have turned connoisseur but, in any case, he is parabolically pictured as retaining the pearl; suggestion of re-sale would have injured the parable.

47-50 The Drag-Net (Mt only)—From pictures of farm and kitchen and market-place our Lord turns to that of lake-fishing, equally familiar to the Galileans. The net (often about one-quarter of a mile in length and about 6 to 10 feet in depth) is sustained by cork floats and weighted with lead. The men on shore pay out the net as the boatmen, holding the other end, describe a wide arc in the lake until they disembark further along the bank. The net, now semicircular, is evenly drawn towards the shore by both parties. Of the thirty or so species of fish in the Lake of Galilee none is worthless (σκαμψός) though the cat-fish (clarias macracanthus) being scale-less was not eaten by practising Jews, Lev 11:9; Deut 14:9. It is unnecessary, however, to seek ichthyological exactitudes: the moral of the parable demands a mixture of bad and good (as in the 'Cockle' parable) and the picture becomes subservient. 49-50. The application of the parable is similar to that of the 'Cockle' (without the epilogue concerning the 'just') of which it is a twin. Both parables make it clear that the Kingdom exists amid earthly conditions before it reaches its final stage of perfection.

51-52 The Scribe in the Kingdom (Mt only)—The disciples assert that they have grasped the implications of the foregoing parables of the Kingdom. Our Lord in reply defines the advantage of such understanding. It is only when he possesses this comprehension of the Kingdom (διὰ τοῦτο) that the 'scribe', thus instructed, becomes comparable to the careful householder. Old garments have not been destroyed but put away in his store-cupboard ready for emergencies. The new must not be used to patch the old, 9:16, but the old has its subservient uses. The 'scribe' (or law-learned) of the new order (cf. 23:34), unlike his counterpart of the old, has the essentials of the Old Law at his finger-tips precisely because he possesses the knowledge of the Kingdom which is the perfection of the Law, 5:17. He is in a position to expound the working-out of God's design not only in its preliminary expression (the Mosaic dispensation) but in its present activity (the Kingdom in being) and even in its consummation, 39-43; 49-50.

53-58 Hostile Reception at Nazareth (Mk 6:1-6a; Lk 4:22b-30)—53-54. From the account of the parables Mt (having already, in chh 8-9, narrated the miracles of Mk 4:35-41; 5:1-20, 21-43) takes us straight to Nazareth, our Lord's home-town; cf. 21:11, Mk 1:9. It is Jesus' second visit; cf. 4:13 and Lk 4:16-30. His teaching in their synagogue astounds them, 7:29 note. They know he has not been trained in the rabbinic schools at Jerusalem. Moreover, they have heard of miracles worked, though not at Nazareth (another source of complaint; cf. Lk 4:23-29). 55-56. With the public our Lord passed for the son of Joseph the 700e carpenter (τέκτων—joiner and housebuilder; cf. Höpfl, Bi 4 [1923] 41-5). His 'brethren' are known to the people of Nazareth: James, Joseph (or Jose; Mk 6:3), Simon, Jude. James is called 'brother of the Lord' in Gal 1:19; nevertheless he is certainly not a son of our Lady but of another Mary ('of Cleophas', cf. Mt 27:56; Mk 15:40; Jn 19:25) who is also the mother of Joseph (Jose); cf. §§ 672-3. If the first two named are only cousins (the Greek term 'brethren' represents the more general Aramaic 'ah') it is scarcely likely that Simon and Jude, named last, are closer relations (Lagrange, L'Evangile, 193-4. On the question of the 'brethren' of the Lord; cf. §§ 672-3). 57-58. Contemptuous familiarity was a psychological obstacle. Our Lord sadly notes this irrational but common attitude. He works only a few unspectacular cures (Mk), evidently upon some of the few who accepted him. He could give nothing (cf. note to Mk 6:5) to those who refused his gifts.

701a D. Round and About Galilee: Formation of the Apostles—XIV 1-XX 16.

XIV 1-12 Antipas, Jesus, the Baptist (Mk 6:14-29; Lk 9:7-9; 3:19-20)—1-2. Antipas (called 'Herod' on his coins), son of Herod the Great by Malthace the Samaritan, was tetrarch ('ruler in that quarter' KNT) of Galilee and Peraea (4 B.C. to A.D. 39). He was living probably in his new town of Tiberias on the SW. bank of the Lake when reports of our Lord's activity became too persistent to ignore. Only guilty superstition could have prompted his absurd conjecture, if, indeed, it is to be taken seriously; cf. Lk 9:9. His courtiers had other ideas, Mk 6:15. 3-4. The imprisonment of John had taken place before our Lord began his Galilean ministry, 4:12. Its cause was John's denunciation of Antipas's adulterous marriage, Lev 18:16; 20:21. Herodias was the wife of his half-brother Philip—not Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis and Iturea, Lk 3:1, but a private individual. To make the case worse, Antipas, though the Baptist does not mention it, was the uncle of Herodias. 5. Mt, unlike Mk, content with general statements of events, does not mention the murderous intent of Herodias, though cf. 8. Nor does he represent as adequately as Mk 6:20 the vacillating character of Antipas, fascinated by John, half-persuaded by Herodias, held back by fear of John's many supporters. This perplexity seems to have lasted for nearly a year.

b 6. The scene was the banquet-hall of the fortress-palace of Machaerus (Mkauer; cf. Jos., Ant. 18, 5, 2). The castle, rebuilt by Herod the Great, lay between Callirhoe and the Arnon. It stood in the mountains of Moab on the southern border of Antipas's Peraean dominion, cf. Abel 2, 371 f. The occasion was the birthday of Antipas; cf. Schürer, 1, 2, 26 f. In place of the usual courtesans danced Salome, daughter of Herodias by her first husband; cf. Jos., Ant. 18, 5, 4. This condescension of a young princess of the blood (perhaps about fifteen years old at the time, certainly not more than twenty) was doubtless instigated by the far-sighted Herodias. 7-8. Antipas fell into the trap. The girl's mother then instructed her (προβιβάζω: not 'instruct before', DV; and cf. Mk 6:24) to ask for the head of the Baptist who lay in the dungeons. The girl herself pertly added 'here, in a dish'; cf. Mk 1:24-25. 9. The unexpected and cold-blooded request sobered Antipas. He was being rushed into an act which did not suit his policy, 5, nor entirely answer his feelings, Mk 6:20. He was a king (tetrarch in fact, 'king' in popular speech; cf. Holzmeister, Historia Aetatis Novi Testamenti, Rome 1932, 54) and a royal, if drunken, oath could not be recalled—if uttered in public! 10-11. The courageous Baptist died a martyr's death for the sanctity of marriage. His head went fitly back to the woman who had schemed so carefully for it. 12. Antipas possibly silenced his strange conscience by allowing the disciples of John to bury the body. For the subsequent history of Antipas, Herodias, Salome, cf. Jos., Ant. 18, 5, 1-4.

e 13-21 First Multiplication of Loaves (Mk 6:31-44;

Lk 9:10b-17; Jn 6:1-15)—13. If Mt's formula is not a transitional cliché it implies that our Lord's suggestion of repose for his disciples (Mk) was reinforced by the fate of the Baptist, 12, and the sinister reflexion of Antipas, 2. The people were evidently excited; Antipas might act; our Lord used his human prudence and retired to a place 'apart', i.e. not so much secluded as removed from the crowds. He and his disciples were on the west side of the Lake (cf. 22, 34), presumably near Capharnaum, Mk 6:32. They quietly withdrew from Antipas's territory and sailed to that of Philip the tetrarch, to the neighbourhood of Bethsaida Julias in Gaulanitis; cf. Lk 9:10. The crowds, not to be thwarted, followed on foot; doubtless they had observed whither the boat was heading. The distance (c 6 m.) was almost twice that by sea, but the disciples, in need of rest, were in no hurry and the crowd arrived first, Mk 6:33. Its numbers had increased as it went. 14. Our Lord's heart could never resist suffering. In the broad, uncultivated plain that lies to the SE. of Bethsaida between hills and sea he healed the sick. He taught the simple folk, too, Mk 6:34. 15. The work went on until late afternoon ('evening': ὀψίας, cf. 23). Our Lord took no heed but the hungry disciples called his attention to the fact that the time (for refreshment?) had slipped by. They were perhaps not thinking solely of the multitudes! 16-17. The Master's command must have left them dumbfounded. It was Peter's brother, Jn 6:8, who told of the boy with the five cheap (barley) loaves and the two dried fish. This remark of Andrew's was not meant to be helpful—Philip had already calculated that two hundred days' labour would not buy the necessary provender. 18-19. The plain of Bethsaida is green in spring at the time of the Pasch, Jn 6:4, and all sat down on the grass in companies, Mk 6:40, at our Lord's bidding. He evidently wished to give the impression of a formal meal and, in the same spirit, he invoked a blessing like the father of a family. The breaking of the bread also, being mentioned by all four evangelists, is evidently significant: our Lord repeated this action just one year later, at the Last Supper, 26:26. It would appear that the ceremony was deliberately symbolic of the Holy Eucharist but the symbolism is our Lord's: the very sober account of the evangelists suggests historical intention on their part and not mere symbolism. Moreover, the presence of the fish and the absence of wine does not suggest that we have here a mere symbol of the Eucharist. (On the opinions of non-Catholic critics cf. Lagrange, Mt, 170 f.) Whether the bread increased in our Lord's hands or in the Apostles' does not appear. 20-21. The prodigality of God's gifts does not excuse human waste and the remnants are gathered up. They fill twelve baskets (the property, perhaps, of the twelve Apostles) whereas the original amount had been carried in one—the boy's. The 'baskets' here are 'hampers' in 15:37 (second multiplication) and the distinction is preserved when our Lord recalls the two miracles, 16:9-10. It would seem that the distinction is not merely literary: 'The κόφινος of 14:20 appears to have been a strong wicker "basket"', (as used for farmwork) 'the ὀψύς of 15:37 a larger "hamper" used chiefly for food (cf. Ac 9:25)' (VV note to Mt 16:9-10).

22-23 Our Lord (Mk 6:45-52; Jn 6:16-21) and e Peter (Mt only) walk on the Waters—22-23. The miracle of the loaves had dangerously excited the people, Jn 6:14 f. It was important that the Apostles should not share their political frenzies; our Lord therefore dispatched them boatwards (εἰς πλοῖον) while he sent the people home. He did not rejoin the Apostles who evidently waited at the lakeside until night fell (Jn 6:17. In Mt and Mk ὥρα as in 15, but here, apparently, bearing the meaning 'night', cf. Lagrange, Mk, 173). Instead, he slipped away from the crowd to pray in the hills surrounding the plain. 24-25. The Apostles left without him, but made poor progress against the high (Jn) and contrary wind. Driven, no doubt, off their course they were in mid-

701a lake (over 3 m. out; Jn) making little headway. There was only one way to rejoin the dispirited Apostles and our Lord took it. The time was between 3 and 6 in the morning—the 'fourth watch' of the night according to the Roman reckoning used by the Jews at this time, SB 1, 688 f. 26-27. The cry of the Apostles: 'It is a ghost' proceeded from the apparent impossibility of any other explanation. The familiar voice calmed and convinced. 28-31. Peter now appears for the first time with his high qualities and their endearing human defects. He is devoted to his Master and sublimely confident in him but, conscious suddenly of self, he cries out in fright. The hand of Jesus is ready and his approach gentle: 'Of little faith!' If this could be said of Peter for his momentary fear, what of us? asks St Jerome, PL 26, 104. 32-33. To Peter on the water and now to the Apostles in the boat it is clear that they are safe with their Master: the wind drops as he joins them. The Apostles ('those in the boat', cf. 22) are carried away. They confess the divinity of their Master (cf. § 50g), who with divine power has walked the waters; cf. Job 9:8. Their confession is, however, a sudden outburst due to the pressure of miracle upon miracle. Peter's calm and considered profession in 16:16 is clearly regarded by Mt as of much higher quality, 16:17; and cf. Scripture, 1 (1946) 32 f. g 34-36 Miracles at Gennesaret (Mk 6:53-56)—Stretching for c 4 m. along the west side of the Lake between 'Ain Tabgha and Magdala and less than 2 m. S. of Capharnaum is a rich plain about 2 m. broad at its widest part. It is not improbable that the name of this plain was Gennesar and that the name Gennesaret (not 'Genesar' DV), with the feminine suffix, is that of a village in the vicinity of Capharnaum (Lagrange, Mk, 177). The inhabitants immediately recognized our Lord who was well known in neighbouring Capharnaum. As usual, they ran (Mk) to fetch their sick. Many were healed by the touch of the tassel (κράσπεδον; cf. 9:20 note) of his cloak.

702a XV 1-20 Legal Cleanness and Purity of Heart (Mk 7:1-23).

XV 1-10 Attack and Counter-attack (Mk 7:1-13)—1-2. The quiet atmosphere of the last two chapters is now broken upon by the renewed attack of the Pharisees who meanwhile have not been idle. This time reinforcements for the local Pharisees have come from Jerusalem itself in the person of Scribes. (The distinction is Mk's; Mt is not concerned with this detail.) These complain that the disciples do not observe the prescribed ceremonial handwashings before, during and after the meal ('when they eat bread'—a Semitism). These prescriptions were carefully laid down not in the Law but in the oral tradition of the 'ancients' (i.e. of the early Rabbis). Towards the end of the 2nd cent. A.D. they were codified in written form in the Mishnah (tract: Yadayim or 'Hands'). Such traditions were held in even higher esteem than the Law itself, SB 1, 692; for the minutiae of the handwashing ordinances, cf. SB 1, 689-705, Edersheim 2, 9-12. 3. Our Lord declines an aimless discussion of sophistries and sharply attacks the spirit that prompted the objection. As once before (12:7 note) he might have denounced explicitly the legal zeal that had suffocated charity. Instead, he fights them on their own ground and shows how this blind devotion to 'the tradition of the ancients' had driven them to 'transgress' (he uses their own word, 2) the law of God himself. He supports the accusation with one example. 4. The law of God on duties to parents was unequivocal (the citations are from Ex 20:12, or Deut 5:16, and Ex 21:17). 5. This, most certainly, God said; 'whereas you say that if anyone should utter this sentence to father or mother: "Any property of mine from which you might draw benefit is Qorban", then he will not (need to) honour his father'. Mt obscures the already involved sentence by translating the technical term 'Qorban' ('offering, gift' consecrated, i.e. to God); Mk keeps the Aramaic term and explains it. The use of this word 'Qorban', though not implying that the property in question would be actually given to the temple, had the effect of a sacred oath isolating that property from any claims. That these claims included those even of filial duty was the opinion of at least some of the Rabbis in our Lord's time (cf. Babylonian Talmud, Nedarim, 3, 2; cf. also Edersheim 2, 21; Bonsirven 2, 163, note 7). Later reforms may have been due to criticism such as our Lord's in the present passage. To sustain the validity of such a vow, therefore, was in effect (though the Pharisees would not deduce this conclusion in so many words) to relax the divine command always to honour father and mother, 4a; indeed such an oath is equivalent to a curse, 4b. It declares null (ἀκυροῦν: DV 'made void') the divine law. 7-9. Again sacred history repeats itself (13:14 f. note). Isaiah, 29:13, had also been confronted with hypocrites and his denunciation applied equally to this Messianic age. The quotation, practically identical with Mk 7:6 f., is from LXX, slightly adjusted though not abbreviated. It is given a slightly different turn. The prophet (cf. HT) had complained of the Law observed from human motives; the evangelists complain of the Law unobserved through human 'traditions'. On the lips the word 'Qorban' has a pious sound but, as our Lord's example shows, it may hide the heart's contempt for the express will of God.

XV 10-20 The True Perspective (Mk 7:14-23)—We observe three grades of teaching adapted to three classes of listeners. The malevolent have their charge rebutted, and no more, 3-9; the ordinary folk, now gathered together by our Lord, receive positive, though prudently veiled, instruction with an invitation to reflect upon it, 10-11. To the disciples, interested enough to ask, Jesus explains himself more fully, 15-20. 10-11. It seems odd that our Lord should summon the crowd to hear this one sentence. It is possible, therefore, that Mt and Mk have selected it from a longer discourse. The dictum of 11 would remain obscure for the multitude who, it seems, were unaware of the circumstances, 1-2, that prompted it. Moreover, for those imbued with the food-distinctions of the Law (Lev 11 etc.) the implications of 11b would be unthinkable. The startling implications are there nevertheless, as Mk 7:19 observes. But the immediate application of our Lord's saying is determined by the context. The unwashed hand, thought the Pharisees, communicates its uncleanness to the food and so to the eater. There is no suggestion, 2, that the food itself was illegal and consequently our Lord's retort to the crowds does not explicitly touch the Mosaic distinction of foods but only the superstitious precautions of the 'tradition of the ancients'. He affirms that to eat with clean or unclean hands can have no moral significance because the very food handled has none. He will explain later, 18-19, what he means by 'what cometh out of the mouth'. 12-14. (Mt only but cf. Lk 6:39). The disciples are perturbed; the recognized religious leaders, evidently present in the crowd, have taken serious offence at 'this word' of 11. Perhaps they saw more clearly than the simple folk that our Lord's words touched not only the 'tradition' but—in their logical conclusion—the Law itself. What they could not see was the possibility that certain elements of the Law might be transient and ill-suited to the fullness of time. Such incomprehension was excusable and the Apostles long shared it; cf. Ac 10:9-15. Not blindness only but refusal to see was the sin of the Pharisees, Jn 9:41. They would not lower themselves by humbly asking explanations. But their whole regime, being not of God, would pass and our Lord warns the disciples against setting any store by hostility even on the part of those who were the accepted guides. Only the blind would mistake those for guides who are blind themselves. Jesus, therefore, opens his disciples' eyes to the blindness of the Pharisees and urges them to have nothing to do with them (ἀφ' ἐρ' αὐτοῦς, i.e. 'leave them to their own devices'). 15-16. It is Peter who speaks up ('answering', in the Aramaic sense) and asks an explanation of the 'parable' (here, as sometimes in OT, enigmatic saying) of 11. He speaks for the 702a disciples. Our Lord reproaches them: At this stage (ἀκμή) are even you uncomprehending? 17. With unusual energy and realism (Lagrange) our Lord declares that food, of itself, is an object indifferent to the spiritual soul; it is matter only for the digestive process. 18. Of no spiritual import, therefore, what goes into the mouth but what proceeds from it. For the mouth is the overflow of the inmost heart, 12:34, and the heart, in Semitic idiom, is the factory of evil or good intent. 19. Having reached this point in the reasoning there is no further need for the opposition (into the mouth; out of the mouth) of 17-18. The sins mentioned in 19 are therefore not confined to sins of the tongue. They are embraced by the term 'wicked purposes' (WV; DV 'evil thoughts') and include four sins of act and two (false witness; blasphemies) of the tongue. 20. Our Lord (in Mt, not Mk) rounds off the whole controversy with a concluding reference to its starting-point, 2—the Semitic literary phenomenon known as 'inclusion' (cf. Lagrange, Mt, lxxxi).

703a XV 21-28 The Canaanite Woman (Mk 7:24-30)—21. This incident, one of the most touching in the gospel and treated with a delicate realism unusual in Mt, takes place in the pagan district of Tyre and Sidon; cf. 11:21 note. This Phœnician territory borders Galilee on the north. It is possible that our Lord leaves Israelitic ground to give his disciples the respite which they had been recently denied, 14:13 note. 22. Mt uses the term 'Canaanite' (Mk 'Syrophœnician') to underline the significance of a miracle worked for one who belonged to the hereditary enemies of Israel. The term is not inaccurate: this district, colonized by Canaanites, Gen 10:15, was still basically Canaanite. The woman salutes our Lord with the Messianic title 'Son of David'; see on 1:1; 9:27. The phrase must have spread with his reputation beyond the confines of Israel, 4:24 note. 23. (Mt only). The realistic reference to the disciples' intervention is strangely absent from Mk. Mt's Greek translator is evidently independent of Mk here. Since it is not his habit to enter into detail of this kind, it is clear that the detail is not invented 'to heighten the effect' (*Allen, 169) but rather that the translator has under his eye 'a second and longer account (than Mk's)'. Yet even here the lifelike quality of the incident is due as much to what is implied as to what is expressed. Our Lord's silence (we gather) naturally drives the poor mother to the disciples. These are more concerned to rid themselves of the annoyance but, as our Lord's reply in 24 hints, they suggest that the only way to do so is to dismiss her with the request granted. 24. Our Lord's personal concern (like that of the Apostles on their first mission; 10:6 note) is with Israel. His remark recalls that made to his mother at Cana, Jn 2:4, where, evidently, the tone was sufficiently kindly to encourage. 25. In any case, the woman's quick eyes have seen him at last open his mouth. She seizes the slight advantage and falls at his feet with a cry for pity. 26. The words of Jesus are not as harsh as they read and they seem deliberately to invite a riposte. That they are a little parable turned into allegory only by the situation lessens the shock of the words. (On parable and allegory cf. notes to ch 13.) Moreover, the term 'dogs' (κυνάρια not κύνες) would be better rendered 'little dogs', 'pet dogs'; it serves to bring out the importance of priority for the children yet eliminates the absolute idea of contempt. 27. Nevertheless the remark would have checked one with a vestige of pride (contrast Naaman, 4 Kg 5:11-12) as our Lord well knows. But the woman's simple humility rises to her occasion and there is wit in her reply: 'How true' (or: 'Please!' cf. Phil 4:3; Phm 20; Benoît) 'Lord! for the little dogs also get their meal—from the crumbs that fall'. The woman quaintly turns the parable to her own advantage: it is true, she implies, as far as it goes, but it has not been taken far enough. As a mother she knows that she would not thus rob her children of bread, but she also knows their table-manners and how the floor is kept clean. 28. The Sacred Heart is won by a faith that stood so sharp a test. When the woman got home she found her child well again (Mk). 703b

XV 29-31 Cures at the Lakeside (cf. Mk 7:31-37)—Jesus with his disciples leaves the district of Tyre and Sidon for the Lake of Galilee; for this journey cf. Mk 7:31. The scene of the miracles appears to be the NE. side of the Lake where the hills fall to the plain. The sick were laid down at his feet (not 'cast down'; the Semitic verbs for 'to throw'—e.g. Aramaic r'māh—are often used in the sense of 'to put, place'; Jotūn, 101). In 31, 'the maimed healed' should be read (Merk etc.) though omitted by Vg, DV, WV. From the fact that the crowds praise 'the God of Israel' it would be bold to argue that they were pagans; cf. Lk 1:68; Ac 13:7.

XV 32-39 Second Multiplication of Loaves (Mk 8:1-10) d—The evangelists plainly record the multiplications as two separate miracles. Each narrates them in close succession (Mt chh 14-15; Mk chh 6 and 8) and subsequently refers to them as two separate events, Mt 16:9-10; Mk 8:19-20. If the unexpected attitude of the disciples on this second occasion seem surprising, we should remember the months that had elapsed since the former miracle, the occasions on which the disciples must have since gone hungry without a miracle being worked, their very proper diffidence in asking for a miracle, 23. 32. The disciples therefore leave it to our Lord to comment on the hunger of the crowds. He does so. Their provisions are exhausted after three days with him, far from their homes (Mk). Jesus proposes a dilemma: they have no food here yet he will not send them elsewhere. He is clearly inviting the disciples to ask for a solution like the previous one, 14:19. So far, the text does not exclude (rather it suggests) a previous multiplication of loaves. 33-34. The disciples' remark is cautious, perhaps even a sly suggestion: Whence should we [emphatic] have...? They express their own helplessness, not necessarily his. Moreover, their answer to our Lord's question: How many loaves? is not the helpless one of 14:17 ('only five') but simply 'Seven', as if in this case the information was not regarded as useless. 35-37. The multitude (4,000 here, 5,000 in ch 14) sat on the ground—there was no 'green grass' as on the previous occasion, Mk 6:39; it was summer. The number of hampers (WV; see on 14:20) corresponds, not to the number of the Apostles (unlike 14:20) but to the original number of loaves, thus more directly signaling the abundance of the miracle. 39. It appears that our Lord sets sail for the western bank of the Lake since it is on this bank that he would be most likely to meet the Pharisees, 16:1, and since it is to the eastern side that he later sails, 16:5, to go to Caesarea Philippi, 16:13, via Bethsaida Julius, Mk 8:22. But the point of arrival, Magadan, ('Dalmanutha' in Mk) is unknown. It is probable however (Abel 2, 373) that the form, certainly authentic, represents 'Magdala' (cf. 27:55 note) just as the 'Migdal' of Jos 15:37 is transcribed 'Magada' in the Vatican Codex. (Mk's 'coasts'—i.e. district—of Dalmanutha may represent an Aramaic original: liglilā dilm'ōnāṭh or 'to the place of his abode'; cf. RB 53 (1946) 373-84 and Mk 8:10.)

XVI 1-12 Leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees f (Mk 8:11-21; Lk 12:54-56; cf. Mt 12:38-39; Lk 12:1b)—The incident of 1-4 serves as introduction to the lesson of 5-12. 1. Pharisees and Sadducees forget their differences and make common cause against the new teacher. The situation is similar to that of 12:38 ff. (see note) but the Sadducees here take the place of the Scribes, our Lord's answer is notably different and the reference to Jonas is curt (on the 'doublet' question cf. Lagrange, Mt, liv). They issue a cynical challenge ('tempting', i.e. putting to the test). They demand a Messianic sign descending from (Mt: ἐκ) the physical heavens. This 'sign' is possibly a repetition of the 'manna' miracle of Mosaic times (cf. Jn 6:30 ff.) which times were in Jewish tradition (Edersheim, 1, 176), a rehearsal of the Messianic age; in particular, the Messias was to bring down manna from heaven for his people;

708f cf. Lagrange, Jn, 175. Their ill-will had contrived to explain away our Lord's miracles (e.g. 9:34; cf. Jn 9:18-29) and he refuses to work wonders at their dictation; cf. his similar attitude in Lk 23:8-9. 2-3. He ironically concedes their ability to recognize natural portents in the heavens but adroitly invites them to discern supernatural portents on earth among the blind, the lame, the deaf (cf. 11:4 f.), announcing the new Messianic day. 4 has possibly (Buzy, Lagrange) with the exception of the ominous, valedictory phrase, been imported hither by translator or copyist from 12:39.

g 5. Jesus and his disciples sail for the eastern shore of the Lake. Distracted by dispute or by unexpected departure the disciples had not made their usual provision: only one old loaf lay in the boat, Mk 8:14). 6-7. Jesus bids his disciples beware of the corrupting element ('leaven', cf. 1 Cor 5:6) which is the outlook ('doctrine') of his recent questioners. The word 'leaven' reminds the disciples who exclaim: 'We have forgotten the bread!' (omit 'because': the ὅτι of 7 is probably recitative). 8-12. After witnessing the two miracles of the loaves (14:17-21; 15:34-38 with notes) the disciples needed no great faith to exclude worry about material things; still less should they have implicitly attributed this worry to their Master. Our Lord has only to repeat his original remark (doubtless with an emphasis on its second half) to make its metaphorical meaning clear. Doctrinally the Pharisees and Sadducees had little in common, the 'doctrine' therefore is their common cynicism, so recently displayed, with regard to the 'signs of the times'. Our Lord's warning is not unnecessary: unlike the Pharisees and Sadducees the disciples did not ignore his Galilean miracles but they were inclined to forget them and to miss their full significance, 8-10.

704a 13-20 Peter's Profession and Primacy (Mk 8:27-30; Lk 9:18-21)—13. After reaching the east bank of the Lake and after the cure of the blind man at Bethsaida Julias, Mk 8:22-26, our Lord takes his disciples to the district of Caesarea Philippi on the extreme northern frontier of Palestine, 2 or 3 m. E. of Dan. Here in fertile country rises one of the largest sources of the Jordan. It is a natural site for the sanctuary of Pan (hence Panias; Arab. Baniyas) built there by the predominantly Greek population in the 3rd cent. B.C. In our Lord's time the town itself was new-built by Philip the tetrarch in 3-2 B.C. and named Caesarea in honour of Caesar Augustus. It boasted a temple to Augustus built by Herod the Great c. 20 B.C. Here where 'men worshipped side by side the forces of nature and the incarnation of political power' the divinity of Christ was first clearly professed; cf. SHG 473-8. Our Lord asks for the rumours of his identity, not to inform himself but to lead up to his next question. In Mt ('Son of Man'; Mk and Lk: 'I') we are already prepared for 'Son of God' which is to follow, 16. 14. In Galilee at Antipas's court there was a superstitious rumour of the Baptist's resurrection. Other circles felt the Messianic atmosphere and thought of Elias the precursor (but cf. 17:10 note) or of Jeremias, Israel's champion at a time of national crisis (cf. 2 Mac 15:13-16); the Messianic age was associated, too, with the return of other prophets; cf. 4 Esd 2:18. It is strange that none mentions rumours of the Messiah himself which must have been recently circulating; cf. Jn 6:15). 15-16. Our Lord expects more from his companions and pupils, but it is only Peter who makes the decisive and immediate reply acknowledging his Messiahship. In Mt (only) he goes on to profess the divinity of his master; cf. § 50g. Peter's formula 'the son of the living God' is found, with slight variation, on the lips of Caiaphas, Mk 14:61, and for its acceptance Jesus is declared guilty of blasphemy. He accepts it here and in terms which make it clear that Peter's conception of his dignity is not merely a deduction of Messiahship from adequate human premisses; cf. 11:4-6. 17-19. Human considerations ('flesh and blood') such as reasoning from miracle and prophecy could have led Peter to a confession of Messiahship—no great marvel there. That the Father, not the Son, had revealed shows how profound was the significance of Peter's words even if Peter himself had not yet fully sounded their depth. By this revelation the Father had singled out Peter as the natural foundation for his Son's society and our Lord, as ever, follows his Father's lead. Faith in the divinity of Christ must henceforth be a criterion of the true society of Christ. The Son of God now echoes and outdoes the generosity of the son of Jonah. At last he explains the name (apparently of his own invention) promised to Simon at the first encounter, Jn 1:42, and confirmed on the occasion of Simon's call, Mt 4:18; cf. 10:2. The name in Aramaic is Kēphā, i.e. 'Rock' or 'Stone'. The Greek translator judged πέτρος 'stone' more suitable, being masculine in form, for Simon's name and kept πέτρα 'rock' for the foundation-material demanded by the metaphor. The original language, however, leaves no room for distinction: Thou art Kēpha and upon this kēphā. . . . The 'church' (ἐκκλησία, the customary LXX rendering of the Hebrew qāhāl, i.e. religious assembly, congregation) is the new society of Christ's faithful answering to, and supplanting, the OT qāhāl. Simon is to be the ultimate authority on earth of this society which is itself the hierarchical body described in 18:15-18. By reason of this rock-foundation the malignant powers will not prove stronger than (κατισχύουσιν) the citadel-society. The phrase 'gates of Hell' needs some explanation. The term 'gates' in Hebrew is often used of the fortified city itself (Gen 22:17; 24:60; Is 14:31, etc.) 'Hell' (Hades), dwelling-place of demons (four times in this sense in the Apocalypse, cf. Allo, L'Apocalypse, Paris 1933, 101, and cf. Lk 16:23) is not merely 'death' (an idea which would confuse the warlike image) but the activity of forces hostile to the cause of Good. The promise is therefore not one of immortality for Peter (Harnack)—a meaning that would require also (against the natural construction of the sentence) that the pronoun 'it', 18, be referred to 'rock' and not to 'church'. In 19 the metaphor changes: the besieged citadel founded on a rock now becomes the Kingdom with its Chancellor to whom Christ will in due time commit his own keys, Jn 21:15-17. The gift of the keys implies responsible stewardship as the keys of Eliacim, Is 22:22, implied stewardship of the Davidic household. This idea serves as a bridge from the rock-metaphor to the more direct definition of Peter's powers (Lagrange). These powers are of effective 'binding' and 'loosing' in the spiritual order on earth. The 'binding and loosing' (rabbinical terms for excluding from ('binding') or granting readmission to the community or for declaring forbidden or permitted according to the Law) must be understood as containing all that is implicit in the gift of the keys, i.e. all powers necessary to the well-being of the kingdom including any positive legislative power which may prove necessary in the future. (On the authenticity etc. of the Petrine text cf. Bi 1 (1920) 240-64 and DBV(S) II, 546-64.) 20. The title 'Son of God' refers to our Lord's personal dignity, the term 'Christ' to his function. The latter might politically excite the crowds; it alone, therefore, is the direct object of his prohibition.

21-23 First Passion Prophecy. Peter rebuffed (Mk 8:31-33; Lk 9:22)—21. Caesarea Philippi marks a turning-point of the Apostles' faith. Our Lord now ventures to break the strange news of his approaching Passion. The titles 'Messias', 'Son of God', were to the Apostles far removed from the idea of Israel's official rejection (through the Sanhedrin) and from the prospect of death. All three Passion predictions, 16:21 f.; 17:21 f.; 20:18 f., are accompanied by a prophecy of resurrection which, however, seems to be overwhelmed in the Apostles' mind by the shocking prediction preceding it. Moreover, the nature of this resurrection is relatively vague and its prospect remote; cf. their mentality perhaps with Martha's, Jn 11:23-24, 30. 22-23. Peter 'taking him' (προσλαμβάνειν—drawing him to one side or, possibly, 'trying to be helpful')

704a remonstrates: 'Mercy on you!' (Θεός σου, i.e. ... εἰς δὲ θεός: 'may God be merciful to you'). But Peter is a snare ('scandal') in the path traced by the Father and willingly taken by the Son; our Lord orders him out of the way. Peter cannot yet appreciate (οὐ φρονεῖς) God's ways. He is unwittingly playing the part of their great adversary (σατάν). Through him Satan, who had left our Lord only 'for a time', Lk 4:13, renews the original temptation, 4:1-11. The faithful report of this rebuke is a tribute to the candour of the evangelist who has just reported the promise of the primacy.

f 24-28 Death the Way to Life (Mk 8:34-38; Lk 9:23-26)—Like master, like man: the disciple must himself be prepared to shoulder a cross in imitation of Christ. The saying is even more natural in this passage than it is in 10:38 (see note) because it here follows a prediction of the Passion. 25. The exhortation is reinforced by a prospect of the great issues involved (cf. 10:39)—no less than the loss or gain of eternal life. 26. How great is this gain appears from a literary balance of the world's riches against the supernatural life of the soul; it appears too from the obvious inability of those riches to purchase that life. That 'soul' here is regarded as the principle of supernatural, not merely natural, life is clear from the context and, on the dogmatic side, from the unanimity of Catholic interpretation; cf. § 52*h* and A. Bea, Bi 14 (1933) 435-47. 27. Man cannot buy eternal life: it will be awarded according to his works, i.e. according to his loyalty to Christ's cause, 25. The fitting judge of this loyalty is Christ himself. Of him, with his cross, one might be tempted to be ashamed (Mk, Lk) but the true dignity and reward of his following will appear from his glory and his sentence in the final judgement. 28. This sentence, though juxtaposed to 27 was perhaps originally a separate dictum, as Mk 8:39 seems to hint. In the present context it appears to imply that the dignity of Christ's discipleship will be manifested even before the final judgement, nay, in the lifetime of some of the bystanders. The Kingdom of the Son (not 'of the Father', cf. 13:43 note) will establish itself shortly 'in power' (Mk; cf. 1 Cor 4:20). This power, following the 'weakness' of the Cross, 1 Cor 1:23-25, manifests itself progressively from the Resurrection onwards, Rom 1:4 ff. To those who could see it the glory of this spiritual Kingdom on earth was already plain in St Paul's time, e.g. 1 Thess 2:12, Eph 2:6 f. The destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 served only to show that the Kingdom stood alone. The presence on earth of such a kingdom, acknowledging Christ as its king, will be evidence that the Son of Man has entered into (ἐν for ἐν as often in biblical Greek) his kingdom, i.e. has been solemnly invested as King in heaven. It will be the realization of Daniel's vision in which the 'coming' of one like a 'son of man' was a coming not to earth but to the Ancient of Days on his heavenly throne to receive power and a kingdom. See notes to Dan 7:13 ff.; Mt 8:19-20; 26:64.

705a XVII 1-9 The Transfiguration (Mk 9:1-8; Lk 9:28-36; cf. 2 Pet 1:16 ff.)—1. The Father had already revealed the divinity of his Son to Peter, 16:17, he now, about one week later, reveals it more publicly. As his companions our Lord takes (παράλαμβάνει; cf. 4:5, 8) the three favoured witnesses of one of his greatest miracles, Mk 5:37, and of his deepest distress, Mk 14:33. The 'high mountain apart' is not Hermon but, according to a 4th cent. tradition, probably Tabor, a few miles SE. of Nazareth and two or three days' direct journey from Caesarea Philippi; it rises, symmetrical and isolated, about 1,000 ft above the plain. 2. Before the eyes of the disciples the aspect of Jesus was profoundly changed (μετεμορφώθη), the result of an inner brilliance affecting even his garments (read, with the best MSS: 'white as light'). 3. Moses the legislator and Elias the prophet-champion of Yahwism (cf. Eccles 48:1-10) show by their presence that the old order is not destroyed but fulfilled in the person and work of Jesus—fulfilled even in the 'scandal' of the Cross, the subject of their converse with him, Lk 9:31. Wearied with the climb in the August heat the three Apostles 705a are asleep; they waken to see the vision (Lk). 4. Peter's suggestion is a wild one (Mk, Lk), based apparently on the assumption that Moses and Elias have come to stay and to herald Jesus in his glory. 'It is fortunate we are here', he says (tr. Osty, Les Evangiles Synoptiques, Paris 1947). He means that, being there, he and his companions will be able to improvise lodgings (huts of branches). He forgets that such guests need no shelter. 5. As in the OT (cf. Ex 24:15; 33:9-11 etc.) the cloud is the visible manifestation of the divine presence. It envelops them all. The Voice repeats the words spoken at the Baptism, 3:17, and approves Peter's profession, 16:17, but the added command ('hear ye him') warns the Apostles against questioning the words of the Son; cf. 16:22. 6-8. The glory passes and Jesus is once more the familiar friend. He enjoins silence: the vision is not to be spoken of until after the Resurrection, presumably to avoid premature and mistaken Messianic enthusiasm. Few, knowing of the Transfiguration, would learn to appreciate the necessity of the Cross.

10-13 The Precursor (Mk 9:10-12)—The appearance and disappearance of Elias have been troubling the Apostles. He had appeared after our Lord and disappeared without furthering our Lord's mission in any way. This was not the Elias, herald of the Messias, depicted by the Scribes (cf. Edersheim 2, 706-9; SB 4, 764-98) from their reading of the prophet Malachi (Mal 4:5-6; DV). Our Lord grants the expression of the scribal teaching: Elias is to come and restore (i.e. bring back to perfection) . . . , but he corrects its perspective. This herald-Elias has already come in the person of the Baptist. The 'great day of the Lord' before which Elias was to come, Mal 4:5, is therefore the day of Messianic visitation. Jesus declares the profound sense of the prophecy (missed by the Scribes): not the person but the spirit of Elias returns—in the person of the Baptist; cf. Lk 1:17. (With many Catholic commentators, e.g. Lagrange, Pirot, Allo, Van Hoonacker, we find here no justification for asserting the physical return of Elias before the final judgement.) Our Lord then turns this discussion to advantage: if the great Elias is the martyred Baptist, it is not surprising that the glorious Messias should prove to be the crucified Son of Man. The fate of the Baptist was a hint of God's Messianic plan. John was a precursor in more ways than one.

14-20 The Possessed Epileptic (Mk 9:13-28; Lk 9:37-44a)—14. It seems that the night was spent on the hill, Lk 9:37. On the following day Jesus and the Three descend to find a crowd gathered round three groups: the nine Apostles, certain Scribes (Mk; their presence suggests Galilee rather than the Hermon district), and a father with his son. The boy has all the symptoms of epilepsy, Mk 9:17-25, called 'lunacy' by the ancients by reason of its periodicity. 15-16. In the absence of Jesus the father has approached the disciples, without success; he now eagerly approaches the Master. Our Lord's tone is one of lament rather than of rebuke. His words 'are not merely those of a man among men; it is a divine being speaking—one whose own home is heaven', Lagrange, Lk, 277. The lament embraces the whole faithless and misguided (DV 'perverse') human race among whom our Lord came to work. It is immediately evoked, however, by the impotence of his own Apostles (their own fault, cf. 18-19) and perhaps by the malevolence of the carping Scribes, Mk 9:13. 17. The child was not only epileptic but possessed, since our Lord not only cures but exorcizes, Mk 9:34; Lk 9:43. The father, however, does not distinguish the two states nor does our Lord instruct him. Jesus did not come to teach the natural sciences. 18-19. The Apostles puzzled at their inability to exorcize (their first failure?) ask the reason. Our Lord underlines his earlier hint ('unbelieving' generation; 16)—lack of confidence in God. The tiniest grain of such 'faith' (cf. 13:32) can work the impossible. He uses the current rabbinic hyperbole of 'moving 705d mountains' (SB 1, 759), suitable to their situation at the foot of Tabor. 20. This verse is probably to be omitted with the 4th cent. uncials B and S as a harmonization with Mk 9:28, where see note.

21-22 Second Prediction of the Passion (Mk 9:29-31; Lk 9:44b-45)—'While they were still together in Galilee' (KNT) or 'while they were gathering together (at some rendezvous) in Galilee' (συσσεφομένων αὐτῶν) and about to leave for Jerusalem, our Lord again warns the disciples of his death. 'Betrayed [better 'delivered'] into the hands of men' takes the place of the 'suffering from the ancients, scribes, high-priests' of the first prediction (16:21, see note). The phrase suggests a terrible fate, 2 Kg 24:14, and there is pathetic irony in the juxtaposition of 'Son of Man' and 'the hands of men'.

23-26 The Temple Tax (Mt only)—23. From Tabor it is a full day's walk direct to Capharnaum. On their arrival, Peter is approached by the tax-collectors for the tribute which, in the absence of Jesus and the Apostles, has evidently become overdue. The 'didrachma', or two-drachma silver-piece (WV 'florin') is the annual subscription towards the upkeep of the temple. (1 Greek drachma = $\frac{1}{2}$ stater = $\frac{1}{2}$ Jewish shekel = 1 Roman denarius. The denarius was the recognized daily wage of a labourer; cf. Mt 20:2). This tribute affected all male Jews at home and abroad, aged twenty and over. The subscription was traditional (cf. Ex 30:11-16; Neh 10:32-34), the amount fluctuating. The diffident approach of the collectors (who were usually local men) may be due to respect for the dignity of their great townsman; they were aware that priests at least were not forced to pay the temple-tax. 24-25. Peter, knowing his master's custom, unhesitatingly answers 'Yes' and goes into the house (his own? cf. 9:10, 28; 13:1, 36) where Jesus is staying. Our Lord forestalls (DV 'prevented'—a Latinism) Peter's words. He already knows Peter's difficulty—either supernaturally or because he has overheard the conversation. He frames a small parable in the form of a question the answer to which is obvious. 'Tribute' (τέλος—customs dues) and 'custom' (κῆνσος—direct, capitation, tax) would certainly not be exacted of members of an oriental royal family—the royal children are exempt. Now the temple-dues are a tribute 'which each offers to God', Jos., Ant. 18, 9, 1. It is therefore clear (especially to Peter who has recently confessed the divine sonship) that Jesus is exempt. 26. Nevertheless, refusal to pay would savour of impiety for those ignorant of our Lord's dignity and rights. Doubtless the necessary money could have been obtained by ordinary means but the miraculous means chosen has the advantage of avoiding the 'scandal' while yielding nothing to the principle ('the children are exempt') because the money does not come from the apostolic purse after all. The miracle is certainly one of supernatural knowledge, probably more, though the hemichromis sacra of Lake Galilee has been found with e.g. pebbles in its mouth (cf. Buzy 233; Prat 1, 455). Simon here (as the disciples elsewhere; 12:1-8) is associated with the immunity of One who is greater than the temple. (The incident of the 'stater' miracle is discounted in many circles as a pious story later [c. A.D. 97?] elaborated partly to clear up early difficulties on the relationship of early Church and State—cf. Kilpatrick, Origins, 41 f.—partly to enhance the dignity of Peter and of the Roman church. This accusation is subject to the general remarks regarding 'Form Criticism' [cf. § 334-o] but in particular it should be observed that late invention is improbable for this passage. After the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70 the tax remained but was diverted to the temple of Jupiter at Rome; Jos., BJ 7, 6, 6. Against this background the argument of Jesus [resting on the fact that the collection was for his Father's temple] would be meaningless.)

706a XVIII 1-35 Instructions on the Kingdom: Its Spirit and Organization—Our Lord addresses himself principally to those who were to carry on his work.

His discourse is far from being a systematic and exhaustive charter for the Church's leaders, but it inculcates certain fundamental dispositions: childlike spirit, 1-4; care for the simplest of the faithful, 5-9; for the wayward zeal, 10-14, but salutary firmness and exercise of full authority, 15-20; and all this without personal rancour, 21-35.

1-4 Importance of Simplicity (Mk 9:32-36; Lk 9:46-48)—Despite (or even because of?) the promise to Peter of primacy in the Kingdom, 16:19, the Apostles debate, not without personal interest, the question of precedence. The dispute takes place on the way to Capharnaum (Mk) and the Apostles are ashamed to tell our Lord (Mk, Lk) who, however, knows their thoughts. Mt characteristically ignores these details and summarily presents the incident in the form of Jesus' own question and answer.

1. The question concerns present dignity, not degrees of reward in heaven (cf. Mk 9:33: 'which of them was greatest' WV). The 'kingdom of heaven' is, therefore, the kingdom in its earthly stage. This is shown also by the theme of the whole chapter which deals with mutual relations of the disciples on earth. 2. The child is a flesh-and-blood parable. Ambition is not a common trait of childhood. See Chrysostom's further developments in the moving homily 62 in Mt, Roman Breviary, July 20. 3. Our Lord's words are particularly stern in Mt 'Unless you become like little children again' (KNT; σπαραφίρε not 'be converted' but 'turn back'), far from achieving eminence in the Kingdom you cannot even qualify for entrance. Ambition in this matter defeats itself; cf. 20:20 ff. with note. 4. The greatest stature in the Kingdom (i.e. true dignity before God) is paradoxically that of the man who 'makes himself small' (Joüon; ταπεινώω, cf. Lk 3:5). High function in the Kingdom absolves no one from personal humility.

5-7 Obligations towards the 'Little Ones' (Mk 9:37, 42; Lk 9:48; 17:1-2)—5. The 'child' suggests all, young or old, who have simple faith in our Lord. He therefore passes to the duties of the Twelve towards the least sophisticated of the faithful. Care devoted to such, if it be given because they belong to Christ (ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι) as his chosen ones, becomes an act of devotion to our Lord himself. 6. The care for the 'little ones' demanded in 5 is explained by its opposite vice—the providing of a snare ('scandal') in the moral order by one's own conduct—bad example or direct seduction. This is a danger for those destined to occupy high place in the community. Better that those who so seduce should be securely out of the way of doing harm—weighed down in the depth of the sea. The 'millstone' (lit. 'ass-mill') in question is the lower of two stones which is 'like a hollow inverted cone with a wide hole at the narrower end allowing the flour to fall through when the grain has been crushed against its sides by the upper millstone' (Lagrange, L'Evangile, 269). The mill is set in motion by an ass harnessed to a beam. This hollow cone could be put on a man collar-fashion. 7. Human nature being what it is, 'scandal', given and received, is inevitable, but woe to the giver because he takes the evil initiative!

8-9 Ruthless Elimination of Moral Obstacles (Mk 9:42-48)—The transition to this new idea is made, in Semitic fashion, by means rather of a word ('scandal') than by a direct logical connexion with 5-7. A similar thought has been expressed in 5:29-30, but here the context (dealing with mutual relations in a society) suggests that the 'hand, foot, eye' further represent those dear to us who may prove occasions of sin. Our Lord's words are severe because so much is at stake: Life or Everlasting Fire. The 'life' is the unending life of the world to come (cf. Wis 5:15 f.; 2 Mac 7:9, 36; Bonsirven 1, 517-26) where sacrifice of mortal life and limb will be repaired. Everlasting fire or the hell (gehenna) of fire (5:22 note) is proposed as the one alternative without prospect of end, and this was the prevailing Jewish belief, but cf. Bonsirven 1, 538-41 for its more exact description.

706e 10-14 The Sheep Astray (cf. Lk 15:3-7)—After the short digression on 'taking scandal', 8-9, our Lord returns to the care for the 'little ones', 5-7, with a parable to which Luke (Lk 15:3-7, note) gives a different emphasis. 10. These 'little ones' (5, note) are not contemptible; they have their representatives at the court of God to plead vindication of their wrongs or neglect. That these angel-representatives are also companions of the just on earth (cf. Ps 90:11) is a doctrine found in rabbinic writings (Bonsirven 1, 233; Edersheim 2, 752): the just man on his journey is accompanied by two good angels, the wicked by two evil spirits. Later Rabbis speak of angels assigned to the permanent care of each individual (SB 3, 437 f.). Here our Lord clearly speaks of angelic advocates in Heaven and, if we take into account the background of Jewish angelology, implies that they accompany their charges on earth. This doctrine of 'guardian angels', based on our text (and cf. Ac 12:15), is not defined by the Church, but is consecrated in her practice and is held to be proxima fidei. On the manuscript evidence editors rightly omit 11 as an importation from Lk 19:10. 12-14. The parable speaks for itself. The lesson is implicit: if the Father thinks so much of these 'little ones', how far should the disciple be from despising them! The shepherd is, of course, not a perfect image of God; his impetuosity in leaving the ninety-nine, his disproportionate joy in finding the one, are very human qualities. Yet, by their very excess they serve admirably to illustrate the Father's concern for his 'little ones'. The disciples' duty is clear: not only the negative obligation of averting scandal, but the positive one of leading the 'little ones' back to the fold when they stray.

f 15-18 Exercise of Correction (Mt only)—This duty of seeking the straying Christian ('brother') is to be exercised with discretion. 15. The sinner (prob. omit 'against thee', WV, and cf. Lagrange ad loc.) must be won back to God ('gained') as sweetly as may be. If there be no need for public reprimand, charity forbids it: one must show him his fault (WV) privately. 16. In juridical matters the old Law required at least two witnesses: 'it is by the deposition of two or three witnesses that the case is to be established', Deut 19:15. The principle is transferred to this affair which is not yet juridical. The persons called are therefore not witnesses of the fault but are called in as independent opinions helping not to convict but to convince the sinner of his fault. 17. Only in the last resort must the matter be brought to official notice—this for the sake of the individual and of the community. Our Lord prudently and naturally provides for the future (as in 16:17-19, notes) when he will be no longer at hand to settle difficulties. His 'Church' appears as a compact, defined body with powers to exclude the recalcitrant from its society. After such a sentence the sinner stands outside the Society as the pagans and the Jewish tax-gatherers ('publicans'; cf. 9:10 f., note) are beyond the pale of the Synagogue. For Jewish ideas on fraternal correction, cf. Bonsirven 2, 231. 18. 15-17 were addressed, in the singular, to any Christian; now our Lord addresses the Apostles ('you'; cf. 18:1), not the members of the Church at large. He associates their powers with Peter's without prejudice to Peter's exclusive custodianship of the keys or to his function as the one foundation, 16:17-19. The apostolic body, with Peter, is given wide powers which include that of formal excommunication or reconciliation.

g 19-20 Mystical Presence of Jesus (Mt only)—Though the connexion with the preceding may be loose (cf. 'again I say to you') it seems probable that the words, in Mt's context, still have reference to the Apostles. They appear to guarantee efficacious help for any agreed course of action (πράγμα) concerning which the Apostles ask divine assistance. Most commentators, however, refer our Lord's promise to the prayer of the faithful in general and refuse any close connexion with 18. 20. In any case, the reason why the Father's help is certain is based on a general principle: the beloved Son himself whom the Father always hears, 706g Jn 11:42, is mystically present in the tiniest gathering convoked to do him honour ('in my name'; eis τὸ ἔμὸν ὄνομα, not ἐν τῷ ἔμῳ ὀνόματι, suggests the idea of appurtenance, consecration, devotion to). We may compare the words with the rabbinic saying (c.A.D. 135): 'When two are together and discussing the Law, the Glory [i.e. God himself] is in the midst of them'. Our Lord takes the place of the Law as the purpose of the gathering and assumes the role of the Glory itself.

21-25 On Forgiveness (cf. Lk 17:3b-4)—21-22. The instruction on reconciliation of erring brethren, 15-18, has said nothing of repeated faults. It is Peter (naturally enough, in view of his position, 16:17 ff.) who seeks precision on this matter, though he introduces a personal note ('against me') hitherto absent; cf. 15, note. Seven is a round (Semitic) number and therefore, Peter thinks, generous. It is not generous enough for the spirit of the Kingdom. Our Lord multiplies and multiplies the sacred number to leave the impression of limitless pardon. Repeat them as he will, our neighbour's offences against us can never compare with ours against God—and still God forgives. Nevertheless, our forgiveness of neighbour is the condition of God's pardon of us. This is the lesson of the parable which follows.

23-35 The Heartless Debtor (Mt only)—The parable b is a drama in three scenes: Mercy, 22-27, Cruelty, 28-30, Justice, 31-34, with an epilogue, 35. 23. Because this notion of pardon is so indispensable it is possible to represent the Kingdom in terms of Mercy and Justice. The time has come for the king's officials (provincial governors or financial administrators) to settle their account with the Treasury. 24. At the very outset one is brought to the king's presence who owes nearly three million pounds (10,000 talents; one talent is a weight of silver equivalent to 6,000 Greek drachmas—more than a labourer could earn in fifteen years; cf. 17:23, note). The sum is fantastic even for a highly-placed official; its choice has in view the application of the parable to our debt towards God. 25-27. The king, using his royal prerogative, orders the man and his family to be sold into slavery and a small percentage of the debt to be paid for the sale of his person and possessions. The king, though he knows the absurdity of the man's wild promises, relents; he remits the whole debt—a kingly gesture. 28-30. The contrast that follows is emphatic and detailed. The forgiven debtor meets his equal, not his subject; he is owed a paltry sum—one six hundred thousandth of his own forgiven debt; he assails his fellow-debtor with violence, not giving time to speak; he spurns him when his attitude and words (ironically the image and echo of his own) must have recalled the recent interview with the merciful king. Finally he throws his debtor into prison to force him to raise the money by some means (selling-up, borrowing, etc.). 31-34. c The shocking contrast between the king's conduct and his servant's is made explicit in this third tableau. The matter is reported to the king who exacts the rigorous justice which the merciless servant has just demanded. The unhappy man is handed over to the torturers who will force him perhaps to disclose some hidden reserves. He is handed over 'until he should pay'. There is no likelihood that he will be able. 35. The epilogue is on a threatening note, but it plainly identifies the Father with the king whose first characteristic is limitless mercy, 23-27. The enormity of our debt to the Father is immeasurable: it is represented arithmetically only because a parable in human terms demands it and because the figure serves to dwarf our neighbour's 'debt' to us. But the Father lays down two firm conditions, and only two: that we ask for forgiveness; that we exercise it ourselves. The first condition is implicit in the parable, the second explicit. The parable is the graphic development of the pregnant and sobering prayer 'Forgive us as we forgive', 6:12. And the forgiveness must be 'from our hearts', pro-

708a XIX 1-12 The Divorce Question.

1-2 From Galilee to Judaea (Mk 10:1; Lk 9:51; cf. 17:11; Jn 10:40-42)—The common plan of the synoptic gospels gives preference to the Galilean ministry, omitting the various visits of our Lord to Jerusalem, Jn 2:13; 5:1; 7:2; 10:22. After the visit of Jn 10:22 (for the feast of Dedication in December) John says, 10:40, like Mt and Mk, that Jesus went 'beyond Jordan'. It is probable that the journey described by Mt and Mk took place in September and that it included Jn's two visits to Jerusalem—for Tabernacles (Sept.-Oct.; Jn 7:2) and for Dedication, Jn 10:22. In 19:1 Mt rounds off his fourth group of discourses with his familiar formula, 7:28, note. Our Lord seems (Mk) to go first into Judaea and from there to the plain just across Jordan, Jn 10:40, which, though strictly part of mountainous Peraea and under Antipas's jurisdiction, was commonly regarded as the 'district' of Judaea.

b 3-12 Divorce (Mk 10:2-12; cf. Mt 5:31-32)—3. The Pharisees 'put him to the test' (KNT). Their question must be seen against its background. In our Lord's time were two schools of thought divided on the question of sufficient motive for divorce in the full sense. The followers of the Rabbi Shammai allowed it on grounds of adultery only. Those of Hillel (Shammai's pre-Christian contemporary) for less grave, even trivial, reasons; see Edersheim 2, 331-5. The controversy turned on the interpretation of Deut 24:1. There the Mosaic Law prescribed that a husband give his wife a 'bill of divorce' (šēṭer k'ṭup, lit. 'document of cutting-off') if he discover in her 'some uncleanness' ('erwaš dāḥār 'indecency of (in) something'—apparently some sexual irregularity). This last phrase was the subject of bitter argument. It appears that in the 1st cent. A.D. the school of Shammai was gaining ground at least among the ordinary folk in Palestine, and that divorce was more common in the upper classes. The Pharisees' question is therefore equivalent to: 'Is Hillel right? Can divorce for any cause whatever be tolerated?', or: 'Is a man permitted to send away his wife however the case stands?' 4-6. To their chagrin our Lord pronounces for neither school but, as in 15:3 f., goes straight to the act and words of God, Gen 1:27; 2:24. Having created a woman for Adam, God (through the inspired author) had insisted that the union was even closer than that of blood. It produced, as it were, one single and indivisible person ('one flesh'). Our Lord emphasizes his conclusion claiming that no man, not Shammai nor Hillel, dare interfere with the express will of God. 7. The answer was disconcerting. It struck at the practice of divorce itself. Whether the questioners be of the Hillel or of the Shammai school they are forced now to defend common ground. They in their turn appeal to Scripture, Deut 24:1. Their implication is that our Lord's conclusion from Gen is in plain opposition to the enactment of Moses himself. 8. Jesus removes the contradiction by correcting their terms. Divorce was not a Mosaic 'command' but a toleration of existing custom. This custom itself was due to Israel's 'hardness of heart', i.e. (cf. Deut 10:16; Jer 4:4; Eccles 16:10) to a moral immaturity insensitive to God's will—a will made plain, as our Lord says, in Gen 1:27. The Mosaic 'bill of divorce' made the best of an existing situation by demanding a formality which restrained hasty action and which safeguarded the divorced wife from recall at her divorcing husband's whim. 9. Our Lord restores the stability of the primal institution on his own authority, 'I say to you'; cf. 5:21-44. His attitude is so uncompromising, indeed, that the disciples are shocked, 10, as they would never have been had he merely declared for the severe view of Shammai. Moreover, his words as reported by Mk, 10:11 f., and by Lk, 16:18, and used by Paul, 1 Cor 7:10 f., contain no hint of an exception made for adultery. It is in the light of these certain facts that the obscure 'exceptive' clause of Mt, here and 5:32, must be explained. In view of the marked Jewish tone of Mt's words it seems probable that he is nearer to the ipissima verba of our Lord. In any case, an evangelist would not have been so bold as to intrude an exception of his own making nor so stupid as to contradict his own context. It is still less likely that Jesus is reversing his uncompromising attitude with a casual parenthesis thrown out en passant. It follows that the so-called 'exceptive' clause (μή ἐνί πορνείᾳ) cannot permit re-marriage on the ground even of adultery. Its positive explanation is, however, a matter of dispute. The 'classical' Catholic explanation takes πορνεία (DV 'fornication') as being here 'adultery', as it is a question of married persons. The disputed clause is not strictly an 'exception' but reserves the case of adultery (that it is a 'reservation' appears more clearly from the ὑπεκτός—'setting aside'—of 5:32 than it does from the awkward μή of 19:9). It does not positively provide for the case of adultery. This provision, however, must have been made at some time, explicitly or implicitly, by our Lord. It consists in separation a mensa et toro and is found explicitly in Paul, 1 Cor 7:10. The reservation was made to avoid the impression that our Lord was imposing the hardship of living with a faithless partner. An alternative Catholic explanation (recently revived, amended and given rabbinic background by J. Bonsirven, S.J., Le Divorce dans le Nouveau Testament, Tournai 1948) objects that the usual OT and NT word for 'adultery' is μοιχεία. It maintains that πορνεία here means concubinage (cf. 1 Cor 5:1)—incestuous marriage within the degree forbidden by the Mosaic Law, Lev 18:1-17. In such a case a man in dismissing (divorcing) the woman is not only guiltless but is actually doing his duty. Our Lord inserts the clause in order to hint that the Mosaic injunctions remain (cf. CR 20 [1941], 283-94).

10-12 The more Perfect Chastity (Mt only)—10. In private (cf. Mk 3:10) the disciples express their concern. Such severity is unheard of. If such be the position (DV 'case') of the married state, marriage is too dangerous because irrevocable. 11. Our Lord does not withdraw his severe pronouncement but (doubtless to the disciples' surprise) passes from their own phrase ('not expedient to marry') to an even higher teaching. All this doctrine ('word') of the due perspective on marriage and its expediency or non-expediency can be fully appreciated (WV 'taken in'; χρυσὴν) not by the carnal man but by those alone whose understanding is of God ('given'); cf. 13:11. 12. For (says our Lord, explaining that such an understanding and perspective is so given) not accident of birth alone nor malice of men (the case of the first two classes of eunuch) but the high motive of the Kingdom (cf. 1 Cor 7:32) has succeeded in inducing virginity—and, in this last case, of free choice. To these last the divine sense of due proportion has been 'given' and put into practical effect, not by self-mutilation but by self-denial. Our Lord thinks, perhaps, of the Baptist and of others who like Jeremias, Jer 16:2, have thus sacrificed themselves in the interests of the Kingdom. He is proposing an ideal foreign to Judaism which held marriage as a sacred duty for all men, Bonsirven 2, 207 f. Let him who is capable of appreciating the true order of values apply his faculty to this case! WV 'He that can take this in, let him take it in'; χρυσὴν as in 11. It is fairly evident that Jesus is not appealing only for speculative appreciation: a gentle invitation underlies his words.

13-15 Blessing the Children (Mk 10:13-16; Lk 18:15-17)—13. Our Lord has just shown himself the champion of family-life; it is perhaps not without significance that the mothers bring their babies and little children (παιδιά) for a blessing. The disciples were used to the throngs of sick but now 'even the little ones' (Lk 18:15; WV) are brought. They rebuke the children, or rather (Mk) their parents, for this waste of their master's time and strength. 14. It is one of the rare occasions when our Lord shows himself really dis-

b 16-22 Counsel of Poverty (Mk 10:17-22; Lk 18:18-23) —16. A young man of wealth and (Lk) position who, no doubt, had been watching and listening hurried after our Lord (Mk). Jesus had spoken, 14, of a necessary disposition for the Kingdom—a disposition less tangible than the observance of the Decalogue; this has perhaps brought uneasiness to the youth's mind. 'Master', he asks (not 'good' master, DV), 'what good work am I to do' . . . ?'. He evidently wishes to feel an assurance of salvation. 17. Our Lord's rejoinder is verbally uncertain; probably the original form is found in Mk 10:18, Lk 18:19. In Mt it is obscure though even here there remains the prima facie difficulty ('One is good') against our Lord's consciousness of his divinity—a difficulty, it should be noted, that was not grave enough to trouble the early Church which did not shirk the text; cf. Lagrange, Mt, 373 ff. Mt's formula seems to imply that the youth leans too heavily upon one who, as he thinks, is a Rabbi and no more. Our Lord declines this compliment to his human nature; cf. e.g. 20:23; 23:9. He seeks to put the inquiring soul into immediate contact with God who is personified Good. God himself, the one absolute Good, is the model of sanctity; cf. 5:48. Nevertheless, our Lord goes on, in magisterial tone, to exercise the sovereign authority of his human office by confidently pointing the way to eternal life.

c 18-19. He doubtless surprises the youth when he lays down as necessary conditions the elementary prohibitions of the Decalogue, Ex 20:13-16; cf. Deut 5:17-20. But he passes then to positive commands that admit of degrees of perfection in their observance. First, the young man's duty to his parents (Ex 20:12a; cf. Deut 5:16a); secondly, the great precept of charity towards one's fellows, Lev 18:19, not found in the Decalogue. 20-21. In view of the last, and difficult, command the youth's confident reply appears hasty but evidently has little trace of self-sufficiency since (Mk) our Lord's affection is aroused. The young man has a generous heart and our Lord invites it to a perfection exceeding what is, absolutely speaking, necessary to eternal life. If the youth is content to have his treasure (and so, all his heart; cf. 6:21) only in heaven, then he is fit for our Lord's inner circle, 27. 22. The young man, who might have become an Apostle, was taken aback ('his face fell' Mk) and went away dismayed.

d 23-26 Danger of Riches (Mk 10:23-27; Lk 18:24-27) —23. The departure of the youth is the occasion of a sad warning to the disciples. It is with difficulty that the rich shall enter the kingdom of heaven. The saying surprises after our Lord's distinction of moral precept, 17 ff., and counsel of poverty, 21. He speaks, however, not of impossibility, 26, but of difficulty. Nor does he condemn the rich young man but illustrates from his case how riches may grip and even suffocate the heart. 24. Indeed, for merely human reason it is inconceivable that those whose heart is possessed by riches should enter the Kingdom. Our Lord expresses this with a slight adaptation of the Jewish proverb (Ederheim 2, 342) that 'a man even in his dreams does not see an elephant pass through a needle's eye'. 25-26. He has deliberately provoked the astonishment of the disciples in order to impress on them the spiritual menace of riches. If possessions are such an obstacle—and there are few who have no possessions—who can be saved? Our Lord (in words reminiscent of Gen 18:14; Job 42:2; Zach 8:6) explains that divine grace accomplishes the humanly impossible. Grace may leave the rich but loosen their grip on the heart.

e 27-30 Reward of Renunciation (Mk 10:28-31; Lk 18:28-30)—27. During this discussion Peter's mind has turned to the situation of himself and of his companions. They have accepted the invitation, 4:22, 709e refused by the rich young man. What reward? A natural and honest question, if somewhat brusque. 28. The solemn promise surpasses expectation. Its meaning turns on the sense of the word 'regeneration', 're-birth' (παλιγγενεσία) used in NT only here and in Tit 3:5 (of the 'new birth' by Baptism in the Christian era). A similar idea, though not the term, is found in the OT ('the new heavens and new earth' of Is 65:17; 66:22) referring, in apocalyptic style, to the Messianic age. The reference is pointed by Paul, 2 Cor 5:17, for whom the Christian era here on earth is already a 'new creation'. It appears probable, therefore, that our Lord refers to the Kingdom established on earth rather than to the world to come and the last judgement. This opinion (adopted by WV) is supported by the similar text of Lk 22:28-30 which also refers to the kingdom of the Son on earth—not 'of the Father' in heaven; cf. 13:43, note. The Son of Man seated on his glorious throne recalls Dan 7:9 and (as in 26:64; see note) refers to our Lord's presiding from heaven (cf. Ps 109(110) 1 quoted in 22:43 f.) over his Kingdom on earth. Associated with him in this royal function of judgement (i.e. of government, cf. Ps 71(72) 2 etc.—the Last Judgement is reserved exclusively to the Son in Jn 5:27) are the Twelve. This office they are to exercise on earth (and, doubtless, when they pass from earth and the Church remains); they will be thus associated with their master in heaven. Since the horizon has not yet widened for the Apostles, 10:5; 15:24, our Lord speaks in terms of Israel. It will be clear to them later, 28:19, that the sphere of their authority is to be the whole world—the Israel 'of God', Gal 6:16. Our Lord addresses the Twelve as a body. He has already hinted at the defection of Judas, Jn 6:71, but this is not the place to mention it; moreover, their number was later supplied by the election of Matthias, Ac 1:26. 29. In the new era the Apostles occupy a privileged position but those who have imitated their detachment, leaving family or estates for Christ, will have their abounding reward too. The reward, though on earth (Mk) is clearly of the spiritual order since it is compatible with persecution, Mk 10:30. And finally (closing the whole section as it opened; cf. 16) in the world to come 'life everlasting'. 30 introduces the following parable which it serves also to conclude, 20:16, note.

XX 1-16 Parable of the Vineyard Labourers (Mt only) —1. Not the householder but the whole situation in which he figures is comparable to the Kingdom, 13:24, note. He goes to the bazaar at daybreak (ἀνα πωτ) to find men standing waiting for hired work. Since we are in parable and not in allegory (see note to ch 13) it is unnecessary to seek an individual significance for the 'vineyard', though in the allegory of Is 5:1-7 it represents Israel. 2. After the usual bargaining, no doubt, the day's wage is formally agreed upon (a circumstance to be remembered in view of what transpires)—a denarius, 17:24, note. 3-5. At nine, noon and three p.m. (the hours are reckoned from 6 a.m.) the man returns to the bazaar. His first visit was presumably at 6 a.m. The times, however, are merely schematic and should not be scrutinized for hidden meanings. No sum is now mentioned other than a 'fair wage'. In human affairs one would expect three-quarters, one half, one quarter of a denarius respectively. 6-7. One hour before sunset (the time-scheme is violently broken into to emphasize the lesson) the man hires the last of the unemployed—more, it would appear, from pity than from need. 8. The foreman is evidently given two unusual instructions. The first, though this is mentioned later to suspend the interest, is to give the same wage to all—and herein lies the point of the parable. The second is to begin with the 'last', with the late-comers. The purpose of this odd procedure is to hold back the first-comers as witnesses, hostile and critical, who will make objection and thus pave the way to the master's reply. This reply, 13-15, holds the lesson of the parable. 9-12. The disgruntled bystanders complain only of the 700h most extreme case of 'injustice', though they might have complained of the other later groups. These 'last' have worked for one hour, and that in the cool of the evening! 13-15. The master addresses the chief grumbler. His gentle tone ('friend') recalls that of the Prodigal's father addressing the elder son, Lk 15:31, nor is there irritation in 'go thy way' (against KNT: 'away with thee!'; γῆραι; cf. e.g. 8:4). He calmly reminds him of the agreement, duly observed by both parties. 'It is my wish', he says, 'to give the last what I have given to the first'. When justice has been done, should anyone complain if kindness plays its part? The eye (of the mind) should not see evil where there is only good. If it does, it must be a diseased eye. 16. Jesus has explained by parable his initial epigram: 'Many there shall be: first, last, and last, first', 19:30, and concludes: 'It is in this way (DV 'so') that the last shall be first and the first last'. It may be that we have in this parable only 'a striking picture of the divine generosity which gives without regard to the measures of strict justice', Dodd, 122. In this case the parable insinuates a mistrust of works for their own sake (perhaps as a corrective to the reward promised in 19:27-29) to the advantage of the divine liberality. The concluding sentence, stripped of the violent contrast imposed by paradoxical form, implies simply that 'first' and 'last' (long or short service) merge into one another before God—not that he is indifferent to the distinction but that his mercy refuses to be restrained. (The ominous: Many are called but few are chosen, is perhaps not authentic here—Mark omits—but drawn from 22:14, where see note.) The 'murmurers' of 11 do not necessarily figure the Pharisees; they may appear only with a parabolic purpose (8 note) similar to that of the Elder Brother in Lk 15:25 f. This general lesson may not exhaust the parable. In Lk 13:30 the dictum of Mt 20:16a is connected with the personnel of the Kingdom to which there may also be reference here. If so, the late-comers are the Gentiles (cf. Lk 13:29) who will flock to the Kingdom ahead of the mass of Israel; cf. Rom 11:25 f. And this because, although the whole Jewish race has been 'called' to the Kingdom, only a few—the 'remnant' spoken of by the prophets, e.g. Is 1:9—have deserved to be 'chosen' to belong to it; cf. Feuillet, RSR 34 (1947) 303-27.

XX 17-19 Third Prediction of the Passion (Mk 10:32-34; Lk 18:31-34)—17. Passing from the plain across Jordan (19:1-2, note) our Lord hurries ahead of his apprehensive disciples and of others who follow (Mk) towards Jerusalem which lies on the western mountains before him. He turns to them as they follow and, for the third time (cf. 16:21; 17:22-23), speaks to the disciples alone (κατ' ἰδίαν) of his coming Passion and Resurrection. 18-19. The prophecy is more detailed than before. The death-sentence is to be engineered by the Sanhedrin and executed by the Romans. Mocking, scourging and (Mt only) crucifixion appear now for the first time. For the Apostles our Lord evidently wishes to soften the harsh notion of such an inglorious Messiah by showing that he goes to his death consciously and freely. There is no remonstrance this time; cf. 16:23. It is clearly useless. b 20-28 Ambition of the Sons of Zebedee (Mk 10:35-48; Lk 22:25-26)—20. Zebedee's wife, probably the Salome of Mk 15:40 (cf. Mt 27:56), falling on her knees before Jesus (KNT; DV 'adoring') has evidently some great favour to ask. Her presence suggests that of the other holy women whom we find later at the Cross and at the tomb. 21. Mother-like she is interested in her sons' career, but it appears that she profoundly misreads its true character. Our Lord's 'kingdom' though doubtless spiritual is for her, as for the expectant Jews in general, a place also for honours as the world knows them—a Religion-State. For James and John (cf. 4:21) she asks the first and second rank in the King's hierarchy. 22. The mother has asked but the sons are answered: presumably they had 710b confided their hopes to her, possibly even prompted her to ask. Though there is ambition here to be corrected, our Lord does not display the indignation he reserves for the Pharisees, 23:6. It must, therefore, have something of simplicity in it. Moreover, it is accompanied by docility since the brothers profess themselves ready to drink our Lord's own bitter cup; cf. 26:42. The 'cup' is a Hebrew metaphor for destiny—happy, as in Ps 15(16) 5, or unhappy, as in Ps 74(75) 9. 23. Like all our Lord's worthy followers, 10:38 f., the brothers are to share his cross—an imitation of Christ which does not always suppose a martyr's death. James was in fact beheaded in A.D. 44; John suffered torture and exile; cf. PL 2:49; 26:143. Nevertheless our Lord, speaking as the envoy of his Father, reserves to the Father's eternal decree the honours of the Kingdom. He himself has already designated the primate of the Kingdom on earth, 16:18 f., but here he answers the question as it has been put, Mk 10:37, and speaks of the Kingdom in its final, glorious stage. 24-27. Nor will Jesus tolerate the spirit of ambition in his kingdom on earth. This spirit shows itself in the indignation of the ten even more than in the request of the two. It is a commonplace of political kingdoms that rulers are heavy-handed and their ministers officious ('their great ones domineer' WV). There will be rank in our Lord's kingdom, 16:18 f.; 19:28, but it must not be used for selfish ends. Let all know who would seek that rank that it is the rank of servant, 26, even of slave, 27. 28. In this too (cf. 22) our Lord is the model—Lord by nature, servant by deliberate choice, Jn 13:13 f. He has already hinted, 18, 19, 22, the lengths to which he is prepared to go in this service; now he states it clearly, and his phrase contains, in germ, the whole dogma of redemption later developed by Paul. The Servant is to give his life in ransom (DV 'redemption')—one life for the many. The Greek word used (λύτρον) is found twenty times in LXX where its meaning is variously the sum offered either in compensation for injury, or for the purchase of an object, or as the price of a slave's manumission. It is the term used (in Num 3:12; LXX) even of human beings—the Levites, substituted for the firstborn in the temple-service. The evidence of contemporary profane Greek literature shows that the most natural sense of the word in our Lord's time was certainly that of a slave's ransom; see texts quoted in DBV(S) 3, 126. The idea of a human life offered as ransom (λύτρον) is found in the 1st cent. A.D. (Philo of Byblos). Moreover, our Lord's phrase must be read in the light of contemporary Jewish thought not unfamiliar with the idea of an expiatory death, 2 Mac 7:37 f. The same idea of expiation is found in Is 53:10 where, as here, the expiation is the function of a Servant—the 'Servant of Yahweh'. 29-34 The Blind Men of Jericho (Mk 10:46-52; d Lk 18:35-43)—29. Our Lord, making his way from Peraea, 19:1, towards Jerusalem, 20:17, passes through Jericho, the beautiful garden-town adorned architecturally by Herod the Great and by Archelaus. It lies little more than 5 m. to the W. of Jordan and 15 to the E. of Jerusalem but in the plain 3,300 ft below the capital. The approach of the Paschal season brought crowds to the neighbourhood. 30-31. On the way out of the town two blind men sit begging. Hearing that the passer-by is Jesus, the wonder-worker from Nazareth, they cry loudly for pity and refuse to be quieted. They address him as 'Son of David', an indubitably Messianic title, and Jesus this time does not enjoin silence (contrast 9:30; see note). Open proclamation of Messiahship is no longer untimely: our Lord is himself about to enter Jerusalem as Messiah, 21:1-9; he is himself to raise the question of the Messiah in public, 22:42 f., to speak openly as Israel's saviour, 23:37-39, and solemnly to declare himself, 26:64. 32-34. The faith of the blind men is encouraged by our Lord's call and by his gentle question, and they dare to give definite shape to their vague hopes. As 710d at Capernaum, 9:29, the fingers of the Light (cf. Jn 9:5-6) touch the blind eyes. Note on the Synoptic accounts: There seems no reasonable doubt that Mt, Mk, Lk all speak of the same incident though only one blind man is mentioned in Mk, Lk. It is probable that Mk, consciously or unconsciously, omits the second because he is interested in the first whom he evidently knows ('Bar-Timaeus' Mk 10:46). Lk, though here somewhat independent of Mk, follows him in this detail. The exact place of the miracle is uncertain: going out of Jericho (Mt, Mk), approaching Jericho (Lk). It may be (Prat 2, 182, with hesitation) that one was healed on the way in, the other on the way out. Or (Pirot, La Sainte Bible, Paris 1946, IX, 532) Lk may refer to the Herodian Jericho, Mt, Mk, to the old, deserted site a mile or two NNW, and through which our Lord would pass to the inhabited Jericho. It is perhaps more likely that the inspired authors are content with a vague indication ('near Jericho')—an attitude which they so often adopt towards the chronological order of events; cf. Lagrange, L'Evangile, 418, footnote 2.

f XXI 1-11 Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem; Sunday (Mk 11:1-11; Lk 19:29-40; Jn 12:12-19)—1. From Jericho Jesus had gone to Bethany, on the eastern slope of Olivet nearly 2 m. from Jerusalem. There, on the Saturday, he had been anointed by Mary; cf. Jn 12:1-8; Mt 26:6-13, § 719b. It is now Sunday, Jn 12:1, 12. Bethphage lay higher up the eastern flank of Olivet nearer Jerusalem and between Bethany and the summit, a summit which from its 2,500 ft looks downwards and westwards, across the Kedron valley, upon the temple 200 ft below. The old steep road from Jericho to Jerusalem passed to the right of Bethany and through Bethphage. 2. Bethphage is the village that the disciples have almost reached (1: eis, i.e. towards); it lies 'straight ahead' (DV 'over against you'). Just inside the village, our Lord assures them, they will find an ass and her foal tethered. 3. If any watchful bystander object, they are to say that 'the Master' (ὁ κύριος) needs them 'but will straightway send them back' (WV; where see note) when he has finished with them. 4-6. Mt (and Jn 12:15) is struck by the literal fulfilment of the prophecy of Zacharias, 9:9. In view of the sombre prospect of the Passion, Mt introduces the citation not with the 'shout for joy' of Zacharias, 9:9a, but with the sober words in which Isaiah announces the Saviour in 62:11. The promise to 'the daughter of Sion' (Jerusalem) is fulfilled. The substance of the prophecy is the humble advent of the triumphant King, but our Lord chooses to fulfil it to the letter and so to declare his Messianic character. The Hebrew prophecy (here translated from the Heb., not incorporated from LXX) displays the parallelism (synonymous here) inherent to Heb. poetic form. We should therefore read: 'upon an ass, yea [not 'and'] upon a colt'. That this is the meaning of Mt is evident: a translator of the Hebrew would not so misread the poetic device nor would an intelligent writer intend the absurdity of a rider using two mounts apparently at the same time. The 'ass' of 5 is therefore equivalent to the 'colt', as the prophetic context demands, and not to the she-ass of 2. This last is the beast of burden (WV; DV 'of her that is used to the yoke') of 5. 6-7. The colt was not yet broken in, Mk 11:2, note; its dam is brought only to steady it. Nevertheless it seems from the text as it stands that the two disciples, 1, made their cloaks into saddles for both beasts (7: 'upon them'). This is odd but possibly it was done to leave our Lord the choice of mount. On the other hand, many competent commentators (e.g. *J. Weiss, *Klostermann, Lagrange, Joüon) prefer to read the singular 'upon it' (the colt) with some not unimportant MSS and versions. 8. The news of our Lord's approach has spread to the capital where he was expected, Jn 11:55 f., for the Paschal feast. The excited crowd collecting at Bethphage is thus reinforced by another from Jerusalem, Jn 12:12, which escorts Jesus down the western slope of Olivet, across the Kedron and up the opposite slope to the temple. Some 710h paved his path with their cloaks in sign of reverence, 4 Kg 9:13, others with branches broken from the olives in the fields. Those who came from Jerusalem waved palm-branches, Jn 12:13, which, as they set out, they had torn from the trees in the warm Kedron valley. 9. At the feast of Tabernacles it was customary for the people to carry branches in procession and to wave them as they sang 'Hosanna Yahweh!' (cf. Edersheim 2, 159) and the branch itself was called 'the hosanna', SB 1, 845-50. The crowd now, waving branches, associates the action with the word 'Hosanna!' an abbreviated form (hōša-na) of the biblical hōšā'ah-nā', Ps 117(118) 25, lit.: 'Oh save!' or 'Oh be propitious to . . .!' Their cry is: 'God save the Messias!' and (26 of the same psalm with a slight change): 'Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord!'—i.e. with the Lord's glory in view. In the final cry 'Hosanna in the highest' the 'hosanna' is a mere shout of joy, the phrase being equivalent to 'Glory (to God) on high!'; cf. Lk 19:38. 10-11. (Mt only). The capital is in a turmoil: the triumphal approach has been seen and heard. There are visitors from abroad who know nothing of the new prophet. Probably they have heard his Messianic rank acclaimed and they ask only his identity.

12-13 Cleansing the Temple; Monday (Mk 11:15-17; Lk 19:45-46; cf. Jn 2:13-17)—If the episode is the same as that described by Jn, it is probably Jn who gives it its actual chronological setting, viz. at the beginning of our Lord's public life. Mt who (like Mk, Lk) mentions only this one journey to Jerusalem would be bound to insert the incident here if he was to narrate it at all. And indeed the priests, though custodians of the temple, do not here (15; though see 21:23) refer to the incident which perhaps suggests that it did not take place at this time. For this opinion cf. among Catholic authors: Calmès, Buzy, Lagrange; cf. also Braun, RB 38 (1929) 178-200, followed by Dubarle, RB 48 (1939) 21-44. On the other hand, in view of the notable differences between Jn's account and that of the Synoptics, it is possible that our Lord took this action twice—the need for it would certainly recur (thus, amongst Catholic commentators, Durand, Prat, Pirot). 12. At festal times temporary booths were erected in the great outer court of the temple where tradesmen turned pilgrim piety to profit. The materials for sacrifice, animal and bloodless, were sold in noisy market with the usual oriental haggling. Some sold oxen and sheep, Jn 2:14, others doves, the sacrifice of the poor; cf. Lev 12:8. Since Tyrian coinage only was accepted for temple-offerings, Roman and Greek coins were exchanged at a fee by the money-changers who set up their tables in the court. Jesus drove out the animals and their anxious owners. He was content to up-turn the tables of the money-changers and the chairs of the dove-sellers. It is to these, it seems, he speaks. 13. All three Synoptics remember the striking words: the joyful prophecy of Isaiah, 56:7, joined to the subsequent lament of Jeremiah, 7:11. The Jews themselves had profaned the temple by making of it an unseemly and dishonest market.

14-17 The Official Protest (Mt only)—The chief priests b and the scribes though of different schools of thought (Sadducee and Pharisee respectively; cf. 2:7-10 note) are at one. They are irritated by the miracles but particularly by the shouts of the children. Echoing the cry of their elders, 9, doubtless without understanding, they hail Jesus as the Messias and he suffers it. In answer to the objectors he clearly approves it. He sends the scribes back to their Bible, Ps 8:3, leaving them to complete the quotation in their minds ('that thou mayest destroy adversaries'). The Heb. text of the psalm declares that the tiniest children acknowledge the Creator's glory; those who do not are the Creator's adversaries. The implication is sharply pointed by the present circumstances and recalls our Lord's appeal for simplicity, 18:3, 14. LXX (quoted by Mt) renders substantially the same sense as HT, but more clearly e 18-22 The Fig-tree and Its Lesson; Monday-Tuesday (Mk 11:12-14, 20-24)—It is characteristic of Mt that he presents the miracle and the lesson to be derived from it without breaking up the episode as Mk does in 11:15-18. In view of this telescoping process there is no need to stress the 'immediately' of 19, though the word may in fact be intended literally. 18-19. On the Monday morning our Lord left Bethany for the city. The fig-tree stood, perhaps, on the slopes of Olivet; it was in leaf, as it would be at the Paschal season (beginning of April). Our Lord had evidently not broken his fast and he approached the tree. He knew, as well as the evangelists knew, that 'it was not the season for figs' (Mk 11:13)—the figs are not ripe till June (for details cf. Lagrange, Mt, 293; HDB 2, 6). He laid a curse on the tree. There is no impatience in the words since he expected no fruit and it would be a curious sentimentality that could read cruelty there—especially as the insentient tree becomes a signpost for man. The tree withers. The unusual severity of our Lord's tone, the strange rebuke addressed to a mere tree—a tree, moreover, obedient to the Creator's law—betray the fact that his action is entirely symbolic. It resembles the extraordinary symbolic actions of the prophets, e.g. Is 20:1-6, Jer 19:1-11. But our Lord did not explain it. The action, so far as we know, stood isolated. It was only on the following day (Tuesday; Mk 11:19 f.) that our Lord chose to draw from the incident a further, personal lesson for the disciples, 21 f. The meaning of the symbol, therefore, can be decided only from its foregoing and subsequent historical context. Israel has welcomed its Messias, on the previous day, with wild enthusiasm. In a day or two it will reject him. Judaism is condemned by Jesus for its deceptive, fruitless show (cf. 21:43)—a show that should normally have proclaimed its spiritual summer, Cant 2:12 f. When, in the course of the week, the Apostles heard our Lord's rejection of Israel and his condemnation of the vine-dressers who refused his fruit to the Master, they would come to understand, Prat 2, 206. 20-22. Meanwhile the present lesson for the disciples, struck by the display of power rather than by the symbolism, is strong faith to carry them through this difficult week and beyond. Nor is this lesson entirely independent of the symbolism since our Lord has implicitly demonstrated his power over his enemies (cf. 26:53) by causing this figure of hostile Israel to wither. Underlying the exhortation to faith is this invitation to believe in the power of their master when, in the Passion, he is to appear most powerless. Nevertheless, the explicit invitation is to faith in their own power through prayer, or rather an invitation to pray with lively faith. This will move all obstacles—and what obstacles lie ahead for the disciples! With his eyes on Olivet ('this mountain') Jesus uses the common rabbinic hyperbole for accomplishing the impossible: 'rooting-up mountains'; cf. Edersheim 2, 376, note.

e 23-27 Our Lord's Authority officially challenged; Tuesday (Mk 11:27-33; Mk 20:1-8)—23. The priests particularly are concerned at our Lord's unauthorized temple-teaching, possibly also (if his cleansing of the temple was recent) at his assumption of authority over the sacred precincts by expelling the buyers and sellers. With representatives of the other sections of the Sanhedrin (including scribes; cf. Mk) they ask if he acts on his own initiative or at least (and they deem this impossible) to name his accrediter. 24-25. After the manner of rabbinic discussion Jesus answers question with question, not disrespectful to the established authority but pointed enough for those who wield that authority dishonestly. The question concerns the mission of the Baptist. He sums up this mission in the world 'baptism'—significantly, because this baptism was a rite preparatory for Jesus' own work, 3:11 f. Whence did the 'authority' of the Baptist derive? They had once asked that question themselves, Jn 1:25, but since that day to the day of John's martyrdom it had become increasingly plain to those of good faith that John was a man of God and his work 'of heaven', heavenly. 26. The objectors, over-anxious to save their face, miss the implication of the question—namely, that if John's mission was supernaturally accredited so also was that of the one he announced (Jn 1:29-37; 3:25-30; 5:33 ff.). They assume instead that Jesus will attack them for never having countenanced John, 3:7-10, § 682g-h. On the other hand, the public esteem in which the Baptist was held (e.g. Ac 19:3; Jos., Ant. 18, 5, 2) kept them from denying to John the status of prophet. 27. The weak reply, surely damaging in the ears of those present, reveals that they are guided only by motives of policy. To such dishonest witnesses our Lord need make no answer; let honest bystanders judge between them! Nevertheless, he pursues the theme of the Baptist in the parable that follows.

28-32 Parable of the Two Sons (Mt only)—28-30. The significant point of the parable is the contrast between a farmer's two sons: one, beginning with flat refusal, ends with obedience; the other, in appearance at least readily submissive, is in effect recalcitrant. 31. There can be no doubt which did the will of the father (τοῦ πατρὸς: the application of the parable begins to peep through at this place). Swiftly upon the inevitable answer comes the devastating application. The publicans (9:9, note) who had listened to the Baptist, Lk 3:12, and the women of evil life who had come to the saviour, Lk 7:36 ff.; Jn 4:4 ff.; 8:2 ff., are going into the Kingdom even now. There is as yet no sign (and this is a warning) that our Lord's interlocutors are on their way. 32. It was John's preaching that tested the 'I will not' of the sinners and the 'I go' of professional just men. John had come 'in the way of justice' (ἐν ὁδῷ δικαιοσύνης), i.e. respecting the traditional Law. He spoke, too, the old prophetic language of penance. Despite this, the learned in the Law did not listen. The repentance of public sinners should have shamed them 'but even when you saw that, you would not relent and believe him' (KNT).

33-46 Parable of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mk 12:1-12; Lk 20:9-19)—From the lighter warning of 31 to a prophecy of ruin, 43, which concludes a parable that contains many allegorical details. 33. To those familiar with Is 5:7 the image inevitably suggests Israel, vineyard of God. The stone well, the hollowed rock whence the juice of the pressed grapes passed through stone channels to a deeper rock-basin, the stone watch-tower, all are present in Is 5:1-2. These details appear in the parable, not with any allegorical significance but with the purpose of establishing the identity of the vineyard by literary reminiscence of Isaia. The listeners are now in a position to see the meaning of what follows. In his absence the owner, clearly God, commits the vineyard to farmers accountable to himself. These farmers are the centre of the story. 34-36. It would appear from 43 that the vineyard, through the negligence of the husbandmen, had yielded nothing. In any case, to thwart the Master they maltreat or murder his servants who ask for the produce—the fate of the prophets, 23:30-31, § 714h. But the Master has superhuman patience. He sends even more servants but to no better effect. 37. The climax of gentleness is to send his son to persuade them. They will surely respect him. The event is to turn this hope to irony. 38. The sight of the son only stimulates their hate. If he is removed, their possession will be for ever undisturbed. His existence threatened their possession just as our Lord's threatened the position of the Jewish leaders, Jn 11:47-53. 39. In Mk (probably nearer the original words here) the son is first murdered and then cast out. In Mt and Lk the subsequent detail, Heb 13:12 ff., has perhaps influenced the order of words. In either case, the Son is cast out of the vineyard that was his own; cf. Jn 1:11. 40-41. It is already obvious

711h what the Master will do when the time of reckoning comes, but in Mt our Lord invites his hearers to pronounce, implicitly, their own sentence. God will choose other, more honest, workmen who will promptly render the produce. As for the wicked husbandmen, they shall meet an end proportioned to their wickedness. 42. Our Lord's quotation is taken, like the 'Hosanna' cry of 9, from Ps 117(118) 22 f. In the psalm the saying, probably a proverb, seems originally to refer to Israel rejected like a useless stone by the nations as they founded their pagan polities. But in God's surprising plan and in God's building, Israel is the conspicuous angle-stone crowning and uniting the two high walls. The unexpected issue of 41 is, therefore, not without precedent in God's providence. That is why, 43, our Lord has no hesitation in pronouncing his startling prophecy. The kingdom is to pass from the Jewish leaders and apparently from the Jewish people as a race. It will go to others who, as God's new planting, will produce the fruit for which their leaders will faithfully render timely account;

i cf. 41. 44. The allegory of the stone, interrupted by the parenthetical 43, is resumed or rather given a new direction. Note, however, that 44 may be a gloss from Lk 20:18. The setting of the allegory has invited the hearers to see the cast-out Son, 39, in the rejected stone, Ac 4:11. But the 'stone' is no longer considered as part of a building, it is considered in two prophetic connexions differing from this and differing from each other. In the first, Is 8:14, the 'stone' is 'one against which one might strike one's foot . . . a symbol of trouble' (cf. Kissane, The Book of Isaiah, 103); this 'stone' is God himself who becomes a severe judge for those disloyal to him. In the second, Dan 2:34-45, the 'stone' is God's future, lasting kingdom, symbolized and summed-up in 'one like a Son of Man'—a boulder rolling down to the destruction of earthly kingdoms. Our Lord, therefore, warns the opponents of God and his Kingdom with three intimidating texts, 41, 44, which he applies to himself and to his work. 45-46. The words were too pointed to be mistaken. His enemies knew that it was at them that the last parable was directed. The preceding one had been explicitly applied to them by our Lord himself, 31 f.

712a XXII 1-14 Parable of the Wedding-Feast (cf. Lk 14:15-24)—This parable-allegory, unlike 21:33-44, is not directed against the Jewish leaders as such, though there is an ominous echo of 21:38-41 in 22:6-7. It is addressed to all and relates to the personnel of the Kingdom. The distinguished ones favoured with the invitation refuse, those of no distinction take their place. But even among these (Mt only) some are unworthy and so excluded. 1-2. 'Once more Jesus began to speak to them in parables', in parabolic form. The situation about to be described (cf. 13:24, note) presents one aspect of the Kingdom. Jewish literature (cf. Edersheim 2, 425 f.) likened the Messianic era to a feast (cf. Is 25:6) and the Messiah himself to a bridegroom wedded to Israel; cf. the Targum on Ps 44(45) 2 (3); Edersheim 2, 718. It is clear at the outset, therefore, that the 'king' is God and the 'son' the Messiah. 3-5. It was usual in the East to remind invited guests when the time drew near. The servants, presumably the Prophets, warn the chosen people that the marriage-feast (γάμος) is imminent. With great forbearance the king overlooks the refusal and sends a second group of servants to say that the feast stands waiting. This circumstance indicates that the second group of servants is representative of God's envoys in the new order; cf. the invitation of 3:2; 10:7. The oxen and fatted animals suggest a feast of royal proportions, but the invited are more interested in their worldly cares.

b 6. Others (and the strange violence of the action suggests allegory) not content with insulting the servants (and through them their king) actually murder them. This treatment the Baptist had experienced and the Apostles been taught to expect, 10:28. 7. The king's patience is at last exhausted and his revenge terrible: death for the murderers and ruin for their city. The 'city' is plainly not the king's capital which is elsewhere—perhaps (if the allegory has influenced the picture) in heaven itself. But it is as unnecessary to localize the 'city' as it is to localize the 'vineyard' of 21:33. The subsequent destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 by the armies of Vespasian (God's instrument) would give the words a significance perhaps missed by their first hearers. 8-10. The scene shifts to the palace. The king orders his servants (those of 3 or others; to bring in those who have not shown themselves unworthy of the royal honour. They are gathered indiscriminately from 'the street-crossings', not chosen as Israel was chosen—we think automatically of the Gentiles; cf. Lk 13:29. Sinners and just alike, all are called, though not all found worthy. The bridal-hall is full. 11-13. In Mt, 10, not in Lk, our Lord describes the execution of the king's command, 9, with a view to developing a warning for the newcomers; cf. Rom 11:19-21. One is found unsuitable when the king surveys the guests. The lack of attire befitting the occasion is not surprising since the guests had been hurriedly and indiscriminately assembled. The king's sentence, therefore, is justified only if we assume that somehow or other the lack was culpable. Allegory is not concerned to explain such details. We are expected to see immediately that the 'wedding-garment' is an allegorical element representing fitness for the Kingdom; lack of such fitness is obviously culpable and requires no explanation. The man has no excuse to offer. The king passes sentence and the banquet begins or rather is resumed under new conditions, i.e. it now becomes a banquet in which all are perfect. We are reminded of the parables of the Drag-net and of the Wheat and Cockle (cf. 13:39-40, 48-49) where the discrimination of bad and good is postponed until the Final Judgement. The banquet which is the Messianic era on earth passes into eternity with its worthy members. 14. It is difficult to see how the 'many called, few chosen' (cf. 21:17, note) sums up either part of the parable. In the first part, 2-7, many are called but all refuse; in the second, 8-13, though the one man no doubt represents a class of persons, we are left with the clear impression that relatively 'many' are chosen. Unless we treat the remark as a disjointed appendix (with Buzy, Mt, 295 f.) it would appear that it applies to the two parts taken together, Prat 2, 228. In the perspective of the parable and in the range of the experience of our Lord's audience the invitation to the Kingdom has gone out to many—to the whole nation of Israel—and the nation as a whole has refused. Add to this the thought that even in the 'nation' next invited, 21:43, there are some unworthy, 22:11 ff., and the 'many called, few chosen' appears in its due proportions. It is to be remembered also that the term 'few' is relative; they are 'many' in 8:11. Moreover, the dictum refers not directly to the number of the saved (a question our Lord refuses to answer; Lk 13:23) but primarily to the members, and worthy members, of the Messianic kingdom on earth. The rest is the secret of the Father. Note: we have explained the parable as a unity. There are, however, reasons for holding that Mt has fused one parable (1-10 with the exception of 6-7) with two fragments related in theme. The parable is found in Lk 14:16-24, the fragments concern the 'murderers' (Mt only; 6-7) and the 'wedding-garment' incident (Mt only; 11-14). Cf. Buzy, RB 41 (1932) 38-43.

15-22 The Tribute Question (Mk 12:13-17; Lk 20:20-26)—15-16. The Pharisees seek to trap Jesus with a question. To hide the trap they do not approach him themselves but send their students (not yet Rabbis). With these are the Herodians, a political and not a religious sect, supporters of the Herodian princes; in this respect they did not share the Pharisees' outlook which was anti-Herodian. Both parties were at one, however, in their interim policy of subservience to Rome. It was to their common interest to scotch a movement which threatened or seemed to threaten the status quo. They open the debate with a compliment

712a calculated to disarm. They insist, tendentiously, upon the Master's well-known independence of thought (e.g. 7:29) and outspoken expression even against the person of the ruling power, Lk 13:31 f. It seems from this emphasis that they hope for an anti-Roman decision which later they were forced to fabricate, Lk 23:2. The word 'tribute' (κῆνος) here apparently embraces all taxes (capitation, land-tax, etc.) payable to the civil power. The question is dishonest: Pharisees and Herodians had long since adjusted their conscience to the payment. But it presents Jesus with a dilemma. Should he advise non-payment, as they hope and expect, he becomes indictable to Rome. The pseudo-Messias, Judas the Galilean, had perished for this very cause, twenty years before in A.D. 7. Should he advise payment he loses his Messianic credit with the people for whom Messianism spelt independence of foreign yoke. 18. Our Lord, knowing the insincerity of the question, could refuse to answer but does not. 19. As usual (e.g. 21:31-40) he asks the objectors to contribute to their own downfall and they show him a silver denarius (cf. 17:23-26, note), the Roman coin with which the taxes were so often paid. 20. The coin was probably of Tiberius (A.D. 14-37) with, on the obverse, the laureate head of this emperor and the inscription: 'Ti(berius) Caesar Divi Aug(usti) F(ilius) Augustus' (HDB 3, 427 f.). 21. Plainly the coin came from Caesar, it is right that it should be returned (ἀνέδορε) to him. These civil transactions are on one plane, God's rights on another. There is no inevitable clash, provided (as was the case in the relationship of Rome and Jewry) that the civil demands did not encroach upon the duties of man to God. 22. The answer is a simple one. But it amazes the adversaries because they have no suspicion of the simple principle from which it emerges. Messianism is for them inevitably a political movement and their dilemma, 17, consequently exhaustive and fatal. It is the spiritual nature of our Lord's Messianism that provides the third alternative which is, not compromise, but due delimitation of spheres; cf. Jn 18:36 f.

713a 23-33 Bodily Resurrection attacked (Mk 12:18-27, 34b; Lk 20:27-40)—The Sadducees, 3:7-10, note, now appear on the scene not, as the Pharisees had attempted, to involve Jesus with the political authorities, but with a question of Jewish doctrine and practice. They seek either to score a point off the Pharisees by winning his support or else, if our Lord defends the Pharisees' doctrine, to make game of him. The Sadducees, despite the fact that from their ranks the priests were chosen, believed the one God to be uninterested in his creation. They therefore denied divine providence, the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body. The Pharisees' doctrine of bodily resurrection was firmly held but, to judge by certain texts, crass (Bonsirven 1, 482-5). In the question put to our Lord, therefore, another dilemma is implied: either a very material conception of resurrection or no resurrection at all. As before, our Lord has a third alternative to propose, 30, which proceeds from the high spirituality of his mind. 23-27. The Sadducees quote Deut 25:5 enunciating the 'levirate' law. They propose a case in which each of seven brothers, all being childless, had successively equal rights over the one wife. What when these rights become simultaneous after death? It reduces the idea of bodily resurrection to absurdity! 28-30. The objection shows ignorance of God's power to raise man and woman bodily to the chaste condition of the angels who, being immortal, need not to reproduce their kind. 31-32. It shows ignorance, too, of the very Scriptures they have ventured to quote. Our Lord chooses a text from Ex 3:6 (not, e.g., from the clear text of Dan 12:1-2) perhaps because, as is highly probable, the Sadducees accepted only the Pentateuch as having full canonical authority. In its original setting, the revelation in the 'burning bush', the text strictly implies that the God who was now speaking with Moses was the same God as his ancestors adored. Here our Lord draws out its fuller sense after a fashion no Rabbi could resent. 713b The living God could not be named after a dead thing; yet God himself uses the title 'God of Abraham'. Abraham, therefore, still lives. Nor is it only of the soul's continuing life that our Lord speaks. In the first place, this is not the difficulty, 25, 28; in the second place, Jewish theology did not distinguish immortality and bodily resurrection, 2 Mac 12:43 f. Thus the Pharisees, believing in immortality, accepted resurrection; the Sadducees denied the first and therefore the second. There was no third school. It is against this theological background that our Lord's argument must be read. If Abraham lives at all (and the Exodus text proves that he does) he lives with a view to bodily resurrection. And indeed even outside this background but within the total OT context the words of Exodus are significant. Setting aside explicit texts (e.g. Ps 15(16):10-11; 48(49):16; 72(73):24) the whole OT protests that God could never desert his servants—he is their God as he is the God of Abraham. Neither Abraham, therefore, nor any other faithful servant can perish utterly. 33. Again the admiration (cf. 22) and again, it seems, because the objectors have not grasped the simple principle, viz. the spiritual nature even of bodily resurrection. Evidently the Sadducees had never thus heard their difficulty answered by the Pharisees. 34-40 The Great Commandment (Mk 12:28-34a; cf. Lk 10:25-28)—34. The new approach to Jesus has in Mt the air of a conspiracy unless we read (Lagrange) against the weight of MS evidence: the Pharisees 'gathered about him' (ἐν αὐτῷ) instead of 'gathered together' (ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ). In this latter reading the Pharisees are presented as pursuing the attack (though, cf. infra, they have chosen an unsuitable representative). The former reading shows them somewhat conciliated by the repulse of the Sadducees. 35-36. One versed in the Law puts a question probably debated in the schools (SB 1, 900-5). The 613 commandments of the Law were subdivided into 'light' and 'grave', infringements of the latter being expiated only by death. These again were subdivided into small and great. Our Lord's questioner is concerned only with the greatest of all. In Mk 12:28 he seems sincere; in Mt the word 'tempting' suggests the opposite. The solution lies perhaps in the wide sense of this word (μεπάλων; perhaps 'probing', 'sounding', cf. Prat 2, 222); or possibly the lawyer's initial hostility softened as the conversation advanced. 37-38. The words of the commandment, Deut 6:5, were familiar: they opened the twice-daily prayer—the Shema; cf. Mk 12:29. They urged the submission of the heart (in Hebrew idiom, the centre of intelligence) and the soul (principle of sensitive faculties—emotion etc.) to God. And this 'with thy whole strength' (Mt's 'mind' is probably due to the Greek translator). 39. It is more surprising that our Lord joins to this the love of neighbour, Lev 19:18. The fact that he speaks of the 'second' commandment without being asked shows his unwillingness to separate the two. Love of neighbour and love of God are child and parent. The two commandments are 'like' because true love of neighbour is but an overflow of true love of God. As our Lord is the first to present these two precepts as one so he is the first to give the widest meaning to the word 'neighbour'; cf. his explanation of the term on a similar, but apparently not the same, occasion in Lk 10:25-37. 40. From this double support hang (κρέμαται) 'Law and Prophets'. The last phrase significantly repeats 5:17 so that 'we now understand what this divine system was that Jesus had come not to destroy but to bring to perfection. It was essentially the law of charity' (Lagrange, Mt, 432). 41-46 The Messiah Son and Lord of David (Mk 12:35-37a; Lk 20:41-44)—41-42. The recent question, 17, has betrayed a political conception of the Messiah, 22, note; our Lord now invites reflexion. That the Messiah was to be of the Davidic dynasty was the constant teaching of the prophets, Is 11:1; Jer 23:5; Ez 34:23 etc., and there is no hesitation in the Pharisees' reply. 43-46. Yet in the Davidic psalm 109

713d (110) were written the inspired words: 'Yahweh said to my lord: Sit at my right hand'. The Pharisees evidently admitted that the Davidic 'my lord' referred to the Messias. The Rabbis of the next two centuries, probably influenced by our Lord's argument repeated and developed by the early Christians, did not. The psalm-verse, especially with its suggestion of the Messianic throne of Dan 7:29, emphasized the transcendental nature of the Messias. 'Son of David' is therefore not an adequate description of him. Our Lord leaves them with this thought. If honestly pursued it could take the Pharisees and others (cf. Mk 12:35) from ideas of a political Messias to the notion of one whose work was to be as spiritual as his origin.

714a XXIII 1-36 Discourse on the Scribes and Pharisees (Mk 12:38-40; Lk 20:45-47; cf. Lk 11:37-54)—The whole chapter is a warning to those who are or may be deceived by the worst elements in Pharisaism. It is with this in view that our Lord mercilessly exposes them. Note, however, that the recurrent 'Woe!' is not a curse but a portentous expression of grief; cf. 24:19.

b 1-7 The Pharisees and their Victims—1-4. When the scribes and Pharisees faithfully expound the Law it is on the teaching-chair of Moses that they sit (ἐδύσαν, aorist equivalent to the Semitic stative 'imperfect'; Black, 93). Accordingly they must be obeyed. But this obedience should not lead to imitation because they are hypocrites at heart. The letter of the Law they observe, not without ingenuity, but not its spirit; cf. Jn 7:19-23. On the contrary, the casuistic interpretations of the Law that over-burdened the conscience of others, Ac 15:40, served to extricate the Pharisees themselves from many an obligation; cf. Edersheim 2, 777. They take pains to make neat and heavy parcels and to lift them on to the shoulders of others. With their own shoulders, nay with their own fingers they will not carry them an inch; cf. Lagrange, L'Évangile, 337. 5-7. (Mk 12:38-39; Lk 20:48.) Their show is hollow though it is the basis of their prestige. They seek to impress others with their zeal for the Law by making their phylacteries more noticeable. The 'phylacteries' (φυλακτήρια, i.e. safeguards, amulets; Aram. ṭpillin, literally 'prayers') were tiny, oblong, leather-covered cases containing four strips of parchment on which were written the texts, Ex 13:1-10, 11-16; Deut 6:4-9; 11:13-21, the monotheistic profession of faith. Here the word is evidently used to include the ribbons or thongs by which the cases were fastened, one to the forearm, another to the forehead, at the time of morning-prayer. The practice derived from an unduly literal interpretation of Ex 13:9, 16. Our Lord condemns neither phylacteries nor tassels, 9:20-22, § 691f, but only the ostentatious piety that makes them conspicuous. The low respectful bow in sight of all, the title Rabbi ('master', 'teacher') delighted the scribes and Pharisees.

c 8-12 Danger of Imitation (Mt only)—Our Lord turns to his disciples. As he had not condemned phylacteries so in 7 does he not forbid the title 'Rabbi' but the vain complacency taken in it. It is in this sense that the injunction of 8 is to be understood. Our Lord is not out to reform current nomenclature; he is concerned with the spirit, not with the letter. But the use, 9, or acceptance, 8, 10, of any adulation that threatens to intrude between man and God is sternly forbidden. All human titles are only shadows of God's authority from which they derive, Eph 3:15. Unless this is clearly understood, 'call no one on earth "Abi"', 'father', a term sometimes used of the great Rabbi; cf. Edersheim 2, 408-10. Note that our Lord is not a grammarian regulating the use of terms: he is a doctor of the spirit. He forbids any acknowledgment of fatherhood that obscures the fatherhood of God, nothing more. If we make no allowance for the concreteness and brevity of his phrases we reduce either them to absurdity (e.g. 6:3) or him to inconsistency (e.g. Jn 18:23, cf. § 686d). He would not forbid a human son to use the word 'father' nor would he forbid the term if addressed to one who is God's representative; in this second case, indeed, it serves to remind its user of the fatherhood of God. Nor must the Christian disciple pose as an independent spiritual guide (10, καθηγητής). He himself is subject to one Teacher (διδάσκαλος, 8) and one Guide, 10—our Lord himself (the term 'Christ', if a scribal insertion, nevertheless renders the sense rightly). They have one Father who is in heaven. The principle of graded authority remains (11; cf. 20:26, note) but the spirit in which that authority is wielded must be one of humility. For 12, cf. 18:4, note.

13-31 The Seven Woes—13. First Woe: opposition and obstacle to the Kingdom. A general denunciation. Our Lord's anger is explained by the harm he sees done to simple folk. The formalism of scribes and Pharisees has blocked the entrance even to our Lord's own kingdom. It has darkened the public mind and made it incapable of appreciating the need for inward religion or even of recognizing its presence. 14. An insertion from Mk 12:42. 15. Second Woe: proselytism to bad purpose (Lk 11:52). Not content with obstructing entrance to the Kingdom, the Pharisees seek, with immense zeal, to draw ignorant pagans down to their own level and to make them too consciously sin against the proffered light of Christ. On the intense and successful Jewish proselytism of this period, cf. Schürer 2, 2, 303-27. Often twice as fanatical as the born-Jew the newcomer is twice as surely established in the infernal dominion ('son of' in this Semitic sense = 'belonging to'). 16-22. Third Woe: casuistry; a sample. 16-19. The Scribes and Pharisees, blind themselves, have absurdly assumed the role of guide. To illustrate the blindness our Lord chooses an example (or contrives a characteristic, if non-existent, case) of their attitude to vows. On the annulment of these they were an ingenious court of appeal. The terms of the vow were closely scrutinized without regard to the original intention of the one who had made it. Their verdict would be either: 'It is nothing' (it is no vow) or 'He is under obligation'. Two individual illustrations of this attitude are given, 16, 18. Vows naming the gold (apparently the votive-offerings) in the temple and vows naming the sacrifice ('gift') on the altar. These are declared 'valid'; vows on the temple or altar itself are declared void. But our Lord turns the casuistry against them, 17, 19. If they are determined to make these distinctions (though distinctions in this matter are out of place, cf. 20-22), surely the house of God and his chosen altar are more sacred than man's possessions. These last are sacred only when, and because, they become offerings. Even casuistry should have reached a conclusion contradictory to that of the scribes. 10-22. But, in truth, there is no room for it. A sacred vow, whatever its terms, is made in the presence of God. And (22—a final thrust), contrary to the explicit decision of the Jewish doctors, the invocation of 'heaven' in place of the divine name makes not the slightest difference. It is the intention and not the word that tells. 23-24. Fourth Woe: false perspectives (Lk 11:42). 23. The minutiae of the tithe-laws (based on Lev 27:30) on all comestible plants were truly astonishing, Edersheim 2, 412. Even the small seasoning herbs, 'mint, dill, cummin', were not forgotten. The practice is not condemned, nor is it enjoined, despite the misleading Semitic downrightness of the phrase 'these things [justice] etc.' you should have practised without neglecting the other [tithe]'. But it surely should not be found incompatible with the weightier matters of the Law—justice to one's neighbour (κρίσις, i.e. mišpāt; cf. Deut 10:18), sympathy for him (ἐλεος), good faith in dealings with him (πίστις; cf. Ps 32(33): 4; Gal 5:22(23)). 24. This fantastic situation is illustrated in massive hyperbole. Such conduct is compared to that of one who would carefully filter from his cup a tiny gnat (lest he incur some legal impurity) leaving there a camel. Attention is sometimes called to the play on words (gmī', qlm', qml'; respectively 'camel', 'gnat', 'filter'; cf. Lagrange, Mt, 447) which probably indicates that the saying 714g was proverbial. 25-26. Fifth Woe: formalism (Lk 11:39-41). Meticulous ceremonial care to avoid legal impurity (cf. Mk 7:4; Schürer 2, 106-11) was not matched by moral scruples. The surface of the crockery was, no doubt, clean, but it held the product of plunder and the means of intemperance: 'within they [the vessels] are filled from [ἐξ] robbery and excess'. First things first: see that what is within (τὸ ἐνὸς) is morally pure; it will then confer all necessary purity upon the surface of the container. 27-28. Sixth Woe: hypocrisy (cf. Lk 11:44). The 'inner' and 'outer' contrast of 25-26 leads on to a formal accusation of hypocrisy. The comparison, deliberately nauseating, is borrowed from the tombs whitened with chalk four weeks before the Pasch to warn pilgrims of the danger of contact and legal impurity; cf. Num 19:16. The eye sees them gleaming in the sun but they cover corruption. By the same paradox the Law-abiding Pharisee is full of lawlessness (ἀνομία); cf. 1-7, note. 29-33. Seventh Woe: murder of God's envoy (Lk 11:47-48). As in 23 it is not the act of honouring their great ancestors, 29, that is condemned but present murderous intention which lays bare the hypocrisy of their protestations. They admit, 30, that it was their fathers who murdered the prophets but seek to disclaim responsibility. Nevertheless, they and our Lord know their murderous intent in his regard; cf. 21:38, 45. The situation of their 'fathers' has reappeared and their conduct shows, 31, that they are worthy sons and that their protest, 30, is empty. Bitterly ironical, our Lord urges them to their deadly work: their fathers have killed the servants, 21:35, 36, it is theirs to complete the work and kill the Son. In these words, recalling those of the Baptist (33; cf. 3:7) but unexpected and terrible on the lips of our Lord, the crafty Pharisees are warned of the judgement that condemns to hell. 34-36. The crime and its punishment (Lk 11:49-51). To this end (i.e. of 32; 33 is parenthetical) our Lord in his turn (ἰδοὺ ἐγώ, emphatic) is sending (cf. 10:16) his own 'prophets' to declare the divine message and 'wise men' and 'scribes' (cf. 13:52) to apply it. The old order will repeat itself, and with it the opportunity for sacrilegious murder. 35. Thus the chosen race will fitly bear the responsibility for all the innocent blood shed on the ground in the whole course of sacred history. The names of Abel and Zacharias are chosen because Abel's murder is the first mentioned in the Scriptures, Gen 4:8, and that of the priest Zacharias, 2 Par 24:20-22, the last in the Hebrew order of books. In each case there is question, as here, of a just reckoning to be made, Gen 4:10 f.; 2 Par 24:22. The reference to Zacharias is certainly to the priest of 2 Par 24:20—'son of Joiada' and slain in the temple precincts (cf. Lk 11:51)—and not to the prophet, who is called 'son of Barachias' in Zach 1:1. There are some faint indications that the reading 'son of Barachias' in Mt is not original: the phrase is absent altogether from the Sinaitic MS and from four cursives; it becomes 'son of Joiada' in the 'Gospel of the Nazarenes' known to Jerome and thought by him to be the original Matthew. Its absence from the parallel place in Lk suggests to many critics that it may be an ancient and mistaken gloss (e.g. *Allen, *Plummer, *Loisy). This theory is accepted by many Catholic exegetes. The question remains unsolved. 36. For all these crimes the nation shall shortly answer. The fall of Jerusalem came forty years later.

37-39 Lament for Jerusalem (Lk 13:34-35)—37. The sorrow underlying the anger of the denunciations rises to the surface. The city of God, 5:35, assassin of his envoys (cf. 30, 34; 2 Par 24:20 f.; Jer 26:20 ff.; 4 Kg 21:16, etc.) and finally rejecting the reconciliation through the Son! By repeated appeal to Jerusalem (unmentioned in the Synoptics but told in Jn) our Lord has used the most anxious care to protect his own. 38. The city with its temple ('your house') will be left forsaken as the prophet had threatened, Jer 22:5—a repetition of the sorrows of the Babylonian exile. 39. But Jesus does not yet speak openly of material ruin.

He speaks rather of the spiritual loss his absence will bring. They have heard his last appeal. His mission to them is over. Yet, it seems, he ends on a note of invitation. If Jerusalem should come to hail him as her King, as many on Sunday had saluted him (cf. 21:9, note), she will find him. But not till then. The words are perhaps merely a farewell exhortation though many (as Prat, Lagrange) see in them a promise of the future conversion of Israel to Christ—a conversion which is in fact prophesied by Paul, Rom 11:25. For barren resentment of Jewry we should substitute prayer.

XXIV 1-52 Discourse on 'the End' (Mk 13:1-37; 715a Lk 21:5-36).

XXIV 1-3 The Question and its Background (Mk 13:1-4; Lk 21:5-7)—1. Our Lord leaves the temple by the eastern gate and, crossing the Kedron, climbs the slope of Olivet. Turning to look backward down upon the temple buildings the disciples, admiring provincials, exclaim at their massive beauty. 2. Our Lord's reply is disconcerting. This Herodian temple, begun more than forty years before (20/19 B.C.) and not completely finished until thirty years later (A.D. 64) was even now threatened with total ruin—it was burned and overthrown in A.D. 70. 3. The remark is unexpected and the disciples walk on, perhaps in silence, perhaps in agitated discussion until, reaching the summit, all stop to rest. Our Lord's four privileged disciples (Mk) put the double question: 'When?'; 'What warnings?'. It is difficult to determine whether these questions refer to one event, the time and herald-signs of the destruction of Jerusalem, or to two, the time of the destruction of Jerusalem and the signs of the end of the world. Luke's words and to a slightly less extent Mk's seem to suggest one; Mt's suggest two. It is usual to reconcile the two forms of the question, Mt as against Mk, Lk, by pointing out that for a Jew the destruction of the temple would spell the end of the world itself. In this hypothesis the disciples thought that the two events were to be simultaneous, and our Lord in his reply treats of them together because the first is a figure of the second ('end of a world', 'end of the world'); nevertheless, it is claimed, he removes the disciples' chronological confusion. It is said that two separate events are certainly discussed in the discourse because one is described as local, imminent, foreseeable through historical happenings while the other is universal, of unknown date, without warning signs.

Another and important theory has been recently presented by A. Feuillet [RSR 34 (1947) 303-27; 35 (1948) 544-65; NRT 71 (1949) 701-22, 806-28; RB 55 (1948) 481-502; 56 (1949) 61-92, 340-64; 57 (1950) 43-62, 180-211]. It is a revival of Augustine's tentative opinion (PL 33, 904-25), later adopted by Calmet and Le Camus, but revised and supported with powerful new arguments. The theory defends the unity of the discourse and holds that the reference throughout is to the destruction of Jerusalem with its double aspect: the end of the old order ('times of the Jews') and the opening of the new ('times of the Gentiles'). The hypothesis does not deny the possibility of a further sense (fuller? typical?) in the discourse. Indeed it follows from the nature of the case that the divine judgement which closes the first act of world-history (the Age of Israel) is the destined model or type of the Last Judgement which is to mark the end of the next (the Age of the Gentiles). This fusion of perspective is in the style of the prophets. For them the 'Day of Yahweh' (i.e. of Yahweh's judgement) has a shifting perspective, the reason being that this 'day' is considered more from the theological, transcendental, plane than from the historical and contingent point of view (cf. Scripture, 4 [1950] 222-30, 264-73). But the hypothesis denies that the two themes (end of Jerusalem, end of the world) are juxtaposed so that one part of the discourse refers to the end of Jerusalem, the other to the end of the world; it does not deny that the themes are superimposed 715b (Benoit). St Paul, therefore, could resume certain phrases of the discourse and refer them to the end of the world. Strictly literal interpretation, the theory claims, is satisfied by the historical reference (destruction of Jerusalem) and, in fact, sometimes demands such a reference (e.g. 24; 16-20). The following commentary will briefly state both views. Regarding the form of the disciples' question Feuillet, emphasizing the text of Mk, Lk, insists that it is explicitly concerned with the destruction of Jerusalem and that Mt's form is capable of the same interpretation. The phrase 'thy coming' (παρουσία, a term not used in the gospels except Mt 24) has in the Greek papyri the meaning of a royal visit. Paul certainly uses the word for Christ's final coming at the end of the world (1 Cor 15:23 etc.) but it may be that in this case as in others he has taken over Mt's terminology and adapted it to the final coming, RB 56 (1949) 75-6, note. On the resemblance between Mt and Paul; cf. *Dodd, ET 58 (1947) 293 ff. and critique in DR 66 (1948) 367-83; on the likeness of terminology between Mt 24 in particular and 1, 2 Thess cf. Orchard, BJ 19 (1938) 19-42; the last author concludes that Paul in his apocalyptic 'has used the same words, ideas and phraseology (as Mt), reshuffled them, and set them down in their new combination'. The 'consummation of the world' (συντελεία τοῦ αἰῶνος) sounds more decisive for the end of the world reference than does the term 'parousia'. Nevertheless the word αἰῶν signifies not the physical world or universe, but 'era, epoch' of human history; for Paul's use cf. Allo, Vivre et Penser, 1^{re} Sér., 1941, 179. The 'era' here might therefore be that of the old dispensation. In 28:20, where the perspective changes, it is the new, Messianic era.

- 6-14 The Beginning of Sorrows (cf. Mk 13:5-13; Lk 21:18-19)—Our Lord does not yet reply directly to the disciples' question: he is concerned primarily with spiritual issues and with the conduct of the disciples. 4-5. He supposes his own death after which many would come usurping the title that belonged to him—as in fact they did, with grievous results for themselves and their followers. For these political, pseudo-Messiahs who appeared in considerable numbers before the destruction of Jerusalem cf. Jos., BJ 2, 13, 4; 6, 5, 4; Lagrange, Le Messianisme, 21-7. 6-7. Still anxious to warn his own rather than to foretell the future, our Lord speaks of the inward peace the disciples must preserve in a troubled world. The prophetic style he uses does not call for minute verification though this is not lacking for the years before A.D. 70. It was a period savage in its wars, ferocious in its very peace (Tacitus, Hist. 3, 2, 1) with war's usual concomitants: plagues (Tacitus, Annales 16, 13) and famine (Ac 11:28; Jos., Ant. 20, 2, 5); even earthquakes (in towns of Asia Minor, A.D. 61-2; Pompeii in A.D. 63 etc.). All this does not closely concern the Apostles, as the Jerusalem catastrophe will; cf. 15 ff. The 'end' of Jerusalem with its final break with the old order is still to come. 8. These calamities are 'the beginnings of the pangs of childbirth' (ἀρχὴ ὠδίνων). The world is in travail for a new age (cf. Mic 4:9-10; Apoc 12:2) though the pangs have not reached their climax; cf. 15, note. The sentence, though ominous, is designed to console the disciples; cf. Jn 16:20-22. 9. Pursuing the theme of his disciples' conduct (cf. 10:17-23, notes) Jesus fortifies them against the future by showing that their fate is neither outside his knowledge nor divorced from his interests ('for my name's sake'). 10-12. Under the pressure of persecution many shall fall away and even hand one another over to the persecutors. In this divided field religious impostors (cf. 5) reap a rich harvest. (Such a situation in fact developed some years before the Destruction of Jerusalem; Rom 16:17-18; Gal 1:6-9; 2 Cor 11:13 etc.) Faced with this disedifying spectacle the love of God will freeze in the hearts of many. 13. But he will save his soul (cf. Lk 21:19) who has endured perfectly (or 'to the end', i.e.—in this context—to the end of life, not of Jerusalem.

Nevertheless, the phrase εἰς τέλος—not εἰς τὸ τέλος 715d—probably signifies 'completely, perfectly' like the εἰς τέλος of 2 Cor 1:13 and, possibly, the εἰς τέλος of Jn 13:1). 14. But before the 'consummation' (τέλος: 'the end') which, in view of the following verses, probably now means the end of Jerusalem, the good news of the Kingdom must be announced to the whole world (ἐν ὅλῃ τῇ οἰκουμένῃ). This last phrase, suggesting to modern ears the inhabited world as we now know it, is already used, equivalently, in Rom 1:8 'in the whole world' and the testimony 'to all nations' finds its echo in Rom 1:5. Paul registers this universal preaching as a fait accompli as early as A.D. 60, Col 1:23, ten years before the fall of Jerusalem. The verse does not hint, therefore, that the perspective has passed beyond the fall of Jerusalem. Through all the hostile circumstances described, 5-12, the gospel will go steadily forward. 14, too, thus holds a note of consolation for the disciples.

15-28 The Great Tribulation (Mk 13:14-23; Lk 715a 21:20-24)—At last our Lord proceeds to answer the disciples' question but he is still concerned primarily with practical advice and comfort. 15. The prophet Daniel (Dan 9:27; cf. 11:31; 12:11) had spoken of the 'devastating hateful thing' which 'will be upon the temple' (LXX). The words were verified in 168 B.C. (cf. 1 Mac 1:57; 2 Mac 6:1-5) by the conduct of the hellenizing tyrant Antiochus Epiphanes who set up in the temple an idol and altar to Olympian Zeus. Our Lord speaks of a repetition of such sacrilege and he invites the reader of Daniel to penetrate the deeper prophetic sense of the allusion. (Possibly it is the evangelist himself who invites to this or to an attentive consideration of our Lord's words.) If Jesus is referring explicitly to the desecration of the temple ('in a holy place'), the warning would be recognized by the Christians when, in A.D. 68, the Jewish Zealots tyrannized in the temple which they had turned into a fortress. If he is referring to the desecration of the sacred soil of Palestine, it would be the Roman armies bearing down on Jerusalem in A.D. 69 that would be the signal for flight; cf. Lk 21:20. 16. The Christians are to flee from Judaea to the mountains (across Jordan, seemingly). In effect they did leave Jerusalem for Pella before the siege, Eus., HE 3, 5, 3. 17-20. Haste will be imperative. Should anyone be taking his ease, eastern-fashion, on the flat-roof let him run down the outer staircase but not go into the house to encumber his flight with baggage. Should he be at work in the field let him not wait even to pick up his cloak. And alas for those forbidden by necessity or by love to leave their burden behind! The disciples must pray that God's judgement be tempered with mercy. In winter, rushing torrents would stay their flight; sabbath-scruples (cf. Ex 16:29), still felt by the Christians in the early days of the Church, would restrict it to less than one useless mile. Many exegetes see in 21 the beginning of a discourse on the end of the world, 21-32. If this is so, its opening conjunction γάρ ('For') is a merely formal connective after the manner of apocalypse (cf. e.g. Dan 11:45 with Dan 12:1). Others prefer to see a close connexion (WV makes one sentence of 20-21) and refer 21 to the destruction of Jerusalem. In support of this reference is the parallel Lk 21:23b. The 'great tribulation', it is urged, like the 'great distress' of Lk 21:23b, may still be the concomitant of the destruction. The extravagance of the terms (not, however, entirely absent from 6-7 which certainly refer to the period before the destruction) is not incompatible with this restricted reference. The prophets present local historical events connected with the fortunes of God's people in grandiose language; cf., e.g. the 'apocalypse' of Is 24-27 dealing with the overthrow of the arch-enemy, Assyria. 'The mere mention of a world-judgement is no proof that the section deals with the end of time. Every intervention of God is a world-judgement'; Kissane, The Book of Isaiah (Dublin 1941) 1, 267. See terms very like those of Mt and referring to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nabuchodonosor, 716c Bar 2:2; cf. Is 13:6-10; Jer 4:23-26; 30:7. 22. This verse may suggest the period immediately preceding the end of the world; the time, with its physical trials and moral seductions, 24, is mercifully to be shortened; otherwise the salvation of the chosen Christian faithful would be threatened. The mention of these 'elect' is said to prove that the destruction of Jerusalem is not here referred to since the 'elect' can be neither the Jewish factions besieged in Jerusalem nor the Christians, because these last left Jerusalem before the siege, 16, note. Nevertheless the argument is not peremptory: Chrysostom (Hom. 76 in Mt) identifies the 'elect' with Christians who remained in Jerusalem and explains that it was owing to their presence that God shortened the siege and so preserved a remnant of the Jews. Alternatively it is possible to identify this 'remnant' itself with the 'elect' of 22 and 24. The 'remnant of Israel' is the recurrent theme of the prophets (RB 42 [1933] 562-39); it indicates the survivors of the particular national calamity the prophet has in mind, some of whom, not all, will prove worthy of God's promise. In this view the calamity is the destruction of Jerusalem and the 'elect' are the surviving Jews for whom the offer of the Messianic kingdom still lies open. St Paul (Rom 11:7; cf. Rom 11:15) names the 'remnant' the 'elect', but refers the term to those Jews who have already (c. A.D. 56) embraced Christianity. This is because, in his perspective, the crisis has already occurred—the advent, death, resurrection of the Messiah; this crisis is entirely a spiritual one, and its 'survivors', therefore, are necessarily those who have actually entered the Messianic kingdom. Our Lord's perspective is different: the crisis is national and yet to come. This difference of perspective means, as in the case of the prophets (Scripture 4 [1950] 223-4), that the personnel of the 'remnant' is different also. The prophetic flavour of the passage is perceptible: divine decree has 'cut short' (cf. Dan 9:24) the time of tribulation (the siege of Jerusalem lasted five months)—otherwise no single inhabitant ('no flesh'; cf. Jer 12:12) would have survived. 23-25. The words are addressed indeed to the apostles but only in so far as these represent the faithful who live to see the end (of the world? of Jerusalem?). The pseudo-liberators, 5, appear again. Their deceits are described in the terms of Deut 13:1 where the false prophet announces (Heb. nāṭan; LXX δῶ; Mt δῶσουσιν; DV 'shew') various portents. The fulfilment of such predictions, however, is to be taken only as a trial of faith permitted by God, Deut 13:2-3. Their purpose (DV 'inasmuch as to', but ῥῶρε here is probably purposive as in 10:1; 27:1; cf. Mk 'in order to deceive') will be to win supporters even among the 'elect'. The reappearance of the 'deliverers' in this part of the discourse argues for a reference to a second epoch—the end of the world. But, on the other hand, it may be that our Lord's intention is simply to indicate that they multiply, as might be expected, as the threat to Jerusalem grows more alarming. 26. The impostor must be left severely alone under whatever guise he present himself: whether coming like a second Moses from the desert, as happened under the procurators Felix, A.D. 52-60, and Florus, A.D. 60-2 (cf. Jos. B. J. 2, 13, 4; Ant. 20, 5, 10) or hidden in the store-rooms (the inmost rooms) surrounding his preparations with the mystery sometimes expected of the Messias (Lagrange, Le Messianisme, 221-4). 27. The 'lightning' image suggests a suddenness which might forbid reference to the destruction of Jerusalem which, 15, gives warning of its approach. Yet the argument is not conclusive since the suddenness is not such as to exclude a period of activity for pseudo-messiahs, 24, and the 'lightning' image is used by the prophets, Is 30:27 ff.; Zach 9:14, of divine judgements in the course and not at the end of history. The 'coming' (ἡ παρουσία, 3, note) of the Son of Man is therefore not necessarily a coming for the final and universal judgement; it may be his coming for the judgement upon Israel. 28. A sentence in proverb-form reminiscent of Job 39:30. It possibly means that the final coming of the Son of Man will leave none untouched (Buzy) but similar language is used by the prophets to describe divine judgement on Jerusalem (Jer 7:33 f. etc.) in which case the 'carcase' is Jerusalem where the birds of prey will have work to do.

29-31 After the Tribulation (Mk 13:24-27; Lk 21:25-27)—Almost all commentators refer 29-31 to the end of the world theme. The new theory, however, maintaining the single reference of the whole discourse, insists that Jesus still speaks of the fall of Jerusalem or rather of its counterpart which is the establishment of the Messianic kingdom in power. 29. The consequence of the great disaster is expressed in the prophetic style we have already noted, 21. The serried ranks (σῶβαδὲ i.e. 'marshalled hosts'; DV 'powers') of God's heavenly army are in turmoil. As in Is 13:6-10, foretelling the ruin of Babylon, the very heavens are presented as involved in the catastrophe. All agree that these stereotyped terms of prophecy and apocalypse are not to be taken literally whether the reference be to the end of the world or to the end of Jerusalem. It follows that 29 does not settle the problem. It should be noticed, however, that Peter, Ac 2:19 f., uses the very similar language of Joel 2:30 f. not of the end of the world but of the new era formally and spectacularly inaugurated on Pentecost Day. For Peter, Joel's 'great and manifest day of the Lord' has come with the Messianic age. It is instructive (cf. 31, note) that Joel heralds this 'day' with a trumpet, Jl 2:1. 30. Commonly taken as decisive for the end of the world reference. The Son of Man appears as sovereign judge; the sign is of his triumphant and avenging Cross; the lamentation is not of repentance, which would come too late, but of despair. The opposed view makes 'the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds' (cf. Dan 7:13) refer (as in 26:64; see note) to the glorious establishment of his kingdom on earth. The 'mourning of the tribes' is taken from Zach 12:10-14 where the 'mourning' is not of despair but of repentance for the death of one untimely slain, apparently of David's house. The repentance is followed, Zach 13:1 ff., by an era of grace. These references to Daniel and Zacharias, it is claimed, both suggest the Messianic era rather than the end of the world (cf. the grouping of the same texts in Apoc 1:7, probably in the same sense; Allo, L'Apocalypse, 61). The 'sign of the Son of Man in heaven' is taken to mean the rallying-signal which is the Messias himself (σημείον as in Is 11:12). It is a sign perhaps experienced rather than 'seen'; cf. 26:64, § 720g. It is a 'heavenly' sign (once asked for and now to be given, cf. 12:38 ff., § 697d), like the 'coming in the clouds', because the Son of Man's heavenly glory is perceived in the triumphal establishment of his kingdom on earth. The mourning, as in Zach 12:10, is consequent upon the realization of the glory of the Son whose death is thus shown to have been a hideous crime. In this theory, therefore, the sign is 'Christ the King seen in symbolic vision bearing the marks of his shameful death now as glorious wounds—a vision which forces itself upon the attention of men'. 31. The gathering of the elect is variously interpreted according to the sense given to the word 'elect' (22, 24, notes). It is usually understood as the fulfilment of the Christian hope for the end of time, 1 Thess 4:17; 2 Thess 2:1, while the 'trumpet', 1 Thess 4:15 f., is to awaken the faithful who are supposed dead (Buzy). The second hypothesis, which has referred 30 to the conversion of the nations ('all tribes of the earth') who perceive that Christ has risen and reigns, asserts that 31 calls attention to those other members of the Messianic kingdom—the 'remnant of Israel' (22, note). The 'trumpet', it is held, is only the signal that the Messianic era has opened; it is the rallying-call for God's people precisely as in Is 27:13. We are reminded that in the Jewish daily prayer (S'mônê 'Esrê, 10;

716g the 'trumpet' of 31 and the 'sign' of 30 are joined in a petition for the coming of the Messianic age: 'Sound the great trumpet for our deliverance and raise a standard for the rallying of our exiles!'. The 'trumpet' in Mt, as so often in the Apocalypse (Allo, L'Apocalypse, lxi, 122 f.), unlike the 'last' trumpet of 1 Cor 15:52 announces perhaps the intervention of God in the course of history and not at its end. In this view the symbolical trumpet is to rally Christ's own elect—the remnant of Israel dispersed over the known world.

717a 32-35 Parable of the Fig-tree (Mk 13:28-31; Lk 21:28-33)—On the assumption that the preceding verses refer to the end of the world the context of this section causes difficulty, particularly in view of 34. Some (Lagrange, Buzy) suggest that our passage refers back to the destruction of Jerusalem section; others (Prat) find this procedure arbitrary and, yielding to the force of the context, apply 32-35 to the end of the world (34, note). The view which holds for the destruction of Jerusalem theme throughout the discourse claims to offer the more natural explanation of the text, with Lagrange, and also to save the context, with Prat. 32-33. Just as the happy season of summer has its herald-signs, Cant 2:12 f., so the establishment of the Messianic era, counterpart of the destruction of Jerusalem, has its portents, viz. 'all these things', 33; cf. 'these things' in 3. The events of 5-28 will, as they mature, proclaim the imminence of the Kingdom whose powerful establishment is described, according to the Feuillet view, in 29-31. 34. And indeed none of 'these things' is far distant. All shall take place within the lifetime of many now living ('this generation'; cf. 11:16; 12:39; 17:7 etc.). Here, as in 23:36 f., our Lord appears to intend a chronological indication; the alternative explanation (Knabenbauer, Prat) of 'this generation' as 'the Jewish race' is less probable. 35. That 'heaven and earth shall pass' may mean that the old order is to give way to a new world (19:28, note)—the Messianic era, 29. Possibly, however, 35 which is apparently parenthetical and occurs elsewhere (5:18, note) has no reference to the symbolism of 29 and indicates that our Lord's words (his doctrine in general) are more stable than the physical universe.

b 36-41 The Deluge Comparison (Lk 17:26-27, 30, 34-35; cf. Mk 13:32)—36. A return to (Lagrange) or continuation of (Prat) the end of the world theme; or (Feuillet) a continuation of the destruction of Jerusalem theme. Our Lord refuses an exact date though in 34 he seems to define a date within 30-40 years. From this apparent incompatibility the inference is usually drawn that 34 and 36 refer to two different events, respectively the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world. It is admitted however (Ricciotti, Vita di Gesù Cristo, Milan, 1946, 641) that 36 is unexpected in its present place. For this reason, and for others, Feuillet emphasizes the indefiniteness of the time-indication in 34 as opposed to the refused precision ('day and hour') in 36. He concludes that 34 and 36 may refer to the one event—the establishment of the Messianic kingdom, the great 'day' of Yahweh according to the prophets. He underlines the close similarity between 36 and Ac 1:7 f. where our Lord, asked the time of this establishment, refuses to give it and says only (Ac 1:8; cf. Mt 24:14) that the Gospel must first be spread abroad (RB 56 [1949] 87 f.). In either case, the exact day and hour is the Father's secret. No man, no angel, not even the Son (this last phrase, certainly authentic in Mk 13:32, is probably authentic in Mt) knows that. The crescendo is instructive, but there remains the dogmatic difficulty of our Lord's proclaiming his 'ignorance'. It should however be remarked in passing that the inclusion of the phrase is a strong witness to the complete honesty of the evangelists. The difficulty (similar to that of 19:17; 20:23; cf. §§ 709b, 710b) is to some degree solved if we remember that it is the constant practice of the incarnate Son to claim no knowledge beyond that which the Father has instructed him to use. This is true even of the gospel of John who indubitably teaches the divinity of Christ; cf. Jn 7:16; 14:10. On the dogmatic side it may be said (A. Durand, S.J., NRT 71 [1949], 497-503) that in the incarnate Word were two planes of knowledge—divine and total on one plane, human and limited on the other; direct communication between the two being established only by his supernatural 'infused knowledge'. This last was infused in proportion to the dignity of the man-God and to the needs of his redemptive work (e.g. knowledge of his own divinity and Messianic character; gift of prophecy). It is doubtful if the knowledge of the time of the world's ending or of the exact 'day and hour' of Jerusalem's destruction was thus needed; cf. Dz 2183-5. 37-39. No one knows the hour because (γὰρ) in the divine decree the exact time of the coming (παρουσία) is uncertain and sudden. This 'coming' is to overtake people at their usual occupations, careless of impending disaster. 40-41. The sudden event 'will make a sharp distinction between the fate of individuals who up to that moment were in close association' (Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom, London 1936, 87). The sense of 'taken' and 'left' will depend upon the identification of the disaster. For those who accept the end of the world context the terms mean 'taken to God', 'left unaccepted'. In the destruction of Jerusalem hypothesis, 'taken' means 'swept away by the catastrophe' and 'left' means spared (as: Noe was 'left', Gen 7:23) to form part of the chosen 'remnant' (RSR 35 [1948] 555-8).

42-44 The Surprised Householder (Lk 12:39-40; cf. Lk 21:34-35)—This, like the deluge-comparison, 39, presents a man overtaken by disaster. It warns the disciples to be wakeful (γρηγορεῖτε). Though you do not know the hour (cf. 36), proceeds our Lord, this ye know (at least), i.e. you can appreciate this, namely, that if a householder knew exactly when (ποῖα φυλάσσει) the thief would come he would be prepared. The saying is strange because the disciples themselves do not know 'the hour', 36. We are evidently to understand the suppressed implication that the householder, if forewarned of the event but ignorant of the exact hour, would watch all night. As before, 4 ff., our Lord is concerned with the conduct of his disciples. The coming disasters will overwhelm their hope and faith and lead them to rash action (cf. 25-26) unless they stand in calm fortitude awaiting the hour of deliverance; cf. Lk 21:28.

XXIV 45-51 The Parable of the Stewards (Lk 12:41-48) —It is probable that the parable was not spoken on this occasion and that Lk gives its correct setting. It is drawn hither in Mt by an analogy of subject—the 'watchfulness' enjoined upon the disciples, 42, in preparation for a divine 'coming'. But the 'coming' in this case is to the individual not to a community, as in Lk. The parable is a diptych. 45-47. The first picture presents the faithful superintendent of the household, always giving 'them their food in due time'. He is found so doing when his master comes. From supervision of the servants he is promoted to superintendence of all his master's affairs. This steward would appear to represent the disciple placed by Christ, the Master (ὁ κύριος), in a post of responsibility. The coming of the Master (it is not described as a 'return'; Dodd, 159) lacks the solemnity of the 'coming' of 24:27, 30. It does not, therefore, suggest more than the 'coming' to each individual—the time of reckoning which is death. The word 'blessed', 46, and the extravagance of the reward for simple duty, 47, suggest allegory: the disciple, faithful to his earthly responsibilities in the Kingdom, will be associated in heaven with the glorified Son of Man presiding thence over his earthly kingdom; cf. 19:28, note. 48-51. In the companion-picture the steward sees in his master's absence an opportunity for oppression and debauch. The master's 'delay' of 48 is probably but 'a necessary part of the dramatic machinery to produce the situation desired' (Dodd). In the hypothesis that the 'coming' of the Master is the End of the World, the 7171 'delay' is taken as an indication that the End may be 'long a-coming'. The 'separate him' of 51 is difficult (ἀπορρομφαί; WV 'cut him asunder') though the sawing asunder of a slave's body was a punishment not unknown in the Greek and Roman periods; cf. Black, 190. Possibly it allegorically figures severe punishment; possibly it is to be rendered 'cut him off' (KNT), i.e. from the association with the reigning Christ in heaven, 47. His lot is henceforth with the 'hypocrites'. This last term invites us (cf. 23:13, 15 etc.) to think of the scribes and Pharisees who had cut themselves off from the Kingdom, 23:13. The 'weeping and gnashing of teeth' (cf. 8:11-13, note) has already been associated with individual reprobation, 22:13, and recurs, significantly, in 25:30.

718a XXV 1-13 The Ten Virgins (Mt only; but cf. Lk 12:35-39).—The 'coming' of the Master described in 24:45-51 is now presented as the coming of the Bridegroom. Here again the 'coming' lacks the pomp of 24:29-31 and we think instinctively of the 'coming' that tests the individual—death. 1-4. The kingdom of heaven considered in the stage just described (i.e. of the Master's coming to examine the conduct of his servants; 24:46, 50; this seems indicated by the τότε ἀποσπασθήσονται; DV 'Then shall . . . be like') resembles the situation about to be outlined; cf. 13:24, § 699b. The general background is that of a marriage but wants detail and has elements of improbability (Buzy, 326 f.) that perhaps suggest allegory. It is not entirely clear that the 'virgins' are bridesmaids since no bride is mentioned throughout (omit 'and the bride' from 1; WV) and, unless we intrude our knowledge of Palestinian marriage-custom, there is no hint that the virgins go to the bride's house first; it is to the groom's they go. The parable is concerned only with the relationship of virgins and groom. The tiny clay lamps hold little oil. The prudent young ladies, foreseeing possible delay, carry small refuelling vessels also. Such lamps are eminently unsuitable for the open-air procession. They are introduced into the parable deliberately, possibly because the more practical torch would not bring in the necessary idea of replenishing-vessels, possibly as symbols of vigilance, Lk 12:35. The bridegroom (called 'Lord'—κύριος—in 11; cf. 7:22; 24:50) is Christ himself (cf. 9:15; 22:2; Eph 5:25 ff.; Apoc 19:7-9; 21:2. For rabbinic ideas of the Messiah wedded to his people cf. Edersheim 1, 722 f.; Brierre-Narbonne, Les Prophéties Messianiques de l'A. T. dans la Littérature Juive, Paris 1933, 22 f.). 5-8. Wearing with waiting all grew drowsy and fell asleep. This detail serves to underline the delay of the groom. It is not reproved: both wise and foolish have allowed themselves to be overtaken by sleep. The guilt does not lie in this but in the carelessness that had made no provision for all eventualities. The wise, though asleep, are prepared. Nor need the delay of the groom hold an allegorical significance (cf. 24:48, note); it perhaps merely emphasizes the prudence that had provided for it. 9. The rather selfish complacency of the prudent may not be admirable but (as elsewhere; cf. Lk 16:8) it is only their one quality (of preparedness) that is set as a model. It emerges that this quality is a personal one and cannot be supplied by others (note the emphatic pronouns of 3, 7, 9: 'their own lamps', 'for yourselves', ἑαυτῶν, ἑαυταῖς). 10-13. It is too late now: the groom's arrival (like the Master's in 24:50) has caught them unprepared. The wise go in with the groom to the marriage-feast; cf. 22:2, note. The door fast-shut, the invocation 'Lord', the strange and solemn repudiation by the bridegroom, are all unlikeliest and betray the application of the parable. This is explicitly made in 13: prudent provision for the Lord's coming, whenever it be.

• 14-30 The Talents (cf. Lk 19:11-27).—Our Lord had said, 24:45, that the true servant must be faithful and prudent. The parable of the Virgins illustrates the prudence that makes the Christian live with a view to the coming of the Bridegroom. The parable of the Talents illustrates the faithfulness required of each

Christian in the administration of goods committed to him by the Master. 14-15. The 'watchfulness' mentioned in 13 is necessary because (For it is as when': ὡς περ γὰρ) the situation under discussion is comparable to the one about to be described. In proportion to the financial ability of each of his servants (with the intention, therefore, of their making profit for him) the Master commits to them various sums. A huge sum to the first, a small fortune to the second, a not inconsiderable amount to the third. For the 'talent' cf. 18:24, § 707b. 16-17. The first and the second lose no time (the 'immediately' of 15 is to be taken with 16: Straightway he that had received . . .; WV) in doubling each his master's money by hard work. Presumably this result was achieved only 'after a long time', 19, when the master returned; cf. 25:5; 24:48, note. 18. The third hid his talent, doubtless in the form of current coins, in a hole in the ground for safety. 19. The long absence of the master throws into relief the sustained diligence of the first and second servants and the persistent laziness of the third. 20-23. The faithful conduct of some few business-matters (the amounts, though huge, are as nothing to the master and in comparison with the reward) is rewarded by a post of greater importance. The application of the parable shines through the sentence: Enter thou into the joy [i.e. the joyful banquet; Joûon, 157; cf. 25:10, note] of thy Lord! The faithful servant shares with Jesus (cf. 25:34) the joy of the Father's kingdom and apparently (cf. 25:21, 23) is associated with the King's administration of the earthly kingdom so long as it lasts; cf. 19:28, note. 24-25. The lazy servant throws the responsibility upon the master. Experience tells him, he suggests, that the master is an exacting man. It seems that he stops short of an accusation of dishonesty. He develops the term 'exacting' in two farming-images: 'reaping where thou hast not sown', 'gathering where thou hast not winnowed' (WV). They are operations in which the master has had no personal share, from which nevertheless he expects profit. It is the classical objection to the 'capitalist'. The servant alleges that his timidity proceeded from a knowledge of this. He considers that the return of the talent absolves him from blame. 26-27. The master immediately unmasks the true motive of the servant's conduct: sloth. Even granted this caricature of himself, he argues, the servant should have had the wit and will if not to trade, as the others have done, at least to bank the money. On Jewish bankers cf. Edersheim 2, 463 f. The master would thus have received the interest. 28-29. To the first servant, who has shown himself able to bear great responsibility, the master transfers the idle 'talent'. Yet the servant has already 'entered into the joy of his Lord'. One, therefore, again receives the impression (cf. 21, 23) that 'the faithful servant of Christ is awarded a stewardship of a higher order in heaven (cf. Lk 16:9-12) and associated more closely than ever with the furthering of the Kingdom's interests' (Feuillet). In human affairs responsibility is increasingly added to the able and willing. This is true, mutatis mutandis, of the Kingdom, 29. 30. The punishment is directly contrasted with the reward. The lazy servant is thrust out from the joy and light of the king's banquet-hall; cf. 8:12, § 689e. The parable primarily teaches that God's gifts, of nature and especially of grace, are held in stewardship and must not be allowed to lie idle. They are to be used to further his kingdom; cf. 5:13-16. It emerges, secondarily, that the standard of God's judgement is relative to the opportunities offered: 'the greater the gifts, the greater the account demanded' (Gregory the Great, PL 76, 1106).

XXV 31-46 The Last Judgement (Mt only).—The preceding parables have dealt with God's particular assessment of the conduct of individuals—an assessment which is repeated throughout the course of the earthly Kingdom's history as each individual comes to his account. Our Lord now passes to a description of the universal and final Assize. 'Between 24:1-44 and 25:31-46

718f there is this in common, viz. that in each case a collective judgement closes an era in the history of salvation, and there is a solemn intervention of the Son of Man. . . . But the analogy stops there. . . . The first tableau, 24:1-44, presents a purely collective judgement, taking place in time, without any reference to sanctions in the eternal world; this is followed by a new stage in the history of man's religious evolution—a new cosmos. The second tableau describes a judgement not only collective but individual also; when it is finished, human history is at an end; man goes to eternal life or to eternal loss', Feuillet. Contemporary Jewish thought, too, appears to distinguish a judgement inaugurating the Messianic era ('days of the Messiah'; cf. 19:28, § 709e) and another judgement, strictly eschatological, which introduces the eternal world, Bonsirven, 1, 486-93. Even the second of these has, for the Rabbis, a tinge of nationalism: Israel would receive preferential treatment from God the Judge, Bonsirven 1, 500-3. Our Lord, speaking here of this second and final judgement, shows no trace of nationalism. The judgement by which the kingdom of the Son is purified before becoming the kingdom of the Father is decided exclusively on religious grounds. 31. Of this final judgement the Messiah had not been imagined as the independent Judge. Our Lord, however, unhesitatingly assumes this office. He goes further (cf. 40, 45) and decides the issue on man's attitude to himself. This situation 'constitutes a declaration (of divinity) almost as solemn as the one he was to make when he presented himself to the Sanhedrin as Son of God', Lagrange. 32-33. Man is fitly judged by the Son of Man and the judgement is universal. The 'sheep', for their mild expression and docility, are a suitable image of the faithful followers of Christ the shepherd, Jn 10:3, 4, 27. They are distinguished from the 'goats' (cf. Ez 34:17), mistrustful of eye and intractable of conduct, aptly chosen as their wicked counterpart. The right hand then, as now, was considered as the place of favour. 34. The 'king', the enthroned Son of Man of 31, invites the good to the kingdom of his royal Father. They are blessed of (i.e. 'by' or 'belonging to'; cf. Jn 11:29) that Father who, in his eternal decree had foreknown his own and prepared for their happiness; cf. 5:4, note. 35-36. Why this reward? Because the King himself had been by them fed, harboured, clothed; visited in sickness and in captivity. The Son of Man thus identifies himself with the cause of all men whom, as the Servant of God, Is 53, he purchased with his death. 37-40. Christian disciples at least could not doubt that they had done these things for the love of Christ, Mk 9:40, nevertheless they could not have realized, without our Lord's assurance, that these were favours personal to him. This was all the more remarkable in that the visible objects of those favours were often their own enemies and perhaps his; cf. our Lord's own instructions in 5:46. But the astonishment of the just at the judgement is merely a literary presentation of the lesson. In effect, after this revelation of our Lord's, they will henceforth see Christ in all the needy, friend or foe. 41-46. The sentence of the wicked, expressed more briefly than the invitation of the just, is a terrible one. Instead of 'Come!', 'Depart!'; in place of the Kingdom, 'everlasting fire'. God had prepared for man the Kingdom, not the fire, Wis 2:23 f.; this last was prepared only for the rebellious Satan (cf. 2 Pet 2:4; Jude 6) and his satellites whom, in rabbinic tradition, the archangel Sammael (Satan) had dragged with him to their doom, SB 1, 983 f. The Jewish texts do not agree on the eternity of punishment (Bonsirven 1, 538-41) but our Lord's terms clearly suggest a definitive separation of good from bad when the last and solemn judgement is declared.

719a F. The Passion XXVI 1-XXVII 66.

XXVI 1-5 The Conspiracy (Mk 14:1-2; Lk 22:1-2)—1-2. The long discourse of chh 24-25 is over (note Mt's familiar formula; cf. 7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1). It is Wednesday, two days before the Friday of our Lord's death. 3-4. Even as our Lord is speaking (if Mt's usually vague 'then' is here intended as a chronological note; otherwise cf. Jn 11:47-53) the Sanhedrin holds an informal meeting in the palace (not 'court-yard'; cf. Jolion, 159 f.) of its president Caiaphas (Iosepos Kaiaphas), high-priest from A.D. 18-36). 5. Haste is imperative yet the impending feast of the Pasch, anniversary of the birth of the nation, is an obstacle being a time of Messianic excitement. Moreover, the Galilean pilgrims and others have triumphantly escorted Jesus into the city on the previous Sunday. Had Judas not intervened it seems that the arrest would have been deferred.

6-18 Anointing at Bethany (Mk 14:3-9; Jn 12:1-8)—6 Though the incident took place on the Saturday before Palm Sunday, Jn 12:1, Mt and Mk place it in this Passion-context as a prophetic rehearsal of the burial-rites. 6. The host bears the common name of Simon, one of ten such in NT. He has suffered from some form of leprosy (cf. 8:2, § 689b), hence his soubriquet. He was possibly the father of Martha, Mary and Lazarus (cf. Jn 12:2-3) but more probably all three were guests at Simon's house. 7. From a flask of onyx ('alabaster-box') Mary pours the ointment that would have cost a contemporary labourer his whole year's salary or a Roman legionary sixteen months' pay (300 denarii; Mk 14:5). 8-9. It would have bought bread for thousands, Jn 6:7. The extravagance shocks the utilitarian but it is a salutary warning that the protest is most loudly voiced by Judas, Jn 12:4, who had no love of the poor, Jn 12:6. 10-11. Jesus is far from opposing efforts to conquer pauperism; he simply remarks a fact: the disciples will have ample opportunity after he has gone to care for the poor. 12-13. Consciously or unconsciously, Mary has lovingly enacted a prophecy of our Lord's death. The generous tone of his prediction, remarkably fulfilled, is in sharp contrast to the mean protest of 9.

14-16 Judas at Work (Mt only)—Mt resumes the thread of the historical narrative after the break in 6-13. Presumably it is still Wednesday. The traitor, reproachfully called 'one of the twelve', was the only non-Galilean Apostle, 10:1-4, § 692e. He had evidently reached the conclusion that nothing material was to be gained from associating with a Messiah who preached sacrifice and who had so little appreciation of the value of money, 9. The sum agreed upon for the treachery is the equivalent of 120 denarii; cf. 7, note. The 'pieces of silver' are staters; cf. 17:24, note. The sum was a natural one for the priests to choose because the Law laid it down as the price for a human person (a slave; Ex 21:32).

17-19 Preparation for the Supper; Thursday (Mk 14:12-16; Lk 22:7-13)—All the evangelists are agreed that our Lord died on the day preceding the Sabbath, i.e. on Friday, Mk 15:42; Lk 23:54; Jn 19:31. The day of the Supper is therefore certainly Thursday. 17. The 'feast of the Azymes' (i.e. of 'unleavened bread'), so called from the week's abstention from leavened bread, was celebrated from the evening of 14th Nisan to the evening of 21st Nisan. On the evening of the 14th the paschal lamb was slain and the paschal supper celebrated with unleavened bread. The term 'feast of the Azymes' (alternatively 'feast of the Pasch') was applied in particular to the first day of the week's feast, from sunset 14th to sunset 15th. The 'first day of the Azymes' (Mt) 'on which it was necessary that the pasch should be killed', Lk 22:7, is evidently used here (as e.g. in Josephus) in the wider sense of the phrase to include the whole day on the evening of which the paschal supper was eaten. It seems evident (Mk 14:14; Lk 22:11; see however WV 1, 362-5) that our Lord actually celebrated the Jewish paschal supper; cf. J. Jeremias, Die Abendmahlsworte Jesu, Göttingen, 1949¹. Nevertheless, John 18:28 makes it clear that our Lord's enemies celebrated the paschal supper on the evening of the following day, Friday, and the Synoptics themselves describe 719d the Friday morning as such a busy time for priest and Pharisee (Sanhedrin meeting, delation to Pilate, etc.) that it is difficult to imagine Friday being the 15th Nisan, one of the greatest feasts of the calendar with abstention from business and work. It seems probably that our Lord and the Galilean pilgrims celebrated the paschal supper on the day before the Jerusalemites, i.e. on the evening of Nisan 13th. If it were celebrated at all it would be with unleavened bread (essential to the paschal rite) and therefore the evangelists may speak of Nisan 13th as 'the first day of the Azymes'. Cf. §§ 739e, 768a-c. 18. Our Lord is outside the city (perhaps he has spent the night in prayer on Olivet, cf. Lk 21:37; Jn 18:2) but it was obligatory to eat the paschal lamb in Jerusalem, Bonsirven 2, 123. The disciples (Peter and John; Lk 22:8) are therefore sent into the city to one whose name the evangelists suppress, perhaps for prudence' sake. It appears from Mt ('the Master saith') that the man was a friend of our Lord and willing to put a private room at his disposal despite the crowded conditions of the town at festival times. The hour of our Lord's destiny has struck (his 'time'—as in Jn 7:6-8).

f 20-25 Prophecy of Treason (Mk 14:17-21; Lk 22:14, 21-23)—20. When the sun had set (cf. Ex 12:8), the thirteen lay at table. The guests would lie on mats or mattresses, resting on the left arm, the right being used for eating. If the order was that of the Roman triclinium, three sides of the square (or oval) were used by the guests, the fourth being left open for convenience of service. (For positions at table cf. Jn 13:23 ff., § 802g). Judas, keeping up appearances, was still with the Apostles, but in the course of the meal our Lord attempts to touch his conscience. 21-23. Our Lord's answer to the question of the troubled Apostles insists on the intimacy, not the identity, of the traitor. The traitor is at table now; he has dipped (or 'is dipping') as in Mk 14:20; cf. Joüon 162) his herbs (first course of the paschal meal) in the dish of sauce that passes round the table. 24. That the Son of Man goes freely to his death (cf. Jn 8:14, 21 f. etc.) is no excuse. 25. Judas probably puts his question in a low voice or possibly in concert with the others, 22. The answer is not a direct affirmative (Aramaic has hên or hên for 'yes') but it agrees with the statement made and at the same time calls attention to the fact that the first speaker has provoked agreement; it therefore implicitly invites the first speaker to salutary reflection; cf. 26:64; 27:11. Judas must have left the table almost immediately—his knowledge of discovery would make his position intolerable; it is therefore improbable that he was present for the institution of the holy Eucharist. Lk 22:21 gives the impression that Judas was still at table for the Institution but his phrase is placed before the Institution by Mt 26:23 and Mk 14:18.

720a 26-29 The Holy Eucharist (Mk 14:22-25; Lk 22:15-20; cf. 1 Cor 11:23-25)—The Holy Eucharist appears to have been instituted within the framework of the paschal supper, but its importance eclipses the traditional Jewish elements which go unemphasized, therefore, in the gospel accounts. The institution took place probably when the principal course (the lamb) was over, 1 Cor 11:25. 26. The bread is unleavened—the only type available after the noon preceding the paschal supper. Our Lord blesses it (or 'gives thanks') over it: εὐλογίας, εὐχαριστίας in Lk 22:19 and 1 Cor 11:24) and breaks. As he gives it to the disciples (Lk 22:19 ἔδωκεν λέγων) he says 'This [that I hand to you] is my body'. In view of the clear belief and practice of the early Church it is becoming increasingly old-fashioned to question the plain meaning of the words; the present custom is rather to deny that Jesus spoke them and to credit them to Paul the 'sacramentalist'; cf. Coppens DBV(S) 2, 1150 f., 1155 f. 27. The chalice was in all probability the third cup of the paschal supper. It followed the eating of the lamb and, being itself followed by a long blessing, was called 'the chalice of benediction'; cf. 1 Cor 11:16.

28. A new covenant had been promised through Jeremias, Jer 31:31; the old Sinaitic covenant had been sealed with the sacrificial blood of animals (Ex 24:8 'Behold the blood of the covenant!'). Both reference and inference are unmistakable—the new covenant is now being liturgically concluded with the sacrificial blood of Christ. The sacred blood is considered either in the state of being shed or as now dedicated to its shedding (ἐκχυνόμενον, present participle, possibly with future meaning; Joüon 163). The Apostles ('Drink ye all from it') are to make the sacrifice their own and thus achieve its purpose which (most fully expressed by Mt) is the expiation of the sins of many (ὑπὲρ πολλῶν) by the death of One (cf. 20:28). 29 is placed by Lk 22:18 before the Institution, probably rightly because the reflexion is more naturally made before the thought of the Apostles has been raised to the higher plane of the chalice of Christ's blood. The reason for its present place in Mt and Mk is that each, concerned only with those elements of the Last Supper which were to endure, does not speak of the first half of the paschal celebration. Consequently the cup, though the third, is mentioned only once and the dictum of 29 used by Jesus of an earlier cup, is perforce joined with the Eucharistic cup. 'This fruit of the vine' (the phrase is taken from the Jewish ritual benediction) seems, therefore, to refer to the unconsecrated cup: our Lord declares his imminent death and the happy reunion in the eternal Kingdom ('of my Father') where all is new, Apoc 21:1, 5. Note: St Luke appears to have in mind the 'Kingdom' on earth, the Church, and the Eucharistic banquet which is the 'Pasch' of the Messianic era; cf. RB 48 (1939) 357-93.

30-35 Prediction of Desertion and Denial (Mk 14:26-31; cf. Lk 22:31-34; Jn 13:36-38)—30. The Jewish paschal supper ends with the singing of the 'Hallel' ('praise') psalms, 113:8-18; 114-117 (Vg), and, the religious rite over, conversation turns to other topics. At the Last Supper it is our Lord who discourses, Jn 14:1-17:24, but the discourse is not reported in the Synoptics. The time is probably about 10 p.m. and the little company passes through the town in an easterly direction, crosses the Kedron valley and turns left along the western slope of Olivet. A walk of nearly a mile brings them to Gethsemani. 31. Either on the way or while still in the supper-room (cf. Lk Jn; Mt's 'then' is often merely stylistic and not chronological) the disciples are told of their impending desertion: 'You will all lose courage over me' (KNT). Our Lord quotes Zach 13:7 to illustrate the general principle that the flock owes its strength and unity to the shepherd (especially this flock to this shepherd). The illustration is borrowed from the history of king Sedecias, a timid 'shepherd' who, attacked by the Babylonians, abandoned the capital and its inhabitants to their fate, 4 Kg 25:4. 32-35. In the general consternation the Resurrection prophecy again goes unheeded as also, it would appear, 28:10, the Galilean assignation. Peter's indignation outdoes his respect and draws upon him a detailed prophecy of his own moral fall. The 'cock-crow' in Mt is probably the second—the dawn-crow at about 5 a.m. Mk mentions two, 14:30; the earliest cock-crow at paschal time is reported as 2:30 a.m., Lagrange, L'Evangile, 542. Between 35 and 36 there is a pregnant silence. Our Lord leaves the event to make reply, 25:56.

36-46 Gethsemani (Mk 14:32-42; Lk 22:40-46)—d 36-38. They come to a plot of land (χωρίον) at the foot of the western slope of Olivet, facing the temple; a garden, Jn 18:1, called 'the oil-press', gaṭ ṣ'mān (m), doubtless because of some rustic installation among the olive-trees. Eight of the Apostles remain near the gate but Peter, James and John, witnesses of Jesus' glory (17:1-2; cf. 2 Pet 1:17-18) are invited to see him in his suffering. The prospect of his passion brings distress and dismay (WV) and mortal sadness. He asks his friends to remain wakeful with him. 39-44. In an attitude of complete prostration but with his human 720d will deliberately turned to the Father he asks that the cup of sorrow (cf. 20:22) may pass him by if this may be done without upsetting the divine redemptive plan. There are two wills in Christ: the divine will and the human will. We may distinguish a double act in the human will: the act of the will which may be called 'instinctive' (voluntas ut natura) and the deliberate, considered act (voluntas ut ratio). Our Lord's instinctive will, true to its nature, shrank from suffering and death considered in themselves; his deliberate will embraced them for the sake of what they were to bring: the redemption of man in the way God willed it. 'Placebat enim Christo secundum voluntatem divinam . . . ut voluntas naturalis in ipso et voluntas sensualitatis secundum ordinem suae naturae moverentur' (ST 3, 8, 6). With the restlessness of sorrow he seeks the solace of his disciples but he asks them to pray not for him but for themselves. Peter's loyalty, so eagerly expressed, 35, is not enough: without prayer, fear for bodily security will overwhelm the will. In his second prayer our Lord uses the words he taught his disciples to say, 6:10. 45-48. His first words, 45a, are perhaps a question: 'Are ye going to sleep on (τὸ κοινοῦ) and take your rest?' (*Plummer, Mt, 371) and he awakes them with 'Behold . . .', stirring them to activity with 'Rise . . .'. Others prefer the tone of melancholy resignation to the disciples' weakness: 'Very well, then, sleep; (it is too late to worry what you do), the hour has struck . . .; let us go to meet the traitor'.

47-56 The Arrest (Mk 14:43-50; Lk 22:47-53; Jn 18:2-12)—47-49. Judas was familiar with this garden and with our Lord's habits, Jn 18:2. He knew, too, that Jesus would not have gone to Bethany because paschal night was to be spent in Jerusalem or in the immediate neighbourhood. He now leads what is (to judge by their impromptu weapons) a casual gang hired for the purpose, but there is evidently an escort of Roman soldiery, Jn 18:3. The kiss (natural enough from disciple to master) is ostentatious (κατεφίλησεν) to avoid mistakes. 50. The clipped, and therefore obscure, Greek phrase (ἐφ' ὃ πάρε;; lit. 'for what thou art come') is interpreted as a question by DV (and KNT); more probably it is an exclamation either fully expressed ('for what a purpose art thou come!'), WV or, perhaps better, cut short by emotion, e.g. '(A kiss), friend, for such a purpose!', Lagrange. Lk 22:48 appears to render this last sense. 51-54. Peter's half-parried blow at Malchus, Jn 18:10, is rebuked by our Lord. Firstly, it is useless—violence must always take the consequence of violence and, in this case, the power is apparently on the wrong side. Secondly, it is unnecessary and undesired—the Son does not choose to exercise his power: twelve times six thousand armed angels, not eleven impotent Apostles, waited his word. But how, were he to give that word ('how, were it so . . .?' KNT), would this consort with the prophecies (e.g. Is 53) of a meekly suffering Messiah? 55-56. Our Lord objects to the absurd drama of his arrest and to the show of violence. It implies that he is a dangerous bandit. Yet it must have been clear from his general habit of public teaching ('daily' in the temple; cf. especially Jn 7:14; 8:2, 20, 59; 10:23) that he was no secret conspirator and that he could have been seized at any time. He thus lays bare the leaders' fear of overt unpopular action, 26:5. The evangelist notes on his own account, 56, what our Lord had already said, 54—the whole incident is a prelude to the fulfilment of prophecy. He does not deem it necessary, however, to point out that the flight of the Apostles verifies our Lord's recent forecast, 31.

57-68 Before the Council (Mk 14:53-65; cf. Lk 22:54-55, 63-71 and Jn 18:12-14, 19-24)—57-58. The prisoner is taken back along the Kedron to the Gate of the Fountain at the SE. angle of the city-walls and so up the graded road to the palace of Caiaphas in the SW. quarter of the city. For Caiaphas cf. 26:3-4, §719a. To judge by the Talmud (cf. Edersheim 2, 533f.) night-trials were illegal, but details like this are dwarfed by the monstrous injustice of the whole process. 720f Peter has followed at a safe distance; having reached the palace (αὐλή; DV 'court') he ventures into the court, Mk 14:54, to await the upshot (τέλος). 59-63. All three classes of the council are represented (chief priests, elders, scribes; cf. 57). This council (or 'Sanhedrin'—the Greek συνέδριον in Aramaic form) totalling 71 members was the supreme judiciary body of the Jewish nation and met under the presidency of the reigning high-priest. For capital trials a quorum of 23 sufficed, according to the Mishna, Sanhedrin 4:1; it is not, therefore, necessary to understand 'whole council' strictly. The object of the meeting is to formulate a capital charge to present to the procurator, who alone had power to order execution of sentence; cf. Jn 18:31; Schürer 1, 2, 57 f.; Jos., Ant. 20, 9, 1. For appearance sake the formalities had to be observed (Num 35:30 etc.) and eventually the necessary two witnesses are found though even these are not in complete agreement, Mk 14:59. They pervert our Lord's words, slightly in words, profoundly in sense; cf. Jn 2:19. The high-priest is not satisfied; he seeks a capital charge and hopes to condemn our Lord from his own mouth: 'Answerest thou naught? What is it that these men allege against thee?' (WV). 63. Jesus, ignoring the trumped-up charge of the witnesses, will not refuse an answer to an independent and formal demand from the highest authority ('by the living', and therefore avenging, 'God'): 'Tell us if thou be the Christ, the Son of God!'. The Rabbis never give the title 'Son of God' to the Messiah (Bonsirven 1, 366 f.) and the Jewish writings about our Lord's time are shy of it, Lagrange, Le Messianisme, 104 f. The titles 'Son of God', 'Christ', are therefore probably not equivalent for Caiaphas. But the term 'Son of God' had been used of our Lord in his own circle, Mt 16:16; Jn 11:27, and the fact was known outside that circle, 27:39-40. It is probable that Caiaphas, aware of all this, adds the title to the term 'Christ' and so feels his way to a charge of blasphemy, a capital crime, Deut 13:2-6. 64. Mt's 'thou hast said it' is equivalent to Mk's 'I am' with a faintly ironical touch as if Caiaphas by using the terms already assumed their truth. Taking this fictional assent as starting-point our Lord proceeds to build upon it. 'Moreover', he says solemnly, 'from now onwards (ἀπ' ἀπρι, cf. 23:39) you shall be witnesses of' the situation described by Daniel. 'See', in regard to apocalyptic vision is not so much physical vision as intellectual appreciation. The sentence is better punctuated: 'You shall see "the Son of Man"', Dan 7:13, "sitting on the right hand of the Power" [i.e. of the Almighty; cf. Ps 109(110) 1] and "coming upon the clouds of heaven"', Dan 7:13. This punctuation by indicating a mere juxtaposition of tableaux removes the confusion of imagery. In effect, the 'sitting at the right hand' and the 'coming upon the clouds' indicate the same thing. The twin-thrones for God and the Messiah suggested by the psalm (and cf. Dan 7:9) indicate a participation in the divine administration of the world. The same idea is found in the Daniel text where one 'like a son of man' 'comes' (i.e. to the Ancient of Days for investiture, not to the earth for Judgement) riding on the clouds to receive his Kingdom. In Daniel there is no suggestion of a 'coming' in a distant perspective of 'Last Judgement': it is a question of the new Messianic era. Jesus, too, speaks of the new era which begins now (ἀπ' ἀπρι) on earth; its glory is paradoxically inaugurated by the whole process of the Passion itself; cf. Jn 12:31-33. 65-66. The second of Caiaphas's two questions (Christ? Son of God?) may have been asked after the reply of 64 as in Lk 22:66, 70. In any case, it is clear that the high-priest takes our Lord's transcendental Messianism for capital blasphemy. Jesus, therefore, is not claiming a mild, political Messianity though Caiaphas will find the 'Messias' admission useful before the pagan tribunal. He tears his garments, from the neck downwards for a palm's length, in the ritual manner prescribed for the hearing 720h of blasphemous speech. For the religious court the case is clear, Lev 24:16; it remains to secure sentence from the procurator, 27:11. 67-68. Mt leaves us to understand that our Lord was blindfolded; cf. Mk 14:65; Lk 22:64. Those who strike him (not necessarily the Sanhedrists, even in Mt) defy him to use his prophetic or clairvoyant gifts; cf. Ac 23:2 for similar action of another high-priest.

1 69-75 Peter's Denials (Mk 14:66-72; Lk 22:56-62; Jn 18:17, 25-27)—Peter is in the open-air courtyard round which the palace was built (αὐλή as in 58 but here further defined by ἐξω). Meanwhile, Jesus is on trial in an upstairs room, Mk 14:66, of the building itself. In the light of the fire, Lk 22:56, Peter is recognized by a maid; his public denial is not less real for being indirect. He moves from the light towards (dis) the gate and another maid (the portress?) challenges him. The denial is formal this time. Then ('about an hour later'; Lk 22:59) Peter is once more at bay among many accusers. His Galilean dialect (confusion of the gutturals: ἡθὲ 'ayin, 'aleph; difficulty with the vowels: a, i, o) proclaims him a northerner. The third denial is emphasized by oath and straightway signalized by the crowing of the cock for the second time; cf. Mk 14:68-72. It is a bitter reminder of our Lord's words, 26:34.

The evangelists do not, as a rule, purpose to give the exact words of speeches—of accusations and denials in this case—nor the exact order of events. From 26:34 we should expect three denials, but the combined gospel accounts suggest more by naming five different accusers at least. The solution probably lies (cf. Prat 2, 355 f.) in assigning the multiplicity of accusers to three groups only, thus:

First Denial: in the courtyard (Mt, Mk, Lk) by the fire (Mk, Lk). Accused by a maid (Mt, Mk, Lk), the portress (Jn). The cock crows for the first time (Mk).

Second Denial: in the forecourt (Mk) near the door (Mt) a little later (Lk). Accused by the same maid (Mk 'the maid') whose accusation is supported by others (Jn) including another maid (Mt), a man (Lk).

Third Denial: apparently by the fire again, a little later (Mt, Mk), after about an hour's time (Lk). Accused by the bystanders (Mt, Mk) including another man (Lk) and a relation of Malchus (Jn). The cock crows for the second time (Mk) immediately (Mt, Mk, Lk, Jn).

721a XXVII 1-26 Jesus and Pilate (Mk 15:1-15; Lk 23:1-25; cf. Jn 18:28-19:16).

XXVII 1-2 Jesus delivered to Pilate (Mk 15:1; Lk 23:1; Jn 18:28)—The second meeting of the Jewish council (Luke, simplifying, records only one) was at dawn, Lk 22:66; it was evidently short because it was still early morning when Jesus reached Pilate's residence, Jn 18:28. The meeting was held probably in the Sanhedrin's assembly-hall (the gaziṭh), on the southern side of the 'court of the Israelites'. Its purpose was to pass sentence of formal condemnation in legal day-session (57-58, note) and to formulate a charge which would impress the governor. They decided upon a political one (27:11; cf. Lk 23:2). In the Roman province of Judaea only the procurator (Pontius Pilatus, A.D. 26-36) could order execution of the death-sentence (SB 1, 1026; cf. Holzmeister, Historia, 82-4). Normally resident at Caesarea Palaestinae, the procurator established his military headquarters ('praetorium') in Jerusalem for the dangerous periods of the great feasts. In the year of Christ's death at least this praetorium was probably established in the Antonia, the fortress abutting on the NW. corner of the temple-enclosure.

b 2-5 Fate of Judas (cf. Ac 1:18-20)—The whole incident, 3-10, presented parenthetically, serves to underline the Sanhedrin's contempt for justice and the hypocrisy of its members. 2-5. Mt's 'then', as so often, is vague—the time may be after the condemnation by Pilate. Possibly Judas had thought that the evidence would prove insufficient for condemnation or possibly his crime came home to him only when he saw its fruit and handled the bribe. Filled with remorse (not true 'repentance' because empty of hope) he sought to dissociate himself from the affair by proclaiming his Master's innocence. The unscrupulous cynicism of the judges showed the attempt hopeless and drove him to a desperate decision. The money was now worse than useless; he flung it down in (eis) the temple (vaos, a word which, to judge from its use in Jn 2:20, may include the temple buildings such as the gaziṭh). The place of his suicide is unknown.

XXVII 6-10 Scruples of the Unscrupulous (Mt only)—

6-8. The Law, Deut 23:18, forbade the price of chastity to be put to sacred use; the Sanhedrists now extend the principle to blood-money—it must not be put into the temple-treasury (qorbānā, Aram. 'offering'). With it they buy 'Pottersfield' (hitherto a well-known name, evidently, and doubtless so called because it contained potter's clay); thenceforth it was called in Aramaic ḥā qēl d-mā 'field of blood' because bought with blood-money, but cf. Ac 1:18 f. This cemetery for strangers (probably Jews who died on pilgrimage in Jerusalem—pagans were the Romans' affair) lay on the southern slope of the Hinnom valley. 9-10. Mt, as usual, hastens to associate the OT with the event; cf. Zach 11:12-13; Jer 18:2-4; 19:1-2; 32:7-9. The prophet Zacharias, a true shepherd of Israel, is assessed by the false shepherds, the political authorities, at the mean price of thirty pieces. It is an insult to God whom Zacharias represents. 'Throw it to the potter! [i.e. to the cheap shop] a fine price at which to be assessed by them!'. The words are God's. The striking similarity of situation and the concurrence of the 'thirty pieces' with 'the potter' call Mt's attention to a text which he freely adapts, apparently from the Hebrew text: 'And they [the priests—the prophet himself, 'I', in HT of Zach] took the thirty pieces of silver, the assessment at which he was assessed [lit. 'of one assessed']—they were of Israel who assessed him—and gave them to the potter's field' (Zach 'and I threw them into the potter's workshop'; trans. Van Hoonacker). Mt adds, in Zacharias's name, 'as the Lord directed me', betraying the original 'I' of the preceding verbs in HT. In so doing he underlines the fact that the hand of God was in the first situation and therefore prepares us for a higher, Messianic, significance. The Rabbis, too, applied the passage messianically but the thirty pieces of silver become the thirty precepts given by Moses to Israel, Edersheim 2, 736. The attribution of the text to Jeremias, strongly supported by the MSS (though Ta; 33; φ; 157; a; b; syrsin; pef. omit 'Jeremias') is strange. It is possible, however, that the text is a fusion of Zach and Jer. Jer 32 recounts the purchase of a field, symbolic of confidence in Judah's rehabilitation; Jer 19:11 has a curious rapprochement of the potter's vessel and Hinnom; Jer 18 tells of a visit to a potter of which (according to Van Hoonacker, Les Douze Petits Prophètes, Paris 1908, 677) the text in Zach is an 'adaptation'. In this case, Mt assigns the text to Jer (as Mk 1:2-3 assigns a composite Is-Mal text to Is only) as being the more 'important' prophet or as heading the fifteen prophets in the Jewish canon of the time (SB 1, 1029 f.; for this opinion cf. Knabenbauer, Buzy, Bover, WV, KNT, etc.). If the reminiscence of Jer seem too slight to make this view acceptable, it still does not follow that formal error is to be attributed to the evangelist himself. Indeed, according to Lagrange, Mt, 515, it is 'psychologically improbable' that the evangelist, who appears to have adjusted a Hebrew text which he had in front of him, could have made such a mistake. From purely rational considerations, therefore, it is not improbable that the name of the prophet was inserted by an early copyist misled by the faint echoes of Jer. It has been recently suggested (G. Courtade, S.J., DBV(S) 4, 542) that, in any hypothesis, the principle of inerrancy remains untouched since the mind of the evangelist (?) is not formally to teach the derivation of the prophecy from Jeremias, he merely uses the name 'Jeremias' en passant 'without guaranteeing its exactitude'. Augustine's explanation, PL 34, 1175, is not dissimilar: he 721e concedes that the use of the name may have been an initial inadvertence of the evangelist which, however, subverted the purpose of the Holy Spirit who wished to inculcate the unity of the prophets. In this case, the categorical statement of the inspired writer which is guaranteed by inspiration is: 'It was said by one of the prophets'; to this he adds, equivalently: 'by Jeremias, I think'.

f 11-26 Jesus before Pilate (Mk 15:2-15; Lk 23:2-5, 18:25; Jn 18:28-40; 19:1-15)—The scene is Pilate's praetorium, the residence of the commander-in-chief with adjoining barracks. In this year it was apparently established not in the palace of Archelaus, the dispossessed Herodian, but in the Antonia; cf. 2, § 721a. Jn 19:13 names the place of judgement 'Lithostrotos' 'paved place' and 'Gabbatha' 'eminence'. The terms admirably fit the recently excavated court attached to the Antonia: it is a paved space more than 50 yards square and occupies the highest point of the city's eastern side; cf. Jn 19:13, note. 11-14. The interview takes place on some terrace of the Antonia looking on the street since the Jewish leaders are present but do not enter the building, Jn 18:28. The accusation is a political one (the 'tribute' question; cf. Lk 23:2) prejudicing the title 'king of the Jews' to which, however, our Lord does not refuse claim ('Thou sayest it', cf. 26:64, note). John's fuller account, 18:33-38, explains how Pilate, despite the claim to kingship, remains unconvinced of our Lord's guilt—a kingdom of 'truth' (whatever that be! cf. Jn 18:38) is not a political entity within Pilate's competence. Our Lord answered none of the accusations; calumny's best answer is silence. 15-18.

g Pilate is impressed and seeks to apply the Roman abolitio (suspension of criminal proceedings) in our Lord's favour. Such a concession was made on certain festal occasions (κατὰ δὲ ἐορτήν) in the provinces (cf. the papyrus of A.D. 80 for a similar occurrence in Egypt, Papiri Fiorentini 1, Milan 1906, 113). Pilate offers the one alternative (there were others possible, cf. Mk 15:7) of the murderer Barabbas ('Jesus Barabbas' is a probable reading; cf. Vaganay, Textual Criticism of the New Testament, London 1937, 193-6). The contrast, he thinks, will decide the case in favour of Jesus Christ. He appeals to the people because he has been informed, reliably enough, that the cause of our Lord's arrest was precisely the leaders' envy of his popularity with them. 19. (Mt only). For the evangelist the incident of Pilate's wife (Claudia Procula by name according to the apocryphal gospels) underlines the malice of Israel—a pagan woman pleads the cause of Jesus against his own people. For Pilate it confirms his own uneasy wonder by thickening the atmosphere of mystery. For the Jewish leaders it provides an opportunity of h organizing their supporters. 20-23. The modern technique of mob-management shows how a multitude, even well-disposed, can yield to a vociferous and violent minority—moreover, Barabbas was suffering for a nationalist cause, Mk 15:7, and would have noisy supporters among the crowd. 24-25. By an action familiar to Jews, Deut 21:6, and Gentiles, Herod 1:33, Pilate disclaims responsibility, saying: 'I am innocent of this blood' (VV). It is an act rather of private superstition than of public administration. This latter Pilate is as impotent to decline as the Jews are powerless to assume. It is before God and not before Tiberius that the Jews take responsibility upon themselves and their descendants. 26. Mt omits Pilate's further attempt to release our Lord after the scourging, Jn 19:4-15. The scourge was normally the prelude of the cross. Its leathern thongs usually carried pieces of bone and metal. The naked victim's hands were tied to a low column; this bent position made the executioner's work easier and more efficient. In Roman practice the number of blows was limited only by the endurance or taste of the executioner. It was not uncommon for victims to die under the lash.

722a 27-30 The Mockery (Mk 15:16-20; cf. Jn 19:2-3)—27-28. Our Lord is brought from the paved outer court into the praetorium properly so called, i.e. to an inner court of the Antonia, Mk 15:16, which appears to be that in which the barracks were placed. Only the off-duty men of the cohort would be present (the 'cohort', σπεῖρα—there were five in Judaea, one permanently resident in the Antonia—was larger in the minor provinces of the empire than the 'cohort' which formed part of a 'legion'; it mustered sometimes nearly one thousand men). Our Lord has evidently been allowed to dress after the scourging, but now his outer garments at least are replaced by a crimson military cloak symbolizing ironically the imperial purple, Mk 15:17. 29-30. The emphasis is on the ridicule rather than on the pain of the crowning. The 'thorn' is, with some probability, the poterium spinosum which abounds about Jerusalem and was used then, as now, for firewood; its spikes are slender. The form of the 'crown' may have been that of a head-dress, as in the 2nd cent. representation in the Catacomb of Praetextatus, though the phrase πλέξαντες στέφανον suggests a fillet; but cf. RB 42 (1933) 230-4; DAC 5, 4141; 1150. The earliest (5th cent.) representations of the Crucified show him without the crown; it was perhaps laid aside with the reed (his 'sceptre').

31-32 The Way to Calvary (Mk 15:21; Lk 23:26-32; Jn 19:17a)—31. Jesus carried his own cross, Jn 19:17, from the praetorium, 31, until the procession left the town, 32. The shape of this cross is not certainly known. The X, Y and T forms were in use, but in our Lord's case the T-shape with upward prolongation of the vertical (crux immissa) is witnessed by the best authority (Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 2, 24, 4) and leaves room for an inscription 'over his head', 37. The transverse beam was called the patibulum and, in Rome at least, it was customary for the criminal to carry only this beam. This may be true of our Lord; the σκαπός of Jn 19:17 may mean patibulum only. In the middle of the upright was usually a small block to serve as a seat and so take some weight from the hands which were sometimes bound to the patibulum, but usually nailed, as in our Lord's case; cf. Jn 20:25, 27; Lk 24:39. In Christian art the seat has become a foot-support, doubtless for aesthetic reasons. There is no reason to think that our Lord's feet were nailed together: all representations of the Crucified up to the 12th cent. show them nailed separately. (But cf. Barnes, The Holy Shroud of Turin, London 1934.) 32. Simon, born in Cyrene (N. Africa; a town with a large Jewish colony) is conscripted (ἀγγαρεύω, i.e. to press into governmental service) into carrying the cross in place of our Lord (cf. Lk 23:26, note) who seems to have collapsed.

33-34 Crucifixion and Derision (Mk 15:22-32; Lk 23:33-43; Jn 19:17b-27)—33. Golgotha (simplified form of Aramaic gulgolthā 'skull'; Latin 'calvaria') was the name for the mound, rising about 15 ft. from the surrounding soil, just outside the city-walls (cf. Vincent & Abel, Jérusalem Nouvelle, 89-300) and about half a mile from the Antonia. 34. It was the custom for pious women (SB 1, 1037 f.) to administer narcotics to condemned criminals. The 'gall' (χολή) of Mt is used, as in LXX, in a general sense: bitter drug (more precisely 'myrrh', cf. Mk 15:23). Our Lord refuses the alleviation. 35. The soldiers take their customary perquisite of the criminal's possessions, but Mt (strangely) does not call attention to this fulfilment of Ps 21(22), 19, though the text has been imported into Mt by some few MSS from Jn 19:24 and is found in Vg and DV. 37. The exact form of the inscription is not known (four different forms are found in the four gospels) but would certainly include the name of the crucified and the charge ('cause'): Jesus, the 'king of the Jews'; this proves too laconic for the chief priests' liking. 38. The episode of the brigands (ἄγροται), like the gesture and words of the passers-by and the mockery of the priests are all verbally reminiscent of OT passages (Is 53:12, cf. Lk 22:37; Ps 21(22), 8; Wisd 2:13, 18; Ps 21(22), 9) but in no case does Mt remark the fact. 39-40. Criminals were usually crucified by the roadside for a warning. The passers-by railed at d XXVII 45-50 Death (Mk 15:33-37; Lk 23:44-46; Jn 19:28-30)—45. From noon until three in the afternoon darkness covers Jerusalem and its horizon (not 'the whole inhabited earth'—ἐνὶ πᾶσαν τὴν οἰκουμένην, but 'the whole land'—ἐνὶ πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν, cf. Ex 10:22; Prat 2, 409). It is clear that the evangelist thinks of a miraculous event; possibly the frequent April 'black sirocco' occurred in this year with miraculous intensity (Pirot, La Sainte Bible, ix, Paris 1946, 596). The miracle should have reminded the scribes of the darkness associated with the great day of God's judgement in the prophetic writings (Jl 2:10; Am 8:9; Is 13:10; Jer 15:9). 46. 'Eli 'Eli l'māh s'baqtāni are the opening words in Aramaic ('Eli is the Hebrew form also) of Ps 21 (22). Doubtless our Lord continues the psalm in silence. The fact that the words are a quotation removes the dogmatic difficulty. The psalm is not a cry of despair but, on the contrary, a hymn of supreme confidence in God despite profound suffering. As in our Lord's case the divine 'forsaking' in the psalm is no more than a poetical expression of acute physical and mental pain to which God has 'abandoned' the psalmist without, however, having 'turned his face away', Ps 21 (22), 2, 25. In our Lord's mouth, indeed, the words are not even a complaint because his intention is simply to show that the fruitful martyrdom of the innocent psalmist was a shadow of his own; cf. NRT 70 (1948) 137-49. It is worth noting, however, that the mental shock that the words, coming from the God-man, must produce, powerfully argues the fidelity of the evangelists who ran this risk in the interests of e honest report. It will be observed that in our explanation of this quotation on our Lord's lips the question does not formally arise of his enjoyment of the beatific vision even during the passion (the common opinion of theologians). That the uninterrupted beatific vision in the highest faculty of the soul is compatible with bodily, mental and even spiritual suffering (e.g. the uselessness of his passion for some souls) becomes clear to our intellect, not to our imagination, if we remember that the formal object of the vision and the formal object of the suffering are different. Compare the simultaneous joy and sorrow of a parent whose son leaves home to become a priest. (And cf. § 720d.) 47-49. Misunderstanding (deliberately?) the 'Eli, articulated with the difficulty of a dying man, the Jews, 47, 49, think or affect to think that this 'Messias' may have his precursor-Elias at hand; 17:10 ff., notes. A soldier, moistening a sponge with the sour wine (posca) of his flask, places the sponge on the end of a long reed (or javelin? cf. Jn 19:29, note). He was moistening our Lord's lips with it (ἐπιόριζεν); others, apparently Jews, adopting the Elias-jest, bid him to desist—not wishing to spoil the atmosphere of empty expectation. In Mk 15:36 the soldier, too, weakly makes his compassionate action part of the joke. 50. At about three in the afternoon when, a few hundred yards away, the paschal lambs of the old rite were being slain in the temple, the Lamb of God died; cf. 1 Cor 5:7. His last cry was loud and clear. Lk 23:46 tells us what it was: 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit'.

f 51-54 Prodiges after the Death of Jesus (Mk 15:38-41; Lk 23:45b, 47-49)—51. The veil of the temple (voûs) may be the curtain of the inmost sanctuary, the Holy of Holies, of the appearance of which nothing certain is known; or possibly the enormous and elaborate curtain to the outer sanctuary, the Holy Place; cf. Jos., BJ, 5, 5, 4. If the first, the priests, many of whom were converted, Ac 6:7, could verify and report the prodigy. The symbolism seems to favour this inner veil, Heb 10:20 f.; cf. 9:7, 25. If God used secondary causes (Mt does not say) we may possibly think of the gale, miraculous now in intensity, that dissipates the black sirocco of spring, 27:45, note. 52-53. The earth, too, was torn (Mt, alone, mentions the earthquake) and opened some of the rock-tombs: vertical earthquake-fissures are still to be seen in the rock of Calvary (Vincent & Abel, Jérusalem, 2, 186). It seems probable that the bodily resurrection and apparition of many dead just ones did not occur until after our Lord's resurrection (cf. 1 Cor 15:20-23) and that it is mentioned here because the earthquake prepared their exit from the tombs. 54. The manner of our Lord's death, the darkness, the earthquake, all impress the pagan guards. They confess the justice of the title 'Son of God' with which they had heard Christ's foes ironically taunt him, 27:40, 43, however little they may realize all this title holds.

55-56 The Holy Women (Mk 15:40-41; Lk 23:49)—g The Galilean women stood watching from some distance: Mary of Magdala (el-Mejdel on the lakeside c 3 m. N. of Tiberias) whom our Lord had exorcized, Lk 8:2; Mary, mother of James (the 'Less') and of Joseph, 13:53-54, note; the mother of the sons of Zebedee (20:20, note) probably the 'Salome' of Mk 15:40.

57-61 Burial (Mk 15:42-47; Lk 23:50-56; Jn h 19:38-42)—57-58. The sacred body had to be removed and buried before the first stars announced the beginning of the Sabbath, Jn 19:31. It would be about four o'clock in the afternoon when Joseph, sympathetic throughout to our Lord, Lk 23:51, approached Pilate to whom, as an influential member of the Sanhedrin, Mk 15:43, he would have access. He was of Arimathea (Ramathaim; cf. 1 Kg 1:1, 19 etc.) c 12 m. N. of Lydda. 59-61. He had purchased a worthy linen shroud, Mk 15:46, and Nicodemus, Jn 3:1-15, had bought a quantity of spices, Jn 19:39, to place on the shroud and round the body. In the presence of the women, and doubtless with their help, they laid Jesus in Joseph's own unused tomb about fifty yards from the cross. The more well-to-do Jews cut the family tomb in the rock, usually on the side of a slope; a low entrance closed by a thick disc of stone led to the vestibule which in turn led to the tomb proper by a small communicating cavity. Joseph's tomb had one shelf on the right of the entrance, Mk 16:5, for the reception of the body. For a description of the contemporary tombs of Abu Gosh cf. RB 34 (1925) 275-9. The two Marys (56; cf. Mk 15:47) remained. Others of the holy women prepared spices for a further and less hurried anointing, Lk 24:1.

62-66 The Tomb-Guard (Mt only)—A night passes 1—the night of Friday, the 'parasceve' or 'preparation-day' of the Sabbath. On the Saturday there is no formal meeting of the Sanhedrin (Mt does not mention 'ancients') but it occurs to a few of the priests and Pharisees that the dead 'impostor' promised his resurrection after three days; cf. 12:40. The disciples must be prevented from removing the body during these crucial three days. The first 'imposture'—our Lord's claim to Messiahship and more—had been effectively answered by crucifixion; the second (resurrection, possibly to be alleged by the disciples) would be more difficult to counter should the body be stolen. Pilate, who sounds tired of the whole affair, allows the Jews to use their supporting posse of Roman troops (cf. Jn 18:12) for the guardianship of the tomb. The stone is then joined to the surrounding rock, presumably by means of a tape and the official seal.

G. XXVIII 1-20 The Resurrection and after—The 722a women see the angel and the empty tomb, 1-8; the Magdalen sees the risen Christ, 9-10; the tomb-guards are bribed into silence, 11-15; the Eleven meet our Lord in Galilee, 16-17, and from him they receive the universal mission, 18-20.

1-8 The Empty Tomb; the Angel (Mk 16:1-9; Lk 24:1-9; cf. Jn 20:1)—1. The sabbath-rest was

- 723a observed, Lk 23:56. When the Sabbath was over (ὀψὲ δὲ σαββάτων : after the sabbath; WV) as the sky was lightening towards sunrise on 'the first day of the week' (Sunday; cf. SB 1, 1052) the women (Mk 16:1; Lk 24:10) including Mary the Magdalen and Mary the mother of James, 27:56, came to watch at the tomb (Mt) with a view, no doubt, to completing the hasty anointing of Friday, Mk 16:1, Lk 24:1. 2-4. Before their arrival as it seems (2-4 are probably parenthetical) a considerable earth-tremor declared the advent of the angel in human form. His purpose was to declare the physical Resurrection of Christ and to confirm his message by the spectacle of the empty tomb. He therefore rolled away the stone not to enable the already risen Christ to emerge (cf. Jn 20:19, 26) but to allow the women to enter. Mt gives the impression that the angel was still seated on the stone when they arrived but that he preceded them into the tomb (ἐκάθηντο, δεύρε θέρε). Terror made the guards powerless to interfere; it is probable that they made off citywards before the coming of the women since the angel and the women ignore them completely and there is no trace of their presence in Mk 16:1-8 or Lk 24:1-8; and see on Mt 28:11. 5-8. But for the women (true seekers of the crucified one) there was no cause for such terror ('Fear not you'—emphatic). The Lord's promise was fulfilled; cf. 16:21; 17:22; 20:19. Escorted by the angel they saw the empty tomb for themselves. The physical body had risen. Now they were to tell the disciples that the risen Christ would be found in Galilee. (7 is better punctuated thus: '... say to his disciples: "He is risen and behold he will go before you into Galilee [will be there when you, his disciples, arrive]; there you shall see him"'. Lo, I have told you') i.e. There, that is all; Joûon. It is possible that the verb 'go before' (προάγειν) is to be translated 'lead, conduct' (Braun, Jésus, Paris 1947, 190-4) in which case Mt clearly supposes that our Lord appeared to the disciples in Judaea. But in any case it is Mt's plan to describe only the Galilean episode. By a kind of factual 'inclusion' (§ 702), he presents Galilee as the starting-place of the universal mission as it had been the starting-place, 4:12-16, of the first, restricted preaching of the Kingdom. Hence he is careful, unlike Lk and Jn, to report the angel's message concerning the Galilean rendezvous and to reinforce it, 10, with our Lord's instruction to the same effect.
- 9-10 Magdalen and the Risen Christ (cf. Mk 16:9-11; Jn 20:11-18)—Some Catholic authors identify this apparition, the first mentioned by Mt, with the apparition to Magdalen alone, Jn 20:11-18. In this hypothesis Mt attributes to the women-group (as opposed to the 'brethren' in 10; i.e. the disciples; cf. 12:49) what happened to their single representative. Such a 'plural of category' is perhaps not unfamiliar to Mt; cf. 2:20; 24:8; 27:44; Levesque, RB 25 (1916) 13-16. The identification would also explain Lk 24:22-24 where it seems that the women had reported no more than the angel and the empty tomb. Other Catholic authors (e.g. Bover, SJ, El Evangelio de San Mateo, Barcelona 1946, 518-20) oppose the identification and explain (cf. Buzy, Mt, 384) that 9 refers to a second visit of the women (without Magdalen). Whatever the solution, it must take account of the extreme telescoping of Mt's last chapter.
- 11-15 The Guard bribed (Mt only)—As the women were still on their way, certain of the guard were in touch with the priests. It is probable that the guard had already left for the city before the women arrived at the tomb; 28:2-4, note. The Gk tenses used do not contradict this suggestion ('whilst they [the women] were on their way [from the tomb] the guards having reached the city told . . .'). The situation of the guards is awkward: the true, supernatural, explanation of their discomfiture would be laughed at in a court-

723d martial. The priests, therefore, have no difficulty in bribing them to suppress an explanation that would have been useless in any case. The main point of the priests' instruction was the alleged theft by the disciples. This the soldiers agreed to and this story became the current explanation in Jewish circles; cf. 15 and Justin, Contra Tryphonem, 108. The 'sleep' excuse is thrown out carelessly as a suggestion. It could be used only before the general public; clearly if it came to an official inquiry (14: 'if the case should be brought before the Governor') sleeping on duty would be no adequate excuse. The priests undertake, in this case, to bribe in high places (for πειθω 'persuade' in this sense, cf. 2 Mac 4:45; 10:20).

XXVIII 16-17 Galilee: Apparition to the Eleven (Mk 16:15-18)—The Eleven remained in Jerusalem until the end of paschal week, Jn 20:26, when, naturally, they went back to their homes with the assurance, 7, 16, that they were not leaving the risen Christ in Jerusalem, Mt is aware of the fact (though, like the other evangelists, he does not report Christ's own words) that our Lord had indicated a particular 'mountain' in Galilee. The 'mountain' is doubtless the high ground above the Lake (as in 5:1; 14:23; 15:29)—perhaps, fittingly, the hill of the Discourse which inaugurated the Kingdom, 5:1. 'Some doubted', says Mt. It is probable that he is simply recording a fact (mentioned by the other evangelists, Mk 16:11, 13, 14; Lk 24:11, 21 ff.; Jn 20:25) without reference to this particular occasion. The reason may lie in the summary nature of Mt's final chapter (Buzy) or possibly the phrase is to be translated: 'they, the very ones who had doubted, adored'; cf. Abel, Grammaire du Grec Biblique (Paris 1927) 119.

18-20 The Universal Mission (Mk 16:15-18)—18. The obedience unto death of the man-Christ has resulted in the Resurrection which constitutes his formal investiture as king of the kingdom of heaven and earth, cf. Phil 2:8 f. Sovereign powers were his before (11:27; cf. Jn 3:35), a necessary consequence of the Incarnation, but now the Son of Man has formally taken possession of his throne, Dan 7:14. The Resurrection inaugurates the new and worldwide epoch of the Kingdom. The Kingdom has come 'in power'. 19. Consequently (οὖν) the old restriction of apostolic preaching, 10:5 f., is abrogated. Enrolment of disciples (μαθητεύσαστε; DV 'teach ye'), baptism, religious and moral instruction are for Gentiles also. The exact conditions of Gentile-reception will cause difficulty later (cf. Ac 15) but the principle is already clear. The rite of enrolment is baptism according to Mt (all MSS and versions) and Mk 16:16, and indeed the rigorous and universal practice of the early Church is explainable only by the historical fact of Christ's command. 'In the name of' is not 'on the authority of' (ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι; cf. Ac 2:38; 10:48) but 'by way of consecration to' (εἰς τὸ ὄνομα). By baptism 'the neophyte becomes the property, and therefore the protégé, of the person named'. It therefore seems probable (Prat 2, 567) that the Trinitarian formula was necessary for the efficacy of the rite, and it is attested early in the 2nd cent. (Didache, 7:1; Justin, Apol. 1:61). It is possible, however, that our Lord is not prescribing the exact formula to be used but describing the effects of the rite—consecration to the blessed Trinity; cf. Lebreton, History of the Dogma of the Trinity, 1, 439. 20. Faith and ritual are not sufficient. There are obligations of the moral order. 'In a few words our Lord initiates a regime hitherto unknown to the ancient peoples: a doctrine not only religious but, at the same time, moral', Lagrange, Mt, 545. His precepts and his spirit are known to the Apostles who will, nevertheless, need the light and force of his presence in the hard days ahead. These will be with them until the era of the Messiah on earth draws to its close. The promise has held good for two thousand years.

b Modern Importance of Gospel of St Mark—Until the 19th cent. the Gospel of Mark was rarely made the subject of extended commentaries such as were written on the other Gospels. The explanation for this neglect of the Second Gospel and apparent lack of interest in its narrative lies in the fact that Mark contains very little material which is not found also in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, who give much additional information about the discourses and deeds of Christ. Only two miracles, 7:31-37; 8:22-26, one parable, 4:26-29, and the incidents recorded in 3:20 f. and 14:51 f. are peculiar to Mark; in all, only some sixty verses of the Gospel are without parallels in the other Synoptics. In modern times, however, the Gospel of Mark has come to hold a foremost place in Gospel studies. Some have been particularly attracted to it by the vividness and realism with which scenes are depicted. But it is the critical study of the literary relations between the Synoptic Gospels which has been mainly responsible for focusing attention on Mark in the last century. Non-catholic critics are practically unanimous in holding that Mk was written before the other Synoptics, and that it was used as a source by the authors of the First and Third Gospels. It was formerly the general verdict of critics that Mark's narrative shows fewer traces of subsequent interpretation intermingled with the primitive record of Christ's Life and Teaching than do the other Gospels, and consequently, that Mk should be regarded as our most reliable source of information for the simple historical facts concerning the Person and Mission of Christ. That critical estimate of the historical worth of the Second Gospel has been called into question by more recent critics, especially by writers of the 'Form-criticism' school. According to these, even Mk does not bring us into such immediate contact with the facts of Christ's life as was commonly supposed by earlier critics. The author of the Gospel is regarded as primarily a compiler or editor who has brought together scattered fragments of oral tradition and, with the aid of various editorial connecting phrases, fitted them into an artificial, chronological and geographical framework in which details of time and place are quite unhistorical. Supporters of this theory maintain that the fragments of oral tradition now loosely linked together in the Gospel were, for the most part, the creation of the Christian community. They are a reflexion of the faith and of the religious needs of the first Christians rather than an objective record of authentic sayings of Christ and the historical facts of his Life, cf. 'The Gospels and non-Catholic Higher Criticism', §§ 607a-e, 608b-c, 609a-d, 610-615.

External Evidence of Authorship—Against such denials of Marcan authorship and refusal to recognize the organic unity and historical value of the Second Gospel, and also against critics who contend that the Gospel embodies one or more earlier written documents (Proto-Mark etc.) or that it is the result of successive rehandlings of a basic document, we have clear evidence, both external and internal, that the Gospel is the work of a single author, Mark, that it faithfully reproduces the oral catechesis of St Peter and should, therefore, be accepted as a reliable source within the limits of the author's purpose. The tradition of the early Church is unanimous in declaring that Mark, the disciple and interpreter of St Peter, was the author of the Second Gospel. Evidence of this tradition is to be found not merely in the explicit assertions of the fathers and ecclesiastical writers, but also in the quotations and allusions occurring in their writings, in the use of the Gospel by heretics, and in the title 'according to Mark' attached to the Gospel in the manuscripts and early versions. The internal evidence of the Gospel itself provides remarkable confirmation of the external testimony; cf. 'Replies of the Biblical Commission', § 50h.

The oldest surviving testimony to Marcan authorship is that of Papias, who wrote a work entitled Expositions of the Oracles of the Lord, about A.D. 125. His words, which have been preserved by Eusebius (H. E. 3, 39, 15), are as follows: 'And this the Elder used to say: Mark, having been the interpreter of Peter, wrote accurately, though not in order, all that he remembered of the things said or done by the Lord. For he had neither heard the Lord nor been his follower, but afterwards, as I said, he was the follower of Peter, who gave his instructions as circumstances demanded, but not as one giving an orderly account of the words of the Lord. So that Mark was not at fault in writing certain things as he remembered them. For he was concerned with only one thing, not to omit anything of the things he had heard, and not to record any untruth in regard to them'. Papias here quotes, at least in the first sentence of the passage, the statement of an Elder (presbyter) called John. Whether the Elder was John the Apostle or, as many authors hold, a disciple who had known the Apostles, his statement takes us back to the 1st cent. and to the contemporaries of Mark. The main points of the passage are that Mark, who was a disciple and interpreter of Peter, put the oral catechesis of Peter into writing, and that the lack of 'order' in the work was due to its dependence on Peter's preaching. Apparently some had found fault with Mark's work because it lacked 'order'; probably it was being compared unfavourably with the Gospel of Matthew in which the material is arranged in a systematic, logical order (cf. Prat, Jésus-Christ, 1, 17). In reply to this criticism, Papias points to the fact that Mark's purpose in writing was simply to reproduce faithfully the teaching of Peter. Papias is undoubtedly speaking of the canonical Gospel of Mark. The ancient writers who were acquainted with the work of Papias never mention any other Gospel of Mark, and the internal evidence of the Second Gospel is in complete harmony with what Papias says of the absence of 'order' in Mark's work and its close dependence on St Peter.

724a In later writers we find similar unhesitating affirmations of the close relationship between Mark and Peter and the dependence of the Second Gospel on Peter's preaching. St Justin, who wrote in Rome about A.D. 150, makes clear his conviction that Mark's Gospel depends on Peter, though he does not name the author. Dealing with the change of Simon's name to 'Peter' and the title 'Boanerges' given to James and John, he gives the Memoirs of Peter as the source in which these points are found (Dial. c. Tryph. 106). Actually the only passage in which the matters in question are mentioned together is Mk 3:16f. (cf. Vaganay, L'Evangile de Pierre, 151 f.). No other Evangelist tells us that the sons of Zebedee were called 'Boanerges'. From Irenaeus (†A.D. 202) we have the statement that after the death of Peter and Paul 'Mark, Peter's disciple and interpreter, himself also left us in writing the preaching of Peter' (Adv. Haer. 3,1,1). Clement of Alexandria says: 'When Peter had publicly preached the word in Rome and promulgated the Gospel under the inspiration of the Spirit, many of those who were there besought Mark, as one who had long been a companion of Peter and remembered his words, to write down what he had said. Mark did this and gave the Gospel to those who had asked for it. When Peter learned of it he did nothing either to hinder or to encourage it' (in Eus. H. E. 6, 14, 6). Tertullian (†220), Origen (†254), Jerome (†420) and other early writers all stress the relationship of Mark's Gospel to the oral catechesis of St Peter.

f Internal Evidence—When we turn to the Gospel itself we find a number of features which confirm the external testimony. The general scheme of the Gospel, beginning with the mission of John the Baptist and continuing till the Ascension, corresponds with Peter's address at the reception of the Gentile Cornelius into the Church, Ac 10:34-43, and with the conditions which Peter laid down when a successor to Judas was about to be appointed, Ac 1:22. Miracles, as a divine seal on Christ's mission, are given particular prominence in Mark; cf. Ac 2:22; 10:38. It is noteworthy that Peter stands out from the group of disciples who were in close touch with Christ. He is mentioned by name on four occasions (1:36, 11:21; 13:3; 16:7), when the other Synoptics do not mention him; after a brief account of the mission of John the Baptist and the Temptation of Christ, Mark tells of the call of Peter and Andrew, 1:16; Peter is first in the list of the Apostles, 3:16, and first of the three who were present at the raising of the daughter of Jairus, 5:37, at the Transfiguration, 9:2, and at the Agony, 14:33; he answers on behalf of all at Caesarea Philippi, 8:29; he calls Christ's attention to the withered fig-tree, 11:21; after the Resurrection he is mentioned specially by the Angel in the instructions given to the women, 16:7. There is nothing, however, to suggest that the author wished to present Peter in a particularly favourable light. On the contrary, we are told of the stern rebuke which he received when he protested against the prediction that Christ should suffer, 8:33; his denials of Christ are recorded faithfully, 14:66-72, but there is no mention of his walking on the waters, Mt 14:29, of the praise he received from Christ when he was promised the Primacy, Mt 16:18 ff., or of the incident of the coin with which to pay the temple-tax for Jesus and Peter, Mt 17:24 ff. These latter incidents did particular honour to Peter, and their omission from Mark's Gospel is to be explained by the fact that Peter, in his humility, did not dwell on them in his preaching. Although tradition states clearly that Mark was not an immediate disciple of Christ, many incidents in the Gospel are described so vividly and with such realistic detail as to suggest the narrative of an eyewitness. Mark's Gospel is considerably shorter than Mt or Lk, but in narratives which are common to all three Synoptics Mark usually gives more details than do the others; cf. 2:1-12; 5:1-20, 21-43; 9:13-28, and parall. in Mt and Lk. A notable characteristic of Mark's style is the use of an indefinite plural in describing the movements of Christ and the disciples, this being followed immediately by a verb in the singular referring to Christ alone; cf. 1:21; 5:1, 38; 8:22. This peculiarity of style is readily intelligible if we suppose that Mark is reporting the words of an eyewitness who said, e.g. 'we came to Capernaum . . . and he (Christ) entered the synagogue and taught', 1:21; cf. C. H. Turner, JTS 26 (1925), 225 ff.; Chapman, Matthew, Mark and Luke, 61 f. Mark's narrative is direct, simple and graphic, but these qualities cannot be attributed to the literary skill of the author. His style lacks variety and the range of his vocabulary is limited; frequent redundancies of expression, lack of grammatical sequence and omission of connecting particles suggest everyday speech rather than literary art. The unimportant details which make the narrative so realistic were not inserted for literary effect, but simply because they were part of what Mark had heard from Peter, the eye-witness who remembered vividly the scenes at which he had been present. Apart from some minor variations, the distinctive stylistic and linguistic features are to be found uniformly throughout the whole Gospel, except in 16:9-20. This must be regarded as a definite pointer to the unity of authorship of the Gospel. By way of summary of the internal evidence it can be said that many features of the Gospel positively confirm the external testimony to its authorship, and that there is nothing incompatible with the traditional view. Most non-Catholic critics support the Marcan authorship.

Life of St Mark—Tradition stresses particularly the close relations between Mark and St Peter, but in the passages of the NT which refer to Mark, and which actually furnish most of our information about his life, his relations with Paul and Barnabas are much more prominent. Only two passages, 1 Pet 5:13; Ac 12:12, mention or imply close association between Peter and a disciple called Mark. This is significant as an indication that the tradition of Marcan authorship of the Second Gospel and its dependence on Peter is not merely a conclusion derived from the evidence of the NT. Several passages of Ac and the Pauline Epistles refer to a disciple who is sometimes called 'John', Ac 13:5, 13, sometimes 'John who is surnamed Mark', 12:12, 25; 15:37 f., sometimes 'Mark', Ac 15:39; Col 4:10; Phm 24; 2 Tim 4:11. In Ac it is clearly the same person who is sometimes given his Hebrew name John, and on other occasions, the Roman surname Mark. It was not unusual at the time to have two names; cf. Mk 2:13; 3:16. In Col 4:10 we are told that Mark was a cousin of Barnabas; this information fits exactly with Ac 15:37-39 which shows that there was a bond between Mark and Barnabas. Mark was the son of a woman called Mary to whose house Peter came when he was released from prison by an angel, Ac 12:12. The house was a meeting-place of the Christians. Peter was evidently known to the household, and could count on their attachment to himself. Mark must, therefore, have been known to Peter. It is probable that, with other members of his family, he had been baptized by the Apostle; this may be the reason why Peter calls him 'my son', 1 Pet 5:13. About the time, apparently, of Peter's escape from prison (A.D. 41) Paul and Barnabas came to Jerusalem with the assistance contributed by the Christians of Antioch, Ac 11:29 f., and on their return they took Mark with them. When they set out on the first missionary journey (c. A.D. 45) Mark accompanied them as an assistant and remained with them until they reached Perge in Pamphylia. There, for reasons which are unknown, Mark separated from Paul and Barnabas and returned to Jerusalem, Ac 13:5, 13. Paul was so seriously displeased by his conduct that when it was proposed by Barnabas that Mark should rejoin them on the second missionary journey (c. A.D. 50), Paul refused to take him. The result of this dissension was that Barnabas took Mark and revisited Cyprus, while Paul was accompanied by Silas in revisiting the other districts which they had evangelized, Ac 15:36-41. For some ten years after this the NT is silent about 725b Mark. It was probably in this period that Mark became the follower and interpreter of Peter. The stern attitude which Paul had adopted towards Mark did not cause permanent estrangement. We find Mark was in Rome when Paul was first imprisoned there (A.D. 61-3). Together with two other disciples of Jewish origin he was praised by Paul as a fellow-worker for the kingdom of God who had been a comfort to him. Paul also refers to a proposed visit of Mark to the church of Colossae, Col 4:10 f.; Phm 24. It was probably about this time that Peter wrote from Rome his first Epistle, in which he refers to Mark as 'my son', 1 Pet 5:13. The fact that Peter sends greetings from Mark to the Christians of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia suggests that Mark was known in these districts, presumably because he had taken part in evangelizing them. During Paul's second Roman captivity (A.D. 66-7) he wrote to Timothy, who apparently was at Ephesus, instructing him to come and to bring Mark 'for he is useful to me for the ministry', 2 Tim 4:11. We have no certain information of other events of the life of Mark. The tradition that he was one of the seventy-two disciples contradicts the testimony of Papias. Eusebius and Jerome record a tradition that he was the founder of the church of Alexandria. Many exegeses are of opinion that Mark was the young man in Mk 14:51 f.

c Destination of the Gospel.—The statements of Clement of Alexandria and other early writers that Mark put Peter's oral catechesis into writing for the Christians of Rome is borne out by the evidence of the Gospel itself. It is clear that Mark did not write for Christians of Jewish origin; his Gospel is silent about the Mosaic Law and its relation to the NT economy; unlike Mt, it rarely points to the fulfilment of the OT prophecies, 1:21; 15:28; very little of Christ's denunciation of the scribes is recorded, 12:38-40; Jewish customs are explained for the benefit of readers, 7:3 f.; Aramaic words and expressions are translated, 3:17; 5:41; 7:11, 34; 9:43; 14:36; 15:22, 34; we are told that the Jordan is a river, 1:5, that Mt Olivet stands over against the temple, 13:3, that the Parasceve is the day before the Sabbath, 15:42. This omission of matters of special interest to Jews, and the addition of information superfluous even for those Jews who lived outside Palestine, show that the Gospel, like the instructions of Peter which it reproduced, was intended primarily for Christians of Gentile origin. It has also been noted that Latinisms occur in the Greek of Mark (cf. 2:23; 10:33; 11:32; 14:65; 15:15, 19), and that a number of borrowed Latin words are used, e.g. legion, 5:9; speculator, 6:27; denarius, 6:37; sextarius, 7:4; census, 12:14; praetorium, 15:16; centurion, 15:39, 44. Specially notable is 12:42 where we are given the Roman equivalent of Greek coinage. It is natural to think that Rufus, the son of Simon of Cyrene, 15:21, who obviously was known to the readers of the Gospel, is the Rufus to whom Paul sends greetings at Rome, Rom 16:13. All these features of the Gospel are readily intelligible in the traditional view that Mark wrote Peter's instructions for the Christians of Rome.

d Place and Time of Composition.—The testimony of Clement of Alexandria, Jerome and other early sources that Mark wrote his Gospel in Rome finds support in the internal evidence; cf. § 725c. Chrysostom, PG 57, 17, states as hearsay the opinion that the Gospel was written in Egypt, but this is improbable. As to the time of composition of Mark, opinion is divided. The Biblical Commission, § 50m, has rejected the view that the Gospel was written after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. In actual fact, there is nothing in the Gospel to indicate that Jerusalem had been destroyed, or even that the revolt of A.D. 66, which led to the final catastrophe, had begun when the Gospel was written. On the contrary, the manner of reference to the 'loaves of proposition', 2:26, and, in particular, certain expressions in the eschatological discourse, ch 13, clearly imply that the city and temple were still standing when Mark wrote. Some Catholic writers hold that the Gospel was written as early as A.D. 42-5. But the majority nowadays favours the view that it was written in the period A.D. 53-63. This view accords with the known facts of Mark's life and with the evidence of tradition concerning the order of composition of the Synoptic Gospels. It does not seem likely that Mark could have been the companion and interpreter of Peter in Rome before c. A.D. 53, cf. § 725b. Consequently, the composition of the Gospel cannot be placed before that time, and the latest date is fixed by its relation to the Gospel of Luke. Modern critics agree with ancient tradition in maintaining that Mark's Gospel was written before the Third Gospel. Now Luke wrote his Gospel before Ac, which was composed towards the end of Paul's first Roman captivity, c. A.D. 63; see § 50n. The statement of Irenaeus that 'after their [Peter and Paul's] death, Mark . . . left us in writing the preaching of Peter' constitutes a difficulty against this view, as it is generally accepted that Peter's martyrdom did not take place before A.D. 64. Various solutions of this difficulty have been propounded. Probably Irenaeus was less concerned with the exact time of composition of Mark's Gospel than with its authority as the continuation of the preaching of Peter.

Canonically and Authenticity of Mk 16:9-20.—The Biblical Commission, § 50f, has declared that the reasons adduced by critics to show that the last twelve verses of Mk were not written by Mark do not justify the assertion that they are not to be accepted as canonical and inspired, nor do they demonstrate that Mark was not the author. For Catholics the canonicity of Mk 16:9-20 is not open to doubt, as the passage fulfils the conditions laid down by the Council of Trent in the decree on the Canon of Scripture, EB 409. It was at all times accepted by the Church as inspired and forms part of the Latin Vulgate. The question of literary authenticity, i.e. whether Mark was the author, is a distinct problem from that of canonicity and inspiration. In the MSS and patristic writings we find evidence of four different forms of ending to the Gospel. (1) The Gospel ends at 16:8 in the Gk codices Vaticanus and Sinaiticus, in one Syriac MS (syrr-sin) and in some MSS of the Coptic and Armenian versions. Both Eusebius and Jerome state that 16:9-20 was missing from many Gk MSS. (2) A Short Conclusion. One MS (k) of the Old Latin version introduces after 16:8 the words 'They recounted briefly to the companions of Peter the things which had been commanded them. After this Jesus appeared and through them sent from East to West the holy and incorruptible preaching of eternal salvation'. This short ending is found together with the canonical conclusion in a few Gk MSS and in some MSS of the Coptic and Syriac versions. (3) The Freer-Logion. In the Gk codex W (Washington) a fairly long passage, beginning with the words, 'But they defended themselves, saying, "This age of iniquity and incredulity is under the domination of Satan"', is inserted after 16:14. Jerome knew of Gk codices which included this passage. (4) The Canonical Conclusion. This is found in all Gk MSS except Vaticanus and Sinaiticus; it is included in all Vg MSS and in all MSS of the Old Latin version except k; it is also found in the Syriac, Coptic and other early versions, with the exception of the MSS already mentioned. Justin, Irenaeus, Tatian, Epiphanius and Chrysostom were acquainted with it. Ambrose, Augustine and later Latin writers also have this passage. This external evidence is, on the whole, strongly in favour of the authenticity of the canonical conclusion. Furthermore, it is highly improbable that the Gospel originally ended at 16:8 with the abrupt final phrase 'for they were afraid'. At the same time, the variation in the manuscript and patristic testimony, taken in conjunction with the internal evidence of 16:9-20, suggests that the present final section is not the exact original ending. There is a break in the continuity of the narrative between 16:1-8 and the final section, which is not written in the usual style of Mark; cf. on 16:9-20. It has been suggested that Mark left the Gospel unfinished at first, or that the 726b original conclusion was lost (cf. C. H. Roberts, JTS 40 (1939) 253-7), and that Mark himself later supplied the present canonical conclusion. But the lack of continuity and change of style militate against the view that Mark wrote the section as it stands. Some authors favour the opinion that when the original ending was lost the present conclusion was added by another inspired writer. In an Armenian MS of the 10th cent. the note 'of the presbyter Ariston' is written in before 9-20. Possibly the opinion which is least open to objection is that when the original ending was lost, the canonical conclusion was supplied from memory, and by reference to the other Gospels, by a contemporary who had known the original. This would account for the change of style and lack of continuity.

- 6 Purpose and Teaching—Mark's primary purpose in writing his account of 'the sayings and deeds of the Lord' was to provide the Christians of Rome with a faithful record of the teaching of St Peter. The Gospel is not directly apologetical in its aim or its method of treatment of the life of Christ. It was written for people who already believed that Jesus was Son of God and Saviour of mankind. Its purpose is not so much to prove that Jesus was the Messiah and Son of God as to narrate the facts of Christ's ministry on earth as Mark had learned them from the preaching of Peter. As a consequence of Mark's dependence on instructions given by Peter to an audience which consisted mainly of Gentiles, we find that the Gospel stresses particularly the events of Christ's life which were calculated to impress a pagan audience. Unlike Mt, which constantly appeals to the fulfilment of the prophecies of the OT in order to prove to Jews that Jesus was the promised Messiah, the Second Gospel gives prominence to those things which show forth the divinity of Christ. It is noteworthy that there is a striking similarity in theme between Mark's Gospel and the discourse delivered by Peter in the house of the Gentile Cornelius—'Jesus Christ, who is Lord of all . . . God anointed him with the Holy Spirit and with power, and he went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed by the devil, for God was with him. . . . And he commanded us to preach to the people and to testify that it is he who has been appointed by God to be judge of the living and of the dead', Ac 10:34-43.
- d The dominant theme of the Gospel is indicated in the opening words: 'The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God'. This is the Evangelist's affirmation of his own belief in the divinity of Christ. In the Gospel, by a simple narrative of Christ's ministry, Mark puts before the reader facts which leave no room for doubt that the Christian faith in Jesus Christ, true God and Sovereign Lord, is well founded. The divine sonship of Christ is proclaimed by the Father at the Baptism, 1:11, and at the Transfiguration, 9:7; the demons who call Christ 'the Holy One of God', 1:24, 'the Son of God', 3:11, 'the Son of the Most High God', 5:7, fear him and obey his command; Christ is the Lord of the Sabbath, 2:28; he cured the paralytic in order to prove that he possessed the divine prerogative of forgiving sin, 2:10; in the Parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, 12:1-12, and in his reply to the high-priest, 14:62, Christ claimed to be God. The divine power of Christ is manifested in his miracles. Mark's Gospel has been called 'the Gospel of Miracles' because of the high proportion of the narrative devoted to the miracles of Christ. Despite its brevity, the Second Gospel gives most of the miracles recorded in the other Synoptics, and adds two others, 7:31-37; 8:22-26. In the performance of miracles, whether healing the sick and afflicted, 1:31; 2:11 f.; 5:28 f.; 6:56; 7:32; 8:22; 10:52, or controlling the forces of nature, 4:39, 6:48, or in his complete mastery of the evil spirits, 1:24-27, 34; 3:11 f., 22-27; 5:1-15; 9:16-27, Christ acts as the Supreme 'Lord of all', Ac 10:36. The reader of the Gospel must echo the words of the centurion, 'Indeed this man was the Son of God', 15:39.

726a The portrait of Christ which emerges from the Gospel of Mark is not, however, exclusively that of the Son of God. There is no question of making the divinity stand out at the cost of obscuring his humanity. In fact, no other Evangelist gives more tangible proofs of the reality of the human nature which Christ had assumed at the Incarnation. Christ is 'the Son of Man', 2:10; he eats, 2:16, and sleeps, 4:38, like ordinary mortals; he feels compassion for the leper, 1:41, and for the crowds who have nothing to eat, 8:2; he is moved to anger and grief by the blindness of the Pharisees, 3:5; he wonders at the lack of faith of the people of Nazareth, 6:6; he is indignant with the disciples and shows his affection for the children, 10:14-16; in Gethsemani Christ is sorrowful and dismayed, and in his prayer that he might be spared the ordeal of the Passion he submits his own will completely to the will of the Father, 14:33-36. Mark is not the Evangelist of Christ's divinity merely. His is the Gospel of the Incarnate Son of God who 'came not to be ministered unto, but to minister and to give his life a redemption for many', 10:45.

I 1-18 Preparation for the Public Ministry.

727a 1-8 John the Baptist; cf. Mt 3:1-12; Lk 3:1-18; Jn 1:19-28—1-4. The exact construction of this passage is uncertain. Some take 1 as the title of the Gospel, while others connect it more closely with 2-3. It appears to be more satisfactory to treat 2-3 as a parenthesis and to link 1 with 4; cf. Turner JTS 26 (1925) 146. Mark means to declare that the mission of John the Baptist was the prelude to the Gospel and also the fulfilment of prophecy: 'Mark has made the preaching of John the commencement of the Gospel' (Basil, Adv. Eun. II 15). 1a. 'The Gospel of Jesus Christ' here means not the written record of his life and teaching, but the good news (εὐαγγέλιον) of the coming of Jesus Christ, the glad tidings of salvation brought by Jesus, the promised Messiah. 1b. 'Son of God'. These words are missing in a few ancient witnesses to the text and are omitted in some critical editions, but the evidence does not justify the omission. In the Synoptic Gospels the title 'Son of God' applied to Christ does not necessarily imply belief in his divinity; cf. Lk 4:41. In the present context, however, it is rightly understood as an affirmation by Mark of the divinity of Christ, in which he clearly believed; cf. § 726c. Mark is speaking here in his own name, not merely reporting the words of others. 2-3. The prophetic passage in 2 is taken from Mal 3:1. Of the numerous solutions put forward to explain how the words of Malachias are included under the name of Isaias the most probable seems to be that this is an interpolation which has found its way into the present context from Mt 11:10 (Lk 7:27), where Christ applies these words to the Baptist. A scribe who was familiar with them in Mt or Lk may have included them here because of their application to the Baptist; cf. Lagrange, Saint Marc, 3 f. 3. In this passage from Is 40:3 the prophet announces the return of the exiles from Babylon and depicts Yahweh as about to lead them through the desert back to Palestine. The voice of a herald proclaims the coming of Yahweh so that a road may be prepared. This imagery is derived from the custom of sending a herald to proclaim the forthcoming visit of a king so that his subjects might put badly-kept roads into a proper state of repair. The words of Isaias are here applied to the Baptist. He is the herald who announces the coming of the Messiah and urges the Jewish people to make due preparation to receive him. 4. The baptism of John was a rite which symbolized the interior renovation which he preached as the fitting preparation for the Messiah. By penance we are to understand not mere penitential exercises or regret for past sins but the true repentance (μετάνοια) which consists in a change which brings the mind and heart of man into conformity with the law of God. 5. The preaching of the Baptist naturally aroused the hopes of the Jews and clearly evoked 727b an enthusiastic response from many. The effect of John's words was heightened by his dress which recalled the prophet Elias, 4 Kg 1:8, and by the asceticism of his life. Locusts are still eaten by the Bedouin of the desert. Wild honey may have been either the honey collected by wild bees or the sap of certain shrubs. 7-8. Some who heard the Baptist speak wondered whether he was not the Messiah; cf. Lk 3:15; Jn 1:19. In reply to such surmises John insisted that he was an inferior, unworthy to perform even the most menial tasks for the Messiah. The baptism of the Messiah would impart the Holy Spirit and is thus incomparably superior to the baptism of John, which was a merely preparatory rite, an external washing symbolic of interior conversion. Some writers understand the reference to the 'baptism with the Holy Ghost' as a metaphor signifying the copious outpouring of the gifts of the Holy Spirit not merely in the Sacrament of Baptism but in the entire economy of salvation to be established by Christ; cf. Ac 1:5. The prophets had spoken of the copious effusion of the Holy Spirit as a characteristic of the Messianic age, Is 44:3; Jl 2:28; Zach 12:10.

c 9-11 The Baptism of Jesus; cf. Mt 3:13-17; Lk 3:21 f.; Jn 1:30-34—In coming to John to be baptized, Jesus, who had no need for repentance, gave an example of humility and showed his approval of the mission of the Baptist; cf. 11:29-33. Moreover, it was the divine purpose that John, on the occasion of the baptism, should receive unquestionable evidence that Jesus was Messiah so that he might make him known to the Jewish nation, Jn 1:30-34. The baptism marks the inauguration, with clear divine approval, of the public ministry of Jesus who is Messiah and Son of God. 10. The descent of the Spirit on Christ recalls instances from the OT, Jg 3:10; 6:34; Is 11:2; 42:1, where persons called to the performance of arduous tasks are given the special assistance of the Spirit. In the case of Christ the descent of the Spirit is a sign of the divine origin of his mission and a pledge of divine assistance. It is not to be understood as signifying an addition to the fullness of grace already possessed by Christ. Neither the descent of the Holy Ghost nor the voice of the Father brought about a change in the Person or dignity of Christ. These external manifestations were the public authentication of his divine mission and Messianic dignity. 11. 'Beloved': ἀγαπητός. In classical Gk and in LXX, where it frequently translates the Heb. yahid, this word has also the meaning 'only', 'only-begotten'. Jesus is always well-pleasing to the Father because he is the eternal, only-begotten Son of God; cf. Jn 1:18. Some early heretics interpreted the events at the baptism in the sense that the 'god-Messiah' then descended on the man Jesus of Nazareth, remaining with him till the Passion. Modern rationalists say that it was at the baptism that Jesus became conscious of his Messianic dignity and mission. He descended into the Jordan a mere man, but came up from the waters convinced that he was Messiah. Such interpretations are a denial of the divinity of Christ and have no foundation in the narrative of Mark. Jesus did not become Messiah or Son of God at the baptism, but it was then that God solemnly introduced the beloved Son in his Messianic role.

d 12 f. The Temptation of Jesus; cf. Mt 4:1-11; Lk 4:1-13—Mark gives only a summary account of this incident. Satan wished to discover whether Jesus was the Messiah and, if possible, to lead him from the path of suffering which God had ordained as the course to be followed by the Redeemer. Our Lord allowed Satan to tempt him, 'for since he himself has suffered and been tempted he is able to assist those who are tempted', Heb 2:18; 'For we have not a high-priest who cannot have compassion on our infirmities, but one tried in all things as we are, except sin', Heb 4:15. Mark alone mentions the wild beasts whose presence suggests the desolate character of the region to which our Lord had retired.

e I 14-III 19 Beginning of the Public Ministry.

14-15 The Return to Galilee; cf. Mt 4:12; Lk 4:14a; 727c Jn 4:1-3—John had been thrown into prison by Herod Antipas, the ruler of Galilee and Peraea, whom he had denounced because of his adulterous union with Herodias, Mk 6:17-29. This reference to the imprisonment of the Baptist indicates the time of Christ's return to Galilee, while Jn 4:1-3 shows that the growing enmity of the Jews had made it advisable for Jesus to withdraw from Judaea. In Galilee Jesus proclaimed the good news that the Messianic kingdom foretold by the prophets was at hand. The time appointed for the establishment of the kingdom was come and all are exhorted to prepare themselves for entry into it by repentance and acceptance of the glad tidings proclaimed by Christ. This call to repentance, first issued by the Baptist and repeated by Christ, was in itself a corrective to the popular misconceptions of the nature of Messianic salvation which proved such an obstacle to the success of Christ's ministry among the Jews.

16-20 The Call of the First Disciples; cf. Mt 4:18-22; Lk 5:1-11—It is uncertain whether the narrative of Lk refers to the same incident as that recorded by Mk and Mt. We know from Jn 1:35-42 that Peter, Andrew and John were already followers of Christ. Here, however, they receive a special call to become immediate disciples. The redeeming mission of Christ was not to end with his own death and departure from this earth. Hence he selected as intimate companions and witnesses of his life and teaching a number of disciples who, after his departure, would be the duly accredited teachers of the Gospel, bringing the knowledge of salvation to all men.

21-34 Preaching and Miracles in Capernaum; cf. f Mt 4:13-17; 8:14-17; Lk 4:31-41—21-23. The synagogue meeting on the Sabbath, with its ritual of prayer and readings from the OT followed by an instruction, was a characteristic institution of post-exilic Judaism. The ruler of the synagogue had authority to invite a member of the congregation to address those present. In this way Christ was given many opportunities of making his message known to the Jews. Mark repeatedly draws attention to the astonishment of those who heard Christ speak, 1:27; 6:2; 11:18. Listeners were impressed by the fact that he spoke 'as one having power', as a teacher qualified to speak and decide questions in his own authority, whereas the Scribes were accustomed to repeat the traditional views and constantly cited the opinions of the great rabbinical teachers of the past. 23. The miraculous cure of the demoniac was a confirmation of the supernatural 'power' which he possessed.

24a. What is to us and to thee? This idiomatic Hebrew phrase normally expresses dissent or protest of some kind; cf. Jg 11:12; 2 Kg 16:10; 19:22; Mt 8:29; Mk 5:7; Lk 4:34; Jn 2:4. The demons had now come to realize that Christ was the 'stronger one'. Lk 11:22, who would overcome Satan, and they protest against his coming to destroy their power over men. 24b. 'The Holy One of God'. Though there is no evidence that this was an accepted title of the Messiah, it is possible that this was the sense intended by the demon; cf. Lk 4:34, 41; Jn 6:69. Christ, of course, was 'the holy one of God' in an altogether unique sense. 27. 'What is this? (This is) a new teaching with authority, and he commands even the unclean spirits and they obey him'. The authority of Christ was evident not merely in the manner of his teaching but in the fact that the demons obeyed his command. 32. 'After sunset', when the Sabbath had ended, the sick and those possessed by demons were brought to Christ. According to the teaching of the Scribes, even the carrying of the sick was a violation of the law of sabbath rest. 34. The demons knew now that Jesus was the Messiah, Lk 4:41, but they were forbidden to proclaim this fact. The chief reason for this 'injunction of silence', Mk 3:12; 5:43; 7:36; Mt 8:4, is to be found in the prevalent misconceptions of the nature of the Messianic kingdom and of the role of the Messiah. The Messianic b 35-39 Preaching and Miracles throughout Galilee; cf. Mt 4:23; Lk 4:42-44—35. It is possible that in departing from Capharnaum Jesus wished to allow the enthusiasm of the crowds, who were still ill-instructed about the nature of the kingdom, to moderate. He also wished, as the Evangelist tells us, to preach the message of salvation in other parts of Galilee. 36. Mark is the only Evangelist to mention that Peter was among those who went to find Jesus—a characteristic Petrine touch in the second Gospel.

40-45 Healing of a Leper; cf. Mt 8:1-4; Lk 5:12-16—The Mosaic Law, Lev chh 13-14, gave extensive regulations concerning leprosy, including under this name a number of curable skin-diseases as well as the malady nowadays known by that name. The leper was compelled to lead an isolated life, wearing a special garb and giving notice of his approach by crying out 'Unclean', in order to prevent contagion. Anyone who claimed a cure from leprosy was obliged to go before the priest who would verify the cure and, presumably, give some certificate of legal cleanliness. 43. Our Lord cured the man but he spoke sternly to him, because he had violated the prudent regulations of the Mosaic Law in thus coming into contact with others who might receive the contagion. 44. The man is commanded by Jesus to carry out the regulations laid down by the Law. 'For a testimony to them'. Some interpret this phrase in the sense that the priests, seeing that the man had been cured, would have clear testimony that Christ had worked a miracle. It is more probable, however, that the phrase refers to an official attestation of freedom from leprosy which the man would receive from the priest in order to reassure those who had previously known him as a leper.

728a II 1-12 Healing of a Paralytic; cf. Mt 9:2-8; Lk 5:17-26—The dispute with the Scribes which took place on the occasion of this miracle was the first of a series of such conflicts, 2:1-3:6, and gives the earliest indication in Mk of the growing opposition to our Lord. Christ's miracles and teaching had aroused the enthusiasm of the people; he had begun to form his own group of disciples and conducted his mission in complete independence of the traditional religious guides of the Jews. He thus incurred the suspicion of the Scribes, the recognized interpreters of the Law, who now watched him continually, and ultimately, together with the Pharisees and Herodians, determined to put him to death.

1-5. As soon as the crowds learned of Christ's return to Capharnaum they thronged to the house in which he was staying. The bed on which the paralytic was carried was a mat or pallet used as a stretcher. An outer stairs gave access to the flat roof of the house, and it was not difficult to make an opening, as it was a simple structure of tiles, flat stones and rubble resting on cross-beams. Christ rewarded this remarkable display of faith by remission of the sins of the paralytic. 9-10. The cure of the paralytic and the forgiving of sin both equally demanded divine power. But it was easier to claim the power implied in the words, 'Thy sins are forgiven thee' than to claim the power to cure the paralytic. The latter claim could easily be put to the test. Consequently, the miraculous cure should be taken as proof that Christ, the Son of Man, had the power on earth to forgive sin. It is noteworthy that while all four Gospels give numerous examples of the use of the title Son of Man by Jesus to designate himself, they do not give any instance of its application to him by others. In the rest of the NT the title is found only three times, Ac 7:56; Apoc 1:13; 14:14. These passages appear to allude directly to the figure mentioned in the vision of Daniel, 'I beheld therefore in the vision of the night, and lo, one like a son of man came with the clouds of heaven', Dan 7:13; cf. Lattey, The Book of Daniel, 83. In Hebrew and Aramaic usage 'son of man' means 'a man', 'a member of the human race'; cf. Ps 8:5. The common view of exegetes until the last century was that Jesus called himself 'the Son of Man' in order to emphasize the human nature and lowly way of life which he had assumed at the Incarnation. Nowadays it is widely held by Catholics that the use of this title was part of the scheme of progressive revelation and instruction followed by Christ in his teaching. Because of the prevalent misconceptions about the Messiah and his kingdom it would have been imprudent to claim publicly the title of Messiah; cf. 1:34. By designating himself as 'the Son of Man' Jesus gradually prepared the way for the revelation of his identity as the suffering Messiah and also the Son of God. The unusual form of the title (lit. 'the Son of the Man') as employed by Christ, and its frequent repetition were calculated to focus attention on his person, 'the man that I am'. His humanity is thus affirmed not merely when there is reference to sufferings and humiliations, 9:12; 10:33, but also when he claims power to forgive sin on earth or authority over the divine institution of the Sabbath, 2:28. It seems probable that a limited section of Jews, who recognized the Messianic sense of Dan 7:13 f., referred to the Messiah as 'Son of Man', but the expression was not in common use among the people at the time of Christ as a title of the Messiah. It could be used, therefore, without the risk of provoking a popular upheaval. Moreover, when closely linked with the vision of Daniel, it pointed to the heavenly origin of Jesus, who was not a merely human Messiah but the Son of God; cf. 13:26; 14:62.

13-17 The Call of Levi; cf. Mt 9:9-13; Lk 5:27-32 e—It is clear from Mt 9:9; 10:3 that Levi the publican and the Apostle Matthew are one and the same. The NT gives several examples of this double nomenclature, e.g. Simon—Peter, Saul—Paul, John—Mark, Joseph—Barnabas. It may be that Mk and Lk used the name Levi here because they did not wish to draw attention to the fact that one of the chosen twelve had previously belonged to a class hated by the Jews. The 'publicans' of the Gospels were local agents of the person who had bought from the State the right to collect the taxes in a particular area. Jews who took the position were commonly regarded as renegades from Judaism. The phrase 'publicans and sinners' in practice meant 'publicans and other sinners'. 15-16. The banquet given by Matthew provided the Scribes and Pharisees with another opportunity to attempt to discredit our Lord. They were greatly concerned with questions of ritual purity and sought scrupulously to avoid contact with all possible sources of legal defilement. The question put to the disciples was intended to create a prejudice in their minds against Jesus by suggesting that he was blameworthy in associating with persons whom the Pharisees regarded as sources of defilement because of their contacts with pagans and disregard of the Law and pharisaic traditions. 17a. Christ's ministry is compared to that of a physician; the physician must come into contact with the sick who need his ministrations, and similarly, Christ, the physician of souls, must associate with sinners. 17b. The salvation of sinners is the object of Christ's mission. The self-righteous Pharisees, by their pride and obstinate opposition to the claims and teaching of d 18-22 A Question concerning Fasting ; cf. Mt 9:14-17 ; Lk 5:33-39—Fasting was well known to the Jews as a sign of repentance and mourning. The Mosaic Law had prescribed only the Day of Atonement as a general day of fasting, but custom had introduced other days and the Pharisees boasted that they fasted frequently. 18. The question put to our Lord was intended to place him in an unfavourable light by contrasting the conduct of his followers with the ascetic practices of the Pharisees and of John's disciples. 19-20. Christ uses a simple illustration to show that fasting by his disciples is inopportune while he is with them. At a wedding celebration no one expects the companions of the bridegroom to fast, because it is a time of joy. Similarly, while Christ is with the disciples, fasting is out of place. But when he is taken away, i.e. after his Passion and Death, then the disciples will fast in token of sorrow. It is in this spirit, in association with the sufferings and death of Christ, that the Church orders times of fasting. 21-22. In these two illustrations Christ taught that the spirit which would animate his followers is incompatible with the spirit which inspired pharisaic observance. 'Raw cloth' is the new material which has not yet been fulled in order to prevent shrinking. Such material is quite unsuitable for patching old garments, because when it shrinks it will make an even larger rent in the old garment. 'Bottles' : Gk 'wineskins'. Skins of animals were commonly used in antiquity as containers for liquids. New unfermented wine must not be put into old wineskins, which are worn and inelastic, as the fermentation may cause them to burst. The disciples were being prepared for a new life animated by a spirit totally different from that of the Pharisees. In the economy to be established by Christ fasting would be practised as a sincere expression of repentance, not as a display of righteousness.

e 23-28 The First Dispute about the Sabbath ; cf. Mt 12:1-8 ; Lk 6:1-5—The observance of the obligation of abstaining from work on the Sabbath, which is the subject of this dispute, figured frequently in conflicts between Christ and his opponents ; cf. Mk 3:1-6 ; Lk 13:10-17 ; Jn 5:9-18. The Mosaic Law, Ex 20:10, had forbidden work on the Sabbath in order to give men relief from their daily labours and to enable them to share in the public worship of God. But the Scribes, by excessive rigour in the interpretation of this law, had made the observance of the Sabbath an intolerable burden. Christ showed, Mt 12:5, 11, that the Scribes were inconsistent in their interpretation and that they had lost sight of the fundamental purpose of the law. 23-24. The action of the disciples in plucking the ears of corn and rubbing out the grain is taken as a violation of the prohibition of work on the Sabbath. 25-26.

f Christ disregards casuistic discussion of the law of sabbath rest and considers the essential nature and purpose of the law. In effect, his answer means that the law of abstention from work is not an absolutely rigid and immutable regulation based on the nature of things. It is rather a positive ordinance intended to benefit mankind. The letter of the law must not be insisted on against the demands of charity and the needs of men. 'Loaves of proposition'. Twelve loaves were placed on the table of the sanctuary each Sabbath and when changed at the end of the week were to be eaten by the priests, Lev 24:5-9. The incident from the biblical narrative, 1 Kg 21:1-6, illustrates forcibly the point that the letter of the law should not be allowed to stand in the way of the urgent needs of men. 'Under Abiathar the high-priest'. According to the text of 1 Kg 21:1-6 it was the priest Achimelech, not his son Abiathar, who gave the loaves to David. Some suggest that the phrase is not authentic. Others take it to mean 'in the time of Abiathar' or 'in the biblical passage about Abiathar' ; cf. Mk 12:26 ; Rom 11:2. Abiathar was closely connected with David as the high-priest of the time (cf. Knabenbauer, Evangelium sec. Marcum, 87-9). He figures prominently in the biblical narrative and was presumably present on this occasion. We are not here dealing with a word for word citation from the OT, but rather with a general allusion to an incident which illustrates the point of doctrine which Jesus wished to inculcate. 27. The fundamental principle is that the law of sabbath rest was intended to benefit mankind. Its observance is subordinate to the needs of men, who were not created merely in order to observe the Sabbath. 28. Further, the Son of Man, i.e. Jesus the Messiah and Son of God, has authority to interpret or even to abrogate the Sabbath. In declaring himself 'Lord of the Sabbath' Christ claims authority over a divine institution, thus making an implicit claim to divinity.

III:1-6 Cure of a Man with a Withered Hand ; cf. Mt 12:9-14 ; Lk 6:6-11—1-3. Here again the question at issue is the observance of the law of sabbath rest. The hostility of the Pharisees has increased ; they now spy on Christ to see whether he will perform a cure on the Sabbath so that they may accuse him of violation of the Law. 4. This question means, Is it permissible to perform a good deed on the Sabbath in contravention of the letter of the law, or must one allow evil to happen, by refraining from action in order to keep the letter of the law? May one take action to save life on the Sabbath, or should assistance be withheld despite danger to life? It was admitted in practice by the Pharisees that one should assist a person whose life was in danger. The principle thus established had obviously a far wider application in all cases where the needs of mankind seemed to conflict with the positive law. 5. Mark alone notes the anger and grief of Christ on this occasion, 'blindness of their hearts' : Gk 'the callousness of their hearts'. The silence of the Pharisees is proof of their obduracy. 6. The first mention of a plot against our Lord. The Herodians (cf. Mt 22:16), were either a party who supported the dynasty of Herod, or persons of influence at the court of Herod Antipas, the ruler of Galilee. Christ was within Herod's territory at this time and the sanction of the tetrarch would have been necessary for the success of any scheme to bring about his death.

7-12 Enthusiastic Crowds come to Jesus ; cf. Mt 4:24 f. ; Lk 6:17-19—This section gives a vivid picture of the excitement caused by Christ's teaching and miracles. The crowds came from districts far removed from Galilee, and even from outside Palestine, in order to avail of his miraculous healing powers. They so pressed upon him that it was necessary for him to address them from a boat moored near the shore. In Mt 4:24 f. and Lk 6:17-19 this account of the coming of the crowds to Jesus (7-8) leads on to the Sermon on the Mount. For a discussion of the absence of the Sermon on the Mount from Mk, especially in relation to the Synoptic Problem, see Vaganay, RB 58 (1951) 5-46. 11-12. The casting out of demons was not merely a work of mercy, but a proof that Jesus was mightier than Satan. Later Jesus pointed out that the breaking of Satan's power was a sign that the kingdom of God had come ; cf. Lk 11:20. The title 'Son of God' suggests more forcibly than 'Holy One of God', 1:24, the unique relation between Christ and the Father. There is no certainty as to the precise sense intended by the demons, but probably they had some notion of Christ's divinity by this time. Christ did not refuse the title but for motives of prudence (cf. 1:34) forbade the demons to proclaim it.

13-19 The Call of the Twelve Apostles ; cf. Mt 10:1-4 ; Lk 6:12-16 ; Ac 1:13—The twelve disciples now specially chosen by Christ were to be the duly accredited witnesses who would proclaim the message of salvation after the death of Christ. Hence the solemnity attached to their calling. Luke tells us that Christ spent the whole night in prayer beforehand. Mark emphasizes that the choice came from Jesus ; cf. Jn 6:70 ; 15:16. 14-15. The number twelve had symbolic significance in relation to the twelve tribes of Israel. The Apostles would be the rulers of the new spiritual h 35-39 Preaching and Miracles throughout Galilee; cf. Mt 4:23; Lk 4:42-44-35. It is possible that in departing from Capharnaum Jesus wished to allow the enthusiasm of the crowds, who were still ill-instructed about the nature of the kingdom, to moderate. He also wished, as the Evangelist tells us, to preach the message of salvation in other parts of Galilee. 36. Mark is the only Evangelist to mention that Peter was among those who went to find Jesus—a characteristic Petrine touch in the second Gospel.

40-45 Healing of a Leper; cf. Mt 8:1-4; Lk 5:12-16. —The Mosaic Law, Lev chh 13-14, gave extensive regulations concerning leprosy, including under this name a number of curable skin-diseases as well as the malady nowadays known by that name. The leper was compelled to lead an isolated life, wearing a special garb and giving notice of his approach by crying out 'Unclean', in order to prevent contagion. Anyone who claimed a cure from leprosy was obliged to go before the priest who would verify the cure and, presumably, give some certificate of legal cleanliness. 43. Our Lord cured the man but he spoke sternly to him, because he had violated the prudent regulations of the Mosaic Law in thus coming into contact with others who might receive the contagion. 44. The man is commanded by Jesus to carry out the regulations laid down by the Law. 'For a testimony to them'. Some interpret this phrase in the sense that the priests, seeing that the man had been cured, would have clear testimony that Christ had worked a miracle. It is more probable, however, that the phrase refers to an official attestation of freedom from leprosy which the man would receive from the priest in order to reassure those who had previously known him as a leper.

728a II 1-12 Healing of a Paralytic; cf. Mt 9:2-8; Lk 5:17-26. —The dispute with the Scribes which took place on the occasion of this miracle was the first of a series of such conflicts, 2:1-3:6, and gives the earliest indication in Mk of the growing opposition to our Lord. Christ's miracles and teaching had aroused the enthusiasm of the people; he had begun to form his own group of disciples and conducted his mission in complete independence of the traditional religious guides of the Jews. He thus incurred the suspicion of the Scribes, the recognized interpreters of the Law, who now watched him continually, and ultimately, together with the Pharisees and Herodians, determined to put him to death.

1-5. As soon as the crowds learned of Christ's return to Capharnaum they thronged to the house in which he was staying. The bed on which the paralytic was carried was a mat or pallet used as a stretcher. An outer stairs gave access to the flat roof of the house, and it was not difficult to make an opening, as it was a simple structure of tiles, flat stones and rubble resting on cross-beams. Christ rewarded this remarkable display of faith by remission of the sins of the paralytic. 9-10. The cure of the paralytic and the forgiving of sin both equally demanded divine power. But it was easier to claim the power implied in the words, 'Thy sins are forgiven thee' than to claim the power to cure the paralytic. The latter claim could easily be put to the test. Consequently, the miraculous cure should be taken as proof that Christ, the Son of Man, had the power on earth to forgive sin. It is noteworthy that while all four Gospels give numerous examples of the use of the title Son of Man by Jesus to designate himself, they do not give any instance of its application to him by others. In the rest of the NT the title is found only three times. Ac 7:56; Apoc 1:13; 14:14. These passages appear to allude directly to the figure mentioned in the vision of Daniel, 'I beheld therefore in the vision of the night, and lo, one like a son of man came with the clouds of heaven', Dan 7:13; cf. Lattey, The Book of Daniel, 83. In Hebrew and Aramaic usage 'son of man' means 'a man', 'a member of the human race'; cf. Ps 8:5. The common view of exegetes until the last century was that Jesus called himself 'the Son of Man' in order to emphasize the human nature and lowly way of life which he had assumed at the Incarnation. Nowadays it is widely held by Catholics that the use of this title was part of the scheme of progressive revelation at instruction followed by Christ in his teaching. Because of the prevalent misconceptions about the Messiah as his kingdom it would have been imprudent to claim publicly the title of Messiah; cf. 1:34. By designating himself as 'the Son of Man' Jesus gradually prepared the way for the revelation of his identity as the suffering Messiah and also the Son of God. The unusual use of the title (lit. 'the Son of the Man') as employed by Christ, and its frequent repetition were calculated to focus attention on his person, 'the man that I am', in which humanity is thus affirmed not merely when the reference to sufferings and humiliations, 9:12; but also when he claims power to forgive sin on, or authority over the divine institution of the Sabbath, 2:28. It seems probable that a limited section of those who recognized the Messianic sense of Daniel referred to the Messiah as 'Son of Man', but this expression was not in common use among them at the time of Christ as a title of the Messiah. It was, therefore, without the risk of provoking popular upheaval. Moreover, when closely associated with the vision of Daniel, it pointed to the origin of Jesus, who was not a merely human being but the Son of God; cf. 13:26; 14:62.

13-17 The Call of Levi; cf. Mt 9:9-13; Lk 5:27-32. —It is clear from Mt 9:9; 10:3 that Levi the tax collector and the Apostle Matthew are one and the same person. The NT gives several examples of this double name, e.g. Simon-Peter, Saul-Paul, Joseph-Barnabas. It may be that Mk uses the name Levi here because they did not wish to draw attention to the fact that one of the chosen twelve had previously belonged to a class hated by the Jews. The 'publicans' of the Gospels were local tax collectors who had bought from the State the right to collect the taxes in a particular area. Their position was commonly regarded as repulsive and dishonourable. The phrase 'publicans and sinners' in the Gospel practice meant 'publicans and other sinners'. The banquet given by Matthew provided an opportunity for Jesus to discredit our Lord. They were greatly concerned with questions of ritual purity and sought to avoid contact with all possible sources of defilement. The question of the disciples' minds was suggested that he was unworthy to be associated with persons whom the Pharisees regarded as defilement because of their contacts with sinners. Christ's mission was compared to that of the physician who goes into contact with the diseased, and similar to the physician who must associate with the diseased. The scribes and Pharisees, obstinate in their refusal to

 d 18-22 A Question concerning Fasting; cf. Mt 9:14-17; Lk 5:33-39—Fasting was well known to the Jews as a sign of repentance and mourning. The Mosaic Law had prescribed only the Day of Atonement as a general day of fasting, but custom had introduced other days and the Pharisees boasted that they fasted frequently.
 18. The question put to our Lord was intended to place of his followers in an unfavourable light by contrasting the conduct and of John's disciples. 19-20. Christ uses a simple illustration to show that fasting by his disciples is in-opportune while he is with them. At a wedding celebration while he is with them, the companions of the bridegroom no one expects the companions of the bridegroom to fast, because it is a time of joy. Similarly, while Christ is taken away, i.e. after his Passion and death, then the disciples will fast in token of sorrow.
 22. In these two illustrations Christ taught that the allusion to an incident which illustrates the point of doctrine which Jesus wished to inculcate. 27. The fundamental principle is that the law of sabbath rest was intended to benefit mankind. Its observance is subordinate to the needs of men, who were not created merely in order to observe the Sabbath. 28. Further, the Son of Man, i.e. Jesus the Messiah and Son of God,

 Christ claims authority over a divine institution, thus making an implicit claim to divinity.
 III:1-6 Cure of a Man with a Withered Hand; cf. Mt 8 12:9-14; Lk 6:6-11—1-3. Here again the question at issue is the observance of the law of sabbath rest.
 The hostility of the Pharisees has increased; they now spy on Christ to see whether he will perform a cure on the Sabbath so that they may accuse him of violation of the Law. 4. This question means, Is it permissible to perform a good deed on the Sabbath in contravention of the letter of the law, or must one allow evil to happen, by refraining from action in order to keep the letter of the law? May one take action to save life on the Sabbath, or should assistance be withheld despite danger to life? It was admitted in practice by the Pharisees that one should assist a person whose life was in danger. The principle thus established had obviously a far wider application in all cases where the needs of mankind seemed to conflict with the positive law. 5. Mark alone notes the anger and grief of Christ on this occasion, 'blindness of their hearts': Gk 'de callumens of their hearts'. The silence of the Pharisees is proof of their obduracy. 6. The first mention of a plot against our Lord. The Herodians (cf. Mt 22:16), Herod, or persons of influence at the court of Herod Antipas, the ruler of Galilee. Christ was within Herod's territory at this time and the dynasty of tetrarch would have been necessary for the success of any scheme to bring about his death.
 7-12 Enthusiastic Crowds come to Jesus; cf. Mt 4:24 f.; Lk excitement caused by Christ's teaching and miracles.

 The crowds came from districts far removed from Galilee, and even from outside Palestine, in order to avail of his miraculous healing powers. They addressed upon him that it was necessary for him to address them from a boat moored near the shore.
 In Mt 4:24 f. and Lk 6:17-19 this account of the coming of the crowds to Jesus (7-8) leads on to the Sermon on the Mount. For a discussion of the absence of the Sermon on the Mount from Mk, especially in relation to the Synoptic Problem, see Vaganay, RB

Their companionship with Christ during his public life, their intimate knowledge of his teaching and acquaintance with his supernatural powers, fitted them in a special way to be the authentic witnesses of the good news of the Redemption. The power of working miracles would be a confirmation of their teaching; they shared in the ministry of Christ even during his life on earth; cf. Mk 6:7 ff. 16. It is significant that Simon (Peter) is placed first in all the lists of the Apostles, though there is some variation in the order of the others, with the exception of Judas who is always placed last. 17. 'Boanerges' is probably a defective transcription into Greek letters of the Aramaic B'nê-r'gāi 'Sons of thunder' = The Thunderers. This title may be explained by the incident recorded in Lk 9:54, which suggests the fiery disposition of the brothers. Some writers take the expression as a reference to their eloquence, and especially to the theology of John, the author of the Fourth Gospel. 18. 'Simon the Cananean'. Lk calls him 'the Zealot', translating the Aramaic Q'nānā of which the Gk Kananaïos is a transcription. It is unlikely that Simon belonged to the fanatical political group known as Zealots. The word refers rather to a personal trait of character or to zeal for the Law; cf. Ac 21:20; Gal 1:14.

THE MINISTRY IN GALILEE AND ADJOINING DISTRICTS

728a 20-30 Different Attitudes towards Christ—20-21 are found only in Mk. The crowds are still enthusiastic and so eager to be with Christ that it is impossible for him and the disciples to take their meals. This eagerness of the crowds is a contrast to the anxiety shown by the persons mentioned in 21, and still more to the blasphemous accusations of the Scribes and Pharisees. 21. 'Piety adds to the difficulty of this passage; for the mind shrinks not merely from believing but from the very thought that Christ's relatives said or considered that Christ was mad', Maldonatus. The usual interpretation is that relatives (or followers) of Christ, disturbed by reports, came out to take charge of him. The following points are to be noted. (1) The phrase of παρ' αὐτοῦ does not necessarily mean relatives (friends). It has a wider usage which would include disciples, followers, members of a household. It is not certain that the persons designated by this phrase are the same as 'his mother and brethren', 31. Even if they are, there is no reason for thinking that our Lady shared in the sentiments of the others, though she would naturally wish to be present when the welfare of her divine Son was in question. (2) 'For they said', rather, 'For people were saying'. If this be correct, then 21b refers to reports which reached Christ's friends, not to an expression of opinion by them. (3) 'He is become mad' is too strong as a translation of ἐξέστη. This verb is used by Mark to describe the astonishment and awe caused by the teaching and miracles of Christ, Mk 2:12; 5:42; 6:51. In the present context a more satisfactory rendering would be 'he is beside himself'. Those who came to seize Christ may have thought that his conduct, e.g. neglect of his health, 20b, was imprudent. 'For not even his brethren believed in him', Jn 7:5. An alternative explanation, which would obviate the difficulties of the usual interpretation, was put forward by Hartmann, BZ 11 (1913) 249-79. The gist of his interpretation is conveyed by the following translation: 'When they who were with him (in the house) heard (the crowd), they went out to control it [the crowd]. For they said, it [the crowd] is out of hand'. A strong argument against this interpretation is drawn from Marcan usage. In no other instance in Mk do we find the singular of the pronoun αὐτός used when referring to the crowd (ὄχλος). It is always the plural (αὐτοὺς, αὐτοῖς) which is found; see MacRory, IER 65 (1945) 1-5; Fahy, ibid. 6-15. We must take it, therefore, that the pronoun in the phrase κρατήσαι αὐτὸν 'to lay hold on him' refers to Christ. If Mark intended to refer to the crowd he would have used the plural αὐτοῖς; cf. CBQ 4 (1942) 357-9. 22-30 The Scribes calumniate Our Lord; cf. Mt 12:22-33; Lk 11:14-22—22. The Scribes from Jerusalem had probably been sent by the Sanhedrin to spy on our Lord. The blasphemous charge that Christ was in league with Satan in expelling the demons shows the blindness and obduracy of his opponents. It also indicates the indisputable character of the evidence that Christ had really performed these miracles. 'Beelzebub' is the name given to the god of Accaron in 4 Kg 1:2 f. It appears in the Ras-Shamra tablets also as the name of a pagan divinity; cf. R. Dussaud, Les Découvertes de Ras Shamra et l'Ancien Testament (Paris 1937), 69. It is uncertain how this name came to be applied to the prince of demons. In the Greek MSS of the Gospels the name usually appears in the form 'Beelzebul', which is variously explained as 'lord of the dwelling', 'lord of dung', 'lord of flies'. Some think that Beelzebul is a corruption of the Aramaic form Beelzebub, which means 'enemy', 'accuser'. It would correspond, therefore, to the Hebrew 'Satan' = Adversary, and διδόλος = Accuser. 23-26. The illustrations introduced here by Christ show the absurdity of the blasphemous charge which had been levelled against him. Every kingdom or household which is torn by internal strife will come to ruin. If Christ is in league with the prince of demons in order to cast out devils, then the kingdom of Satan is divided against itself and its collapse cannot be far off. It was clearly absurd to suppose that Satan would be willing to destroy his own kingdom in this way. 27. This parable points to the only correct conclusion from Christ's power over the demons. The 'strong man' is Satan, the 'prince of this world', Jn 12:31. But Christ 'a stronger one', Lk 11:22, has come and overcome Satan. The expulsion of demons from men is the proof of Christ's victory and the sign of the destruction of Satan's kingdom. 28-30 Blasphemy of the Holy Spirit; cf. Mt 12:31 f.; Lk 12:10—In this context 'blasphemy' is to be understood in accordance with the primary sense of βλασφημεῖν 'to slander, calumniate'. It is clear from 30 that 'blasphemy against the Holy Ghost' is the sin committed by those who attributed to the power of Satan the expulsion of demons by Christ. These miraculous works of mercy were so clearly due to the beneficent operation of divine power that to attribute them to Satan was a calumny of diabolical malice. Unlike other blasphemies or sins which might be partially excused by ignorance, passion or inadvertence, this was a sin of wilful malice and blindness to the light. As long as such a mentality persists, pardon is impossible, not because of any limitation on the power or mercy of God, but because those who are guilty of this sin refuse to respond to the promptings of grace. 31-35 The Mother and Brethren of Jesus; cf. Mt 12:46-50; Lk 8:19-21—31. According to the usual interpretation, Christ's mother and brethren are the persons referred to in 21 as 'friends', and their arrival is the sequel to the facts there described. 32-35. These words of Christ are not a repudiation of the ties of blood nor a refusal to acknowledge the duties which arise from such relationship. Christ condemned the casuistry which made it possible for undutiful children to evade the obligations imposed by the Fourth Commandment, Mk 7:9-13, and when dying on the Cross showed his solicitude for his mother, Jn 19:26 f. Here, however, he wished to inculcate the doctrine that the claims of natural kinship are subordinate to the primary duty of performing God's will. 'His brethren'. Other references to the brethren of Christ are to be found in Mk 6:3; Mt 12:46-50; 13:55 f.; Lk 8:19-21; Jn 2:12; 7:3, 5, 10; Ac 1:14; 1 Cor 9:5; Gal 1:19. The evidence of the NT and of Tradition leads to the conclusion that the 'brethren' were cousins of Christ. The precise degree of relationship and also the question whether they were related to

f IV:1-34 Teaching in Parables; cf. Mt 13:1-52; Lk 8:4-18—1-2. The enthusiasm of the crowds for Christ is undiminished as they gather again to hear his teaching. The sloping shores of an inlet of the lake would have provided a natural amphitheatre for the crowds whom he addressed from a boat moored near the shore. This was not the first occasion on which Jesus made use of parables (cf. Mk 2:19-22; 3:23-27), but both Mk and Mt seem to indicate this day by the lake-shore as the 'day of parables' in a special way. Mark records only two of the 'parables of the kingdom', which are found in Mt 13, but he has one parable, 4:26-29, which is not found in the other Evangelists. 3-9. The Parable of the Sower depicts a situation familiar to Christ's audience. The cultivated land was not fenced off by walls or hedges, the only boundary marks being stones fixed at intervals. The 'wayside' was frequently nothing more than a rough path. Seed which fell on it had not even a light covering of earth to protect it from the birds which, according to modern observers, sometimes snatch the seed as it is falling to the ground from the sower's hand. Much of the soil of Palestine is stony, with frequent outcroppings of rock or only a light covering of soil over the underlying rock. The seed which fell there sprang up quickly but, because of the lack of moisture, the corn withered in the burning heat of the sun. The thorn-growths were not uprooted in the preparation of the soil. Usually they were burned together with the straw which remained after the preceding harvest, but roots left in the earth and seed which had fallen to the ground produced a new growth which smothered the grain-crop. 9. This phrase is used by Christ (cf. Mt 11:15) to impress upon the listeners the importance of what he has said and to urge them to ponder upon its meaning.

g 10-12 The Reason Jesus spoke in Parables; cf. Mt 13:10-15; Lk 8:9f.—10. This question about the parables was put to Jesus by 'those about him with the twelve' at a later stage, when the crowds were not present. 11a. 'The mystery of the kingdom of God' is the secret design of God for establishing the Messianic kingdom. It is called a 'mystery' because it proceeds from the inscrutable wisdom of God whose hidden purpose is not ascertainable by human reason apart from divine revelation. Knowledge of this design of God, of the nature of the kingdom, the manner of its foundation, the conditions of entry into it, is given to the disciples on whom would fall the duty of proclaiming the kingdom after Christ's death. By their docility and faith in Christ they had shown that they were fitted to receive a more profound and clearer understanding of God's design. 11b. 'Those outside' are not neglected; they are taught in parables. The expression 'those outside' includes Christ's avowed enemies, the Scribes, Pharisees and Herodians, and also the crowds who, though attracted by Christ and impressed by his teaching and miracles, had not become faithful followers. It was not Christ's intention, in teaching through parables, to prevent them from understanding his doctrine. The Evangelist tells us that Christ spoke to them in parables according to their capacity to understand, 33. Parables, by their very nature, are calculated to arouse the interest and to enlighten, but a certain effort is called for if one is to grasp the truth enshrined in the imagery of the parable. In adopting parables as a method of instruction Christ took account of the dispositions of 'those outside' and of their mistaken notions of the kingdom. Prevalent misconceptions of the role of the Messiah and of the character of his kingdom made it necessary to propound the true doctrine to the people in a manner which would neither destroy such goodwill as could be found among them nor provoke a conflict with the Roman authorities; cf. 1:34. Christ's appeal for earnest consideration of his teaching, 9, was not to be dismissed lightly in view of the manifest signs of God's approval which his mission had received. Men of goodwill would reflect on the parables and be enlightened. Those who, like the disciples, sought further explanation would receive it from Christ. But for the ill-disposed, who neglected the grace thus offered to them, the parables would be the occasion of a further hardening of their hearts. 12. In its original context in Is 6:9f. this passage predicts the failure of the prophet's mission, a mission of mercy which, because of the blindness and obduracy of the Jews to whom he was sent, resulted in further hardening of their hearts. At first sight the passage seems to mean that the purpose of the prophet's mission was to blind and harden. But the text must be understood in accordance with Hebrew idiom and the Hebrew conception of divine causality in which little account was taken of secondary causes. The final result of God's merciful action in sending Isaias is stated as if it were the purpose of his mission. Actually of course, that foreseen result was brought about by the evil dispositions of those to whom he was sent; cf. Kissane, The Book of Isaias (Dublin 1941), Vol. 1, 75 f. The situation contemplated in the text of Isaias has a parallel in the mission of Christ. He too came on a mission of mercy and taught 'those outside' in parables, because that was the method most suited to their dispositions and capacity for understanding his doctrine; cf. Vosté, Parabola selecta D. N. Jesu Christi (Romae 1933).

13-20 Explanation of the Parable of the Sower; cf. Mt 13:18-23; Lk 8:11-15—The key to the meaning is given in 14. The seed represents the message of the kingdom which Christ is preaching. As the fate of a seed depends upon the type of soil on which it falls, so the success of Christ's teaching and the growth of the kingdom depend upon the dispositions and loyal co-operation of those who hear him. If his message is to bear fruit it must find a fruitful soil in the minds and hearts of the listeners. This lesson had a special significance for the Jews of the time of Christ. Many of them imagined that membership of the Chosen People, irrespective of moral qualifications, would secure entry into the Messianic kingdom, but the parable emphasizes the necessity of good dispositions. 21-25 The Mystery of the Kingdom will be revealed; cf. Mt 5:15; 7:2; 10:26f.; 13:12; 25:29; Lk 8:16-18—The instructions contained in the parables of the Lamp, 21, and of the Measure, 24, appear to be directed specially to the Apostles and disciples. 21-23. The knowledge of the kingdom which has been given to the disciples, 11, is not for them alone. They are 'the light of the world', Mt 5:14-16, and as the function of a lamp is to give light, so it will be the function of the disciples to proclaim to all mankind the knowledge of Christ and his teaching which has been entrusted to them. For the moment 'those outside' are incapable of appreciating the doctrine of the kingdom, but the time will come when that knowledge will be proclaimed from the housetops, Mt 10:26 f. 24-25. The semi-proverbial statements of 24b and 25a contain a warning which recalls the teaching of the Parable of the Talents, Mt 25:14-30. Knowledge of the kingdom is a favour from God which, like all God's graces, demands the co-operation of man if it is to be understood and to prove fruitful. The measure of understanding and fruitfulness is in proportion to the attention and goodwill with which the message is received. Those who make use of the knowledge they have received will be granted an increase. This teaching obviously has a special interest for the disciples who would have the duty of preaching to others.

26-29 The Seed growing by Itself—In this parable, which is found only in Mk, the central point of comparison with the kingdom of God is the manner in which the seed, once it has been sown, grows to maturity without further intervention from the sower. While he goes about his daily round, the seed, through its own hidden energies, develops in the soil until it is fit for harvesting. The chief lesson of this parable appears 730e to be as follows : just as the seed develops gradually until it has formed the full-grown ear ripe for harvesting, so the kingdom of God established on earth by Christ, will develop gradually, but none the less surely, until it reaches the final consummation. This doctrine of the gradual but persistent growth of the kingdom was a timely corrective to the false ideas of those who looked for an immediate and highly dramatic inauguration of the Messianic kingdom. The parable inculcates patience and confidence in the mysterious plans of God who will secure the growth of the kingdom without the aid of violent revolutionary upheavals or the theatrical manifestations which were part of popular expectation.

d 30-32 The Mustard Seed ; cf. Mt 13:31 f. ; Lk 13:18 f. —The mustard seed, though not absolutely the smallest of all seeds, was proverbial for its smallness, Mt 17:20. From this tiny seed, however, grows a plant which attains the dimensions of a tree. Flocks of birds gather on its branches to eat the ripe grains of mustard seed. This growth from small beginnings provides the term of comparison in the present parable. The kingdom has an apparently insignificant beginning ; the preaching of the Gospel is an apparently inadequate method of inaugurating the Messianic age. But Christ foretells a remarkable development to which history bears testimony in the spread of the Gospel and the growth of the Church. He also discredits mistaken ideas of a sudden manifestation of the kingdom in all its fullness, and directs attention to the latent powers which achieve this extraordinary expansion.

e 33-34 Concluding Remarks on the Parables ; cf. Mt 13:34 f.—33b. 'According to their capacity to understand'. These words make it clear that the evangelist did not consider that the purpose of the parables was to blind and harden ; cf. 4:10-12. The reason for failure to understand the doctrine of the kingdom propounded in them must be sought in lack of goodwill and failure to give due attention to Christ's teaching. His mission had evident marks of divine approval and, consequently, his teaching merited the most earnest consideration. 34. The disciples showed their goodwill by seeking explanations, 10, and they received from Christ the fuller knowledge which would not have been refused to 'those outside' if they had seriously sought it.

f 35-40 The Storm on the Lake ; cf. Mt 8:18, 23-27 ; Lk 8:22-25—Mark's narrative mentions several details not found in the other Synoptics, e.g. 'they took him as he was, in the boat', 'other boats accompanied him', 36, 'he was in the stern sleeping on a cushion', 38. These unimportant details which make the narrative more graphic without affecting the substance of the story, clearly imply that the evangelist's information came from an eyewitness. This internal evidence is in complete harmony with the tradition that Mk is a record of the preaching of Peter. The realism and graphic quality of the narrative, as well as certain other features of the second Gospel, are traceable to the eyewitness Peter. 37-38. In the sudden violent storms which sweep down on the Lake of Galilee waves rise to a height of more than six feet and small craft caught in these squalls are in grave danger. 39. 'Be silent! be muzzled!' Christ addresses the winds and waves as if they were living things. 40. The disciples were not completely lacking in faith—their appeal to Christ shows that they relied on him to help, 38—but their faith was still imperfect. 40b. The disciples were awed by this manifestation of the power that Christ possessed over the forces of nature, a power which in the OT is attributed to Yahweh. The Fathers see in the boat tossed upon the waters a symbol of the Church subjected to persecutions and trials.

g V 1-20 Expulsion of the Demons in Gerasa ; cf. Mt 8:28-34 ; Lk 8:26-39—Once again it is noteworthy that Mark's account of this and the subsequent incidents, 21-43, is characterized by touches of realism and graphic detail which immediately suggest that the evangelist's information came from an eye-witness. 1. 'And they came to the opposite shore of the lake, in the territory of the Gerasenes'. Instead of Gerasenes, which is the best supported reading in Mk, some witnesses to the text read Gadarenes (cf. Mt 8:28) or Gergesenes (cf. Lk 8:26). The latter reading is most probably an emendation due to Origen (cf. PG 14 270). While it is clear that the cure of the demoniac was performed on the eastern shore of the lake, the place has not been identified with certainty. It is unlikely that the name 'Gerasenes' should be connected with the well-known city of the Decapolis called Gerasa (modern Jerash) which lies some 30 m. to the SE. in Transjordan. It has been suggested, however, that the territory of Gerasa reached the lake shore and that the lake side inhabitants were therefore called Gerasenes. But the town to which the Gerasenes belonged was evidently close to the lake ; cf. 5:14 ; Lk 8:27. At the place called Moqā Edlō on the eastern shore a steep descent comes to within a short distance of the water's edge, 13. In the vicinity there are numerous caves which may have been used as tombs, 3. About a mile north of Moqā Edlō there is a place called Kursi. It is probable that this name should be traced back to the Aramaic form of Gerasa and that the present Kursi indicates the site of the town of the Gerasenes ; cf. Lagrange, Saint Marc, 132-6. 2-8. We have here a particularly striking manifestation of Christ's power over the demons. The possessed man, who was previously uncontrollable and had doubtless rushed out to molest Christ and those with him, Mt 8:28, was now subdued and prostrated himself, 6, before our Lord, who commanded the unclean spirit to depart from him. The demon, dismayed at the destruction of his malignant tyranny over men, 3:23-27, adjured Jesus not to torment him 'before the time', Mt 8:29—not to command them to go into the abyss', Lk 8:31. This appeal appears to reflect the belief that demons were allowed to roam the world to harass and tempt men till the day of judgement. Some commentators are of opinion that the 'torment' is the deprivation of the malicious pleasure which the demons derived from harassing those who were possessed. 'Son of God Most High' was not a current Messianic title. The demon evidently recognized the exceptional dignity and superior power of Christ. It would seem, however, that he did not yet know the full significance of the title 'Son of God' as applied to Christ. If he had understood he would not have adjured Christ by God, as by One who was Christ's superior. 'Most High' was the name given to the God of the Jews by Gentiles who did not know his real name ; it was also used by the Jews to emphasize the transcendence of their God. 9-10. The Roman legion numbered up to 6,000 men. Here the word signifies a very large number and suggests the power of Satan. But despite their numbers, the demons are compelled to beg Christ not to drive them from the district. 11-13. The inhabitants of the territory east of the Lake of Galilee were mostly pagans (cf. Jos., B.J. 2, 18, 5), and, consequently, unaffected by Jewish traditions or by the declarations of the Mosaic Law, Lev 11:7 ; Deut 14:8, that swine were unclean animals. The loss which Christ permitted the demons to inflict on the owners of the swine should be judged in the same way as other material losses and afflictions which God permits for a higher purpose. The inhabitants of the district were rid of the malignant power of Satan, and were granted an exceptional opportunity of coming to recognize Christ as the divine envoy who would liberate souls as well as bodies from the dominion of Satan. 14-17. Consideration of the loss which they had suffered outweighed even the evidence of the miracle, and the inhabitants asked Christ to leave their territory. 18-20. The man who had been freed from the demon was probably a pagan. His presence among Christ's immediate followers would have given the Scribes and Pharisees an opportunity to arouse opposition to the public ministry among the Jews. Moreover, Christ had a special mission for this man to his own people. By making known to them how great things Jesus had done for him, he would arouse their interest in the 7801 Person and mission of Christ, thus preparing them for the message of salvation. The proclamation of Christ's wonderworking power among the pagan inhabitants of the Decapolis did not involve the risks of political upheavals which were to be feared among the Jews; cf. 1:25, 34; 3:12.

j 21-43 The Daughter of Jairus and the Woman with the Issue of Blood; cf. Mt 9:18-26; Lk 8:40-56—Both incidents illustrate the importance of unwavering faith in Christ. 21. 'And when Jesus had again crossed in the boat to the other side', to the western shore, the crowds gathered to him with an eagerness which is in striking contrast to the attitude of the Gerasenes. 22. Jairus was either the chief official who presided at synagogue services or one of the elders who were responsible for the administration of the synagogue. 25-29. The disorder of normal menstruation from which this woman was suffering made her legally unclean, Lev 15:25. It would have been embarrassing for her to tell her affliction to Christ in the presence of the crowd. The people might have driven away and ill-treated one who exposed them to the danger of contracting legal defilement. Consequently, she had recourse to this means whereby she hoped to secure the benefit of Christ's miraculous power without being observed. The Gospels mention other cases where cures were sought by touching Christ. 3:10, or his garments, 6:56; Mt 14:36.

k 30-34. Jesus knew 'that power had gone forth from him'; he was aware that the miracle had been performed. The question 'Who hath touched my garments?' was intended to make it clear to the woman that she had not obtained the cure as a magical result of contact with Christ's garment without his knowledge or consent. The miracle was granted in answer to the faith of which she had given such striking proof. Christ, of course, knew by supernatural knowledge who had touched him. His action in looking round 'to see her who had done this', and the question in 30b are to be understood in the light of his experimental knowledge. He had assumed a real human nature at the Incarnation and, by the use of his senses and intelligence, acquired knowledge experimentally in the same way as other men. 35-36. The messengers did not think that Jesus could restore the girl to life. Jesus, however, reassured Jairus; all will be well if his faith remains unshaken. 37. These were the three Apostles who were privileged to be witnesses of the glory of Christ at the Transfiguration, and were also his companions at the Agony. 38. The 'tumult' was caused by the lamentation of relatives and neighbours together with the cries of the professional mourners. 39-40. The girl was really dead, as the mockery of the listeners shows, but her death is likened to sleep because she was about to be restored to life. 41. Mark alone gives the actual Aramaic words ḥ'liā, 'maiden'; qūmī 'arise' spoken by our Lord. 43. Christ again imposed silence on the witnesses of the miracle. The time was not yet ripe for the fulfilment of his command: 'For there is nothing hidden that shall not be made known, and nothing has been kept secret but in order that it should be brought to light', 4:22.

781a VI 1-6 Jesus at Nazareth; cf. Mt 13:53-58; Lk 4:16-30—Commentators are not in agreement on the question whether Lk, which records a visit to Nazareth early in the Galilean ministry, deals with the same incident as Mk and Mt. It is difficult to understand how, in the course of a single visit, the people of Nazareth changed so suddenly from admiration of Christ's wisdom to scepticism and murderous hostility. A possible solution of the problem is that the accounts of two separate visits have been joined together. On the occasion of his first visit, Mt 4:13, Jesus was well received, Lk 4:16-22. But on this later occasion the atmosphere was less friendly. His townsmen were disappointed and jealous that Jesus had left Nazareth and favoured Capharnaum and other cities with his miracles. They refused to recognize the superiority or extraordinary mission of one who had grown up amongst them and, finally, tried to kill him, Lk 4:23-30.

1. 'His own country' (Gk 'His fatherland'), i.e. Nazareth; cf. 1:9, 24. In paying this visit to Nazareth Christ's purpose was to preach the kingdom of God. He was accompanied by the disciples who would have learned a useful lesson for their own ministry from the rejection of Christ by his townsmen. 2. The people of Nazareth were all the more astonished at Christ's wisdom because they knew that he had not attended a rabbinical school. 3. These questions reflect the change from admiration of Christ to scepticism and ill-will. He had returned to Nazareth with the reputation of a prophet and wonder-worker, but his townsmen took offence. Their attitude was that they knew his relatives and his own humble way of life too well to accept him as a divinely appointed teacher. 'The carpenter'. This is the only passage in the Gospels which reveals this fact of the hidden life of Christ. 'The son of Mary'. The form of the expression in Gk, ὁ υἱὸς τῆς Μαρίας, indicates that Jesus was the only son of Mary. 'Brother . . . sisters', cf. 3:31-35, § 729e. 4. Jesus answered the scepticism of the people of Nazareth with a proverb which is a particular application of the familiar truth that jealousy and familiarity create a prejudice against one who is well known. His words disclose the real reason for the offence they have taken at him and also affirm his own claim to be a prophet. 5. Christ's power to work miracles was not limited or lost, but faith, which his townsmen lacked, was normally demanded for the exercise of this power. 6. Christ's wonder was real; the attitude of his townsmen was something new in his human experience.

7-13 Mission of the Twelve; cf. Mt 10:1, 9, 11, 14; Lk 9:1-6—7. Christ had chosen the Twelve to be with him and that he might send them to preach, 3:14. They had been in his company for a considerable time, and as a further step in their preparation for the task which lay before them, 16:15-20, they are now directly associated with his personal ministry. In order to lend authority to their message of repentance, 12, Christ gave them power over the unclean spirits. 8-9. The meaning of these instructions is that they are to undertake their task in a spirit of complete detachment from material or personal considerations, with entire trust in divine providence. The verbal discrepancy between Mk, which allows a staff and sandals, and Mt and Lk, which forbid shoes and even a staff, does not affect the sense. 'Each one wished to convey that Christ had commanded the Apostles to take nothing more than was needed for immediate use', Maldonatus, Comment. on Mt 10:10. 10-11. When they have found hospitality in a respectable house the Apostles are to remain there. Changing from one house to another would lay them open to the charge of inconstancy and be likely to cause jealousies and contentions. By 'shaking the dust from their feet' they would signify the breaking off of relations and refusal to accept any further responsibility for people who had shown themselves unworthy; cf. Ac 13:51. 12-13. The proclamation of the message of repentance and the driving out of demons emphasize the spiritual character of the kingdom for which the preaching of the disciples is a preparation. 'Anointed with oil'. According to the Council of Trent (Sess. 14, c. 1, Dz 908), the Sacrament of Extreme Unction is 'insinuated' in this passage; cf. Jas 5:13 ff. Oil was commonly used at the time in the dressing of wounds, etc. Here, however, it is clear that there is question of an anointing which has results far beyond those customarily associated with ordinary medical treatment. It is probable that the Apostles were acting in accordance with a definite instruction of Christ. The anointing which they practised foreshadowed Extreme Unction in somewhat the same way as baptism by the Apostles during Christ's life, Jn 4:2, foreshadowed the Sacrament of Baptism.

14-16 Herod's Opinion about Jesus; cf. Mt 14:1 f.; Lk 9:7-9—14a. 'and he said'. According to another Gk reading, 'and people were saying'. Herod Antipas, 731e tetrarch of Galilee and Peraea, had undoubtedly heard of Christ before this, but the mission of the Twelve had created a stir throughout the whole country and speculation about Jesus was rife. While some were of opinion that he was the Baptist risen from the dead, others, recalling the teaching of the Scribes, Mk 9:10 f., thought it was Elias who had come to prepare for the Messias. Others regarded Christ as a prophet like one of the prophets of old. Herod's guilty conscience drove him to accept the opinion that the Baptist had risen from the dead.

f 17-29 The Death of the Baptist; cf. Mt 14:3-12; Lk 3:19 f.—Mark had previously referred to the arrest of the Baptist, 1:14. This account of the circumstances of his arrest and death is introduced here in order to explain Herod's statement. Herod had married a daughter of Aretas, king of the Nabataeans, but while on a journey to Rome became infatuated with Herodias the wife of Philip, a half-brother of his, who lived as a private citizen. When Herod's wife became aware of his intention to divorce her she fled to her father, while Herodias abandoned her husband and went to live with Herod. The Law, Lev 18:16; 20:21, expressly reprobated such a union, and John did not hesitate to denounce it. He thereby incurred the enmity of Herodias who 'nursed a grudge' against him, 19, and wanted to have him put to death. But she was forced to bide her time because 'Herod stood in awe of John . . . and protected him, and was greatly perplexed when he heard him, and still listened to him gladly', 20. The celebration of Herod's birthday with a banquet for 'the high officials, tribunes and chief men of Galilee', 21, gave Herodias her opportunity. Her daughter Salome, the child of her marriage to Philip, became the instrument of her evil designs. It was beneath the dignity of one of her rank to appear in the role of dancer at these festivities, but the performance was a pleasant novelty for guests accustomed to professional entertainers. Herod, evidently feeling obliged to show his appreciation in princely fashion, made an extravagant promise and rashly confirmed it with an oath. Herodias took full advantage of the situation, knowing that it would be difficult for Herod to reject even the outrageous request which Salome was instructed to make. Herod was grieved by it because of his esteem for John, but through shame before the guests and a superstitious fear of violating his oath 'he was unwilling to refuse her', 26. Thus the malice of Herodias finally triumphed over the weakness of Herod. According to Josephus (Ant. 18, 5, 2), the defeat which Herod subsequently sustained at the hands of Aretas was thought by many Jews to be a punishment for his treatment of the Baptist. 29. The place where the disciples buried the body of John is not known. In the 4th cent. the tomb of the Precursor was venerated near Samaria; cf. Theodoret, HE 3, 7.

g 30-44 Return of the Twelve and Feeding of the Five Thousand; cf. Mt 14:13-21; Lk 9:10-17; Jn 6:1-15—30-33. Mk here resumes the account of the Apostles' mission from which it digressed at 14. As a result of the activity of the Twelve, fresh throngs were coming to Christ so that the disciples 'had not time even to eat', 31. It was solicitude for the Apostles, not any fear of Herod's intentions, which prompted Christ to take them away by boat to an uninhabited place near Bethsaida, Lk 9:10, where they could rest from their labours. But the crowds saw from the shore the direction they had taken and, surmising their destination, followed on foot. Mk alone has the detail that the crowds had arrived before Christ and the disciples, 33b. 34-44. The Feeding of the Five Thousand is the only miracle recorded by all four evangelists. 34. Though the presence of the crowd ended the prospect of a period of rest, Jesus did not resent this nor seek to go elsewhere. He had pity on them 'because they were like sheep without a shepherd' (cf. Ez 34:5). Christ was the Messianic shepherd foretold by Ez 34:23, and in fulfilment of that role he began to give them instruction. They had been neglected by those whose duty it was to give them guidance. 37b. 'Are we to go and buy two hundred denarii worth of bread, and give them to eat?'

39. 'companies': συνάγαι, 'groups (of guests)'; 'green grass' is to be found in Palestine only in the spring. This indication of the time of year at which the miracle was performed agrees with John's statement that the Pasch was near, Jn 6:4. 40. 'ranks': ῥαβδία, garden-plots or flower-beds. The crowds when arranged in groups on the ground, which at this season would have had a rich carpet of flowers, looked like garden-plots in orderly arrangement. 41. 'blessed'. The usual formula of blessing was 'Blessed be Thou, Yahweh our God, King of the universe, who hast caused the earth to bring forth bread'. The multiplication of the loaves was a foreshadowing of the Eucharist and, together with the walking on the waters, 47-52, was a manifestation of power which made an admirable prelude to the Eucharistic discourse, Jn 6:26-72.

45-52 Jesus walks on the Waters; cf. Mt 14:22-33; Jn 6:16-21—45a. Jesus compelled the disciples to leave lest they should be carried away by the misguided enthusiasm of the crowds who wanted to make him king, Jn 6:14 f. The miracle just performed by Christ was of the spectacular kind which, according to popular expectation, would mark the coming of the Messias. 45b. 'to go ahead of him to the other side towards Bethsaida'. Bethsaida-Julias, near which the miracle had taken place, was on the north-eastern shore of the Lake. This text seems to mean that there was another Bethsaida on the western shore. But there is no historical or archaeological evidence to support this. If the point of departure of the disciples was on the south side of the small inlet near the place where the miracle took place, then the text can be explained without reference to the western shore or to a second Bethsaida. Lagrange (Saint Marc, 172) suggests that πρὸς Βηθσαϊδάν means 'opposite Bethsaida'. Some MSS omit 'to the other side'. 50. 'All saw him'. There was no possibility of an illusion, yet the disciples could not understand how Jesus was walking on the waters. 52. They had failed to appreciate the full significance of the miracle of the loaves in so far as it shed light on the person of Jesus. 'For their heart was blinded' (cf. 3:5); their understanding was dull. They lacked insight and penetration. Clearly the disciples were not witnesses whose imaginations were easily excited, and the value of their testimony is thereby enhanced.

53-56 Jesus returns to Gennesareth; cf. Mt 14:34-36

—53. 'Having crossed over, they reached land at Gennesareth and moored the boat'. The plain at the north-west of the Lake was called Gennesar. It was renowned for its fertility. 55-56. Once more we see the unbounded enthusiasm of the crowds as they bring their sick to be healed by Christ.

VII 1-23 Controversy on Rabbinical Traditions; cf. 732a

Mt 15:1-20—The Pharisees, 3:6, and Scribes, 3:22, had previously been discomfited by Christ, but they evidently thought that the failure of the disciples to perform the ritual washing of hands before eating provided a suitable opportunity for renewing their attack. 2. 'common' = defiled, ritually unclean. 'they found fault'. This phrase is not found in the majority of the MSS. 3-4. which are peculiar to Mk, give an explanation for the benefit of non-Jewish readers who would not understand why it should be considered blameworthy to eat with unwashed hands. The Pharisees were concerned not merely with the observance of the written regulations of the Mosaic Law concerning legal defilement, but also with the traditions of the ancients, interpretations of the written law and further regulations handed down by the Rabbis of the past. It was one of these rabbinical traditions, which the Pharisees regarded as no less binding than the Law itself, that the disciples had violated. 3. 'Often' πυκνά. A more probable reading is πληγμή = 'with the fist'. Some take this expression to mean 'vigorously, thoroughly': others interpret it as 'the finger-tips' or 'up to the elbow', signifying a ritual

732a washing. 4. 'And they do not eat what comes from the market without sprinkling it'. The phrase 'and of beds' is probably not authentic. All these rules concerning the legal cleanliness of persons, foods and vessels were part of the fence around the Law which had been erected in the post-exilic period. They were intended to secure unquestionable legal cleanliness. 5. The Pharisees and Scribes, while not directly charging Jesus with violations of the traditions of the ancients, imply that he is responsible for his disciples' conduct. 6-8. Jesus challenges the principle of these traditions and denounces the insincerity and hypocrisy which characterize the conduct of the Pharisees. The words in which Isaias, 29:13, denounced the insincerity of his contemporaries in their worship of God are applicable to Christ's opponents. In their eagerness to maintain traditions which had their origin in the opinions of earlier teachers, they neglect the essential obligations of God's law. 9-13. Here Christ gives an actual example of the way in which adherence to rabbinical tradition nullified God's law. The Fourth Commandment strictly commanded children to honour their parents, an obligation which undoubtedly included the duty of rendering them assistance when they were in need. But rabbinical casuistry made it possible for undutiful children to evade their duty to parents under the pretence of respect for tradition. 11-13. 'But you say, if a man say to his father or mother, "Whatever help you might have had from me is Corban" (that is a gift to God), you no longer allow him to do anything for his father or mother, nullifying the word of God by your tradition'. The Hebrew word 'Corban' meant a 'gift' or 'offering', especially a gift dedicated to God. To declare that something was 'Corban' meant that it was dedicated to God and, therefore, withdrawn from profane uses. From this lawful practice of dedicating things to God a grave abuse had arisen. People pronounced the word Corban to signify that they would not do something which was perfectly lawful or even obligatory. The Talmud gives examples of such 'Corban' oaths or vows, e.g. 'Corban, if thou wilt have any advantage from me', i.e. I swear that thou wilt not have any assistance from me. According to rabbinical tradition, such an oath or vow was binding, even though the course of action to which person bound himself was contrary to the Law of God. Thus an undutiful child who said to a parent, 'Corban, if thou wilt have any assistance from me' (cf. 7:11) was regarded as bound not to assist them. In this way the Pharisees nullified the precept of the Decalogue by their tradition. It was absurd that they should criticize the disciples for infraction of a merely human tradition concerning legal defilement.

b 14-23 True Principles concerning Defilement—14-16. Christ summoned the crowd and invited them to pay serious attention to his words. In 15 he states the fundamental principle that real defilement, moral defilement, is not caused by externals such as food, but by what comes from within, 20-23. The first part of this statement, 15a, was easy to understand in the light of the case which had been challenged by the Pharisees. But the second part, 15b, was not so easy to grasp—the disciples do not appear to have understood it—because 'the things that come from within a man' might have referred to sources of defilement such as leprosy. 17-23. Here Jesus sets forth clearly, in answer to the disciples, the meaning of the statement in 15. 18-19. Food, like other externals, cannot of itself defile a man morally. It does not enter into or contaminate the seat of man's moral life. Making (declaring) all foods clean. This is a parenthesis inserted by Mark to explain the significance of Christ's words. His teaching means that the distinction between clean and unclean foods is abrogated. This was a radical change for persons accustomed to the Mosaic Law and Pharisaic tradition. It was only gradually that the full implications of Christ's teaching were grasped; cf. Ac 10:9-16, 28; 11:1-10. 20-23. The heart, as the seat of moral life, is the source whence proceed the evil thoughts and affections which cause moral defilement. 'From here the new law according to the spirit takes its beginning' (Catena in 732b Marc.).

24-30 The Syrophenician Woman; cf. Mt 15:21-28 d
—This was one of the few occasions on which Christ went outside Palestine. The district of Tyre and Sidon, part of ancient Phoenicia, now belonged to the Roman province of Syria. The population was pagan, and though the report of Christ's miracles had reached there, 3:8, it does not appear that it was his intention to preach the Gospel in the district. He may have wished to proceed quietly with the instruction of the disciples. 24. 'Coasts': ὅρια = 'districts', 'territories'. 27-28. The 'children' represent the Jews to whom Christ's personal mission extended; cf. Mt 15:24. The 'dogs' represent the Gentiles. The comparison is based on a familiar domestic scene, but the woman was probably well aware of the contempt which Jews had for the Gentiles and their gods. It is not certain that at the time of Christ the Gentiles were called dogs by the Jews. With profound humility and understanding she turned the image to her advantage—her request was only for a crumb of consolation, something which would not be missed from the rich feast offered to the Jews. 29-30. Christ granted her request as a reward of her strong faith and deep humility.

31-37 The Cure of a Deaf-Mute—This incident is recorded only by Mark whose account is again characterized by vivid touches suggesting the story of an eyewitness. 31. Jesus had been in the Decapolis previously, 5:20, and his fame had been spread there by the man whom he had freed from diabolical possession. 32. 'Dumb': μωχλῶλος = 'speaking with difficulty', 'with an impediment of speech'. 33. 'Taking him aside from the crowd'. In the exercise of his miraculous powers Jesus avoided ostentation. His humility in this respect was a contrast to the pretensions of false messiahs who sought to win the favour of the people by extravagant promises of miraculous deeds. The prevalent misconceptions of the nature of Messianic salvation explain the measure of silence and secrecy with which Christ sought to veil his miracles and his own identity at the beginning of his ministry. In the present instance there was an additional reason. The gestures employed by Christ in curing this man were very appropriate to the cure which he was about to perform. But pagans might have mistaken their significance and have interpreted them as part of a magical rite. Some consider that the purpose of these gestures was to arouse in the man the faith required from those who sought the benefit of Christ's power. Jesus could have cured this man by a word, even at a distance, cf. Mt 8:8-13, but the actions performed in this case place in clear light the efficacious participation of his humanity in his miracles. This would not be so clear if he had cured the man by a mere word. 34. 'Ephpheta': ἐφφαθά is a transcription of the Aramaic form 'ephtah = 'etp'tah = 'Be thou opened'. Here again Mk gives the Aramaic word spoken by our Lord. 36. The command of silence emphasizes the humility of Christ. He knew, of course, that the command would not be obeyed, but the disciples would have learned from Christ's example the lesson that they were not to seek personal renown from the exercise of the powers that they would enjoy. 37. The crowds in their enthusiasm apply to Christ the words of Isaias, 35:5 f., concerning the Messianic age.

VIII 1-9 Feeding of Four Thousand; cf. Mt 15:32-39 f
—This second multiplication of the loaves and fishes appears to have taken place while Jesus was still in the Decapolis. Many critical writers assert that there was only a single multiplication and that this second account is simply a recension of the earlier one, 6:34-44. It is quite clear, however, that the evangelist intended to tell of two distinct incidents; cf. 8:19 f. The general resemblance between the two accounts is not surprising, and there are important points of difference. This miracle was performed in the wilderness, while the first took place near Bethsaida-Julias with towns and villages nearby. Here it is Christ himself who takes the initiative, whereas previously it was 732f the disciples who suggested that the crowds should be sent away. There is also a difference in the numbers of those who were fed, the number of the loaves and fishes and the number of baskets of fragments which were left over. It is urged that the attitude of the disciples as expressed by their question 'Whence can anyone fill them with bread here in the wilderness?' is difficult to explain if they knew of an earlier multiplication. It must be remembered, however, that a considerable time had elapsed since the first multiplication and that it had not been the practice of Christ to work miracles to meet the everyday needs of the people. Clearly it was only by a miracle that the crowds could be fed. The question of the disciples, in effect, leaves the matter in the hands of Christ.

g 10-12 The Pharisees ask for a Sign from Heaven; cf. Mt 15:39-16:4; Lk 11:16, 29-32; Mt 12:38-42; Lk 12:54-56—10. Dalmanutha is not otherwise known. In Mt 15:39 the best Gk MSS read 'Magadan'. No satisfactory identification of either place has been put forward. The presence of the Pharisees suggests that the incident in 11 took place on the western shore; cf. 13. It is possible that there is some corruption in the form of the name; cf. RB 53 (1946) 372-84. 11. In asking for a sign from heaven the Pharisees had in mind some striking manifestation like the manna, Ex 16:12 ff., or the fire which fell from heaven, 3 Kg 18:22 ff. Such a sign, because of its unquestionable divine origin, would provide a dramatic confirmation of Christ's claims. It was commonly believed that the coming of the Messiah would be accompanied by some outstanding sign of this kind. 'tempting him': 'putting him to the test'. The demand of the Pharisees was not prompted by a sincere desire for enlightenment. They had become the enemies of Christ because he acted independently of them and opposed their assertions. They had even attributed his miracles to the power of Satan. But they saw clearly that Christ was claiming to be an envoy from God, and now seek to put his claim to the test. 12. Christ sighed because he knew of the evil intention of the Pharisees. If they had been men of goodwill they would not have needed any other or more dramatic signs than the miracles which Christ had already performed. He refused to grant a sign such as they sought. If he had granted it, some of them would still have remained unconvinced. Moreover, a sign of this kind would have encouraged false Messianic hopes, whereas Christ wished them to prepare their hearts for the kingdom.

h 13-21 The Leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod; cf. Mt 16:5-12; Lk 12:1-14. It was a normal precaution to take provisions when crossing over to the eastern shore of the Lake of Galilee. 15. The Jews regarded the fermentation caused by leaven as a kind of corruption. For this reason leaven was removed from their homes during paschal time. The Law forbade the inclusion of leaven in some of the offerings made in the temple, Lev 2:11. Christ here uses the word 'leaven' in the metaphorical sense of a principle of moral corruption; cf. 1 Cor 5:6 ff.; Gal 5:9. The leaven of the Pharisees was hypocrisy, Lk 12:1. They were extremely concerned with the externals of religion but neglected the essential interior spirit. The leaven of Herod was the spirit of worldliness, preoccupation with pleasure and political ambitions. 16-21. The disciples failed to understand Christ's warning, and thought that he was referring to their failure to bring provisions. Christ took them to task for their slowness in comprehending the significance of the wonderful events which they had witnessed. His words were a reminder that they should have learned by now to trust him, even for their material needs. Mark's insistence on the disciples' lack of understanding (cf. 6:52) is a noteworthy confirmation of the reliability of the Gospel. The evangelist makes no attempt to present a flattering picture of Peter and the other Apostles by omitting mention of their faults and weaknesses.

i 22-26 Cure of a Blind Man at Bethsaida—This incident is recorded only by Mk. As he had done previously in the case of the deaf-mute, 7:31-37, Jesus takes the blind man aside, performs a certain ritual and forbids divulgation, 26. The reasons for secrecy are presumably the same as in the former instance. Christ performed both miracles out of compassion, and did not wish to give any occasion for misunderstanding about the nature of his mission. 24. 'And as he began to see he said, "I see men; for I see them as trees, (but) walking"'. Evidently the man had not been blind from birth. Various explanations have been put forward for the fact that Christ performed this cure slowly and by degrees. Some hold that the degree of healing corresponded to the man's faith in Christ. It is probable that Christ meant to teach a lesson to the disciples. They were to learn that spiritual enlightenment is usually a gradual process. It had been so in the case of the disciples themselves, and it would be thus also with those to whom they would preach the Gospel. The disciples could hardly have failed to see the Messianic significance of healing the eyes of the blind; cf. Is 35:5.

27-33 Peter's Confession: Prediction of the Passion and Resurrection; cf. Mt 16:13-23; Lk 9:18-22—Caesarea Philippi was a new city built by Philip the tetrarch on the site of the ancient Paneas, near the sources of the Jordan. In this pagan district Christ was away from the malicious intrigues and demands of the Pharisees, and could discuss freely with the disciples the fundamental question of his own identity and mission. 27-28. The opinions about Christ correspond to the rumours which circulated at the court of Herod, 6:14-16. Those among the crowds who had formerly thought of Jesus as the Messiah, Jn 6:14 f., may have abandoned the idea because he refused to manifest himself as the conquering Messiah of popular expectation. 29. Peter makes a clear confession that Jesus is the Messiah. Neither Mk nor Lk give the additional phrase, 'Son of the living God', nor do they report the promise of the Primacy to Peter. The silence of Mk on the latter point is due to dependence on Peter whose humility prompted him to omit from his preaching matters which brought honour to himself (Eusebius PG 22, 217). 31. This prediction of the Passion and Resurrection was intended as a corrective to false ideas of a triumphant Messiah. Now that the disciples firmly believed that Jesus was the Messiah, it was necessary that they should understand that he was a suffering Messiah (cf. Is 53) who would be rejected by the leaders of the Jews. 32-33. Peter understood the meaning of this word which Christ 'spoke openly', but he was obviously taken aback by the prediction of the fate of Jesus at the hands of the Jews, and 'began to remonstrate with him'. He was rebuked by Christ because his protest showed that his thoughts were out of harmony with the divine plan. It was God's will that the Messiah should suffer. 'Satan': 'adversary'.

34-39 How to be a Follower of Christ; cf. Mt 16:24-28; Lk 9:23-27; Jn 12:25—The teaching of this section is closely connected with what has gone before. As the Son of Man must suffer, so also must those who take him as their leader. 34. 'Deny himself': treat himself as a stranger, renouncing his own interests. 'Take up his cross': the disciple must be ready to face even death by crucifixion. 35-36 explain why the disciple must be prepared to sacrifice even life itself. 'Life' and 'soul' translate the same word ψυχή, which can mean life, soul, oneself. In the context there is an underlying antithesis between physical life and the life of the soul. The person who sacrifices his life for the sake of Christ will secure the eternal life of the soul. To have saved one's life, or even to have gained everything that this world can offer, is of no avail if eternal life has been lost. 37. Nothing that a man may gain in this world will enable him to buy the life of the soul; once that has been lost in death, man has no means or power to redeem it. The Pontifical Biblical Commission replied in the negative to the question whether it was lawful to assert that the words of Christ found 738b in Mt 16:26 and Lk 9:25 (cf. Mk 8:36 f.) in the literal sense do not refer to the eternal salvation of the soul, but merely the temporal life of man; see § 52h. 38. Whoever refuses to follow Christ because of the sacrifices which this involves, shows thereby that he is ashamed of Christ and his doctrine. At the day of Judgement Christ will disown those who have been ashamed to follow him. 39 (Gk 9:1). From here to the end of ch 9 the verse numbers in the Vulgate differ by one from the numbers in the Gk text. The opening words 'And he said to them' are a transition formula and indicate that 39 is an independent statement not closely connected with 38. 39b. until they see the kingdom of God come (ἐληλυθῆναι: established) with power; cf. Mt 16:28 'until they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom'; Lk 9:27 'until they see the kingdom of God'. The coming of the kingdom in power is not to be understood as the Parousia, when Christ will come as the Supreme Judge 'in the glory of the Father with the holy angels', 38; cf. Mt 25:31 ff. None of the features usually associated with the coming of Christ in final judgement on the world is mentioned here. Neither can the coming of the kingdom be explained satisfactorily as a reference to the Transfiguration, Resurrection or Pentecost. These events belonged to the immediate future, but the words 'there are some standing here who shall not taste death' etc., point to a more remote period. Christ was speaking of a striking manifestation of power related to the establishment of his kingdom on earth. If he had one particular manifestation in mind, it is probable that the destruction of Jerusalem was the event in question. It marked the end of the ancient economy. Together with the expansion of the Church through preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, 'God adding his testimony by signs and wonders and manifold deeds of power, and impartings of the Holy Spirit, according to his will', Heb 2:4, it constituted a striking proof that God had established his kingdom 'in power' on earth; cf. Feuillet, NRT 71 (1949) 709-15.

d IX 1-7 The Transfiguration; cf. Mt 17:1-8; Lk 9:28-36-1-2. This is the only place, outside the Passion narrative, where Mark gives a precise indication of the date. The six days are counted from Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi which is now confirmed by the events at the Transfiguration. The same three Apostles were present at the raising of the daughter of Jairus and were also with Christ at the Agony. A tradition coming from the 4th cent. identifies the high mountain as Tabor in Galilee. 'Transfigured': μεταμορφώθη, 'transformed'. The glory of the divinity which was normally veiled is allowed to shine forth. The Apostles are made 'eye-witnesses of his majesty', 2 Pet 1:16, 'we saw his glory', Jn 1:14; cf. Phil 2:6 f. Even Christ's garments shared in the radiance proceeding from the glory of his divine Person. 3. Moses and Elias represent the Law and the Prophets. By their presence they testify to the continuity and harmony between the Old Dispensation and the New Covenant inaugurated by Christ who had come 'not to destroy the Law or the Prophets . . . but to fulfil', Mt 5:17. 4-5. 'It is well that we are here': the exact purport of the phrase is uncertain. Peter may have thought that this vision was the beginning of the glorious reign of the Messias. In his confusion and eagerness he offered to provide three huts for Christ, Moses and Elias. 6. The voice of the Father, coming from the cloud which is the external manifestation of God's presence (cf. Ex 16:10; 19:9, 16), repeats the declaration made at the Baptism, Mk 1:11. This is the culminating point of Mark's Gospel. 'Hear him': henceforth they owe obedience to Christ, not to the Law and the Prophets which have rendered testimony to him through Moses and Elias. The Transfiguration of Christ, together with the appearance of Moses and Elias and the declaration by the Father, was a confirmation of all that Christ had taught them concerning his own Person and his relation to the Old Law. It was undoubtedly intended to strengthen the faith of 738d the Apostles and to prepare them for the trials of the Passion. According to Leo the Great (PL 54, 310) the chief purpose of the Transfiguration was to remove the scandal of the Cross from the hearts of the disciples. 'He reveals his glory so that they may no longer be distressed by their own death or the death of the Master'. (Catena in Marc.)

8-12 The Return of Elias; cf. Mt 17:9-13-8-9. The command of silence was particularly necessary here because this manifestation of Christ's glory would have made it all the more difficult to understand the prediction of his sufferings. After the Resurrection all these things would be seen in proper perspective. 10. According to a belief based on Mal 4:5 f. Elias was to come before the Messias to prepare for him; cf. Justin, Dial. c. Tryph. 49. But they have now seen Elias come after Christ, not before him, and he has disappeared without carrying out the expected preparation for the Messias. 11-12. '[If] Elias comes first and restores all things, and [then] how is it written of the Son of Man that he must suffer many things and be despised? But I say to you that Elias has come, and they did to him what they would, as it is written of him'. The majority of ancient commentators concluded from this passage that the prophet Elias in person will return before the second coming of Christ; cf. Skrinjar, VD 14 (1934) 361-7. It is difficult however, to maintain this interpretation in view of Christ's statements that Elias has come, 13, and that John the Baptist is 'Elias who is to come', Mt 11:13 f. Moreover, we are told that the disciples understood that the Elias of whom Christ spoke was the Baptist, Mt 17:13. It seems more satisfactory to take the opening phrase 'Elias comes first' etc. as a concessive clause. Christ grants that the Scriptures speak of the coming of Elias, but they also foretell the sufferings of the Messias (cf. Is 53; Ps 22). If it were true that Elias in person was to come and restore everything in preparation for the coming of the Messias, how then explain that the Messias should suffer? The fact is that the precursor of the Messias foretold by Scripture has already come in the person of John the Baptist, who is figuratively called Elias; 'and he will go before him in the spirit and power of Elias', Lk 1:17. The restoration which he carried out in preparation for the Messias did not save him from sufferings similar to those which befell Elias, his prophetic prototype; cf. 3 Kg chh 17-19. Similarly, all that has been foretold about the Messias must be fulfilled. His mission must be understood in the light of the prophecies concerning his sufferings.

13-28 Cure of a Possessed Boy; cf. Mt 17:14-21; Lk 9:37-43—Here again it is noteworthy that the narrative of Mk is much more detailed than the accounts of the other Synoptics. 13. The dispute with the Scribes was about the failure of the disciples to cure the boy. 17. 'dasheth him': 'casts him down'. The symptoms of the boy's illness correspond to those of epilepsy. In Mt 17:15 his condition is described by the word σκληνύσκειται which was in common use to designate epilepsy. But it is clear from Christ's words, 24 f., that the boy was also possessed by the demon. 18. The complaint uttered by Christ applied to all present. All of them, in different degrees, were lacking in faith. 19. 'troubled him': 'threw him into convulsions'. 20-23. This further description of the boy's state is found only in Mk. 22. 'If thou canst believe': lit. 'This if thou canst', i.e. 'as for being able'. The phrase refers back to 'If thou canst', 21. 23. The father realizes the imperfect nature of his faith but appeals to Jesus to help him nonetheless. 25. 'Greatly tearing him': 'throwing him into violent convulsions'. 27-28. The power of casting out demons which the disciples had received did not operate after the fashion of magic. Christ expelled demons by a simple command because of his divine power. The disciples had failed to cast out this demon because they relied excessively on themselves, forgetting that they were only instruments of divine power. They should have recourse to God in prayer, with faith, 733f Mt 17:18-20, and humility. 28. 'This kind': it is uncertain whether this means demons in general or a particular class of demons whom it is especially difficult to expel. 'and fasting': these words are missing from a few important MSS.

734a 29-31 The Second Prediction of the Passion; cf. Mt 17:22 f.; Lk 9:44 f.—The Galilean ministry is now at an end and the last journey to Jerusalem about to begin. 30. Jesus avoided the crowds 'for he was instructing his disciples'. The renewed prediction of the Passion was necessary because this was an aspect of the role of the Messiah which the disciples found it difficult to understand. Like the doctrine of the necessity for personal sacrifices by the followers of Christ, it did not accord with popular expectations.

b 32-36 Jesus Checks the Ambition of the Disciples; cf. Mt 18:1-5; Lk 9:46-48—This and the succeeding sections to 9:49 give instructions on a variety of topics without any strict logical sequence. It is not necessary to hold that all were spoken in the same circumstances. 32-33. The discussion among the disciples may have arisen from the promise of the Primacy made to Peter a short time previously, Mt 16:18 f. 34. Christ sets before them the ideal of humble and devoted service of which he himself had given the example; cf. Lk 22:24-27; Jn 13:13-15. In his kingdom selfish ambition for preferment is out of place. Greatness in the kingdom will be estimated not by the distinction of high position, but by the degree of devoted service. 35-36. The child represents the humble and unimportant among those whom the disciples will be called to serve. Whoever receives such little ones with kindness for Christ's sake, receives Christ and the Father who sent him. If humble service brings so great a reward, ambition for the highest places in the kingdom is misplaced. Mk alone mentions that Christ embraced the child.

e 37-39 Use of the Name of Jesus; cf. Lk 9:49 f.—37. The phrase 'in my name', 36, probably recalled to John's mind the incident of the man who was casting out devils in the name of Jesus and had been ordered by the disciples to desist because he did not belong to their group. Jesus disapproves of their action and recommends a more tolerant attitude. One who performs miracles in Christ's name thereby recognizes Christ's authority, and is unlikely to speak ill of him. The dispositions and faith of such a person may be imperfect, but his miracles are a commendation of Christ and his teaching. Unlike the Scribes and Pharisees who were irreconcilable in their opposition, he is making common cause with the disciples. 40-41. Here Christ returns to the theme of 36. The smallest service rendered to the disciples because they are Christ's followers, will not go unrewarded. But whoever scandalizes those who believe in Christ, especially children, will incur a dreadful punishment.

d 42-48 Avoidance of Scandal; cf. Mt 18:6-9; 5:29 f.; Lk 17:1 f.—The followers of Christ are to avoid causing scandal to others, and they must also be prepared to sacrifice anything which is a cause of scandal to themselves. The hand, foot and eye represent particularly dear possessions. But nothing, however precious or useful, is to be spared if it is a cause of scandal. 'Life', 42, 44, is identified with 'the kingdom of God' in 46. This is the true, eternal life which the just will attain as a reward for faithful service. The place of punishment is the hell of unquenchable fire, yéeva, Gehenna. The Gk word is formed from the Aramaic Ge-hinnam = the valley of Hinnom. This was the name of the valley to the south of Jerusalem where at one time children were offered in sacrifice to Moloch, Jer 7:31. Later it was made the dumping ground for the refuse of the city. The fire which burned there constantly and the worms which fed on the refuse became symbols of the torments inflicted on the wicked, and in the apocalyptic literature the name Gehinnom was applied to the place where the wicked were punished; cf. 4 Esdras 2:29; Enoch 27:2. In Is 66:24, which is quoted in 47, the prophet alludes to Gehinnom as a symbol of the place of condemnation where rebels against God are punished; cf. Kissane, Book of Isaiah, 2, 327 f. 48a. 'For everyone shall be salted with fire'. Some take this phrase closely with 47 and interpret it in the sense that the fire of hell preserves as well as punishes. It has power to preserve, like salt, so that those who go to hell will not be destroyed by the fire, but will be punished for ever. Others take this verse as the conclusion to 42-47. The words 'salted with fire' refer to the purifying effect of the voluntary renunciations and sacrifices made by the disciples who will be like acceptable sacrificial offerings which have been sprinkled with salt, Lev 2:13. 48b. Critical editions of the text omit 'and every victim shall be salted with salt' as a gloss. 49a. Similar expressions are to be found in Mt 5:13; Lk 14:34. Salt is used to season and preserve foods, but if it should lose its saltiness it is no longer of any use. 49b. This final admonition links up with the dispute among the Apostles. The imagery is based on the idea of salt as seasoning and as a symbol of friendship. A 'covenant of salt' meant a perpetual covenant, Num 18:19; 2 Par 13:5. If the disciples have within them the salt of the true Christian spirit, they will be at peace with one another. They will not dispute about the highest places. This was all the more necessary in those who are the 'salt of the earth', Mt 5:13, as their example would influence so many others.

X 1-XIII 37 Journey towards Jerusalem and Last Ministry in Jerusalem. 735a

X 1 Ministry in Judaea and Peraea; cf. Mt chh 19-20; Lk 9:51-18:34—'And departing thence he came into the region of Judaea and beyond the Jordan'. This mention of a journey into Judaea and Peraea is probably to be understood as a general reference to a period of missionary activity which took place in the interval between the end of the Galilean ministry and Christ's arrival in Jerusalem for the Pasch at which he was put to death. The visits to Jerusalem for the feasts of Tabernacles, Jn 7:14, and Dedication, Jn 10:22, may belong to this period. For some time Christ had concentrated on the instruction of the disciples, but now he resumes the teaching of the multitudes as formerly.

2-12 The Question of Divorce; cf. Mt 19:3-12; b 5:31 f.; Lk 16:18—Mk's account differs from Mt in two main points; he omits the words 'for every cause', Mt 19:3b, from the Pharisees' question, 2, and also the clause 'except it be for fornication', Mt 19:9, from Christ's reply, 11. The reason for the omission is presumably that these phrases referred to matters which were primarily of interest to Jews and would scarcely be intelligible to Gentile readers. 2. The Mosaic Law, Deut 24:1-4, permitted a man to divorce his wife 'if she did not find favour in his eyes because he found in her a shameful thing'. If a man decided to repudiate his wife, the Law commanded him to give her a 'bill of divorce'. The marriage was then regarded as dissolved, and both parties were free to contract new marriages. But though all Jews agreed that divorce was allowed, they differed in their interpretation of the 'shameful thing' (Heb. ervat dābār) which justified a man in repudiating his wife. According to Shammai, adultery was the only legal cause. Hillel and his school allowed divorce for far less serious reasons. The Pharisees, probably having some knowledge of Christ's views, hoped to force him into open contradiction of the Mosaic Law. 3-5. Jesus knew their evil intention and asked what Moses had commanded. Actually Moses had merely permitted divorce, but had commanded that the woman who was repudiated should be given a bill of divorce which would regularize her position. This legislation did not grant the Hebrews the right to repudiate as a privilege. It simply tolerated an abuse which was due to their evil dispositions. Divorce did not correspond to the primitive institution of marriage. 6-9. God's will in regard to marriage and divorce is shown in the primitive institution of marriage as recorded in Gen 1:27;

- 785b 2:24. Man and woman united in marriage are linked by bonds as real and permanent as those which unite members of the same family. Divorce, therefore, is contrary to God's law. 10-12. Here, in answer to the disciples, who were naturally surprised by teaching contrary to that which all Jews accepted, Jesus reaffirms that neither partner is set free through divorce to marry again. Husband and wife are on an equal footing in this respect. According to Jewish law it was only the husband who had the right to initiate divorce proceedings. In Roman law, at the time of Christ, the wife had the same right as the husband; cf. J. Bonsirven, Le Divorce dans le Nouveau Testament (Tournai 1948); U. Holzmeister, Bi 26 (1945) 133-46.
- e 13-16 Jesus blesses the Children; cf. Mt 19:13-15; Lk 18:15-17—Mk alone mentions that Jesus was indignant with the disciples. They probably thought that by keeping away the children and their mothers they would save him from an intrusion which would interfere with the more important work of teaching. 14-15. The simple confidence and docility natural to the child must be possessed, as the result of deliberate choice, by all those who seek to enjoy the blessings of the kingdom of God. 16. As in 9:35, Mark is the only evangelist who mentions that Jesus embraced the children.
- d 17-22 The Rich Young Man; cf. Mt 19:16-22; Lk 18:18-23—17-18. It would seem that this man was impressed by the preceding incident and now wants to know what conditions he must fulfil in order to have a share in the kingdom. The expression 'receive life everlasting' (cf. 9:42, 44, 46; 10:30) corresponds to 'enter the kingdom', 15, and probably refers to membership of the kingdom on earth as well as to enjoyment of the eternal reward of the just. 'Why callest thou me good? No one is good but God alone'. These words are not a disavowal of a claim to divinity. According to many commentators, Christ intended by them to give a hint of his divine nature. It was not the custom of the time to add the epithet 'good' to the title 'Master' (Rabbi, Teacher). God alone is the absolute good. If Jesus deserves the title 'Good Master', it is because he is more than a merely human teacher. Others hold that Jesus did not intend by these words to suggest anything about his own divinity. He answered in accordance with the state of mind of this enquirer who had come to him as to an outstanding human teacher. The flattering title by which he was addressed gave Jesus an opportunity of turning the man's thoughts to God, the supreme good and source of all goodness, to whom all honour is due; cf. Catena in Marc. 21. 'Jesus fixed his gaze upon him and loved him'. This detail is found only in Mk and again points to an eye-witness as the source of the evangelist's information. The man was good and sincere, but it was still possible for him to aim higher by carrying out a counsel of perfection. Renunciation of worldly goods would be compensated by treasure in heaven. 22. 'He shows him that the reward is great, and great indeed is the recompense for following him' (Catena in Marc.). 'His face fell at the saying and he departed in grief'. His attachment to his possessions was such that he was not prepared to make the sacrifice proposed by Christ.
- e 23-27 The Danger of Riches; cf. Mt 19:23-26; Lk 18:24-27—These verses forcibly point the moral of the preceding incident. 23-24. 'With what difficulty shall they who have riches' etc. The repetition of this pronouncement, which amazed the disciples, leaves no room for doubt about the meaning and the importance of Christ's statement. Riches are not evil in themselves, but man has only a stewardship of this world's goods. Undue attachment to wealth is a form of idolatry and inconsistent with true service of God. 'You cannot serve God and mammon', Mt 6:24. 25. The paradoxical expression 'a camel passing through the eye of a needle' may have been a proverbial phrase signifying an impossibility. The Talmud has a similar expression—'an elephant passing through the eye of a needle'. 26-27. The disciples understood that Christ was speaking literally of an impossibility. But what is humanly impossible does not exceed the power of God. With the aid of grace, and by attaching himself to God as the supreme good, the rich man can be saved.

28-31 The Reward of those who leave all to follow Christ; cf. Mt 19:27-30; Lk 18:28-30—28. Peter's question follows naturally from the incident of the rich man and the subsequent statements of Christ. It seems to invite approval of the action of the disciples in abandoning everything to follow Christ. 29-30. A twofold reward is promised to those who have abandoned earthly interests and family ties 'for the sake of Christ and the Gospel': first, 'a hundred-fold now in this time . . . with persecutions'; second, 'in the world to come life everlasting'. The clause 'with persecutions' shows that the hundred-fold recompense in this life is not to be understood in terms of earthly happiness. According to St Jerome (PL 26, 139), the meaning of the hundred-fold reward is that whoever abandons fleshly things for Christ's sake will receive a spiritual recompense whose value by comparison with earthly things is as a hundred to a small number. A more satisfactory explanation would appear to be that Christ had in mind the spiritual kinship and the bond of charity which unites all those who make the sacrifices demanded from every true disciple; cf. 8:34-38. The true follower of Christ acquires a new kindred far more numerous than those whom he may have abandoned for the sake of Christ and the Gospel. In this new relationship, dominated by charity, all are 'brothers', Mt 23:8, and 'children of God', Jn 1:12; Ac 2:44; 4:32. The recompense granted in this life does not, however, exclude suffering and persecution at the hands of men. Christ foretold that his followers would suffer for his name's sake, that they would be hated because they belong to him; cf. Mt 5:11; 10:24; Lk 6:22; Jn 13:16; 15:19. 31. Some take this as a warning to the Apostles, who are now in the first places because they have left all things to follow Christ, lest through presumption they should fall to the lowest places hereafter. More probably, however, the 'first' are those who, judged by the world's standards, hold the highest places in this life, the rich, Pharisees, members of the Sanhedrin. Hereafter, these will be in the lowest places, while the Apostles, who are of no account in the world's estimation, will take the highest places.

32-34 Third Prediction of the Passion; cf. Mt 20:17-19; Lk 18:31-34—32b. 'And Jesus was walking before them, and they were dismayed, and those who followed were afraid'. Here we have a vivid picture of Christ going forward resolutely to face the sufferings which awaited him in Jerusalem. Mark is the only evangelist who mentions the dismay of the disciples and the fear of those who were accompanying Christ. 33-34. This prediction of the Passion is more detailed than the earlier ones, 8:31; 9:30. The statement that the Son of Man would be handed over to the Gentiles and put to death implies that he would die by crucifixion. But the assurance of final triumph is contained in the words 'after three days he shall rise again'. These predictions of the Passion, though disconcerting for the disciples, put the doctrine of the suffering Messiah clearly before them. Later, the fulfilment of these prophecies in Christ's Passion and Resurrection confirmed their faith.

35-40 The Request of James and John; cf. Mt 20:20-23—35-37. The request of the disciples was made through their mother, according to Mt. Their petition was for the highest places in the kingdom next to Christ. Despite his teaching about the Passion and the sacrifices which would be demanded from his followers, 8:34-38, they did not appreciate fully the place of sufferings in the Messianic kingdom. 38. The metaphorical expression 'drink the cup' could signify either joy or affliction. In this context it obviously refers to the endurance of suffering. 'Baptism': lit. 'immersion'. This metaphor conveys the idea of 735h being overwhelmed by sorrows. 39-40. James and John will be associated with the sufferings of Christ, but it is not part of his mission as Messiah to assign places in the kingdom. These are assigned in accordance with the eternal decree of the Father. As Messiah, the capacity in which he had been approached by the two brothers, Jesus carries out the decrees of the Father—he does not alter them. 40b. 'To you': these words are not authentic, and should be omitted.

41-45 The Obligation of Service by those in Authority; cf. Mt 20:24-28; Lk 22:24-27-41. The other Apostles were annoyed by the pretensions of James and John. Jesus took the opportunity of teaching the Twelve the lesson of humble service of those whom they would rule. 42-44. 'You know that those who are regarded as rulers of the Gentiles lord it over them, and their great ones domineer over them'. The Apostles will have authority in the Church, but in the exercise of that authority they are not to imitate rulers and high officials who rule tyrannically and arbitrarily in their own interest. Rather they should make the service of those entrusted to them the ideal of their office. In that way they will imitate 'the Son of Man who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister'. 45b. 'to give his life a ransom for many'. In these words Christ states the purpose and redemptive value of his death. The use of λύτρον in profane Gk and in LXX confirms the translation 'ransom', e.g. the price paid for the redemption of a slave. The death of Christ, therefore, is like the price paid to redeem from slavery. The slavery in question is slavery to sin. Christ's sufferings and death are an expiation of the sins of men. 'for many': ἀντι πολλῶν 'instead of many'. The preposition ἀντι conveys the idea of substitution; Jesus pays the price of redemption for 'many' who are unable to pay it themselves. 'Many' is here used as a contrast to the One, the Son of Man, who suffers for the multitude. No one is excluded from the benefit of his redemptive sacrifice; cf. 14:24. There is a clear connexion between these words of Christ and the teaching of Isaiah concerning the sufferings of the Servant of Yahweh, Is 52:13-53:12.

46-52 Cure of the Blind Man Bartimeus; cf. Mt 20:29-34; Lk 18:35-43—Mk again excels in its vivid presentation of the incident. 46. 'And as he went out of Jericho'. Mk and Mt agree in saying that this miracle was performed as Jesus was leaving Jericho, while Lk states that it took place when he was drawing near Jericho. The explanation of the discrepancy is that Mk and Mt are referring to the ancient city conquered by Josue, through which Jesus had just passed, while Lk is speaking of the new Jericho built by Herod, in which Christ was about to be received by Zacchaeus. The miracle was performed on the way between these two places; cf. Ketter, Bi 15 (1934) 411-18. Bartimeus means 'son of Timeus'. Mk records the name probably because the man was known in the Christian community. 47. 'Son of David' was the most widely used title of the Messiah; cf. 12:35-37; Jn 7:42. It was a title which recalled the promises made to David, 2 Kg 7:8-16. 51. 'Rabboni' = My Rabbi (Master); cf. Jn 20:16. 52. 'Thy faith has saved thee': this statement refers primarily to the restoration of the man's sight, but he was probably also granted the light of salvation, for 'he accompanied him [Jesus] on the way'.

736a XI 1-11 The Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem; cf. Mt 21:1-11; Lk 19:29-44; Jn 12:12-19—Here Jesus presents himself to the people as Messiah, fulfilling one of the clearest Messianic prophecies, Zach 9:9, in the manner of his triumphal entry. On this occasion Jesus makes no attempt to withdraw from the crowds, and openly approves of their acclamations, Lk 19:39 f. He was truly the Messiah, though not the Messiah of popular expectation. He had not come to establish an earthly kingdom. This modest and peaceful triumph would not have caused any alarm to the Roman authorities. 1. 'And when they were drawing near to Jerusalem, to (at) Bethphage and Bethany on the Mount of Olives'. Bethphage was between Jerusalem and Bethany, near the summit of Mt Olivet, and is probably the village mentioned in 2. 2-6. It is noteworthy that Jesus himself took the initiative in making these preparations which were intended to fulfil the prophecy of Zacharias; cf. Mt 21:2 f. 3b. 'The Lord hath need of it, and will at once send it back hither'. 7-10. It was an extraordinary mark of honour to spread their garments on the road before Jesus; cf. 4 Kg 9:13. 'Hosanna': Heb hōša-nā = 'Save, we pray'; cf. Ps 117:25; 85:2. The expression had become a cry of acclamation. Here it is a triumphant salutation of Jesus as Messiah. He is coming in the name of the Lord (cf. Ps 117:26) to restore the kingdom of David, i.e. to establish the Messianic kingdom. For the Jews, the coming of the kingdom of David represented the fulfilment of the Messianic promises. 11. As was fitting on this occasion, Jesus visited the temple where he would have noted the abuses which profaned the sanctuary, but owing to the lateness of the hour and possibly in order to allow the excitement of the crowds to die down, he took no action till next day. Meantime he retired to Bethany with the Twelve.

12-14 The Barren Fig-Tree; cf. Mt 21:18 f.—This incident is to be understood as a symbolic act or parable in action. Such a method of teaching or giving a warning was familiar to the Jews from the OT; cf. Is 20:1-6; Jer 13:1-11; 27:1-11. Some have held that Christ was not really hungry on this occasion, that he merely simulated hunger in order to lead up to the miracle he was about to perform; cf. Maldonatus, Commentary on Mt 21:18. But there is no sufficient reason for departing from the obvious meaning of the evangelist's words. Christ's hunger was real, and made a very natural starting point for the symbolic action. He did not, however, expect to find fruit on the tree 'for it was not the time for figs', 13. This strange act on his part, as well as the malediction and subsequent withering of the fig-tree, forms part of the symbolic action. They were intended to impress upon the mind of the Apostles something the sense of which they did not immediately perceive. The chief lesson of the incident is that those who fail to yield the fruit of good works which Christ seeks will be punished; cf. Lk 13:6-9. This lesson applied in the first instance to the Jews who failed to answer his call, but it has an application for all time, especially to Christians. It is probable that the withering of the fig-tree was also intended to be a timely reminder of the power of Jesus. He could have used his power to destroy his enemies, but refrained from doing so and went forward voluntarily to his death: 'the fig-tree was withered for the sake of the disciples in order that they might be encouraged. . . . It was necessary that he should give proof of his power to punish, so that the disciples might learn that although he had power to wither the Jews, he submitted voluntarily' (Catena in Marc.).

15-19 Christ drives the Sellers from the Temple; cf. Mt 21:12-17; Lk 19:45-48; Jn 2:13-17—It is uncertain whether John and the Synoptic writers are dealing with one and the same incident or two distinct occurrences, one at the beginning of the public ministry (Jn), the other at the final Pasch (Synoptics). Among those who hold that there was only a single expulsion of the sellers, there is a difference of opinion as to the time at which it took place. The majority favour the view that it was at the beginning of the public ministry. They argue that John gives the exact historical setting, while the Synoptic writers, who were less concerned with matters of chronology, relate the incident in connexion with their one description of a visit of Jesus to Jerusalem during the public ministry. 15. Mk, more precise in details of information than Mt or Lk, connects the driving out of the sellers from the temple with the day after the triumphal entry, 12. The fact that Mk gives the precise day is an indication that an expulsion of the sellers from the temple did take place at the final Pasch. Animals and other things required for the sacrifices were being d 20-26 The Withered Fig-Tree: Faith and Prayer; cf. Mt 21:19b-22—20-21. Mk again gives more precise information than Mt, mentioning that it was next morning that the disciples noticed that the fig-tree was withered, and that it was Peter who drew Christ's attention to it. 22-23. Jesus did not explain the symbolism of the incident of the fig-tree, but in the words 'Have faith in God' he drew attention to that faith which is an essential prerequisite for the performance of deeds of power such as the withering of the fig-tree at his command. By confident faith in God, through whose power miracles are wrought, even that which seems impossible will be accomplished, provided it is reasonable and useful for the kingdom of God; cf. Mt 17:20. 24. In prayer also it is necessary that we should have confident faith that our requests will be granted. 'Believe that you have received' (Paßere) expresses the confident assurance that the petition will be granted. 25. 'Stand to pray': standing was the ordinary posture in prayer. To pray on bended knees or prostrate on the ground was a sign of insistent supplication. The disciples are reminded of their duty to forgive others before seeking from God forgiveness of their offences against him, Mt 6:14 f. Thus prayer will be inspired by charity as well as by faith. 26 is not found in the best Gk MSS.

e 27-33 Jesus is questioned about His Authority; cf. Mt 21:23-27; Lk 20:1-8—27-28. The group who approached Jesus were probably an official delegation from the Sanhedrin, the Jewish supreme council, which was constituted from representatives of the priestly families, the Scribes and the lay aristocracy of the Jews (the ancients). Their question about Christ's authority may have arisen from his action in driving the buyers and sellers from the temple. Responsibility for the administration of the temple rested with the priests, and Christ had acted without their authority. 29-30. Instead of giving a direct reply, Jesus put to the delegation a question which would have set them on the right track if they were conscientiously seeking information. They should have had no difficulty in recognizing the heavenly origin and authority of the mission of John the Baptist. A similar conclusion was indicated in the case of Christ, especially as the Baptist had borne witness to him, Jn 1:29-37; 3:25-30. 31-33. They were not prepared to consider the question in accordance with the evidence. They had shown no enthusiasm for the mission of John. To admit its heavenly origin now would have been to condemn themselves, and yet they dared not deny it because of the popular belief that John was a prophet from God.

f XII 1-12 The Parable of the Wicked Husbandmen; cf. Mt 21:33-46; Lk 20:9-19—In this parable Jesus made it clear to the deputation from the Sanhedrin that he was aware of the plot to put him to death, and warned them that this crime, which was the climax of Israel's ingratitude and disobedience to God who had given so many favours to the chosen people, would bring dire punishment. Their privileges would pass to the Gentiles. 'Therefore I say to you that the kingdom of God shall be taken from you and shall be given to a nation yielding the fruits thereof', Mt 21:43.

1. The careful preparation of the vineyard (cf. Is 5:1 f.), which was equipped with everything necessary for protection and for the extraction of the wine before being handed over to the husbandmen, symbolizes the lavish favours which God had extended to the chosen people. 2-5. The servants represent the prophets and others who spoke in God's name to the chosen people, urging them to remain faithful to the covenant and to obey God's law, but constantly received ill-treatment at their hands. 6-8. 'The beloved son' (cf. 1:11; 9:6) is Christ. The contrast with servants throws into relief the fact that Christ claims divine sonship in an altogether unique sense. He is the Son and Heir, Heb 1:1-4, and, like God the Father, enjoys full rights over the vineyard because of his divine nature. 9. By the death of Christ the old order is abrogated. In the new dispensation which replaces it the privileges of the Jews are extended to the Gentiles. 'The vineyard is let to us on condition that we yield fruit to God in due season', Jerome, PL 26, 158. 10-11. In the original context of Ps 117:22 f. the stone rejected by the builders represents Israel which, though despised by the pagan empires, was destined to play a decisive part in God's providential design; cf. Calès, Le Livre des Psaumes, 2 (Paris 1936^a) 402. In like manner, Christ, though rejected by the leaders of the Jews, holds a position of supreme importance in the Messianic kingdom. His triumph over his enemies would be complete. 'Head of the corner': the corner stone which joins two walls, an essential element in the building. 12. The significance of Christ's words was quite clear to the representatives of the Sanhedrin and they would have attempted to seize him were it not that they feared the people.

13-17 The Tribute to Caesar; cf. Mt 22:15-22; Lk 20:20-26—The tribute in question was the poll-tax, payable to the imperial treasury, which had been imposed by the Romans after the deposition of Archelaus in A.D. 6. The tax was resented by many Jews on patriotic grounds. It created a real problem of conscience for those who thought that the payment of tribute to a pagan overlord was inconsistent with the theocratic conception of God as the only true ruler of Israel. The Zealots, led by Judas of Galilee, refused to pay the tax on this ground; cf. Jos., Ant. 18, 1, 1; B.J. 2, 8, 1. 14b. 'Is it lawful to pay tribute to Caesar or not? Should we give (it) or should we not give (it)?' In practice, the Pharisees as well as the Herodians (cf. 3:6) submitted to Roman overlordship and paid the tax. The sole purpose of their hypocritical question was to trap Christ. They knew his Messianic claims, and interpreting these in accordance with the popular conception of the Messiah as a national hero who would overthrow foreign domination, they felt that Jesus would declare that the tax should not be paid. They could then 'deliver him up to the authority and power of the governor', Lk 20:20, as an agitator against Roman rule. 15-17. The use by the Jews of Roman coinage stamped with the image of the Emperor and bearing his name and titles was a sign of acceptance of Roman dominion. In the words 'Render therefore to Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God the things that are God's' Christ teaches that the practical recognition of Roman authority implied in the payment of the tribute to Caesar was not incompatible with duty to God. This reply of Christ embodies a principle which has a wider application to the relations between the demands of civil authority and the fulfilment of obligations to God. The obligation of submission to the civil power is limited by the primary duty of conforming our conduct to the law of God; cf. Rom 13:1-7; 1 Pet 2:13-17.

18-27 The Resurrection of the Dead; cf. Mt 22:23-33; h Lk 20:27-40—18. This is the first mention of the

736h Sadducees in Mk. They were the section of the Jewish nation who had been influenced most deeply by Hellenism. Members of the sect belonged mainly to the priestly families and upper classes; cf. Ac 5:17. Under the Romans they gave ready submission to the established order. One of their number was regularly selected as high-priest at this time. In religious matters, 'the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, nor angel, nor spirit: but the Pharisees confess both', Ac 23:6-10; cf. Jos. Ant. 18, 1, 4. They also differed from the Pharisees in their refusal to attach importance to the traditions of the ancients; cf. Mk 7:1-4. According to some of the Fathers (Jerome PL 26, 165), they accepted only the first five books of the OT; cf. Schürer, Geschichte, 11⁴, 480 f. In numbers and influence with the people they were altogether inferior to the Pharisees. 19-23. The imaginary case submitted to Christ was intended as a reductio ad absurdum of the doctrine of the resurrection. The case was based on the Mosaic Law concerning levirate marriage, Deut 25:5 f. If a man died without issue, his brother was commanded to marry the widow. The first son of this marriage was regarded as the offspring of the dead man, thus perpetuating his name. Fictitious cases like that submitted to Christ were probably put forward by the Sadducees in their controversies with the Pharisees in order to ridicule the idea of the resurrection. 24-25. The denial of the resurrection by the Sadducees shows that they do not understand either the teaching of Scripture or the power of God. They misconceive the manner of existence of those who rise from the dead. Their question is futile because it supposes that life in the resurrection is merely a prolongation of the conditions of the present life. But the power of God will so transform the risen body that 'they cannot die any more, for they will be like angels, and are sons of God, being children of the resurrection', Lk 20:36. Marriage is an earthly institution for the conservation of the human race. In the resurrection, however, men will be immortal and like angels in their freedom from preoccupation with marriage and other temporal matters. 26-27. 'in the bush'; ἐν τῷ βάτῳ = 'in (the passage about) the (burning) bush', Ex 3:2 ff. This method of quoting Scripture was used in the absence of chapter and verse divisions; cf. Rom 11:2; Mk 2:26. The selection of a text from the Pentateuch rather than, e.g. Dan 12:2 or Is 26:19, may have been due to the refusal of the Sadducees to recognize the authority of the rest of the Jewish Scriptures. In its original context, the passage quoted, Ex 3:6, means that God, who reveals himself to Moses, is the God whom the Patriarchs worshipped. The argument here proceeds on the basis that God's declaration contains the assurance that he has not ceased to be the God of the Patriarchs; he has not forgotten his promises nor their loyal adherence to the covenant concluded between them and God (cf. Heb 11:16); he will not abandon to death those who served him, for 'he is the God of the living, not of the dead'. In the actual state of Jewish belief, death was a penalty and the life of Sheol was considered an imperfect form of existence. It was inconceivable that God should fail to re-unite the souls and bodies of those whom he loved. The resurrection is part of the recompense due to Abraham and the other Patriarchs for their faithful service. God is faithful and just, and he will make them live again; cf. Lagrange, Saint Marc, 319 f. 28-34 The Greatest Commandment; cf. Mt 22:34-40; Lk 10:25-28—28. Mk does not suggest that this question was prompted by hostility to Jesus. The Rabbis enumerated 613 precepts of the Law, 248 commands and 365 prohibitions. These were further classified into 'light' and 'grave'; cf. Mt 23:4, 23. The question of the relative importance of these precepts, which included religious laws and ritual ordinances as well as expressions of the natural law, was a subject of discussion among them. 29-30. The commandment to love God with all their powers, Deut 6:4 f., was quite familiar to the Jews as it was part of the monotheistic profession of faith which every faithful Israelite recited twice daily. This profession of faith was known as the Shema from the first word of the passage (Heb. šma = Hear!). The importance of the command to love God may have been obscured by the fact that in the Shema it was immediately followed by passages from Scripture which dealt with temporal prosperity and with the wearing of tassels upon garments (Deut 11:13-21; Num 15:37-41). 31. 'The second is this: thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. There is no other commandment greater than these'. The command to love the neighbour, quoted from Lev 19:18, is introduced here because, in the teaching of Christ, it is inseparable from the command to love God. 'If any man says "I love God" and hates his brother, he is a liar. . . . This commandment we have from him, that he who loves God should love his brother also', 1 Jn 4:20 f.; cf. Jn 13:34 f.; Rom 13:8-10; Gal 5:14. In Lev 19:18 the 'neighbour' is a Jew, a compatriot. Christ, however, made it clear in the Parable of the Good Samaritan, Lk 10:29-37, that 'neighbour' included all men without exception; cf. Mt 5:43-47. The twofold precept of charity is the greatest commandment. It sums up all man's duties to God and to other men. 32-34. These verses are found only in Mk. The prophets (cf. Is 1:11-20; Jer 6:20; Os 6:6) had taught that the interior spirit of religion and fulfilment of the moral law were superior to the external ritual of sacrifice. That teaching, however, had not received due emphasis in the rabbinical schools. The Scribe showed understanding in deducing from Christ's words the superiority of the law of charity over ceremonial worship. His good dispositions won the approval of Jesus, but we do not know whether he entered the kingdom by becoming a disciple of Christ. 35-37 The Origin of the Messias; cf. Mt 22:41-46; Lk 20:41-44—35b. 'How do the Scribes say that the Messias is son of David?' It was not simply in order to confound his opponents that Jesus raised this difficulty about the origin of the Messias. He was then engaged in teaching in the temple, and 'the great multitude listened to him gladly', 37. Rather he wished to direct attention to an important aspect of Scriptural teaching concerning the Messias which the Scribes had overlooked. The prophecies had foretold that the Messias would be a descendant of David; 'son of David' was the most popular title of the Messias; cf. 10:48; Jn 7:42; Rom 1:3. It was a title, however, which suggested a merely human Messias who would restore the temporal kingdom of Israel. Jesus did not question the belief that the Messias would be a descendant of David, but he quoted a passage of Scripture, Ps 109:1, which indicated that the Messias would be something more. 'The Lord [Yahweh] said to my Lord [Adonai]', i.e. the Messias. If David, to whom the Psalm was attributed, calls the Messias his Lord, then the Messias is assuredly more than a 'son of David'. The fact that the Messias is to sit at the right hand of God points to the same conclusion. The answer to the difficulty, 37, is contained in the doctrine of the Incarnation. The Messias is both God 'the Lord of David', and man 'the son of David'; cf. 14:62. 38-40 Denunciation of the Scribes; cf. Mt 23:1-39; m Lk 20:46 f.—The preceding section (736l) gives an instance of how the Scribes had failed in their role of teachers of the people. Here they are condemned for their bad example, which was all the more reprehensible in those who set themselves up as zealous defenders of God's law. The vanity of the Scribes showed itself in their seeking after marks of honour to which they claimed a right as models of legal righteousness. 40. 'Who devour the houses of widows and make pretence of long prayers'. In their avarice the Scribes did not refrain from victimizing the most defenceless section of the community. They gained possession of the property of widows, either by using their expert knowledge of the law in order to defraud them, or by a pretence of piety which was calculated to impress. Their hypocrisy in making long prayers n 41-44 The Widow's Mite; cf. Lk 21:1-4—The building known as the Treasury was situated within the temple area. In it were kept the treasures of the temple together with vessels and vestments used in the services. Apparently it was also used as a place of safe keeping for the property of private individuals; cf. 2 Mac 3:10. According to the Talmud, there were thirteen trumpet-shaped receptacles for offerings for the temple. Christ, showing his knowledge of hidden things, drew the attention of the disciples to the offering made by the widow in order to inculcate once again the importance of the intention of the heart in the service of God. The moral worth of the mite offered by the widow is measured by the sacrifice which she made.

737a XIII 1-37 Prophecy of the Destruction of the Temple and of the Coming of the Son of Man; cf. Mt chh 24-25; Lk 21:5-36; 17:20-37—This prophecy, the longest discourse of Christ recorded in Mk, is usually referred to as the Eschatological Discourse or Synoptic Apocalypse. It was spoken in reply to the question of the disciples about the time of the destruction of the temple, 4, and in it Christ tells of signs preceding that event and also speaks of the coming of the Son of Man. The chief problem in interpreting the discourse is to determine whether certain passages should be understood of the destruction of the temple and events connected with it, or of the coming of the Son of Man as Judge at the end of the world.

A majority of writers at the present day hold that Christ dealt both with the destruction of the temple and the coming of the Son of Man in final judgement in this prophecy. Some writers contend that the manner in which the predictions concerning these two events are combined in a single prophecy, with abrupt transitions from one theme to the other, shows that Christ believed that the destruction of the temple and the coming of the Son of Man at the end of the world would be contemporaneous.

b Most modern Catholic exegetes hold that the evidence of the discourse itself indicates that Christ made an important distinction between the two events. The destruction of the temple would be preceded by signs which would serve as a warning to the disciples to escape from impending disaster, 14-17. This local calamity, from which they could escape by flight elsewhere, would come to pass 'before this generation passes away', 30. Christ, however, gave no information about the time of the coming of the Son of Man, 32. That event would be sudden and unexpected. It would concern 'the elect . . . from the uttermost part of the earth to the uttermost part of heaven', 27. There would be no warning signs. Constant readiness is demanded—'Take heed, watch. For you know not when the time is', 33. While Christ did not reveal the time of the Second Coming, his words convey sufficient information to put the disciples on their guard against identifying it with the time of the destruction of Jerusalem. In their minds, the overthrow of the temple and the end of the world were closely linked (cf. 13:4; Mt 24:3). Christ, by insisting that the time of the Parousia is uncertain, while at the same time declaring that the destruction of the temple would take place before 'this generation passes away' and also by prescribing different attitudes for his followers in relation to these events, intended to dispel the confusion in the Apostles' minds; cf. Lagrange, Saint Marc, 332-354; id. The Gospel of Jesus Christ, 2, 170 ff.; Grandmaison, Jésus-Christ, 3, 61-96, 251-9; Bonsirven, Les Enseignements de Jésus-Christ, 330-55.

c Some prefer to interpret the intermingling of themes and sudden transitions from one to the other as an instance of the lack of perspective which is a well-known feature of the prophecies of the OT. Because of the absence of perspective, the prophecies do not bring into clear relief the time-interval between future events in the way that history sets out events of the past in their chronological sequence. On this theory, Christ would have accommodated himself here to the limitations of ordinary prophetic utterance without in any way implying that the destruction of the temple and his own Second Coming would take place in the same period. But if it be admitted that the prophecy has a twofold theme, the considerations put forward in the preceding paragraph would seem to exclude this explanation.

A number of ancient writers and some moderns do not admit that Christ spoke of two distinct themes in this prophecy. Some hold that throughout the discourse Christ has primarily in mind the coming of the Son of Man at the last Judgement. It is difficult to see how this interpretation can be reconciled with the question of the disciples, 4, and the words of Christ, 14-19. Even if it be granted that the destruction of the temple is a symbol which prefigures the end of the world, it seems to be quite clear that this local calamity in Jerusalem and Judaea is treated as an independent event with its own importance and significance, and not merely as a symbol of a greater upheaval at the end of the world.

Another explanation, which hitherto had few supporters, has recently been restated and strengthened with fresh arguments by A. Feuillet; cf. RB 55 (1948) 481-502; 56 (1949) 61-92, 340-64; 57 (1950) 62-91, 180-211. He holds that the prophecy deals throughout with the single theme of the destruction of the temple. The coming of the Son of Man 'in the clouds with great power and glory', 26, is not to be taken as Christ's coming at the Parousia, but as the inauguration of his reign, the coming of the kingdom in power; cf. Mk 8:39; 14:62; Dan 7:13. This coming is the counterpart of the judgement of condemnation inflicted on the Jewish nation in the destruction of the temple and the calamitous events connected with it. With the disappearance of the temple, the ancient economy, already abrogated by Christ's death, comes to an end, and the new era of universal salvation, 'the times of the nations', Lk 21:24, is inaugurated. Further references to this interpretation will be found in the Commentary. 1-4 Occasion of the Prophecy; cf. Mt 24:1-3; Lk 21:5-7—Herod the Great had undertaken the restoration of the temple in an attempt to win the favour of the Jews. The splendour of the buildings and the dimensions of the huge blocks of stone used in the work of reconstruction are described at length by Jos., Ant. 15, 11, 3; B.J. 5, 5, 1-2. Christ's prophecy was fulfilled to the letter when Titus, after the capture of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, ordered that the city and temple should be razed to the ground; cf. Jos., B.J. 7, 1, 1. 4. The first question of the Apostles refers to the destruction of the temple. In the second question the words 'all these things' have been taken commonly as an indication that the Apostles visualized the destruction of the temple as part of a greater upheaval, the end of the world; cf. Mt 24:3. Feuillet maintains that the form of the Apostles' second question, even as found in Mt, does not necessarily imply that they intended to ask about the time of the end of world as a distinct subject. The expressions used might be understood of the Messianic age; cf. RB 55 (1948) 486; 56 (1949) 344-7.

5-13 Advice for Times of Distress; cf. Mt 24:4-14; Lk 21:8-19—Christ did not reply immediately to the questions put to him. He took occasion first to warn the Apostles against the dangers of deception by false Messiahs and to remind them of the difficulties which they would encounter in preaching the Gospel. Such advice was necessary lest they should be led astray by the expectation that the end of the world, with the coming of the Son of Man in glory, was at hand. In the period between the death of Christ and the fall of Jerusalem many impostors arose and took advantage of the intense Messianic expectations of the time to promise a decisive intervention of God (cf. Lagrange, Le Messianisme, 21 ff.). The same period was marked 7371 by wars in the Roman Empire, disturbances in Palestine, earthquakes and famines (cf. Ac 11:28; Jos., Ant. 20, 5, 2-3). Tacitus (Hist. I, 2-3) describes it as an age 'rich in calamities, made terrible by battles, torn by civil strife, cruel even in its peace. Four emperors perished by the sword. Three civil wars, many foreign wars . . .'; (cf. Jos. BJ Proem. 2). Christ's words apply in the first instance to the trials of this troubled period before the fall of Jerusalem. 3b. These things are the beginning of birth-pangs. The trials of which Christ has spoken are only the beginning: the great tribulation, 19, is still to come. The figure of the pains of childbirth contains an element of consolation. Just as the pangs of childbirth are followed by joy that 'a man is born into the world', Jn 16:21 f., so the trials which reached their climax in the fall of Jerusalem will lead to joy. They are the pangs accompanying the birth of a new world, the kingdom of God on earth; cf. Lagrange, Saint Marc 337. 9-18. Christ's followers will be subjected to persecutions and will incur the hatred of Jews and Gentiles (cf. Mt 10:16-23), but they will have the special assistance of the Holy Spirit when they are summoned before tribunals to answer for their faith in Christ and their preaching of the Gospel of salvation. If they remain faithful to the end, they will save their souls. 10. The immediate context suggests that 'first', πρῶτον, is not to be interpreted as 'before the end of the world'. Christ is still speaking of the period of the 'beginning of birth-pangs'. The preaching of the Gospel to all the nations can be explained as the evangelization which had already taken place in the Apostolic age before the fall of Jerusalem; cf. Rom 1:5, 8; 10:18; Lagrange, Saint Matthieu 461. Feuillet (RB 55 [1948] 492-3) points out that the bringing of the Gospel to the nations should be envisaged particularly as the evangelization of Jews dispersed throughout the Roman empire. As God's chosen people, they would have the opportunity, before the catastrophe of A.D. 70, of knowing the Gospel.

h 14-18 The Sign of the Destruction of the Temple; cf. Mt 24:15-20; Lk 21:20-24-14. This gives the answer to the disciples' question, 4. 'The abomination of desolation, standing where it ought not'. It is not certain how this sign of the imminent destruction of the temple was fulfilled. The expression 'abomination of desolation' comes from Dan 9:27 (cf. Dan 11:31; 12:11) where the prophet is speaking of something which would cause defilement of the temple: cf. Lattey, The Book of Daniel, 91, 101-2. In 1 Mac 1:57 the expression is applied to the profanation of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes who erected a statue of Zeus Olympius within the sanctuary in 168 B.C. Presumably Christ had in mind a sacrilegious profanation of a similar character. It is noteworthy that the Gk text of Mk reads ἐσθηκότα (masc.) in apposition to βδελύγμα (neutr.). This sense-construction may be intended to suggest that the abomination is not an inanimate thing but an intelligent being. A number of authors hold that the invasion of Judaea and the subsequent siege of Jerusalem constituted the abomination of desolation; cf. Lk 21:20. Others find the sign in the crimes committed by the Zealots who seized the temple in A.D. 68 and converted it into a fortress. They murdered two high-priests as well as countless others and caused the cessation of the daily sacrifices; cf. Jos., B.J. 4, 5, 1-3; 6:3; 5, 10, 5. 14b. 'He that readeth, let him understand'. This may be a statement of Christ directing attention to the profound significance of the prophecy of Daniel, 9:27. More probably it is a parenthesis by Mk inviting the reader of the Gospel to pay attention to the practical lesson of Christ's warning. 15a. According to Eusebius (HE 3, 5, 3), the Christians, warned by a revelation, fled from Jerusalem before the siege and took refuge at Pella, across the Jordan. 15b-18. These words of Christ emphasize the urgency of the warning to fly from the catastrophe about to overwhelm the city.

738a 19-23 Great Tribulations: False Christs and False

Prophets; cf. Mt 24:21-28—Exegetes are far from unanimous in their interpretation of this passage. Many hold that at 19 there is a transition from events at the fall of Jerusalem to the trials before the end of the world. They argue that it is no longer a question of saving one's life by flight from a local calamity, but of a great tribulation, 19, from which no one could be saved if the Lord did not shorten the time, 20. In this tribulation it is apparently the eternal salvation of the elect, 20, 22, which is the important issue. The fresh warnings against impostors are taken to imply that the situation is different from that contemplated in 5 ff. On the other hand it is pointed out that Josephus (BJ Proem. 4) describes the fall of Jerusalem in terms very similar to those used here. Furthermore, 19 f. are logically connected with the preceding verses (cf. 'γὰρ' for '—')—they give the reason for the hasty flight urged in 15 ff. The most natural break in the discourse appears to be in 23—'Take you heed, therefore: behold I have told you all things beforehand'. The warnings against impostors, 21 f., may be simply a resumption and development of the earlier admonitions. Feuillet (RB 55 [1948] 485) notes the correspondence between ὄρα, 14, and ὥρα in 15 and 21, and also between ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις, 17, and αἱ ἡμέραι ἐκείναι, 19. This evidence indicates that 14-23 form a unity and that 19-23 deal with happenings at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem. 20. 'no flesh (no one) should be saved'. In the context of the destruction of Jerusalem this must be taken in a relative sense, 'no inhabitant of Jerusalem or Judaea'. 'The elect'; Feuillet (RB 55 [1948] 498-502) holds that 'the elect' are the remnant of the chosen people whom God will preserve from death in the great catastrophe, so that at least a 'remnant' (Is 1:9; cf. Kissane, The Book of Isaiah, I, p 10) of the Jewish race would enter the Church; cf. Rom 9:27-29; 11:1-7. For their sake the time will be shortened.

24-27 The Coming of the Son of Man; cf. Mt 24:29-31; Lk 21:25-28—The language and imagery used in this passage are frequently found in the prophetic and apocalyptic descriptions of God's intervention in judgement upon cities or nations; cf. Is 13:10; 24:18 ff.; 34:4; Ez 32:7; Am 8:9; Jl 2:10, 30 f.; Agg 2:22. The language is metaphorical, and the striking imagery of disturbances in the heavenly bodies was intended to suggest the power and majesty of God. Christ makes use of this accepted terminology in order to describe the coming of the Son of Man. His words need not be taken literally as an enumeration of signs in the heavens which will precede the end of the world. They are rather the recognized mode of signifying that God is about to intervene. 28-27. It is commonly held that the divine intervention in this case is the coming of the Son of Man at the end of the world. Christ, the Son of Man, will then come in glory as the Supreme Judge and gather his elect to himself from the whole earth; cf. 1 Thess 4:15 f.; 1 Cor 15:51-53. Against this interpretation Feuillet (RB 56 [1949] 61-82) argues that nothing in the text indicates such a complete change of perspective between 19-23 and 24-27. There is no hint of a prolonged interval between the great tribulation and the coming of the Son of Man. On the contrary, the repetition in 24 of the phrase ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις (cf. 17, 19), and the presence of the time-particle τότε (cf. 15, 20) corresponding to it in 26 and 27, suggest that the coming of the Son of Man will be contemporaneous with the great tribulation. Feuillet finds the key to the meaning in Dan 7:13-14, to which Christ obviously alludes here. In the prophecy of Daniel the coming of 'one like a son of man with the clouds of heaven' is a symbol of the establishment of God's kingdom on earth. The destruction of the temple by the Romans is God's judgement on the chosen people and brings the old order to an end, but it also marks the inauguration of the new era of salvation, the establishment of the Messianic kingdom on earth and its extension to all nations. This is the joyful and consoling aspect of the birth-pangs represented 738c by the destruction of Jerusalem. The gathering of the elect is explained by Feuillet as the entry into the Church of the 'remnant' of the chosen people who believe in Christ. Together with the great mass of Gentile converts this minority will form the new spiritual Israel, the Church (ἐκκλησία = assembly, gathering) founded by Christ. Other passages of Scripture also employ the figure of 'gathering' to describe Christ's redeeming mission; cf. Jn 11:51 f.

d 28-31 The Parable of the Fig-Tree: the Time of the Destruction of Jerusalem; cf. Mt 24:32-35; Lk 21:29-33—28-29. When the leaves appear on the fig-tree men know that summer is near. Similarly, when the disciples see these things coming to pass they will know that it ('the kingdom of God', Lk 21:31) is at hand. The phrase 'these things' corresponds to the question of the disciples 'when shall these things be', 4, and probably refers to the abomination of desolation and the destruction of Jerusalem rather than to the happenings foretold in 5-8. When the disciples see these things coming to pass they will realize that they herald the establishment of the kingdom. Feuillet (art. cit., 83) emphasizes that the purpose of the parable is to bring home to the disciples that the destruction of the city and temple is not an unqualified disaster, inasmuch as to the eyes of faith it spells the coming of the Messianic age. 30. 'This generation' has been interpreted in a variety of senses: the Jewish nation, the human race, the community of the faithful (the Church), the generation of Jews contemporary with Christ. If Christ is speaking here of the end of the world (ταῦτα πάντα γένηται), the meaning would appear to be that the human race, or the Jewish nation, or the Church would still exist at the Second Coming. It is difficult to see the precise force of such a statement or how it fits the immediate context. Probably 'all these things' alludes to the destruction of Jerusalem. Christ meant that it would come to pass before the contemporary generation of Jews had passed away; cf. 8:12, 38. 'Generation' frequently has a pejorative sense (cf. ZLG. s.v. γενεά), and it may be that it has that nuance in the present context. The destruction of Jerusalem is regarded as the punishment of the evil generation that rejected Christ; cf. Mt 23:35 f. Not more than forty years elapsed from the time Christ spoke until the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. 31. An emphatic declaration of the permanency and truth of all Christ's teachings.

e 32-37 The Time of Judgement: the Need for Constant Vigilance; cf. Mt 24:36-51; Lk 21:34-36—32. Christ has announced the sign which will precede the fall of Jerusalem and foretold that that catastrophe would take place during the lifetime of his contemporaries. Now he declares that no one except the Father 'knows about that day or that hour'. The Arian heretics appealed to this text as proof that Christ did not know the time of the day of Judgement and, therefore, could not be God; cf. Maldonatus, Comment. on Mt 24:36. Many modern writers (cf. Feuillet, art. cit., 87) explain the passage in the sense that Christ revealed the general period (this generation) in which the temple would be destroyed but gives no information as to the precise time (the day or the hour). But the opposition here is not simply between a general indication of the period, 30, and a precise date, 32. There appears to be a contrast between two distinct situations. In one case, there will be warning signs and the general period is revealed: in the other, there are no signs and no information is given about the time. Hence the admonition, 'Take heed, watch. For you know not when the time is', 33. It is unlikely, therefore, that Christ had the same event in view both in 30 and 32. The day and hour of which he spoke was most probably the Day of Judgement; cf. Lk 10:12; 1 Thess 5:10; 2 Tim 1:12, 18; 4:8. The statement that the Son, i.e. Christ, does not know the time of the Second Coming is to be interpreted in the sense that it was no part of his Messianic mission to reveal this information to men. Christ, as a divine Person, knows all the secrets of the Godhead, but it was not the will of the Father that he should make known to men the time of the Last Judgement. 33-37. Because the time of Christ's coming in judgement is not revealed, constant readiness is necessary. This admonition, which is enforced by a parable, was not intended for the Apostles alone—'what I say to you, I say to all: watch', 37.

XIV 1-XV 47 The Passion, Death and Burial of Christ. 738a

XIV 1-2 The Plot of the Sanhedrin; cf. Mt 26:1-5; Lk 22:1 f.—The Pasch, i.e. the ceremony at which the paschal lamb was eaten, was celebrated on the evening of the 14th Nisan. 'The Azymes', or the feast of unleavened bread, began on the 15th Nisan and lasted seven days. In practice, the whole period from the beginning of the paschal ceremony to the end of the Azymes was referred to either as the Pasch or the Azymes. According to an ancient tradition (cf. Calena in Marc.), this meeting of the Sanhedrin was held on the Wednesday before Christ's death.

3-9 The Anointing at Bethany; cf. Mt 26:6-13; Jn 12:1-8—From Jn we know that this incident took place on the day before the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, six days before the Pasch. Mk and Mt place the account of the anointing between the plot of the Sanhedrin and the betrayal by Judas because of its relation to the burial of Christ, 8, whom the Sanhedrin had now decided to put to death. The incident also throws light on the conduct and motives of Judas. 4. 'Some were indignant'. From Jn 12:4 f. we know that Judas protested against the waste of precious ointment which might have been sold for the benefit of the poor. 6-9. Christ defended Mary from the charge of prodigality brought against her under the pretence of solicitude for the poor. Her action was a gesture of homage to him. In view of the nearness of his death, no one should find fault with the lavishness of the expenditure. Opportunities to assist the poor would never be lacking, but Christ would not be visibly present among them much longer. In fact, though Mary may not have realized it, this anointing was an anticipation of the anointing of Christ's body which, in accordance with Jewish custom, should have been performed before burial. It would seem that, because of the haste with which the burial of Christ was carried out (Lk 23:54; Jn 19:42), certain of the customary preparations for burial were not completed; cf. 15:46-16:1; Lk 23:56-24:1. 9. The woman who anointed Jesus was Mary, sister of Martha and Lazarus, Jn 11:2; 12:2 f. It is doubtful whether she should be identified either with Mary Magdalen or with the unnamed sinner who anointed Christ on another occasion, Lk 7:37 ff; cf. O'Rahilly, The Family at Bethany, 181-92.

10-11 The Betrayal by Judas; cf. Mt 26:14-16; Lk 22:3-6—By offering to betray Jesus to the Sanhedrin, Judas solved for them the problem of 'how to seize him by stealth', 1. There has been much speculation concerning the motives which prompted the betrayal. In Jn 12:6 love of money is indicated, and disillusionment of false Messianic hopes and disappointed ambition probably also played a part. Both Lk 22:3, and Jn 6:71 f.; 13:2, 27, refer to the influence of Satan upon the conduct of Judas.

12-16 Preparation for the Pasch; cf. Mt 26:17-19; d Lk 22:7-13—12. For the paschal meal, in addition to the lamb which was to be slaughtered in the temple, it was necessary to provide unleavened bread, bitter herbs, wine, and a sauce called harôset, made from fruits, nuts, spices and vinegar. Four cups of wine at least were prescribed. The third cup, taken after the eating of the lamb, was called the 'cup of blessing'. During the meal the Hallel Psalms (113-118) were recited, and the head of the family explained the significance of the ceremony, which commemorated the Exodus. 13-15. From Lk 22:8 we know that the disciples sent to prepare for the Pasch were Peter and John. Jesus had probably made an arrangement with the householder to whom they were directed. The directions

739d for finding the place were a test of the disciples' faith in Christ, and gave proof of his divine knowledge. He may have avoided mentioning the householder's name or the exact place in order to keep it from Judas, lest he should reveal it to the Sanhedrin beforehand.

• A number of texts in the Synoptics and Jn put it beyond doubt that Christ died on a Friday; cf. Mt 27:62; Mk 15:42; Lk 23:54; Jn 19:31. The Last Supper took place on the previous evening. That Christ intended to celebrate the Jewish paschal feast is clear from the accounts of the preparations; cf. 14:12-16; Mt 26:17-19; Lk 22:7-13. The words 'With desire have I desired to eat this Pasch with you before I suffer', Lk 22:15, confirm that Christ and the Apostles actually partook of the customary paschal meal. In the evangelists' account of the Last Supper the traditional ritual of the Jewish Pasch is overshadowed by the institution of the Eucharist which is the Pasch of the New Covenant. The Mosaic Law, Ex 12:6, prescribed that the paschal lamb was to be slain about sunset on the 14th Nisan and eaten that night. Taking this regulation in conjunction with the Synoptic account one would conclude that Christ died in the afternoon of the 15th Nisan. But from Jn 18:28 it is clear that the Jews had not eaten the Pasch on the day that Christ was put to death. That day was the day of preparation, i.e. the eve of the Pasch, Jn 19:31, 42. Moreover, the first day of the paschal feast, the 15th Nisan, was a day of sabbath rest on which it was not lawful to hold a trial. The Synoptics, Mt 27:32; Mk 15:21, 46; Lk 22:26; 23:56, mention various other activities which also appear to be inconsistent with the supposition that the day of Christ's death was the first of the paschal feast. Various solutions have been put forward to explain the difference in practice between Christ and the Jews on this occasion. Some, indeed, have denied that Christ celebrated a real paschal meal, while others have held that Christ and the Jews celebrated the Pasch on the same day. But the evidence already adduced indicates that neither view is tenable. Whether Christ anticipated the legal date of the Pasch by one day, or the Jews postponed it to the evening of the 15th Nisan remains uncertain. It is possible that there was a divergence in regard to the fixing of the date of the Pasch, which depended upon observation of the new moon fourteen days earlier; cf. Lagrange, Saint Marc, 354-63; Prat, Jesus Christ, 2, 507-20; cf. § 768a-c.

† 17-21 Announcement of the Betrayal; cf. Mt 26:20-25; Lk 22:21-23; Jn 13:21-30—17-18. The announcement of the betrayal was made during the paschal celebration which began after sunset. Among the Jews at this period the ancient practice of standing while partaking of the paschal meal, Ex 12:11, had given way to the Greek and Roman custom of reclining on couches at table. 19-20. The expression 'one who dips with me in the dish' has the same meaning as 'one who eats with me', 18b, = one who partakes of a meal with me. These words did not reveal to the other Apostles that Judas was the traitor, as they could apply to anyone present at the meal. In accordance with oriental practice, each one helped himself from a common dish. 21. Christ, in fulfilment of the divine command, was going voluntarily to his death which had been foretold by the prophets. God foresaw from all eternity the part which Judas would play, but the crime of betraying Jesus, which Judas committed by his own free act, was none the less heinous.

g 22-25 The Institution of the Eucharist; cf. Mt 26:26-29; Lk 22:19 f.—Mk's account here is almost verbally identical with that of Mt, while Lk closely resembles 1 Cor 11:23-25 and includes the command of Christ, 'Do this in commemoration of Me'. 22. In the sentence, 'This is my Body' the subject 'this' (τοῦτο), i.e. the bread which Christ held in his hands, is identified with the predicate 'my Body' (τὸ σῶμά μου). In Aramaic, the language in which Christ spoke, the copula 'is' (ἐστίν) is not expressed, but the sense is the same. The evangelists and St Paul express faithfully in Greek the meaning of Christ's words. That these words are to be taken literally, signifying that the bread has been changed by divine power into Christ's body, follows no less from the impossibility of giving any reasonable figurative interpretation to them than from the emphasis with which it is stated that this is Christ's own body, not a mere figure of it, but the body that suffered for men: 'This is my body, [the body] which will be given for you', Lk 22:19. 24. The same point is made even clearer in the consecration of the chalice: 'This is my blood, [the blood] of the covenant, [the blood] which will be shed for many'. The cup contains the blood of Christ, the same blood which is to be shed in the sacrifice which inaugurates the new covenant between God and men. The participle ἐκχυννόμενον is used proleptically with reference to the shedding of Christ's blood on Calvary. 'of the new testament'. 'New' may be here an interpolation from Mt. The Mosaic covenant was inaugurated by the shedding of blood, Ex 24:4 ff.; Christ inaugurated the New Covenant, which replaces the OT economy, by the sacrificial shedding of his own Blood on Calvary — 'by a single offering he consummated for ever those that are being sanctified', Heb 10:14. 'for many'. The word 'many' does not imply that some are excluded from the benefit of Christ's sacrifice; it simply marks a contrast between the multitude who are to be redeemed and the One who died for all; cf. 10:45. 25. In these words, which Luke places before the account of the institution of the Eucharist, Jesus reminds the Apostles that this is a farewell banquet, for his death is imminent. But he will triumph over death, and they will be with him again in the happiness of the eternal kingdom. Christ uses a metaphor familiar to the Rabbis, comparing the kingdom of God to a banquet. The wine at that banquet will be 'new'; it will belong to a new order of things. Some see in this passage an allusion to the Eucharist which would unite them with Christ even here on earth.

26-31 Prediction of the Scandal of the Apostles and 1 Peter's Denials; cf. Mt 26:30-35; Lk 22:33 f.; Jn 13:36-38—26. The hymn sung on this occasion was the second part of the Hallel, Ps 115-118, which brought the paschal supper to a close. 27-28. The defection of the Apostles predicted by Christ was not an abandonment of faith in him; it was rather a temporary faltering in their loyalty, caused by discouragement at seeing him fall into the hands of his enemies. Together with the warning that they would be scandalized, Christ gave the Apostles the reassuring reminder of the triumph of his Resurrection. The scriptural quotation in 27b is from Zach 13:7—'Sword . . . strike the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock will be dispersed'.

29-31. Peter's protestations of unshakeable loyalty were sincere, but relying excessively on his own strength and placing his own loyalty above that of the other Apostles, he failed to heed the warning words of Christ. The others also protested their loyalty. Mk alone mentions the second cock-crow; cf. 14:72.

32-42 The Agony in the Garden; cf. Mt 26:36-46; 740a

Lk 22:39-46—32. Gethsemani is situated at the foot of the western slope of Mt Olivet. The name means 'oil-press', an installation for extracting the oil from the olive. 33-36. The three Apostles who were with Christ at the Agony had earlier been witnesses of the Transfiguration and of the raising of the daughter of Jairus. 33b. 'He began to be dismayed and distressed'. ἀδυναμεῖν ('to be distressed') suggests repugnance, disgust. The Passion and Crucifixion which were now imminent, were the immediate cause of the Agony of Christ. His hour had come; the Passion with all the accompanying humiliations presented itself so vividly to his mind that he was filled with anguish and dismay. He was also conscious of the unbelief of the Jews, the betrayal by Judas, the scandal of the Apostles, the ingratitude of men, the burden of sin which he had to expiate by his sacrifice. At the Incarnation he had assumed a real human nature: it is in accordance with that nature to shrink from suffering and death. Christ's

- 740a prayer that he might be spared 'this chalice', the ordeal of the Passion, is at once a manifestation of the shrinking of his human nature from the sufferings which lay before him, and a measure of the anguish caused by the thought of them. The prayer, however, is conditional—'he prayed that if it were possible, the hour might pass from him'. His human will was in complete accord with the will of the Father—'not what I will, but what thou wilt'. Despite the repugnance of his human nature to suffering, Christ, by a meritorious act of obedience, voluntarily submitted to the Passion which had been decreed by God for the salvation of men. 'Though Son, he learned obedience from the things he suffered, and having been made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation to all those who obey him', Heb 5:8 f. This narrative puts beyond question the fact that Christ had a true human nature, and a human will distinct from and yet completely obedient to the will of the Father; Vosté, De Passione et Morte Jesu Christi (Romae 1937) 7-56.
- b 37-42. Christ returned to seek comfort in the company of the Apostles whom he had asked to keep watch with him. This seeking for comfort in the presence of friends, and the restlessness shown in the repeated coming and going of Christ are characteristic of one who is deeply distressed. The Apostles, despite their protestations, had failed to keep awake. Mark, 37, notes that Christ's gentle reproof was addressed especially to Simon Peter. This first failure to live up to their protestations of loyalty, 29-31, taught the Apostles the lesson that good intentions are not enough. Human nature is weak and liable to fail in time of trial. Constant vigilance and prayer for God's help were necessary if they were to remain steadfast in their loyalty to Christ in the far greater trials which lay before them.
- c 43-50 The Arrest of Jesus; cf. Mt 26:47-56; Lk 22:47-53; Jn 18:2-11—From Jn we know that a detachment of Roman soldiers under the command of a tribune was present at Christ's arrest. If resistance were encountered, they would have given all necessary support to the representatives of the Sanhedrin who came armed with swords and clubs to seize Jesus. Judas led them to Gethsemani because he knew that Jesus frequently resorted there with the disciples, Jn 18:2. In the darkness even those who had seen Christ previously might have failed to identify him among the Apostles. The sign which Judas arranged was the customary form of respectful greeting. 47. Jn 18:10 tells us that it was Peter who drew the sword in defence of Christ. 48-49. Jesus did not resist arrest or attempt to escape, but made a dignified protest against the methods employed against him by the Sanhedrin. If they had a charge against him because of his teaching or claims, they could have summoned him openly before their tribunal. There was no need to come with an armed band as if Christ were a malefactor from whom violent resistance was to be expected. Force, indeed, would have been useless if Christ chose to resist, cf. Mt 26:51-54; Jn 18:4-6. All that was taking place, however, was in accordance with the prophecies of Scripture; cf. Is 53:7, 12.
- d 51-52. Only Mk records this incident of the unnamed young man. He may have been roused from sleep by the crowd and followed them with a linen cloth (σινδών) wrapped about him. The fact that he followed our Lord in these circumstances suggests that he was a disciple or, at least, sympathetic to Christ. It is unlikely that mere curiosity explains his actions. Many writers hold that this is a personal reminiscence of the author of the Gospel, and identify the young man with Mark himself. The insertion of this personal anecdote, which is not closely linked with either the preceding or the subsequent narrative, would be equivalent to the setting of Mark's signature to the Gospel. The view is not certain, but it gives a reasonable explanation of an otherwise baffling narrative. It appears to be clear that we cannot identify the young man who figures in this incident with any of the Apostles—they had all fled, 50.

53-65 Jesus before the Sanhedrin: the Religious Process; cf. Mt 26:57-68; Lk 22:54, 63-71; Jn 18:13, 19-24—Jn informs us that when Jesus was arrested he was brought first to Annas, who had held the office of high-priest from A.D. 6 till 15 when he was deposed by the Roman Governor, Valerius Gratus. The high-priest at the time of the Passion was Caiaphas. He was son-in-law of Annas and held office from A.D. 18 till 36. The interrogation of Christ by the high-priest, Jn 18:19-23, was probably an informal examination intended to obtain some evidence which could be used against Jesus when he was brought to trial before the Sanhedrin or the Roman Governor. The Sanhedrin had extensive judicial power. It was competent to pass sentence of death on certain charges, but had not the right to execute the sentence; cf. Jn 18:31; Holzmeister, Hist. Aet. N. Test. (Rome 1932) 82-5; id., Bi 19 (1938) 43-59, 151-74. The Romans reserved that power to their own representative in the subject territories. Consequently, when the Sanhedrin had pronounced sentence of death on Christ on the charge of blasphemy they were obliged to seek ratification and execution of the sentence from Pilate, the Roman Governor, who had the right to review the case in order to satisfy himself that the verdict should be executed.

According to Mk 15:1 and Mt 27:1 there were two meetings of the Sanhedrin, one during the night at which Christ was condemned, the other next morning before he was brought to Pilate. Lk makes no mention of the night session: his account of Christ's condemnation is connected with the meeting of the Sanhedrin held in the morning, Lk 22:66-71. The precise relation of Lk's account to the narrative of Mk and Mt is uncertain. Some authors deny that a formal trial of Christ by the Sanhedrin took place during the night. According to the Talmud it was unlawful to hold a trial by night. On this view the condemnation of Christ took place at the formal trial held in the morning, as described in Lk. The other two Synoptic writers have anticipated in their narrative, giving the story of the condemnation along with their account of certain preparatory investigations conducted by the high-priest and the maltreatment of Christ during the night. Others hold that the second session of the Sanhedrin was necessary in order to remedy the illegality of the trial by night, or because it was not permitted to pronounce a condemnatory sentence at the session in which an accused was found guilty. It is possible that the Sanhedrin, having condemned Christ at the night session on the charge of blasphemy, met again next morning in order to formulate charges which would ensure that Pilate would ratify their verdict and execute the death sentence. Like Gallio at Corinth, Ac 18:12-16, Pilate might have refused to take any action on a charge of a purely religious nature. It was decided, therefore, at the morning session to bring Jesus before Pilate as a political offender because of his Messianic claims; cf. Mk 15:2; Lk 23:2. 53-54. The usual meeting-place of the Sanhedrin was a hall situated at the western side of the temple area. On this occasion, however, possibly because the gates of the temple were shut at night or because of the desire for expedition and secrecy, the representatives of the three groups which formed the Sanhedrin met in the house of Caiaphas. Peter, having overcome the panic which caused him to abandon Christ, now followed at a distance and was brought into the courtyard of the high-priest by another disciple, Jn 18:15. 55-61a. In the Law, Num 35:30; Deut 17:6; 19:15, it was laid down that a man could not be condemned to death except on the concordant evidence of two or three witnesses. The testimony of the first witnesses against Christ was conflicting. The two witnesses who testified that Christ had said he would destroy the temple misrepresented what he had actually said, Jn 2:19. His words were 'Destroy this temple' not 'I will destroy this temple' etc. Moreover, as explained in Jn 2:21, he was speaking of the temple of his own body. Here too the witnesses failed 740g to agree in their testimony. It was not necessarily blasphemous to predict the destruction of the temple or even to say, 'I will destroy the temple'. But the charge brought against Christ would have created prejudice against him among the people. The Sanhedrin would no doubt have regarded it as sufficient ground for condemning Christ to death. Jeremias had been threatened with death for predicting the destruction of the temple, Jer 26:6 ff. One of the charges brought against St Stephen was that he had said 'Jesus of Nazareth will destroy this place', Ac 6:14. When the witnesses failed to agree, Caiphas tried to elicit some statement or explanation from Christ in the hope that he would compromise himself in the hearing of the Sanhedrin. But Jesus remained silent: there was no case for him to answer. 61b-65. Caiphas, having seen the debacle of the false witnesses, feared that the plot of the Sanhedrin might fail completely. He sought, therefore, to obtain from Christ an avowal of his claims which would immediately be condemned as blasphemous by the Sanhedrin. They could then pass sentence of death without reference to any other witnesses. 'Art thou the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed One?', 61b. Jesus was not bound to answer this question, even in deference to the authority of the high-priest. But silence at this time might have been misinterpreted as a disavowal of his claims. Therefore he replied, 'I am. And you shall see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of the Power and coming with the clouds of heaven'. The expressions 'the Blessed One' and 'the Power (of God)' were used by the Jews as substitutes for the name of God. Christ's answer, with its allusions to Ps 109:1 and Dan 7:13, is a clear affirmation both of his Messianic dignity and his divinity. He is not a merely human Messiah, but One who will take his place at the right hand of God, sharing his power. He is Son of God in an altogether unique sense. The Sanhedrin understood that Christ was claiming divinity, making himself equal to God; cf. Jn 5:18. The high-priest rent his garments, this being the customary gesture to express horror at hearing a blasphemy. Merely to claim to be the Messiah was not in itself blasphemy nor punishable by death. It was because Christ claimed to be Son of God in the strict sense, making himself God, Jn 10:33, that the Sanhedrin found him guilty of blasphemy and condemned him to death. 65. From Mk it appears that some members of the Sanhedrin began the maltreatment of Christ, spitting upon him and mocking his prophetic power and knowledge of hidden things by striking him when blindfolded and asking him to name the one who had struck him.

1 66-72 Peter's Denials and Repentance; cf. Mt 26:69-75; Lk 22:54-62; Jn 18:15-18, 25-27—The fact that all four evangelists record this incident, in no way seeking to mitigate Peter's fault, is a remarkable tribute to their reliability. Peter was Head of the Church when the Synoptic Gospels were written, and had won the crown of martyrdom for his faith in Christ when John wrote his Gospel, yet there is no attempt to gloss over his lapse. It is also noteworthy, as an indication of Peter's humility, that the denials are narrated so fully by Mark, whose Gospel is a record of Peter's preaching. All four evangelists agree in recording that Peter denied Christ on three distinct occasions. There are differences in the details of their accounts, but these do not affect the substance of the narrative, nor can they be urged as instances of contradictions between the Gospels. We are not obliged to suppose that Peter uttered only a single denial each time he was challenged. It is altogether more reasonable to hold that, in his panic and confusion, he blurted out denials in different forms especially when challenged by several persons at once. There was room for more than one accurate, though incomplete, account of the denials. None of the evangelists purports to give an exhaustive account. Each one recorded the incidents in his own way, giving the sense of the challenges to Peter and of his denials rather than the actual words.

66-69. The first denial took place when Peter, who had 740j joined the servants gathered round the fire in the courtyard, was challenged by the portress who had admitted him to the high-priest's house at the request of another disciple. Mark alone mentions the crowing of the cock after the first denial. Peter moved from the fire towards the entrance porch where, after an interval, he once more encountered the portress, who was joined by others in charging Peter with being a disciple. 70-72. Some time later Peter was again with the group around the fire. The peculiarities of his speech betrayed the fact that he was a Galilean, and he was identified as a disciple by a relative of Malchus, whose ear he had cut off in Gethsemani. This time Peter sought to strengthen his denials with oaths and curses, calling down God's punishment on himself if his statement was not true. The crowing of the cock reminded Peter of the warning words of Christ, who at that moment was being led away from the hall where he had appeared before the Sanhedrin—'and the Lord turning looked at Peter', Lk 22:61. The Apostle realized the gravity of his fault and showed his repentance by his tears. 72b. 'He began to weep' (ἐπιβαλὼν ἐκλαiven). The exact sense of ἐπιβαλὼν is uncertain, but it probably refers to a sudden overwhelming outburst. 'He burst into sobs and wept', cf. MMV s.v.

XV 1-15a Jesus before Pilate: the Civil Process; 741a

cf. Mt 27:11-26; Lk 23:1-25; Jn 18:28-19:16—1-5. Mk is extremely concise at this point and needs to be clarified by reference to the other evangelists. 1. Probably the chief purpose of the morning session of the Sanhedrin was to decide what charges should be brought against Christ at the tribunal of the Roman Governor; cf. § 740f. Knowing that they could not count upon unquestioning acceptance by Pilate of their own verdict on a purely religious charge, the Sanhedrin kept the charge of blasphemy in the background and brought Christ before Pilate as a political offender—'we have found this man perverting our nation and forbidding to pay tribute to Caesar and asserting that he is the Messiah, a king', Lk 23:2. As the representative of Rome, Pilate was obliged to take notice of these accusations. 2. The Messianic claim of Jesus had been represented to Pilate as a claim to political kingship of the Jews, and, consequently, sedition against the Emperor. 2b 'Thou sayest it' (ὁὐ λέγεις). According to some authors this is a non-committal answer = 'It is you who say it'. More probably it is to be understood as an affirmative = 'It is as you say'. A fuller account of the questioning of Christ by Pilate, given in Jn 18:33-38, shows that Christ explained that his kingship was not an earthly one in opposition to the authority of Rome. Pilate was satisfied that the charge of sedition was unfounded. 3-5. Having reached the decision that Jesus was not guilty of sedition, Pilate should have brought the trial to an end and set him free. But when he announced that he could find no crime in him, Lk 23:4; Jn 18:38, the chief priests persisted, 'he is stirring up the people, teaching throughout all Judaea, beginning from Galilee even to this place', Lk 23:5. Pilate, knowing that the anxiety of the Sanhedrin for the interests of Rome was a pretence, questioned Jesus again, probably hoping to discover the real motive of the animosity of the Jews. But Christ remained silent: he had already made his position clear to Pilate. 6-11. The sending of Christ to Herod Antipas, Lk 23:6-12, was the first of Pilate's attempts to find a way out of his difficulty. He knew that Jesus was innocent and was anxious to set him free, yet he was afraid to offend the Jews, lest they should denounce him to the Emperor for negligence in dealing with a political agitator. It was by playing on this fear that the Jews finally succeeded in securing the condemnation of Christ, Jn 19:12 f. Having failed to transfer responsibility for the case to Antipas, Pilate now had recourse to another expedient. The custom of releasing at the paschal feast a prisoner selected by the people appeared to provide a way of escape from his embarrassing

741c position. If the people selected Christ, the Sanhedrin would have no pretext for denouncing Pilate. It was natural to expect that the crowds who had acclaimed Christ a few days previously would now exercise their privilege in his favour. But the chief priests stirred up the people to ask for Barabbas then in prison 'with the rioters who had committed murder in the riot'. We cannot tell by what means the crowd were incited to ask for Barabbas in preference to Christ. It is difficult to understand how that choice could have been made by people who had acclaimed Christ at the triumphal entry into Jerusalem. Probably it was the rabble of the city along with the servants of the Sanhedrin who asked for Barabbas. Some are of opinion that Barabbas was not simply a brigand or common criminal, but a prominent figure in a revolutionary group striving to overthrow Roman power in Palestine. By presenting him in the guise of a national hero the chief priests would have been able to influence the people to ask for his release. The Gospels are the only source which inform us that the Roman authority in Palestine recognized the custom of liberating a prisoner at the Pasch. Similar customs are known to have existed elsewhere in the Greek and Roman world. A remarkable parallel to the Gospel story is found in an Egyptian papyrus from c. A.D. 85 which quotes the statement of the Governor of Egypt to a man on trial before him—'You deserved flagellation . . . but I pardon you as a favour to the people' (Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, 229-30). 12-15a. The unexpected turn of events disconcerted Pilate. Forgetting that he alone was the competent judge in the case, he asked what they wished to have done to Jesus. When they called for his crucifixion, Pilate again declared that Jesus had committed no crime which merited the death penalty. But the clamour continued and Pilate finally gave way to the demand under the threat of delation to the Emperor, Jn 19:12 f.

d 15b-20a The Scouring and Crowning with Thorns; cf. Mt 27:26-31; Lk 23:16, 22; Jn 19:1-3—Scouring was a normal preliminary to the execution of the death sentence. It was also inflicted sometimes in order to extort a confession, or as a distinct form of punishment for offences which did not merit the death penalty. One form of scourge had leather thongs weighted with fragments of bone; another consisted of light chains with balls of lead at the end. Roman law did not impose any limit to the number of blows which might be inflicted. In Palestine, where there were no lictors, the scourging was done by soldiers. From Lk and Jn we know that Pilate had not yet sentenced Christ to death when he ordered the scourging. He intended to set Christ free after the scourging, believing that this compromise would appease Christ's enemies. 16. 'And the soldiers led him into the courtyard, that is, the praetorium, and called together the whole cohort'. The name 'praetorium' was originally given to the tent of the commander-in-chief (praetor). In later use it applies to any place where the Emperor or his military representatives exercised the functions of their office. It is disputed whether the praetorium where Christ was mocked and condemned to death was in the palace of Herod or in the fortress Antonia adjoining the temple. The palace of Herod was the usual residence of the Procurators when they visited Jerusalem. It is probable, however, that at the Pasch and other great feasts Pilate moved into the fortress Antonia where he could more easily keep the crowds under observation and take prompt action to quell disturbances. Recent archaeological findings appear to favour this view; cf. Vincent, RB 42 (1933) 85-113.

f 17-20a. The pitiable condition to which Christ was reduced by the scourging aroused no sympathy in the soldiers. In a mock coronation and parody of homage they ridiculed his claim to be king. The purple garment, probably a soldier's scarlet cloak, represented the royal purple; the crown of thorns and the reed placed in Christ's hand, Mt 27:29, represented the crown and sceptre. It was probably on their own initiative that the soldiers indulged in this brutal mockery of Christ. 741f After the scourging and mockery Pilate brought forth Jesus wearing the crown of thorns and the purple garment, Jn 19:4 f. He thought that the sight of his wretched state would satisfy the Jews' desire for punishment. But they still cried out for his crucifixion. Pilate, intimidated, passed the death sentence.

20b-41 The Crucifixion and Death of Jesus; cf. Mt 27:31-56; Lk 23:26-49; Jn 19:16-37—The evangelists do not give a detailed account of the crucifixion, because their readers were familiar with this form of punishment. It was well known in the Roman empire, particularly as the penalty for slaves condemned for serious crimes, though freedmen or provincials found guilty of sedition and, sometimes, even Roman citizens were put to death in this way. The more common type of cross consisted of two lengths of timber, an upright and a crossbeam. These were not fixed together in the familiar form of cross until crucifixion took place. In Rome, the condemned person, stripped of his garments, carried the crossbeam to the place of execution, being subjected to indignities and ill-treatment on the way. A placard announcing his crime was carried before him or hung from his neck. At the place of execution, it seems that the hands of the condemned person were fastened to the crossbeam, usually with nails, and then he was lifted on to the upright beam which was already in position. A projecting block on the upright served as a 'saddle' to support the body; the crossbeam was secured to the upright at the top or in a socket lower down, and the feet were nailed or tied with cords. Death was sometimes hastened by breaking the legs or by other means; cf. Holzmeister VD 14 (1934) 149-55, 216-20, 241-9, 257-63. Christ was crucified by four Roman soldiers, Jn 19:23, under the command of a centurion, Mk 15:39. We know from Jn 20:20, 25, 27 and Lk 24:39 f. that his hands and feet were fastened with nails. On some points it is uncertain how far the manner of Christ's crucifixion may have differed from the usual Roman practice. It is widely held that Christ carried the whole Cross, not merely the crossbeam. Mk 15:20 'they put his clothes on him, and led him out to crucify him' indicates that Christ was still clothed in his own garments on the way to Calvary. Most of the ancient writers believed that Christ was completely naked on the Cross. But it is not improbable that, in Palestine, the Romans respected Jewish feeling and custom in this matter and allowed some kind of covering.

20b-32 The Crucifixion—Christ was led forth from the praetorium carrying his cross, but when the soldiers saw that he was too weak to carry it to the place of execution they exercised their right to requisition services and compelled Simon of Cyrene to carry it for him. The mention of Simon's sons shows that they were known to the Christians of Rome for whom Mark wrote his Gospel. Rufus was probably the man to whom St Paul sent greetings in Rom 16:13; cf. 725c. 'Golgotha' is the Gk transcription of the Aramaic word 'gūlgūlā' = 'skull'; Latin, 'Calvaria'. The name probably alludes to the shape of the slight eminence on which the crucifixion took place. 23. It was a Jewish custom to give wine mixed with myrrh to condemned persons in order to deaden their senses (Strack-Billerbeck 1, 1037). Christ refused to alleviate his sufferings in this way. 24. In accordance with accepted practice, the garments of the crucified became the spoil of the soldiers who executed the sentence. 25. 'Now it was the third hour when they crucified him'. This appears to contradict Jn 19:14, which informs us that it was about the sixth hour when Pilate condemned Christ. Some hold that the discrepancy is due to a copyist's error. Probably, however, Mk is following a division of the day into four periods of three hours each, cf. 15:1 (morning); 15:25 (the third hour); 15:33 (the sixth hour); 15:34 (the ninth hour). 'The third hour' covers the whole period from about nine until midday. Christ was condemned before midday, and the soldiers took him straightway to 7426 the place of crucifixion. 26. The inscription placed on the Cross was the official placard proclaiming the charge on which Jesus had been condemned. 27. The crucifixion of the robbers on either side of Christ seems to have been intended to throw contempt on his claims by associating him with common criminals. This added humiliation was a literal fulfilment of the prophecy of Is 53:12 'he was counted with the evil-doers'. 28 is missing in some MSS and it is doubtful whether it is authentic. 29-30. Calvary was outside the walls but close to the city, Jn 19:20. The passers-by who railed at Jesus had probably been turned against him by garbled reports, put out by the Sanhedrin, of what he had said about the temple and what had transpired at the trial. 31-32. The chief priests and Scribes ridiculed Christ's kingship and taunted him with the miracles he had performed. By paying this involuntary tribute to his supernatural power they condemned themselves. 'He rose from the dead and you did not believe: even if he were to descend from the cross, you would not believe', Jerome, PL 26, 211. 32b. Lk 23:39-43 informs us that one of the robbers rebuked his fellow for reviling Christ. It is possible that both robbers at first joined in insulting him, but that one of them later repented of his conduct. More probably the plural 'robbers' in Mk and Mt 27:44 is indefinite. The evangelists simply mention another quarter from which insults were offered to Jesus without intending to specify the exact number of those who took part.

d 33-41 The Death of Jesus—33. The evangelist evidently regarded the darkness, which began at mid-day and lasted until Christ's death three hours later, as a portent caused by special divine intervention. It was a sign of the judgement of God on those responsible for the crucifixion of Christ. The Jews should have recalled passages in the writings of the prophets, e.g. Am 8:9, where the imagery of the darkening of the sun is used to describe the intervention of God in judgement upon men. It is not possible to determine the exact nature or the immediate cause of the phenomenon. The darkness was not the result of an ordinary eclipse of the sun. This was impossible at the Pasch, as the moon was then at the full. Some hold that God miraculously withheld the sun's rays; others think that God prevented the rays of the sun from reaching the earth by interposing dense layers of cloud. Lagrange (Saint Marc, 432) suggests a miraculous intensification of the gloom brought about in Jerusalem at the beginning of April by the clouds of sand and dust blown by the sirocco. 33b. 'Over the whole land'. It is not necessary to hold that the darkness extended to the whole earth. Many writers think that the reference is only to Judaea. Probably the evangelist meant simply that the whole horizon was darkened—he was not thinking of the exact geographical extension. 34 gives the Aramaic translation of the opening words of Ps 21 (22). This Psalm is the prayer of the just man who, though surrounded by enemies and in deep distress, looks confidently to God for deliverance. The words 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' are a cry of distress wrung from the just man by the taunts and sufferings which God allows his enemies to inflict on him. There is no note of despair in that cry: confidence in God remains unshaken: cf. Ps 21:10, 25. Christian tradition recognizes the Messianic sense of the Psalm, which finds complete fulfilment only in Christ: 'it contains the whole Passion of Christ' (Tertullian, Adv. Marcion. 3, 19). Christ, the Just One par excellence, made the cry of the Psalmist his own on the Cross with far more perfect sentiments of submission and confidence in God. The desolation felt in the human soul of Christ is given expression in the Psalmist's words. But there is no question of despair or of abandonment of the humanity by the divinity. Christ was abandoned by God only in the sense that God did not spare him the sufferings of the Passion and Crucifixion, but allowed his enemies to work their will on him. 35-36. The bystanders who said 'he calleth Elias' had confused the word 'Eloi' = 'my God' with the name 'Elias'. This may have been a genuine mistake, though the Scribes who were present could scarcely have failed to recognize the words of the Psalm. It was a common belief, Mk 9:8-12, that the prophet Elias would return to anoint the Messiah and make him known to the world. The idea that Jesus, as he hung on the Cross, was calling to Elias for assistance, gave a fresh opportunity for sarcastic gibes. One of the soldiers, hearing Jesus say 'I thirst', Jn 19:28, soaked a sponge in the mixture of water and vinegar called pasca which was the soldiers' ordinary drink, and raised it to Jesus' lips. The soldier was moved by compassion, but apparently because of hostility among the bystanders to this kind deed, he sought to excuse his action by joining in the mockery—this relief to the crucified would give Elias time to come to his assistance! 37. The words which Jesus uttered in a loud voice were probably 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit', Lk 23:46. Many patristic writers and modern exegetes regard this loud cry uttered at the point of death as indicative both of the divinity of Christ and of the fact that he died of his own free will. It is not clear, however, that in the circumstances the loud cry just before death necessarily implies more than human power in Christ. The words spoken show that he retained full consciousness and complete self-control to the end. Christ's death was voluntary: he had the power to lay down his life and the power to take it up again, Jn 10:17 f., but he freely accepted and fully carried out the divine plan for our redemption, knowing that this involved his own death on the Cross. His last words are a renewed expression of his voluntary acceptance of the sacrifice of his life for the redemption of men. 38. It is uncertain whether the veil which was rent in two was the outer veil which hung at the entrance to the sanctuary, or the inner veil which separated the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies. The exact significance of this event is also doubtful. According to some, the rending of the inner veil was a manifestation of God's power which signified that by the death of Christ the way into the heavenly sanctuary was thrown open and the Mosaic economy with its ritual was abrogated; cf. Heb 6:20; 9:9 f.; 10:19 f. Others, holding that it was the outer veil which was rent, interpret the event as a sign that by Christ's death the mysteries which concerned the Church were revealed, the inner veil remaining as a symbol of the truths to be revealed in the heavenly kingdom. 39. The centurion was impressed by the bearing of Christ during the Passion, by the rapidity of his death and by the loud cry which he had uttered before dying, and also by the darkness and the earthquake, Mt 27:54. He had heard of Jesus' claim to be the Son of God, and in the manner and circumstances of his death saw proof that the claim was well-founded. It is doubtful whether the centurion understood the full significance of the title, 'Son of God'; cf. Lk 23:47, 'Indeed this was a just man'. His confession at least attests the honest conviction that Jesus was innocent and that he was no ordinary human being. 40-41. We know from Jn 19:25 that our Lady was near the Cross. Of the other women who saw the Crucifixion Mark names only the three who came to the tomb to anoint Christ's body on the morning of the Resurrection.

42-47 The Burial of Jesus; cf. Mt 27:57-61; Lk 23:50-56; Jn 19:38-42.—It was the Roman custom to leave the bodies of those who were crucified to decay on the cross or to be devoured by wild animals and vultures, unless friends obtained permission to remove a body for burial. Jewish law, however, prescribed that the body of one hanged should be buried the same day, Deut 21:23, and this regulation was applied also to those who were crucified; cf. Jos., B.J. 6, 5, 2. 42. The crucifixion of Christ took place on Friday (cf. § 738e). 'Parasceve': παρασκευή = 'preparation', i.e. the day of preparation for the Sabbath. The obligation of sabbath-rest began at sunset, and as the Sabbath on this occasion coincided with the first day of the Pasch, it was all the more imperative, in 742h the eyes of the Sanhedrin, that the bodies of the crucified should be buried before sunset, as the Law prescribed. Consequently, they asked Pilate to hasten death by breaking the legs of the victims so that the bodies could be taken away, Jn 19:31-37. If our Lord's friends had not intervened his body would probably have been cast into a common grave with the bodies of the two robbers. Joseph of Arimathea, though a member of the Sanhedrin, had not consented to their decision and deeds; he was a good and just man, and, secretly, a disciple of Jesus, Lk 23:50 f.; Jn 19:38. Availing himself of his standing as a member of the supreme council of the Jews to have access to the Roman Governor, he secured permission to take away the body for burial. 44. Pilate was surprised that Jesus had died so quickly. Persons condemned to death by crucifixion usually lingered on the cross for a much longer period, sometimes even for days. Jesus, however, had endured exceptional sufferings and torments from the time of the Agony in Gethsemani. 46. In removing the body of Christ from the Cross and preparing it for burial, Joseph had the assistance of Nicodemus, Jn 19:39. Christ's burial-place was a tomb newly hewn out of the rock in which no body had previously been laid. It belonged to Joseph and was close to Calvary, Jn 19:42. The Gospels, Mk 15:46; Lk 24:12; Jn 20:5, 12, bear out the presumption that it resembled other Jewish tombs of the period, some of which can still be seen near Jerusalem. An outer chamber or vestibule hollowed out in the rock is connected by a low doorway with the inner or burial-chamber which contains recesses for the bodies. At the entrance to the tomb a large circular stone standing on its edge could be rolled into position to close the tomb or rolled aside into a groove cut in the rock. The customary Jewish ritual of preparation of a body for burial included washing and anointing and wrapping of the body in grave-clothes. The Gospels give the impression that the preparations for the burial of Christ were carried out hurriedly. The sabbath rest began at sunset, and there was no time to spare. The very brevity of Mk's narrative suggests haste.

743a XVI 1-18 The Resurrection and Apparitions of Christ; cf. Mt 28; Lk 24; Jn 20-21-1-8. The Women at the Tomb. When the Sabbath ended at sunset on Saturday the women bought unguents with which to anoint Christ's body. Mary Magdalen and Mary the mother of James and Joseph had watched the placing of Christ's body in the tomb. They must, therefore, have known that a mixture of myrrh and aloes brought by Nicodemus had been used in the burial, Jn 19:39 f. But apparently they felt that, because of the haste on that occasion, the burial rites had been performed only in a summary, even provisional fashion. They proposed to complete the rites by anointing the body. 2b. 'the sun being now risen'; cf. Jn 20:1 'when it was yet dark'. This discrepancy is eliminated in some MSS of Mk which read 'as the sun was rising'. According to some authors, who hold that the women purchased the unguents on their way to the tomb on Sunday morning, Jn refers to the time when they set out, Mk to the time when they reached the tomb. Probably both evangelists should be understood as referring to the brief period after sunrise before darkness disappears completely. 3-8. The stone at the entry to the tomb had been rolled back by an angel, Mt 28:2. It was quite natural that the women should wonder how they would have it removed, as it was very large. A man would probably have needed some kind of lever to roll it back. Mary Magdalen may have reached the tomb ahead of the others. Apparently she did not delay when she saw that the stone was rolled back, but immediately went to Peter and John, Jn 20:2 ff. The other women, possibly believing that the stone had been rolled back by some of the disciples, entered the tomb. A young man, i.e. an angel, seated on the ledge at the right side of the tomb told them that the crucified Jesus of Nazareth whom they sought had arisen from the dead, and instructed them to inform 'the disciples and especially Peter that he goeth before you into Galilee'. 743b The special mention of Peter, recorded only by Mk, was a sign that he had been forgiven and retained his position as head of the Apostles. The women were so filled with fear that they delayed in delivering the angel's message; cf. Mt 28:8; Lk 24:9.

9-18 Apparitions of Christ—At this point there is a break in the continuity of Mk. The abrupt final phrase in 8 'for they were afraid' leaves the story of the women unfinished. In 9 Mary Magdalen is introduced and identified, Lk 8:2, as if this were the first time she has figured in the narrative. The statement that Christ had arisen, 9, is not linked with the angel's words. The whole final section of the Gospel, 9-20, appears to follow a different plan from that of 1-8. Instead of the typically Marcan narrative, with picturesque detail and other graphic touches, we have a rapid, detached summary of events between the Resurrection and the Ascension. A number of the words and expressions which occur in the passage are not found elsewhere in Mk. In view of this internal evidence, it has been questioned whether this is the original ending of the Gospel and whether it comes from the pen of St Mark; cf. § 726a, b.

9-11. The appearance of Christ to Mary Magdalen is described more fully in Jn 20:11-18. 'appeared first to Mary Magdalen'. This statement does not exclude the possibility of an earlier apparition to our Lady. The evangelists were concerned with those apparitions which had a certain public, official character. The appearances to the Apostles were the foundation of the Church's teaching, and those to Mary Magdalen and to the other women were a reward for their fidelity and a preparation for the manifestation of Christ to the Apostles and disciples; cf. Lagrange, Saint Marc, 449. 12-13. The apparition to the two disciples is described at length in Lk 24:13-35. 'he was manifested in another form'. It seems that Christ's outward appearance had undergone some change which made it difficult to recognize him; cf. Jn 20:14; 21:4. 14. The narrative has emphasized the unwillingness of the Apostles to believe the reports of the Resurrection. Their unbelief is overcome only by the appearance of Christ in their midst; cf. Lk 24:25-43; Jn 20:19-28. Christ reproached them for their unbelief and hardness of heart. The rebuke is more severe than any other administered to them by Christ; cf. Mk 4:40; 8:17. In view of his repeated prophecies of the Passion and Resurrection, they should have been more ready to accept the word of those who had seen the risen Christ. 15. The command given to the Eleven is similar to that which was addressed to them by Christ at the mountain in Galilee where he had directed them to meet him, Mt 28:16-20. The narrative here, 15, does not mark clearly the change to a scene different from that described in 14. This does not imply, however, that the author meant to convey that these instructions were given to the Apostles on the occasion when Christ first appeared to them. The account is simply a summary which does not purport to give precise indications of time or place. The Apostles are commanded to preach the Gospel of salvation to all men throughout the world. The Gospel and the salvation which it brings are for all without exception. 16. Those who hear the message of the Gospel must accept it with faith and be incorporated with Christ by baptism, if they are to share in the supernatural salvation which he has merited by his death. Refusal to believe the Gospel means rejection of the proffered salvation and involves eternal condemnation. 17-18. When sending the Apostles on a temporary mission in Palestine, 3:14 f.; 6:7, 13, Christ gave them power to cast out demons in order to strengthen the appeal of their preaching. Now he promises to believers miraculous signs to guarantee the truth and divine origin of the doctrine which they had accepted; cf. Heb 2:4. The promise is made to the community of the faithful rather than to each individual believer. In the early days of the Church, possibly because of a greater need 743f for extraordinary signs in order to move a sceptical and hostile world to which the Gospel and Church were still new, some of these manifestations of miraculous power were more frequent than in later times. But Christ's promise is not limited to a particular period. In every age miracles have given proof that Christ abides with the Church. 'cast out devils'; cf. Ac 8:6 f.; 16:16 ff. Irenaeus (cf. Eus., HE 5, 7, 4-6) and other early writers speak of numerous instances of casting out demons. 'speak with new tongues'; cf. Ac 2:3 ff.; 10:46; 19:6; 1 Cor 14. 'take up serpents'; cf. Ac 28:3 ff.; Lk 10:19. 'shall lay their hands upon the sick'; cf. Ac 28:8.

- g 19 The Ascension; cf. Lk 24:50-53; Ac 1:9-11—'after he had spoken to them': this does not mean that the Ascension took place immediately after Christ had given the Apostles the command to preach the Gospel throughout the world. In this brief summary the author 743g does little more than allude to the different events without marking the changes of time and place. 'has taken his seat at the right hand of God'; cf. 14:62. In this metaphorical expression the author proclaims his faith in the divinity of Christ 'who was manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, revealed to angels, proclaimed among the nations, believed in the world, taken up in glory', 1 Tim 3:16. The glorified Christ sits at the right hand of God, equal to the Father in dignity and power.

20 Conclusion—The Apostles had evidently preached the Gospel in many districts outside Palestine when these words were written. Christ was no longer visibly present on earth, but he assisted the Apostles and set the divine seal on their preaching by the miracles which followed it, Heb 2:3 f., thus fulfilling the promise, 'Behold I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world', Mt 28:20.

THE GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST ACCORDING TO ST LUKE

b Author—'Thirdly, Luke the Physician, by nation a Syrian of Antioch, whose praise is in the gospel, and who himself was a disciple of the Apostle Paul, wrote (volumen condidit) in the districts of Achaia and Boeotia, seeking material from the ancients (quaedam altius repetens) and, as he admits in his preface, writing rather from hearsay than from eye-witness'. Thus St Jerome in his commentary on Matthew sums up the unvarying tradition traceable as far back as the Muratorian Fragment and the Adv. Haer. of St Irenaeus which date from the 2nd cent. Firm tradition, backed by internal evidence, shows that Luke was also the author of Acts. His name—Lucas, Λουκάς—is in all probability an abbreviation of Lucanus or of Λούκιος, the latter being the Greek form of the Latin Lucius, which is the sort of praenomen that would be assumed by a Greek on the acquisition of Roman citizenship. He may have been a freedman if not a full Roman citizen. Some wish to identify him with Lucius of Cyrene, Ac 13:1, in view especially of Cyrene's repute as a centre of medical study. 'Luke the most dear physician', Col 4:14, was St Paul's companion during the Roman imprisonment (61–3), and there is much to be said for Harnack's suggested translation, 'the beloved Luke, my doctor'. There is good reason for thinking that the Apostle stood in need of medical attention, and it may have been in such capacity that Luke accompanied him. The attribution of Syrian nationality to Luke should not be exaggerated; it probably indicates no more than the enjoyment of citizen rights at Antioch, the Syrian capital. To all intents and purposes Antioch was a Greek city, owing its foundation to the Alexandrine conquest of the East. Josephus speaks of 'the Macedonians and Greeks who were the inhabitants' of the city (Ant. 12, 3, 1), and it became the main channel for Greek culture flowing eastwards. Thus its situation and character were ideal for the spread of the Gospel westwards, for the introduction to a Greek world of a faith which had such origins as the faith of Christ. It was there that the disciples lost their national character and appellation, and under the new Greek title of Χριστιανοί were recognized as a group distinct from the Jews; Ac 11:26. This is in complete accord with the character and spirit of the third Gospel, and it seems likely that its author was one of numerous Greeks who first accepted faith in Christ at Antioch; Ac 11:20. We incline to the opinion that Luke was of European origin, perhaps descended from Greek or Macedonian colonists settled in Antioch. He was very familiar with Antiochian events; Ac 11:19–27; 13:1; 14:18–21, 25; 15:22–35; 18:22. Confirmation is added by the manner in which Paul groups him with his Greek disciples (Col 4:14, Phm 24), and by the irreproachable Greek style of Lk and Ac which marks off their author clearly from the other NT writers, all of Hebrew origin (except perhaps the writer of Heb). Luke's association with Paul and the Apostles is affirmed by Scripture and tradition. Jerome's words 'whose praise is in the gospel' are taken from 2 Cor 8:18, and the nameless preacher (there is no question of a written gospel) is traditionally identified with Luke, who remained Paul's constant companion from about 50 to the Apostle's death in 67. Their first recorded meeting was at Troas when Paul was about to begin his first mission to Europe, Ac 16:10. Luke goes to Philippi, remains there to carry on the work at Paul's departure, and is there collected by him on the last return to Jerusalem, c 58; Ac 16:10–40; 20:5 ff. Remaining in Palestine during Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea, 58–60 (some hold that the Gospel was written at this time) he accompanies him to Rome for the appeal to the imperial law-courts, staying there for the two years while the case awaits trial. On the successful outcome of the appeal it may be surmised that Luke joined him during his few remaining years of apostolic work, for we find him still with Paul during the latter's second imprisonment at Rome, 2 Tim 4:11, which ended with the Apostle's martyrdom. A tradition traceable to c 200 states that Luke wrote his Gospel in Achaia, where he had preached, and that he died in Bithynia (probably a mistake for Boeotia). Later traditions make him a painter and one of the Seventy-two, the latter most unlikely.

Date—This may be fixed with reasonable certitude from the evidence provided by Luke himself. He wrote Ac after the Gospel, therefore if we can fix the date of Ac this gives the latest limit for Lk. Now the evidence of Ac forces us to the conclusion that it was written in or shortly before 63. For the chronology of St Paul we base our conclusions on the work of Brassac (Une Inscription de Delphes et la Chronologie de St Paul, RB [1913] 36–53, 207–17) who fixes the first Roman imprisonment 61–3. Now it is against all likelihood, and at variance with the known character and style of Lk, that he would have left his reader in doubt about the outcome of Paul's appeal to Caesar, had he known it when he finished Ac. The arbitrary suggestion that he left the question pending because he had in mind to write a 'third treatise' has no foundation. On the contrary, the decision of the Biblical Commission (cf. § 511) directing Catholic scholars to the evidence in favour of dating Ac towards the end of the first Roman imprisonment has all the reason on its side. Added confirmation is provided by the fact that Ac throughout shows the Roman authorities in an accommodating attitude towards the Church; there is no suggestion of the violent persecution which began under Nero after the fire of Rome, July 64, a persecution which put the faith under the imperial ban and brought St Peter to martyrdom. There are two objections to consider, the first hardly meriting serious attention, viz. that Lk shows dependence on Josephus and therefore must have been written not earlier than the end of the 1st cent, but the asserted dependence is unproven. The second, more grave, is Irenaeus' assertion (Adv. Haer. 3, 1, 1) that Mk did not write his Gospel until after the deaths of Peter and Paul. But as Lk is the third and shows a clear dependence 744g on Mk, it follows that Lk would have to be dated in or after 67, the date of Paul's martyrdom. Efforts have been made to interpret the words of Irenaeus in a manner more favourable to an earlier date (cf. Chapman, JTS [1905] 563 ff.); but with Lagrange we prefer to doubt the unsupported assertion of Irenaeus. Rationalist critics on a priori grounds demand a late date because of Lk's more detailed description of the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Our conclusion is that Lk was composed before the end of 63; Harnack said c 60.

h Contents and Plan—Lk completes the trio of the Synoptic Gospels and as such follows the general scheme of Mt and Mk: the preaching of John the Baptist, the Baptism and Temptation of Jesus, the ministry in Galilee and the Transfiguration, the journey up to Jerusalem, the ministry in and around the Holy City followed by the Passion, concluding with the Resurrection and Ascension. Such appear to have been the lines of the primitive catechesis of the Gospel indicated by Peter at the first meeting of the Apostles after the Ascension, Ac 1:21–22. Thus most of Mk is contained in Lk; in addition Lk contains much of that which distinguishes Mt from Mk. But further, Lk contains a good deal wholly proper to itself that we owe to Luke's diligent researches into the origins of the Gospel story; it is twice as long as Mk and considerably longer than Mt. Of its twenty miracles six are proper, as are eighteen of its parables. The long Infancy Narrative, which forms one-eighth of Lk, is completely proper save for a word or two in Mt. Finally the long Journey Narrative, 9:51–18:30, erroneously called the Peraean Ministry, is to a large extent Lk's own. Like Mt and unlike Mk, he gives a number of the discourses of Jesus; but while Mt prefers to gather the discourses and sayings into a unity, Lk follows a different kind of order, distributing them throughout his narrative and placing them in their suitable settings. 'In Mk (and in Mt if he knew the whole of it) Lk would find proof of a considerable gap. Mk is not unaware of the fact that Jesus had preached in Judaea, but he chooses to restrict himself to Galilee. . . . Lk discovered what had happened during a mission of Jesus in Judaea covering several months, and he has given an account of it, but place, occasions, characters, no longer stand out as they would in an account by St Peter . . . Hence in this whole section, peculiar to Lk and of priceless worth, we do not get the details that characterize the story of the lake-side' (Lagr., GJC I 5). The purpose of the Gospel is defined in its opening words which recall Jn 20:30–31; Lk has gone to great pains in searching out the exact origins of the Gospel history and in setting everything down 'in order', so that his reader may know the security of the truths in which he has already been 'catechized', i.e. instructed by word of mouth; the word plainly suggests the primitive catechesis of the Gospel and, according to Harnack, should here be taken in its strict sense: 'The third Gospel is, in the full force of the term, an evangelium εὐαγγέλιον, i.e. the announcement of good tidings. These good tidings tell of the Messiah's coming and of his work, which is to offer salvation to mankind. In Ac Luke has told how these good tidings spread from Jerusalem and, after various wanderings, reach Rome itself. In the Gospel he has shown how the good tidings came down from heaven to Jerusalem first of all, then to Nazareth and eventually to Bethlehem. The word then spreads over all Israel and finally comes back to Jerusalem, where the work of salvation is brought to its fitting completion' (Lagr. Lk xxxiv). Lk falls easily into six clearly defined parts which we follow Lagrange in entitling thus:

- (1) The Infancy Narrative, the dawn of salvation, 1:5–2:52.
- (2) The investiture of Jesus with his Messianic office, 3:1–4:13.
- (3) The manifestation of the Saviour in Galilee, 4:14–9:50.

- (4) Insistent preaching on salvation, 9:51–18:30.
- (5) Arrival at Jerusalem and the Passion, 18:31–23:56.
- (6) The Resurrection and Ascension, 24:1–53.

Sources—Luke indicates them himself: first many 745a written accounts of the Gospel history, and secondly those persons 'who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word', 1:1–2. Ancient commentators were inclined to interpret 'word' as the proper name of the Son of God after the fashion of Jn's prologue, but Lk and Ac commonly use it to mean the teaching of doctrine. We need not conclude (though some have done so) that Lk disapproves of the written documents to which he refers, hence we need not exclude Mt and Mk from among them. It is antecedently probable that there were a great many written accounts of the life and teachings of Jesus, in whole or in part, during the early years of the Church; it would be surprising if there were not. Knowing Luke as we do from his writings, it is also antecedently probable that such a careful writer and exact historian would neglect no opportunity of familiarising himself with what had been written on a subject he had so much at heart. He tells us, 1:3, that he had been a diligent inquirer 'from the beginning' ἀνωθεν—not to be confused with the 'from the beginning' ἀπ' ἀρχῆς of 1:2. Origen says that ἀνωθεν should be translated 'now for a long time', i.e. the matter had been a pre-occupation of Lk since the time of his conversion years before. His opportunities of consulting those who had come into contact with Jesus may be gathered from a consideration of Luke's own history. He spent long periods in Palestine, Antioch and Rome. It will be observed that whenever St Paul mentions him, Mark is always in the company; Col 4:10, 14, Phm 24, 2 Tim 4:11. Luke mentions others who could have furnished him with information: Joanna, wife of Chusa, Herod's steward, Susanna, and 'many other (women) who ministered unto (Jesus) of their substance', 8:3. With regard to the Infancy Narrative it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the repeated remark of 2:19 and 2:51 is intended to indicate that the Mother of Jesus herself is the direct or indirect source of his information. Some modern scholars maintain that the Semitic character of the Infancy Narrative shows that Luke used an Aramaic written source; it is possible but there are other explanations of Lk's Semitisms. As Plummer so well says, Lk is the most versatile of all the NT writers. He can be Hebraistic in describing Hebrew society and Greek when describing Greek society. His relationship to Mt and Mk in the parts 745b common to him and them is disputed among scholars of the greatest authority. In our opinion the following brief conclusions seem best to account for the facts. First that Lk shows dependence on Mk for much material and order of events, though without any slavish copying. Where the Synoptists march together Lk prefers the order of Mk, omitting however and transposing where his purpose requires. His aim is chiefly to present Jesus the Jewish Messiah to his Gentile readers as the divine Saviour of all mankind, and to present him in a manner calculated to inspire confidence in those hitherto considered by the Jews as outside the pale, sinners and objects of divine wrath by their very birth; cf. Eph 2:3; Gal 2:15. This stands out in the sections peculiar to Lk; in parts common to Lk and Mk his omissions create the same impression. He passes over details which tend to leave an impression of severity towards non-Jews, e.g. the incident of the Gentile woman of Syro-Phoenicia, Mk 7:25 ff. For a similar reason he omits things too characteristically Jewish to be of interest to Gentile readers. Again it is characteristic of him to pass over details unbecoming to the dignity of Christ, e.g. the attribution of madness by his relatives, manifestations of human emotion (though not always); he omits remarks derogatory of the dignity of the Apostles; he dislikes repetitions and abundance of detail, and finally 745c

745d he leaves out larger passages which would no doubt hinder him from including those proper parts which he intends to add to the narrative of Mt and Mk. His relation to Greek Mt is harder to define, but again, considering the antecedent probabilities, it is hard to believe that a man of Luke's disposition and opportunities could have remained ignorant of such an important document as Aramaic Mt, the only account at that time known to have been written by an Apostle.

e Official Catholic teaching (cf. § 50e) is that our Gk-Mt is substantially identical with Ar-Mt, but who translated the latter and when is a matter of conjecture. It may not have existed in Greek at the time of Luke's writing, but there could have been no great difficulty in the way of his learning the contents. As he would have known that its chief advantage over Mk was the fact that it contained a long collection of the discourses of Jesus, there is nothing improbable in the supposition that he may well have obtained or found a Greek translation of these discourses. In the large sections of Mt and Lk devoted to the sayings of Jesus (reckoned as one sixth of each Gospel, though the sayings are scattered through Lk) the similarities are so obvious that there seems to be either interdependence or else a common source for both. In reply to those who maintain that Gk-Mt seems rather dependent on Lk than vice-versa, it may be said that this can be explained by the possibility that the Greek translator made use of Lk in those parts common to Lk and Ar-Mt. For fuller discussion of the relations between Mt, Mk and Lk see article on The Synoptic Problem, §§ 610-5.

f Character of the Gospel—Bearing in mind who the author is—not merely a healer of men's bodily ills but a 'beloved physician'; a convert from Gentile paganism to faith in a Christ who is a divine healer of men's spiritual maladies; a devoted follower of St Paul, the preacher of universal salvation in Christ Jesus—this Gospel manifests precisely the character to be expected of it. Plummer points out that its first words recall those with which Hippocrates begins his treatise On Ancient Medicine, and we may note that the benign spirit of Lk calls to mind the old Hippocratic oath taken by medical students. They swore that they would honour and obey their teacher, care for his children in need, help their patients to the best of their ability, never supply them with poison or perform unlawful operations, never abuse their position but always enter a house as a friend and helper. Biblical critics, orthodox and unorthodox, join in praising Lk as the most touching and beautiful book ever written, outstanding for its note of joy at the loving-kindness of God and for its deep sympathy with the sorrows of suffering humanity. But Luke is no mere sentimentalist. He insists with repeated emphasis also on the necessity of absolute self-surrender for all who would profit by the goodness of God and the tenderness of the Saviour. It is a Gospel of renunciation of a most stark character, and the chief example of that is the Saviour himself. Attention may be drawn to the following salient points: (1) Luke's qualities as a genuine historian and literary artist of great merit; (2) his insistence on the joyful character of the good tidings of the Gospel, the solution of both the moral and social evils of the world; (3) his emphasis on the necessity of prayer, exemplified by additional instances in the life of Christ; (4) the important place he assigns to those women who were associated with Christ, to his Mother first of all. Tradition has made Luke the patron of Christian art, and even if he never wielded the painter's brush, without question he has used his pen with an art that has furnished the chief inspiration of Christian painters all down the ages, providing them with the subjects of which they are fondest: the childhood of Jesus at Bethlehem, Nazareth and Jerusalem, the widow's son, the prodigal, the disciples at Emmaus. In like manner the liturgy of the Church draws largely from Lk: the Gloria in excelsis, Benedictus, Magnificat, Nunc Dimittis, while the Joyful Mysteries of the Rosary give us the Infancy Narrative in the form of prayer. 745g Few writers have stood such severe tests of historical accuracy as Luke, yet he comes out triumphant under every test. Adverse critics have repeatedly attacked him as unreliable and even dishonest, but in every case it is the critics who are eventually put to shame. Even Harnack has to blush for 'the truly pitiful history' of their criticisms and the party prejudice which blinds them to the facts that tell against them. Today every biblical scholar worthy of repute accepts with little reserve the verdict of Ramsay that Luke is a great and accurate historian. Every advance in scholarly research has so far completely justified the claim with which Luke begins his Gospel, that like a good historian he has verified his facts before setting them in order. That order is not a chronological stringing together of unrelated facts, a procedure which would have offended both the canons adopted by the classical historical models which he consciously imitates, and also the spirit of rational philosophy characteristic of the Greek world in which he had received his education. Not that Luke lightly neglects chronological sequence; but what he chiefly seeks is the logical concatenation of events out of which grows the object he always keeps in view, 'that thou mayest know the security of those things in which thou hast been catechized', 1:4. This introduces us to the second point above noted, the joyful character of Lk. It is not mere human history but the divine history of man's salvation, summed up here in the word evangelium εὐαγγέλιον, a word he never uses, but its verbal form εὐαγγελίζεω is found in such significant places as 1:19; 2:10; 3:18; 4:18, 43; 7:22. εὐαγγελίζεσθαι is the LXX rendering of the Hebrew bislar 'to gladden with good tidings', a favourite word of St Paul, Luke's master. No one can read Lk without realizing that this is the key-note of his Gospel, the gladness that God's loving-kindness stirs up not only on earth but in heaven also. At the birth of Christ the whole celestial court turns out to celebrate the event; when a sinner turns back to God with repentance there is public holiday in heaven; cf. 15:7, 10. The special note of joy in Lk is due to the fact that the good tidings of salvation are offered to all who are well-disposed, without distinction of race, sex or social standing, to Gentile as to Jew, to slave as to free. It is what we should expect from a disciple of St Paul, for in certain respects Luke stands in relation to Paul as Mark, interpres Petri, stands to the chief of the Apostles. It might be said that Lk is the gospel of Paul with all the asperities taken out of it. In Lk as in St Paul the disposition required in those who wish to profit by the Gospel, which is 'the power of God unto salvation', Rom 1:16, is that complete self-surrender to Christ which Paul calls faith. Lk continues the development of this theme in his own beautiful fashion; cf. the repetition of 'thy faith hath saved thee', 7:50; 8:48; 17:19; 18:42. In heaping up demonstrations of how deep is the love of God's merciful heart he seeks to give sinners that confidence in approaching God, as the publicans and sinners gladly draw near Jesus, which is essential for their happiness. His Gospel is a long drawn out example of that phrase which appears in the splendid passage from Tit 3:3-7 used in the liturgy of Christmas Day, 'when the goodness and kindness φιλανθρωπία of God our Saviour appeared'. But the goodwill of God demands a corresponding goodwill on man's part, and Luke therefore insists even more strongly than his fellow evangelists on the necessity of renunciation of all things to follow Christ's example. There is no enervating softness here; cf. 9:51-62. In Luke's teaching 'there is no room for the flabby-minded in the Kingdom of God'; let each one reckon up the cost beforehand. No other Gospel, for example, insists with such emphasis on the duty of the rich towards the poor; the rich are urged to use their wealth to make friends and patrons among the poor, God's special friends. Friends are what God desires, and friends naturally turn to one another with confidence in their needs. Thus Lk returns continually to the 746a subject of prayer, the soul's communion with God. The model of prayer, as of all else, is our Lord; Lk adds to the examples provided by the other Gospels, showing how Christ turned to his Father with prayer at all the great crises of his life: at the Baptism, before the call of the Apostles and the founding of the Church, before Peter's confession, at the Transfiguration and the Crucifixion. Joined to those two proper parables the Importunate Friend and the Pharisee and Publican, we have a regular treatise on prayer, showing that it must be a confident and persevering cry for God's mercy from the depths of our need, not a declaration of our own self-sufficiency. In speaking of prayer we may note that, though no Jew, Luke shows great appreciation of the purpose and meaning of the temple liturgy with which he shows a remarkable familiarity. Indeed his Gospel begins in the temple and ends there with the characteristic words, 'they went back into Jerusalem with great joy, and were always in the temple (praising and) blessing God'. In a word Luke betrays a literary art and a sensitive delicacy of feeling which is perhaps demonstrated by nothing so much as the place he assigns to women in the Gospel: Elizabeth and Anna the prophetess, the woman who was a sinner, the women from Galilee who followed Jesus and ministered to his needs, the women of Jerusalem who wept over him at the Passion, and most of all the Mother of Jesus. With sublime art he conveys the truth of the virgin motherhood of Mary, telling us more by his silence and delicate reserve than by his words. In accordance with his insistence on the universality of salvation, Luke gives his Gentile readers to understand that from now on women are to receive a new dignity such as the ancient world refused to accord them; a world in which Jewish Rabbis could still seriously discuss the problem of whether women had souls; a world in which the pagan attitude to womanhood bore fatal fruit in that list of anti-social evils drawn up by St Paul, Rom 1:26-32, a passage which ends on a terrifying note: 'hateful to God, without affection, without fidelity, without mercy'. Of all this the Gospel of Luke the disciple of Paul, is the complete antithesis.

746a Doctrinal Witness—We must recall Luke's standpoint: he intends to write a well-ordered history of the origins of the Christian faith for one who is probably already a Christian disciple, a convert from paganism like himself. His aim therefore is not to teach the truths of the faith, but to confirm the credibility of the truths his reader has already learned. 'The sacred text', writes Cardinal Newman in the Apologia, 'was never intended to teach doctrine but only to prove it, and if we would learn doctrine we must have recourse to the formularies of the Church, e.g. to the Catechisms and the Creeds'. Lk ought, therefore, to contain clear indications of the faith of the first generation of Christians. Now the central point of the Christian faith is the belief that in the person of Jesus God has become man to save the world by the cross from the consequences of sin, and further to establish on earth the means by which those who accept him as their Saviour may enter with him into God's kingdom of eternal life. Luke therefore makes an appeal to the prophecies of the OT and to the miracles and supernatural events of the Gospel history as a guarantee of the truth that the coming of Christ was a divine intervention in the world for the good of mankind; 'God hath visited his people' is the characteristic note, 1:68, 78; 7:16. Plummer, strangely enough, thinks that Luke is not interested in the fulfilment of prophecy, writing as he does for Gentiles; nothing could be further from the truth. b Continually Luke insists, in the words of Jesus, that Christ is fulfilling a preordained role clearly foretold by the Scriptures; that is the note on which the Gospel ends with greatest emphasis; 24:20-21, 25-27, 44-46. In that last chapter Luke shows how our Lord had disappointed his disciples in their hopes, hopes which they believed were founded on the prophecies. But he has disappointed them not because he has not fulfilled the prophecies but because he has fulfilled them so perfectly. In other words the Messias they were looking for was not the Messias foretold by the Scriptures; hence 'he opened their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures', 24:45-48. If that is how Luke ends, it is also how he begins. The first two chapters draw largely on the OT in all its parts; but the book of Malachias, the last of the prophets, is most used. Indeed Lk might almost be called the continuator of Malachias: 'the Old Dispensation runs gently into the New as a river runs into the sea, so gently that one fails to notice where the one ends and the other begins'; cf. Mal 4:5-6 and Lk 1:16-17. In a striking way he shows the continuity of God's saving work, as though 'to link the present with the past and future, as with a golden chain of promises that bound the Holy City to the Jerusalem that was above, which in type had already descended and in reality would soon descend from heaven' (Edersheim). (1) Jesus the Son of God—It may be said that while agreeing with Mt and Mk in recording the proofs of Christ's divinity, Lk provides us with further indications of early Christian usage in expressing belief of this truth. He has the habit of giving Jesus the title of 'the Lord', reserved to God alone in the LXX. It is common enough in St Paul and is found in Jn several times; but its special significance in Lk is seen with reference to the declaration of the angel in 1:34-35, a declaration understood so clearly by rationalist critics that they wish to eliminate it as a gloss or later addition to the original Gospel. There is no doubt that Lk means Son of God in the proper sense of the word, i.e. having one nature with the Father. Indeed he has omitted many details of Mt and Mk which might tend to arouse difficulties about this central truth in the mind of a Gentile reader, e.g. signs of human emotion in Christ, the declaration of his inability to work miracles at Nazareth because of the unbelief of his fellow-townsmen, the ignorance of the Son about the last day, his cry of dereliction on the cross. The critics accuse Lk here of a dishonest attempt to create a false impression, but the accusation takes little account of the fact that the same Lk has allowed his divine hero to be tempted by Satan, to weep over Jerusalem, to sweat blood in human agony, to die on a cross. (2) Moreover in Lk, as in Mt and Mk, Jesus is the Son of Man. The reader is referred to the commentaries on Mt and Mk for the discussion of the origin and Messianic meaning of this mysterious title, still a subject of much divergence of opinion (§§ 690a, 740h). Of the eighty times it appears in the gospels Lk comes second to Mt (31 in Mt, 24 in Lk, 14 in Mk, 11 in Jn). In Lk as in the others, the expression is used only by Jesus of himself, never of anyone else. The NT writers do not use the title when referring to our Lord, nor does it seem to have been in use among the first Christians (one exception in Ac 7:55). A comparison of parallel texts in the Synoptists shows that in the mouth of Jesus it is taken as a synonym of 'I', though it is on comparatively rare occasions that he employs it. In Lk, as in Mt and Mk, it is found on the occasions where our Lord wishes to lay emphasis on what he is about to say of himself, e.g. that he has authority to pardon sin, 5:24, his authority is higher than that of the Mosaic Law, 6:5, but that he is preordained by his Father to suffer the humiliation of the Passion, 9:22, as a condition of entering into the glory of his Resurrection, 24:7. A good study of its usage will be found in The Study of the Gospels by *J. A. Robinson, pp 49 ff. It is evident then that our Lord uses the title with a Messianic significance, though it cannot be said to have been a traditional Messianic title. 'When he calls himself Son of Man Jesus simply means "the man that I am" so as to draw attention to his person without assuming the title Messias openly, and so to say officially. It is evident that the most glorious of the Messianic prerogatives are consistent with this title; but, in addition, its unassuming character, which so well lays emphasis on his human nature . . .

746d agrees admirably with his predictions of the sorrowful Passion . . . And when he wishes to allude to his triumph, very naturally he may remind his hearers of the words of Dan 7:13 and Ps 109, two texts which indicate a person who is associated with the glory of God' (Lagrange). The title therefore contains the whole secret of the Incarnation. It is as though Jesus says that he, man as they see him to be, exercises powers which are the prerogative of God himself; but at the same time he is in subjection to God who wills him to suffer and die for the redemption of the world, and so to be glorified.

(3) The Kingdom of God and the Church—As Luke is also author of Ac where the formation of the infant Church is so evident, we should expect him to keep that in view in the Gospel. With special emphasis he develops the notion of the Kingdom of God as the reign of God's will over the lives and actions of men here, with a view to their entrance into the perfect Kingdom of God in the hereafter, where complete happiness is found in the restoration of that ideal condition in which God's benevolent designs are fulfilled without any contrariety of man's will. Hence the establishment of God's Kingdom means the destruction of Satan's kingdom. That is also the work of the Church, which by its organization and supernatural help brings all things into subjection to God through Christ, a theme Luke had so often heard developed by St Paul. He emphasizes the truth that the Kingdom of God is a newly established order in the world, begun in the person of Jesus and completed by his Passion and Resurrection. Among men the Kingdom embraces all those who voluntarily surrender themselves to the will of God as revealed through the life and teachings of Christ. These men, as Luke shows here and in Ac, are not a haphazard group who do not recognize one another, but a visible, organized society with duly appointed leaders whose office it is to rule in the newly established Kingdom as the ministers of Christ. He insists more than Mt and Mk on the deliberate will of Jesus in the choice of the Apostles, an act preceded by a night of prayer, 6:12-13. He adds to Mt and Mk by foreshadowing the development of the hierarchy in recording the appointment of seventy-two additional ministers of Christ, 10:1-24. Regarding the question of Peter's primacy, if he omits the witness of Mt 16:17-19, he provides equally strong evidence of his own, 5:10; 22:31-32. The latter text is as strong as that of Mt in affirming the infallibility of Peter, and is all the more significant in that it immediately precedes the prediction of Peter's fall, thus furnishing the reader with no excuse for misunderstanding the precise nature and purpose of infallibility. It carries us back to the opening words of Lk, who writes in order to provide Theophilus with security of faith, which is the purpose of infallibility.

(4) The Catholicity of the Church—No reputable scholar now seriously calls into question the fact, well-established by sound tradition and internal evidence, that the author of Lk and Ac was Luke the companion of St Paul. It would be strange if there were no reflexion in the Gospel of Luke's relation to his master. Those who still maintain that the essence of Paul's doctrine is that the righteousness which comes to man from the sacrifice of Christ is not a real gift, but the mere legal imputation of righteousness which leaves the sinner still buried in his sins, will of course find it hard to see a reflexion of such a doctrine in Lk. On the contrary Lk leaves us in no doubt about the real mind of St Paul: that Jesus, Son of David according to the Flesh and Son of God according to the Spirit, Rom 1:3-4, died for the salvation of every man, Jew and Gentile, Greek and barbarian, slave and free, Gal 3:26-29; that his Passion is the source of pardon for sin and the cause of reconciliation with God for everyone who believes in Christ with a faith that implies total surrender of self to his influence and guidance. This is the faith that saves; Lk 5:20, 7:50, 8:48, etc. Everyone agrees that Lk, much more than Mt and Mk, echoes the teaching of St Paul concerning the universal character of the redemptive work of Christ. Such additions as 3:6 and the omission of incidents like those found in Mt 15:21-28, Mk 7:24-30 which might create a contrary impression on his Gentile readers, serve to emphasize the point. Indeed one might almost say that the impression given by Lk is that if there is any privilege at all it is in favour of the Gentile, the sinner, and the outcast. It must have been after reading Lk that Celsus wrote so bitterly attacking the faith of Christians, whom according to Origen's Contra Celsum he makes to say: 'Let no educated person come, none wise, none sensible. . . . Whoever is a sinner, or ignorant, or a fool or under malign influence, him the Kingdom of God will accept. . . . Why was Christ not sent to the innocent as well as to sinners? What harm is there in not having sinned?' Some critics have refused to believe that Luke was the author of the Gospel because it makes no reference to the Judaizing controversy so prominent in Ac, a quarrel that touched so closely this question of the universality of the Church. But Lk is a careful historian who in the Gospel writes 'in order' of the origins of the Gospel history; the fact that he omits to speak of a thing that is of much later date merely supports his claim to be an objective historian. Moreover the Judaizing controversy, though of importance for a convert Jew and for convert Gentiles under Jewish influence, was of no importance for Theophilus and his fellow Greeks, the more so in view of the fact that the quarrel had been authoritatively settled at St Paul's instance a dozen years before Lk wrote his Gospel.

I 1-4 The Prologue—The opening words furnish a good indication of the author's character, style and aim: he is a careful writer, he possesses an excellent Greek style, his aim is to furnish his reader with reliable information that will guarantee the credibility of things already learned by word of mouth. This probably refers to instructions in the Christian faith—doubtless the primitive gospel catechesis (cf. κατηχήσις in 4) which Theophilus had already received. It may well be that Luke is writing not for a single person, but adopts the current fashion of dedicating literary works to some distinguished personage. There are unverifiable traditions about Theophilus; all that can be gathered here is that he seems to be already a Christian, and that his title (κράτιστος 'most excellent') indicates an imperial official of the Roman administration; cf. Ac 23:26, 24:3, 26:25. Lk's second 'treatise' is also addressed to him, Ac 1:1. His name means 'the beloved of God' and some have held that Theophilus is a fictitious personage symbolizing the Gentile Christian. In his prologue Luke shows him the reason why he can rely upon the truth of what he is about to read: the writer has 'from the beginning' (ἀνωθεν, 3) of his Christian life investigated carefully the whole history of the Gospel handed down by those who assisted at its fulfilment 'from the beginning' (ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, 2). Ancient commentators saw in 'the word' of 2 a reference to the Word, i.e. the Son of God; but it seems more probable that Lk means the life, miracles and doctrine of Christ (cf. Ac 2:21-22). That is Lk's usual meaning of 'word'.

I 5-II 52 The Infancy Narrative—The importance attached to this part by the author may be gathered from the fact that it comprises more than a tenth part of the whole Gospel. It is entirely peculiar to Lk save for a few words in Mt's Infancy Narrative. Some critics maintain that it did not form part of the original Lk because it differs in language and style from the rest; others hold that Luke has incorporated with little change an Aramaic source discovered in his investigations. But evidences of Lucan authorship are as frequent here as in the rest of Lk and in Ac. The alleged Aramaisms are rather Hebraisms, accounted for by the deliberate imitation of the style of the LXX which Lk everywhere betrays (cf. Plummer's remark above, 745b). It is one of the marks of his great literary and artistic ability. A special reason for the Hebraic style here is the fact that in these introductory 747b chapters Lk links up the New Dispensation with the Old, the New Law with the Mosaic Law, intending thus to show the continuity of God's saving work. He draws largely on the thoughts and words of the OT and carries the mind back to the beginning of Genesis. There may have been written sources such as that suggested above, but the only positive indication of any source at all is the repeated remark about Mary's remembrance of events, 2:19, 51. Why has Lk made this great addition to what appears from Mt and Mk to have been the accepted form of the primitive catechesis of the Gospel? First, for the reason indicated; secondly, because it was inevitable that questions should have been asked among Christian disciples about the early history of the Saviour; thirdly, because Lk insists throughout on the character of the Gospel as the good tidings of salvation, and the Infancy Narrative emphasizes that point, cf. 1:19; 2:10-14. Hostile critics see here an obvious attempt to find a marvellous origin for the hero of the Gospel, after the manner of the pagan mythologies. Lk answers them himself by the simplicity and sobriety with which he surrounds the cradle of the child Jesus, who shows no signs of precocity or abnormality in himself and, apart from the modest incident of 2:41-52, remains in obscurity till about his thirtieth year; nothing mythological there. The chief lesson is the reality of the Incarnation, i.e. that a person, divine by origin and nature, becomes a child like other children. The marvels and supernatural interventions here narrated are not for his sake but for the sake of others. He works no miracles, for miracles are meant to confirm the truth of teaching, and it is not yet time for him to teach.

d 1 5-25 Annunciation of John the Baptist's Birth—The Gospel good tidings are revealed within the framework of the Mosaic dispensation. As of old an angel appears. The message is to a Levitical priest, at Jerusalem, in the temple, during the offering of the daily sacrifice of the lamb. Lk begins as he ends in the temple, and here he shows great familiarity with the temple ceremonial. The names of Zachary (Yahweh hath remembered) Elizabeth (God hath sworn), John (Yahweh is gracious), all bear out the idea of continuity, linking present events with the past. The thoughts suggested by these names are repeated again and again in the Magnificat, Benedictus and Nunc Dimittis, canticles made up of a mosaic of phrases from the Law, the Prophets and the Psalms, cf. 24:27, 44. The words of the angel to Zachary, 1:16-17, pick up the thread dropped in the final words of Malachias, 4:5-6, the last of the Prophets of the Old Law. That prophet was not concerned with the Jewish Messianic hope of a coming King, the Son of David; he foresaw the coming of God in person, 3:1 ff., the passing of the temple worship and priesthood, the spread of a purer worship among the Gentiles, 1:10-11; inveighing against a corrupt priesthood and people, he foretold the coming of a better state of affairs, 1:6 ff.; 2:8-11; 3:3-4, and concluded with an exhortation to remember the Law of Moses, 4:4.

• 5-7. Lk re-echoes all this, beginning by presenting us with an ideal Jewish couple, a Jewish priest and his wife, the antithesis of the priests and people censured by Malachias; of blameless life, exact in the observance of the Mosaic Law, but deprived of the blessing of offspring. 8-10. The great number of priests (Josephus boasts that there were 20,000) necessitated their division into groups for the purpose of temple ministry (cf. 1 Par 24:1-19), each group serving for a week at a time; even so the number was still so large that the chief offices were assigned by the drawing of lots. On the day of the Gospel's beginning Zachary had drawn the lot of offering incense in the sanctuary before the sacrifice of the lamb, an office held so honourable that no priest exercised it twice. Zachary had waited till old age for the privilege. 11-17. Having strewn incense on the fire in the Holy Place it was his duty to bow towards the Holy of Holies and retire; he is 747a arrested by the vision of an angel who announces that his prayer is granted. What prayer? During the offering of incense both priest and people (10b) prayed in a set form for the coming of the Messiah and the redemption of Israel. But Lk certainly seems also to indicate a prayer expressive of the desire of offspring, despite the advanced age of Zachary and his later doubts, 18. In fact the birth of John was an answer to both prayers (cf. 14), which sets the note of joy running all through the Gospel. John, though a priest by birth-right, is not to claim his privilege: he will follow the example of the Sons of Rechab who of old recalled Israel to the example of the patriarchs by refusing to forsake the nomadic life of the desert; Jer 35:1 ff. He shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, a specially Lucan phrase (53 times in Lk and Ac). Ecclesiastical tradition interprets this of John's cleansing from original sin. The influence of the Spirit of God continually recurs in the Infancy Narrative, 1:35, 41, 67; 2:25, 26, 27. In the work for which God has designed him John is to be another Elias, like Elias another 'converter' or 'restorer' of the people; cf. 1:17; 3 Kg 18:37; Mal 4:5-6. He will be like Elias in fiery zeal, in rebuking princes, in calling Israel to repentance (μετανοία, change of mind), in living in the desert on what God sends him. Jewish tradition held that Elias would come to anoint the Messiah; cf. Mt 17:10 ff.; Mk 9:10 ff. But the main idea of the angel's words is that of Mal 3:1; John is the forerunner of God himself. 18-22. For doubting the word of an angel, and such an angel, 19, Zachary is stricken dumb, deaf too in view of 1:62. The punishment is also to serve as a sign of the reality of the vision and guarantee of its fulfilment. 'To bring these good tidings', lit. to announce the evangelium or gospel, εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, a favourite word of Lk and Paul, not in Mk and Mt (except Mt 11:5). 23-25. There is no suggestion that the child is conceived in any but the normal way, though the special intervention of God is indicated in 1:36-37. Why does Elizabeth hide? Not for shame, because her shame is taken away, 25. Partly, perhaps, because her condition at her advanced age would have aroused comment. There are divine secrets here, and Mary is to be the first sharer of them (39 ff.).

26-38 Annunciation of Christ's Birth—By this second announcement that just recorded is now given its proper place and explanation. John's mission is to prepare Israel for the coming of God. As the same angel is sent to Mary we are led to anticipate that the message concerns the same object, viz. that the one now announced is he for whose coming John is to prepare. After due preparation of Mary's mind the angel affirms this in clear terms, 35.

The objections raised by rationalist critics against this verse lend emphasis to its significance. Some hold that Lk has borrowed the idea from pagan sources: others that the words are a tendentious interpolation by a later hand, though there is no MS authority for the suggestion. By the latter it is argued that the idea and terminology are completely un-Hebraic, since Spirit in Hebrew is feminine and therefore could not have been used to express the active principle in conception; that the words contradict the reading of 3:22 in Codex Bezae, 'thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee'; and finally, even if 35 is authentic, it means no more than that a child, conceived in the normal way, is to receive the sanctification of the Spirit like John, 15.

To the first of these criticisms it may be answered that the instances adduced from pagan literature are not in fact parallel. There is many a story of unions between gods and human beings, but there is none relating a virgin birth. The contrast moreover between the sublime description of St Luke and the gross legends of paganism should not be overlooked; cf. Douglas Edwards, The Virgin Birth in History and Faith, London 1943. The second criticism is answered above; to the third it may be said that Luke is 748a writing in Greek, not Hebrew, and there is no proof that he used a Semitic written source; to the fourth, that the critics have yet to prove that Codex Bezae merits the importance they attribute to it; to the last, that a mere reading of Lk is sufficient contradiction.

b 26-28 The time is fixed with reference to John's conception. Note the contrasts, a literary device of which Lk is a past master. The annunciation of the Forerunner is made in circumstances of great splendour and dignity: to a priest, at Jerusalem, in the temple, at the hour of solemn sacrifice: that of the Master in circumstances of poverty and obscurity: to a poor girl, 2:7, 24, in a wretched village of no account, Jn 1:46, with no external accompaniments of splendour and dignity. 'Simplicity is the condition that befits the advent of the Incarnate Word to mankind, whom he comes to serve' (Lagr. GJC 1, 16), cf. 1 Cor 1:17-31. Current Jewish ideas of Messianism are contradicted from the outset: a Messiah springing from among the Galileans, regarded with contempt among the Judæan Rabbis even for their very patois; his birth announced in a village never mentioned in the OT, or the Talmudic writings, or even in Josephus. Lk does not indicate why Mary and Joseph had settled there: in fact he gives us no history of them at all, for he does not allow mere human interest to overshadow the great central fact to which he directs our attention. The Gospel is not a biography of Jesus but a history of the establishment of the Kingdom of God upon earth. He sees the importance of noting that Joseph is of Davidic origin, as he is to become the legal father of Jesus. But Joseph has not yet assumed the legal paternity of Jesus, and Mary is therefore of Davidic origin too, in view of 1:32 and 69, confirmed by Rom 1:3; 2 Tim 2:8, and the ancient tradition which makes Joseph and Mary related.

c 28. The contrast is now reversed: the angel's attitude to Mary differs greatly from that to Zachary. 'Full of grace,' κεχαριτωμένη, a word (replacing Mary's name in the salutation) meaning one endowed with favour or grace, χάρις, in permanent fashion. It is God's favour which is indicated here. St Paul had already developed the idea of the divine graciousness of God which endows men with a supernatural quality making them pleasing in his sight as his children. The doctrine of the Church is that Mary, after her Son, is the most completely endowed with divine grace, through her divine maternity becoming the channel of all the graces received by others. 'Blessed art thou among women' is probably a gloss here from 42. 29. Mary is troubled, not, like Zachary, by the vision but by the unaccustomed salutation: cum esset humilis non tam alta de se sapiebat (Aquino). 31. Lk with artistic reserve abstains from saying that Mary, like Zachary and the other actors in the Infancy Narrative, is a pious Israelite looking for the redemption of Israel, or that she is filled with the Holy Ghost. That is all taken for granted. We may be sure that the words of 31 must have recalled to her Is 7:14 and thus prepared her for what follows. The description of the child goes by ascending degrees, and could leave no doubt in the mind of a Jew that the Messiah was in question; Son of David was his most common title. 33. 'Kingdom,' βασιλεία, 'kingship' or 'reign' in an active sense. 34. Here again Mary differs from Zachary. Her question indicates not doubt but belief, and the reason she gives for her question would be meaningless unless it supposes, as Catholic tradition holds, that she had a previous compact with Joseph about the observance of virginity. If it be objected that such a thing would be at complete variance with accepted Jewish thought, we answer first that the Incarnation and all its circumstances were also at variance with prevailing Jewish Messianism and thought. The whole Gospel shows this. Secondly, it is false to assert that the observance of virginity was utterly foreign to Jewish ideas of the time. Such sentiments as here manifested by Mary (and it is to be concluded that Joseph was of the same mind) were shared by other Jews, such as the well-known sect of the Essenes as Josephus makes plain, Ant 18, 1. Some object that, in such a case, why had she allowed herself to be betrothed to Joseph? We may reply that she may have been left with little choice in the matter owing to the tyranny of established custom, even though she had made her vow before the betrothal. Moreover, knowing Joseph as she did, she may have acted with all the more confidence of finding in him a guardian of her virginity. In the divine design, as Mt indicates more expressly, the betrothal and subsequent marriage of Mary and Joseph were to serve as a protection for mother and Child. Her question, therefore, demands how God's design in her regard stands with respect to her proposal of virginity. The purpose of her vow was the pleasure of God and she will not observe it against his will. The reply of the angel is that God's design will not affect her vow, since the Child is to have no father but God. 35. In the OT the Spirit of God appears on the scene when things are to be brought to life or a special power from God is to be given for the fulfilment of divine purposes; cf. Gen 1:2; Num 24:2; Jg 3:10; 6:34; 1 Kg 10:6, 10; Ps 103:30; Is 11:2, etc. An overshadowing cloud is the traditional symbol of the divine presence and mysterious action; Ex 19:9, 16; 13:21, etc.; 3 Kg 8:10-12; Is 6:4; Lk 9:34; Ac 1:9. Three possible readings of 35b; omit 'of thee': (1) 'the holy one to be engendered shall be called the Son of God'; (2) 'the one to be engendered shall be holy, he shall be called the Son of God'; (3) 'the one to be engendered shall be called holy, he shall be the Son of God'. The force of 'therefore' falls only on the first phrase; Jesus is the Son of God not because of his temporal but because of his eternal generation. 38. Lk shows Mary as the first example of that total surrender to the will of God which is the essential characteristic of the Kingdom of God.

39-45 The Visitation—Unlike Zachary Mary has asked for no sign, though she receives a sign. When Lk emphasized the haste with which she goes to Elizabeth, those critics are very obtuse who make Lk say that she 'proceeds to verify the sign'. St Ambrose understands him better: non quasi incredula de oraculo, nec quasi incerta de nuntio, nec quasi dubitans de exemplo, sed quasi laeta pro voto, religiosa pro officio, festina pro gaudio. Mary's charity provides an occasion for the meeting of the chief actors in the drama and for the supernatural intervention by which Elizabeth and her son are moved to acknowledge and pay homage to Mary's Child. Ain Karim, 5 m. west of Jerusalem, has the best claim to be the site of Zachary's home. 41-45. Just as Mary is miraculously informed about Elizabeth, so Lk seems to indicate that the latter learns Mary's secret by the revelation of the Holy Ghost. 'Blessed (εὐλογημένη) art thou among women', a Hebraism for 'more blessed art thou than all women'. In saluting Mary as 'the mother of my lord' Elizabeth is at least recognizing the child's Messianic dignity. 45. 'Happy (μακάριοι) is she that hath believed that these things shall be accomplished', etc. Elizabeth seems here to be comparing the faith of Mary with the hesitation of Zachary, rather than assuring her that the angel's words shall be fulfilled.

46-56 The Magnificat—Many recent attempts have been made to prove that this canticle really belongs to Elizabeth, because three Latin MSS attribute it to her and because of its similarity to the canticle of Anna, 1 Kg 2:1-10; Elizabeth is held to be much more in the situation of Anna than our Lady. The weight of evidence (all the Greek MSS) in favour of the attribution to Mary is overwhelming, and to put the Magnificat on Elizabeth's lips would be, as Lagrange says, to falsify the whole context of Lk. The canticle is Mary's quiet answer to Elizabeth's congratulations; it is as though she says: 'There is no reason to congratulate me. It is all the work of the Lord. My good fortune consists in the fact that he has deigned to notice one so small as I am'. 48 is an echo of 38.

748g If the Magnificat owes its inspiration to the canticle of Anna, its ideas and their expression are drawn from the OT generally, especially the Psalms: cf. Ps 23:8; 30:8; 33:4, 11; 68:31; 70:18; 88:11, etc. The speaker is saturated with the thoughts of the ancient Scriptures. The keynote is that God is gracious especially to the poor and lowly, and Mary, who has called herself 'the slave of the Lord', insists on keeping that place; 'because he hath regarded the lowliness (not, humility) of his slave, therefore all generations will call me happy'. She confesses that since God is her Saviour, 47, she needs salvation; that is the doctrine of the Church: as a child of Adam she needed her Son's redemption which gained her the preventive grace saving her from incurring the stain of all sin, original and actual. 50. The fear of God in OT phraseology means what we should call the service of God. 51-53. A faithful echo of the canticle of Anna; if that canticle is Messianic in outlook, much more so is the Magnificat which carries us back to the promise made to Abraham, Gen 12:3; 17:7; 18:18, a promise foreshadowing the universalism of the Gospel. Note that Mary refrains from any prophecy about the role of her Son the Messiah. In 55b 'to Abraham and his seed for ever' are not governed by 'spoke'; the words follow on from 'mindful of his mercy' with 55a as a parenthesis.

h 57-67 Birth of John the Baptist—In a few words Lk conveys realistically the religious joy with which the Jews celebrated a boy's circumcision, the ceremony admitting him to spiritual communion with Israel and a share in the promises to the patriarchs; it was a deed of contract between him and God; cf. Gen 17. 'No domestic solemnity', says Edersheim, 'was so important or so joyous as that in which the child had laid upon it the yoke of the Law, with all of duty and privilege which this implied'.

i 68-79 The Benedictus—Like the Magnificat, a chain of the principal thoughts running through the OT, a canticle completely in harmony with the character of Zachary as painted by Lk, as the Magnificat harmonizes with the character of Mary. It marks the recovery of his speech last used to pronounce the ritual prayers offered by priest and people at the sacrifice of incense nine months before. These prayers included the Eighteen Benedictions which sum up the hopes of Israel, and Edersheim points out (op. cit., I 158 f.) how the Benedictus echoes the main thoughts of the Jewish prayer. It is worth noticing how it further turns round the ideas signified by the names of Zachary, Elizabeth and John. The canticle falls into two distinct parts divided in sense: 68-75 repeat the general theme of the Magnificat without referring to what belongs to Mary; 76-79 are addressed to John and his vocation. 68-69. The visiting of his people by God is Lk's theme; cf. 7:16. It is a common OT phrase; God visits to help, save, judge, pardon, show mercy. The same is true of 'horn of salvation', a symbol (borrowed from the bull) of strength and power. Here Zachary joins Elizabeth, 42-45, in paying homage to the child of Mary, the Son of David, whose name Jesus (Jehoshua, Yahweh is salvation) is thus clearly indicated. The testament of 72 is the covenant between God and Abraham, between God and Israel on Sinai (cf. Lev 26:42), as the oath of 73 is that made to Abraham at the time of the famous promise, Gen 22:16-18. Our English translation seems to leave 71-75 hanging, but they are consecutively dependent on the verbs of the preceding vv, being explicative of their content. 76-78 echo Mal 3:1; 2:6-7 and 4:2, and foreshadow the preaching of John, Lk 3:3 ff. 78. 'The Orient', ανατολή, is used for the rising of the sun or a star (cf. Is 9:2; 60:1-2; Zach 3:8; 6:12) and recalls Mal 4:2, 'unto you that fear my name the sun of justice shall arise with healing in his wings', a text that would appeal to a physician. 79 naturally flows from this and is suggested by Is 9:2. Only with light can the wayfarer guide his steps straight; cf. 3:4. The chief feature of the Benedictus is that the Messiah, born in the house of David, appears in the character of a Divine Being, and thus serves to confirm 1:35. 80. Lk, after his fashion, sums up a long history in a few well-chosen words; cf. 2:52; 3:19-20. The 'spirit' is the Divine Spirit which filled John from the womb and now leads him into the desert (cf. 3:2; 4:1) to be prepared for his mission. John lays no claim to his priestly rights; the passing of the temple and the Law is foreshadowed.

II 1-20 Birth of Jesus—After the rough chronological indication of 1:5 (reign of Herod the Great, 37-34 B.C.), Lk here furnishes a more precise date for the birth of Christ, the occasion of a general census of the Roman empire commanded by Caesar Augustus. He adds a qualifying phrase in 2:2 which has given rise to much difficulty. Cyrenus (a Greek form of Quirinius) was Publius Sulpicius Quirinius, a Roman official of obscure provincial origin who by his military prowess rose to the consulship. He was certainly governor or legate of the imperial province of Syria in A.D. 6 when a census was made in Judaea preparatory to the incorporation of that kingdom in the province of Syria, an event remembered on account of the Jewish revolt it occasioned. This census is recorded in Ac 5:37 and is therefore not to be confused with that mentioned here. It has been objected that secular history knows nothing of a general census ordered by Augustus or of a census in Judaea about the time assigned to the birth of Christ, 6-4 B.C.; indeed that such a census was impossible because Herod was then the acknowledged king of Judaea. Finally it is denied that Cyrenus was governor of Syria at the time. For a full treatment of the difficulty, cf. *Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem?; Lagr. Luc 65 ff.; CE St Luke; Ricciotti, Life of Christ 167 ff.; Scripture, vol i 77 ff., vol iii 76 ff. We may sum up here by saying that historical research tends to confirm the accuracy of Lk. It is certain that Augustus instituted a financial reform especially with regard to taxation abuses in the provinces, and set up a professional civil service for that purpose. He set himself to acquire exact knowledge of the financial resources of the empire of which at his death in 14 A.D. he left a written account (Tac. Ann. 1, 11; Suet. Aug. 28). The only way of obtaining such information was by a census of inhabitants and their wealth, and it was natural that he should begin with the provinces immediately under the imperial control. There was such a census in Gaul in 12 B.C., in Egypt 10-9 B.C. b It may be concluded that the case was similar in Syria, the command of which was reckoned highest in rank of all the imperial provinces. It has long been admitted by responsible scholars that Cyrenus twice held authority in Syria, the first time in conjunction with Sentius Saturninus, 9-6 B.C., and there is documentary evidence in favour of this (cf. Lagr. S. Luc 65-6). Lk does not say that Cyrenus himself conducted the census; if it was begun under Cyrenus it would take long to complete in view of the manner in which it was made. There still remains the objection that Judaea was an independent state until A.D. 6 and not a part of the empire. But the real fact is that Herod was merely a client-king, completely dependent on the goodwill of Augustus, who at first saw in Herod a convenient ruler of a state that formed one of the frontiers of the empire. As Ramsay says, to all intents and purposes Herod's kingdom was part of the Roman world, and consequently there is nothing improbable in the idea that it was included in the command for a general census. Moreover it does not follow from Lk that the census in Judaea was conducted by Roman officials. A census made by native officials at the command of the emperor need not have caused any great stir, particularly when we remember that in the neighbouring country of Egypt there appears to have been a system of 14-yearly enrolments for taxation purposes (cf. S.H.R. Wallace, Taxation in Egypt from Augustus to Diocletian). In conclusion it may be said that a writer of proved carefulness like Luke would not have

749b been guilty of such an error as could easily have been detected by those for whom he wrote. Early critics of the Gospel like Celsus never question his statement, while early Christian writers like St. Justin (a Palestinian) appeal to the Roman records in proof of it. 1. 'The whole world', lit. all the habitable (world), a commonly accepted phrase for the empire; cf. Ac 11:28, etc. 2. 'This enrolling was first made while Cyrenus was governor of Syria'. To avoid the difficulty it has often been suggested that the Greek could be translated 'this enrolment was made before Cyrenus was governor'; cf. Jn 1:30. But others maintain that such a translation is untenable, and in view of the above there seems no necessity for it. 3. The method of enrolment indicated here was not the Roman method, but it was the custom in Egypt and was allowed by the Romans. 5. Critics object that here again Lk is at fault, since there was no need for the wife to accompany her husband. But it is obvious from Mt 1:18 ff. that her presence with Joseph would seem advisable, not to speak of the fact that they would see in the circumstances a fulfilment of prophecy. 6. No indication is given of the time spent at Bethlehem, but it would be an anachronism to suppose that the census was conducted with modern efficiency. The impression is that the caravanserai of Bethlehem was full because of the census. 7. The bare record of the fact of the birth of Jesus; Lk 'with indescribable appropriateness and delicacy draws a veil over the most sacred mystery' (Edersheim). In this he is worlds away from the apocrypha which have none of his reserve; they introduce a midwife to bear witness to the virginity of Mary and the miraculous birth. Lk's only indication of anything exceptional is that Mary herself 'brought forth her firstborn son and wrapped him in swaddling clothes', the normal clothing for a new-born infant with which she had come prepared. The constant tradition of the Church has always been that neither the conception nor the birth of Jesus was in any way detrimental to the perpetual virginity of Mary. Lk does not indicate anything different in his use of 'firstborn', which represents the Hebrew b'kor, a word suggesting not so much later children as the Mosaic legal obligations connected with a firstborn son. He already has in mind what has to be said about the Presentation, 22 ff. Moreover he carefully avoids all reference to the 'brothers' and 'sisters' of Jesus found in Mt and Mk. There is no trace in the Church of growth in the dogma of the perpetual virginity of Mary. For a treatment of the question see under Mt 1:25, 13:55-56, Mk 6:3; Lagr. Mc 3:32. 8. Bethlehem is a centre for shepherds; Lk may have in mind 1:51-53, for shepherds were 'under the ban of Rabbinism on account of their necessary isolation from religious ordinances and their manner of life which rendered strict legal observance unlikely' (Edersheim); cf. Jn 7:48-49. In the OT frequent divine manifestations are made to shepherds, like Abraham and Moses; these shepherds prove docile to the voice from heaven like those of old, very different from the Rabbis. 10. 'Behold I bring you tidings of great joy'; compare Greek with 1:19. 'The Glory of the Lord', 9, which shone around them recalls 1:78-79 and Is 9:1-2. 11. 'A saviour who is Messias lord'; as there is no article in Greek before Lord, we may perhaps understand 'Messias Yahweh'. Were Lord used as a common name we should expect it before Messias. Adverse critics are reduced to the suggestion that Lk has here mis-translated a hypothetical Aramaic document which had 'the Messias of Yahweh'. But why has he not mistranslated in 2:26? 13. The angels' song recalls Job 38:7 and Is 6:3, both significant texts. In Job the angels sing at Creation; the birth of Christ is the beginning of a new world, as we shall be reminded again in 3:21 ff.; cf. Jn 3:3, 5. 14. Three possible renderings: (1) as in DV; (2) 'Glory to God in the highest and on earth: peace to men of good will'; (3) 'Glory to God in the highest; peace on earth; good will to men'. (3) is possible only if εὐδοκία 'good will' is in the nominative in the Gk text, as was the common reading among the Greek Fathers. But the strength of MS evidence (8 B A D W) is on the side of the reading εὐδοκίας, bonae voluntatis as in Vg. Hence the choice is between (1) and (2). It is objected that the order of the Gk excludes (2), but that is questionable. If we divide the words after 'earth', the angelic song forms a distich, each line of which begins with the significant word 'glory' to God, 'peace' to men. There is much to be said for the traditional English rendering which divides the words after 'highest'. In this case the angelic song forms a distich in which each term has its parallel, heaven opposed to earth, glory opposed to peace, God opposed to men. Who are the 'men of good will'? Apparently those well disposed towards God. But two objections are raised against this interpretation: first, although Lk makes it clear that good dispositions are required for entering the Kingdom of God, yet the spirit of the Gospel, here especially, is that the good tidings are for all; secondly, it is maintained that εὐδοκία is always used of God's will in the Scriptures (but cf. Rom 10:1; Phil 1:15). It is probable then that the meaning is 'peace to men who are thus made the objects of divine favour'. 17. The shepherds 'made known the word'; DV follows Vg which mistranslates ἐνῷπιον as 'they understood'. 19. Here and 51 are the only indications of Lk's sources of the Infancy Narrative. 21-24 Circumcision and Presentation of Jesus and Purification of Mary—The Saviour just given to Israel now comes forward as the appointed heir of the promise made to Abraham, confirmed in the institution of the rite of circumcision. Here, as in the case of his birth, the narrative is marked with great simplicity. The precise prescriptions of the Law are followed; Gen 17:12; Lev 12:3. As the firstborn, Jesus is God's property, consecrated to God as a sacrifice. Parents could redeem, i.e. buy back, such a child from God at the price of five shekels of silver; Num 8:15; Ex 13:2, 12; Lev 12:4 ff.; Lk makes no reference to this part of the ceremony but indicates that instead of the lamb prescribed to be offered as a sacrifice by the mother, Mary offers what was known as 'the poor woman's offering'. Mary seeks no exemption from the Law although, as Catholic tradition teaches, there was no cause for Levitical purification in her case (cf. ST, III, 37:3, 4). The subjection of Christ to the Law recalls Mt 3:15; Gal 4:4-5; Rom 8:3; Heb 2:14-17. 22. 'Her purification'; here DV follows Vg, but the Greek has 'their purification', which is difficult. As neither Jesus nor Joseph needed purification, the explanation must be that Lk is thinking rather of the Levitical ceremony of presentation and redemption than of Mary's purification, which is mentioned only because of the Presentation. There was no need for a woman to make a special journey to the temple for purification. 25-35 Holy Simeon. The Nunc Dimittis. Forebodings of Opposition—A man after the type of Zachary and Elizabeth, aged, pious, looking for the fulfilment of God's promises in the true spirit of the OT. All such, Lk points out, are under the special influence of the Spirit of God, and through that influence it is Simeon's office to welcome the Lord to his temple, Mal 3:1, and to acknowledge Jesus as the promised Messias. 25. 'The consolation of Israel', abstract for the concrete; Naham or 'Consolation' of Israel was a traditional idea associated with the Messias, Māitah ha-M'nahem, God's 'Anointed Comforter'. 26. 'The Christ of the Lord', i.e. the Messias (the anointed one) of Yahweh, a common expression of the OT for the kings chosen by God to reign over Israel. This title is paralleled in the Nunc Dimittis by 'thy salvation', i.e. the child Jesus, the Saviour. Here, as already in 1:41 ff., 67 ff., Lk seems to indicate that the Holy Spirit gives light regarding the divine mystery; Simeon recognizes the Christ of the Lord despite the circumstances which run 749h counter to current Jewish Messianism. Lk shows no hesitation, after what he has said, in using the words 'parents', 'father and mother'. It follows from the narrative that Joseph has assumed legal parenthood of

1 Jesus, a thing that Mt declares more explicitly. 29-32. The Nunc Dimittis, a third canticle preserved for us by Lk alone, and like the former ones used daily in the liturgy. This closes the Church's day, as it closed Simeon's day. Simeon sees further than Zachary; salvation is prepared not only for Israel but for all nations, according to the promise to Abraham, and the light is already shining in their face. The Nunc Dimittis starts where the Benedictus leaves off with the idea of light shining in the darkness. This canticle too breathes the spirit and echoes the words of the OT; cf. Gen 15:15; 46:30; Tob 3:6; Is 9:2; 42:6; 49:6. 33. The wonder of Mary at least can hardly be surprise, if Lk is to be interpreted as an intelligent author, after 1:26 ff. Some suggest it is surprise that Simeon seems so well informed; but it is more likely that it is simply the Lucan style of recording astonishment at the manifestation of the supernatural; cf. 1:63; 2:18, 33; 4:22; 8:25, etc., and in Ac frequently. Or is it anticipatory of 34-35, which is the first hint of opposition? So far all has been on a note of joy and welcome; now there is a promise of tragedy, strife and the sword. Simeon thus gives a more complete picture of OT predictions. Note 'is set' (κεῖται) is pre-ordained; perhaps he has in mind such texts as Is 8:14; 28:16; Ps 117:22; cf. Mt 21:44. Some have put 35a in parenthesis for fear of attributing anything derogatory to Mary; Origen and some of the ancient commentators, thinking of Mk 3:21, interpreted the words as foretelling that she would be tempted to doubt her Son. But it seems more probable that 35b applies to all the preceding; as Jesus will later say, contact with him reveals all hearts, i.e. the dispositions of soul in each one. There can be no neutrality; everyone must come to a decision. The same idea is in the Magnificat. But it is only natural that the heart of Mary will be pierced with sorrow by the opposition shown to her Son. Tongues of enemies are like a sharp sword, Ps 56:5; 63:4.

j 36-38 Anna the Prophetess—Another of the little group of people on the threshold of the tomb who 'looked for the redemption of Israel'.

39-40 Return to Nazareth—It is difficult to find a satisfactory reconciliation of Lk with Mt 2:1-20. If Lk is not ignorant of these events (and he can hardly be if there is any force in the conclusions drawn from 2:19, 51) then we can only suppose that he has deliberately omitted here, as elsewhere, in view of his plan and aim. The adoration of the Magi might seem fitted to strengthen his thesis of the universalism of the Gospel; but Lk has a different type of people in view, the poor, the wretched, the sinner. In any case 39-40 in no way denies Mt 2:1-20, for it is in characteristic Lucan style, summing up the infancy of Jesus before he proceeds to the next event; cf. 1:80; 3:18-20. Note that only to Jesus and Mary has he attributed the grace of God. Catholic theology teaches that the soul assumed by the Word of God was informed by sanctifying grace in all its fullness; that Christ, as the 'author and finisher of faith', Heb 12:2, had all the requisite gratiae gratis datae; and that as Head of the Church he is the source of all the graces given to men (ST III, 7-8). The Child was also full of wisdom, of which an example will now be given by Lk.

750a 41-52 Jesus in the House of his Heavenly Father—The only incident we are allowed to learn of the hidden life, therefore of great significance in the mind of Lk. Neither women nor children were bound by the precept commanding a triple annual appearance at the temple; cf. Ex 23:14-17, Deut 16:16. Boys fell under the obligation when they became 'sons of the Law' at thirteen, but it was customary to anticipate this age by a year or two. It seems that Lk's intention is to show this incident as the first appearance of Jesus in the temple since the Presentation. The whole incident is full of mystery. Jesus 'remained' in Jerusalem of his own accord; no Jewish boy of twelve would easily be lost, but as the pilgrimages were made in village parties, it is not surprising that Jesus was not missed at first especially as the men and women folk perhaps travelled apart; he might have been with either party, cf. 44. It is another indication of Lk's about the reality of the Incarnation; Jesus behaved as an ordinary boy. 46-47. It was the custom for the Rabbis, especially at great feasts, to give sermons and lessons on the Law and tradition in the surroundings of the temple, as the Moslems do today in mosques. It was among the listeners who readily joined in discussion with the Rabbis that the Child was found, his answers showing such wisdom that all the hearers are 'out of themselves' with amazement. 48. Mary and Joseph are also amazed—not the same word as above but an even stronger one in Greek, expressing the idea of shock; but Lk gives the reason in 48b: Jesus has never behaved so to Mary before. It is to be remembered that with her, as with others, Jesus had conducted himself as a normal child; his divinity was to her, as to us, an object of faith and not vision. 49. 'What reason had you to search for me? Could you not tell that I must needs be in the place which belongs to my Father?' (KNT). An answer surely given with an affectionate smile. The emphasis is on 'search'; where would you expect a child to be but in his father's house? Lk has here 'in the things of my Father' ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρὸς μου, which could in other circumstances mean 'my father's affairs', but here certainly means 'my Father's house' (so the ancient commentators). 'Father' (God) here is a reply to 'father' (i.e. Joseph) in 48, and the evident sense is that Jesus at the age of twelve is conscious of his Divine Sonship, a thing that will be confirmed from heaven in 3:22. Another point of importance is the fact that Jesus takes it for granted that Mary and Joseph will know what he means; it is in the light of this plain fact that we must interpret 50; if Mary does not understand, then the events of 1:26-38 lose most of their point. 51b also throws light on the point. 'They learnt only gradually what his Messiahship involved' (cf. 2:34-35) and this is one stage in the process. From the point of view of her subsequent knowledge, Mary recognized that she and Joseph had not understood' (Plummer ICC on 2:51). 52. Lk ends the Infancy Narrative with a last emphasis on the reality of Christ's human nature: 'Jesus made progress in wisdom and stature and favour with God and men'. God's favour is shown by grace, and though Christ had the plenitude of grace from the beginning of the Incarnation, yet as he advanced in life he showed greater effects of the grace that was in him. His human mind advanced in wisdom, because as man he acquired knowledge by experience, as it is proper to man to do.

III 1-IV 13 The Investiture of Jesus as Messiah—It was fitting that there should be a public manifestation of Jesus as the promised Messiah, Son of David, King of Israel. But in the secret designs of God the Messiah was to be also God's only begotten Son, and this too had to be officially declared. In accordance with the ideas of the time it was fitting that Christ should be preceded by a herald, especially as it was expected that Elias should perform in some sort that office by anointing the Messiah. We are already prepared by Lk to see John in that character. Here Lk begins what is held to be the primitive form of the Gospel catechesis, and up to 9:50 he follows Mk faithfully while making such omissions and additions as suit his purpose.

III 1-20 Preaching of John the Baptist—(Mk 1:1-8; 6:17-29; Mt 3:1-12; 14:3-12). Lucan additions are the detailed chronological indications, 1-2, examples of John's advice to the people and their questioning about his character, 10-15; he anticipates after his fashion by completing the story of John without mentioning his death, 18-20. He omits things unsuitable for Gentile readers: details of John's food and clothing, and the confession of sins by those baptized.

750c The latter omission is dictated by the fact that all this is merely preparatory for Christ's baptism, and there can be no question of confessed sin there.

d The '15th year of Tiberius' may be taken as A.D. 27-8. Augustus died 19 Aug. A.D. 14 and was succeeded by Tiberius. The remaining months of that year would count as the first year of Tiberius; and if, as seems likely, Lk reckons according to the Seleucid calendar which was current in Syria, the new year would begin on 1 Oct. Thus October of 27 to October of 28 is the 15th year of Tiberius. John began his ministry after 1 Oct. of 27 and the baptism of Jesus took place before the Pasch of 28. Allowing for three Paschs in the ministry of Jesus, this would date the Crucifixion at the Pasch of the year 30. If the birth of our Lord was in 6 B.C., and many think it could not have been later, he would have been 33 at the time of his baptism. Lk says 'about thirty'. He has been accused of error in the historical details he here gives: first by including Ituraea in the dominions of Philip, son of Herod the Great; secondly, by making Lysanias the tetrarch of Abilene; thirdly, by joining Annas with Caiaphas in the office of the high-priesthood. But it is now proved (cf. Lagr. Lk 101-2) that, although Ituraea proper was outside the dominions of Philip, the country of the Ituraeans included the district of Panias which was formerly part of Herod's kingdom and passed to Philip, who there built Caesarea Philippi. With regard to Lysanias, the critics formerly held that the only person of this name connected with the district of which Lk speaks had been dead for sixty years. But later research has found a Lysanias of Abilene who corresponds exactly with Lk's Lysanias; cf. CE St Luke, and Scripture, vol. iii. 35. There is also good reason for Lk's inclusion of Annas along with Caiaphas (read 'high-priest' with Gk, not plural as in Vg and DV). Annas was deposed by the Roman authority in 15, Caiaphas, his son-in-law, appointed in 18; but such was the repute of Annas, added to the fact that by Mosaic Law the high-priesthood was for life, that many Jews still acknowledged him as the real religious chief; cf. Ac 4:6; Jn 18:13. 4-6. By extending the quotation from Is 40 further than Mk and Mt, Lk includes words useful for his universalizing theme. 10-14. These specimens of John's advice considerably modify the uncompromising character of him we gather from Mt and Mk. Lk points out, 18, that John's preaching was the authentic Gospel good tidings, evangelizabat, εὐαγγελίζετο. The counsels of John are thoroughly in accord with the spirit of Jesus, 6:30 ff, and explain the character of that penance which is demanded in Mk as a preparation for the kingdom, μετανοία, a thorough change of disposition, signified by a baptism of total immersion which symbolized not only a washing but a rebirth, i.e. a new life. John's kindness to the despised publicans and soldiers (probably the soldiers used by the tax-gatherers to enforce their demands, and therefore Jews) anticipates the attitude of Jesus.

f 21-22 Baptism of Jesus—(Mk 1:9-11; Mt 3:13-17). As in Mk with the following differences: Jesus prays and Lk seems to connect the marvellous events with this prayer; the Spirit descends 'in bodily form' which might seem to make Lk agree with Mt in showing the events as a public demonstration from heaven of the character of Jesus, while Mk is interested in the scene only as it concerns Jesus, though he does not exclude others explicitly. Ac 10:38 may be a reference to this incident. Some non-Catholic critics show great attachment to the reading of Codex Bezae and a few later MSS in 22, 'thou art my beloved son, this day have I begotten thee'; it favours their contention that originally it was believed that only at the Baptism did Jesus become Son of God, i.e. Messiah, or that only now does he become conscious of his vocation and mission. Consequently he is not the Son of God in the proper sense. But the reading has no support in the older Greek MSS and is found only in Lk, where it is a clear gloss from Ps 2:7. The reader is referred here and later to the commentaries on Mt and Mk for the parts common to them and Lk. The appearance of the Spirit above the waters recalls Gen 1:1 ff. This is the παλιγγενεσία, Mt 19:28; Tit 3:5, the beginning of a new world, which is the Kingdom of God.

23-38 The Genealogy—(cf. Mt 1:1-17). Having given a clear indication of Jesus' divine origin Lk proceeds to describe his human descent. Difficulties of reconciliation arise from the comparison of Lk's genealogy with that of Mt. There are two chief differences first to be noted: Mt is content with showing his Jewish readers that Jesus is a true Son of Abraham; Lk traces his origin back to Adam, intent on presenting Jesus as the universal Saviour. Secondly Mt traces his descent through Solomon, Lk through David's son Nathan. The two lists of names then meet again at Salathiel the father of Zorobabel, parting once more until they reach Joseph, the foster father of Jesus. Mt's list contains 42 names divided into three groups of 14, Mt 1:17; Lk's contains 77 in the Gk text, 76 in the Vg. The difference of number need cause no great difficulty, as it is not necessary to suppose that either evangelist has wished to include all the ancestors of Jesus. A comparison of the two genealogies of Esdras, 1 Esd 7:1 ff. and 1 Par 6:1 ff., shows that several names are omitted in the former. The dissimilarities of Mt and Lk led many scholars to suggest that the former traces the descent of Jesus through Joseph, the latter through Mary who was also of the house of David. But this is rejected by the majority of scholars on the ground that it does not accord with the words of Lk 3:23, and that it is contrary to the ancient and traditional interpretation. Lk, then, having declared that Joseph was only the reputed father of Jesus, proceeds to trace the descent of Joseph, as does Mt, though each gives a different name for the father of Joseph. It is necessary to observe that no reasonable understanding of the genealogies is possible without taking into consideration two facts: first, that ancient Semitic ideas of kinship differed greatly from our own; secondly, that both Mt and Lk are concerned to show that Jesus was a son of David in the eyes of the Jewish law. But according to Jewish ideas there was no objection to the inclusion of adoptive or legal parents in a genealogical tree. Thus Julius Africanus, a Christian who lived in Palestine during the 3rd cent., has left it on record that he gathered the following facts from the memories of the kindred of our Lord. Mathan, Mt 1:15, married Estha and begot a son Jacob. Estha, left a widow, was married by Melchi, Lk 3:24, who thus became the father of Heli. Heli died childless, and in accordance with the law of the levirate (cf. Deut 25:5-6 and Mt 22:23-27) his widow was taken to wife by his half-brother Jacob. Their son was Joseph who, according to Jewish law, was reckoned as the legal son of Heli (cf. Eus., HE 1, 7). This explanation is unacceptable to those who wish to explain divergences between the two genealogies by the proposal to regard that of Mt as following the legal line of royal succession and inheritance of the Davidic promises, and that of Lk as following natural descent. For a fuller discussion of the problem and suggested solutions, cf. CE Genealogy in the Bible and Genealogy of Christ, also Lusseau et Collomb, Manuel d'Etudes bibliques, IV Cap 10, Paris 1938. We may conclude by drawing attention to the fact that the Jewish adversaries of our Lord never denied his Davidic descent. 23, 'beginning about the age of thirty', i.e. beginning his mission of teaching; thus falling in with traditional Jewish ideas according to which it was unfitting that a man should come forward as a religious master before the age of thirty.

IV 1-13 The Temptation—(Mt 4:1-11; Mk 1:12-13). 1 Before dealing with this incident it will be well to recall the development of Lk. In 1:17 the mission of John is announced in the terms of Mal 3:1, 'he shall go before him (i.e. Yahweh) in the spirit and power of Elias'. In 2:49 the child Jesus is shown to be conscious of his divine Sonship. In 3:16 we find the 750i application of 1:17, identifying Jesus in some way with Yahweh. All this is crowned by 3:21-22 where the divine Sonship of Jesus is declared from heaven and he is shown as one possessed by the Spirit of God who henceforth conducts him in the work of his Messianic mission, 4:1, 14, 18; 5:17. The work of the Messias is to establish the Kingdom or Reign of God, and in consequence to destroy the reign of the devil, cf. 1 Jn 3:8. Hence the dramatic effect of this meeting between the two opposite champions at the beginning of the ministry, when Jesus goes out to meet his adversary in the desert, the place popularly considered as the special preserve of the evil spirits. The incident was held to be of importance in the early catechesis of the Gospel (the disciples could have learned it only from Jesus) and Lk not only incorporates it, but neglects Mk's brief summary in favour of the detailed source followed by Mt. But he differs from Mt both in order and by notable additions. He emphasizes that Jesus comes from baptism 'full of the Holy Ghost' but, omitting Mk's strong expression 'the Spirit drove him out', he says 'Jesus was led by the Spirit in the desert for the space of forty days, what time he was tempted', etc. Like Mt he seems to show that Satan had heard the words from heaven at the Baptism, though Satan does not understand 'Son of God' in its proper sense; this he could do only by faith or revelation. St Augustine tells us that the devils knew only so much about our Lord as he willed them to know by means of his operations; hence their conclusions were at best conjectural. But Satan, convinced that Jesus was the Messias, attacks him on the point which is the Messias's chief concern, the establishment of the Reign of God of which he is to be the living embodiment. Hence the temptations take the form of persuasion to use his miraculous powers unduly i.e. not subject to God's will; to seek the aid of human power and glory like a false Jewish Messias. Lk characteristically omits Mk's reference to the beasts, 1:13, according to his manner of omitting things derogatory of the dignity of Christ; but he omits the angels also. He concludes by the warning that Satan has not given up the contest: 'having completed every kind of temptation the devil departed from him till a favourable opportunity', or perhaps 'till the time appointed', i.e. by God, who determines the course of events in the career of Jesus, a notion of frequent occurrence in Lk. There will be further attacks; cf. 22:3, 28, 40-44, 53.

751a IV 14-IX 50 Manifestation of the Saviour in Galilee

—In most of this section Lk runs parallel with the Galilean ministry in Mk, making such additions and omissions as his plan and aim require. His most notable additions are such as emphasize the character of Jesus as the Saviour of all men, especially of those most in need. In Mt and Mk the person of Jesus is hidden behind the proclamation of the Kingdom of God. Lk represents (though written shortly after Mk) a later stage in the growth of the Christian mind, when attention became much more fixed upon the person of our Lord (note the early Christological controversies). Thus this part opens with the sermon at Nazareth, found later in Mt and Mk, where Jesus draws the minds of the hearers to himself and his relation to God. In doing this Lk postpones the preaching at Capharnaum and the call of the disciples, Mk 1:14 ff., and so creates difficulties of reconciliation.

b 14-30 Preaching at Nazareth—Cf. Mt 13:53-58; Mk 6:1-6 which are not strict parallels; Lk passes over the visit to Nazareth mentioned there by Mt and Mk. But there are indications, 23, that he has here anticipated the chronological order, and it is hardly likely that there were two different visits to Nazareth followed by two rejections. Augustine is for the identity of 4:16-30 with Mk 6:1-6. Why has Lk anticipated? Perhaps (1) to make Jesus speak for himself and declare what his mission is; (2) to give an example of the treatment Christ will receive; cf. Jn 1:11; (3) to demonstrate the Pauline thesis (Lk being a disciple of Paul) that salvation shall pass from the Jews to the Gentiles. The two examples given, 26-27, are of Gentile origin, and the effect of these examples was similar to that so often produced by Paul's declaration of his thesis in Ac. The incident may be meant here as an early fulfilment of the threat in 13, though perhaps the connexion between 14 and 18 is the best explanation of the insertion of this incident. 15 sums up Mk 1:14 ff. until Lk is ready to rejoin Mk at 31. 16-17 show familiarity with the customs of the synagogue, where men of reputation for learning and piety were invited to read and expound the Scriptures on the Sabbath. The repute of Jesus is already established, 14-15. Despite the apparent meaning of 17b it is possible that Lk means the passage read was the Haphtarah or part of the Prophets assigned to that day, though it is questionable whether set pieces were at that date appointed for each day. The quotation in 18-19 seems drawn from various places in Isaiah; cf. 61:1-2; 58:6; 42:7. Is Lk quoting freely from memory or does the quotation contain parts of our Lord's exposition of the passage read? Omit from DV 'to heal the contrite of heart' and 'the day of reward', which are not in the Greek. Is 61:2 speaks of 'day of vengeance'; characteristic of Lk to omit this. 21. The text from Isaiah is a proclamation (in 61:1 it is the servant of Yahweh who speaks, in the other places it is Yahweh himself) and the words of Jesus mean that the proclamation predicted by Is 61:1 ff. is now being made, and the maker of it is himself. He thus establishes the character of his Messiahship, one in genuine accord with the OT; he is no Messias after the vulgar notions of popular rabbinic tradition. In fact he has a very different sort of work to do. Later on, 7:19 ff., he will have occasion to remind John the Baptist of this same truth, when he will quote the same thoughts from Isaiah. Note that the Hebrew word for 'anointed' is Mesihā; for 'anointed by the Spirit', cf. Ac 10:38, a possible reference to the Baptism. As the ceremony of anointing in the OT signified divine choice and endowment with power or authority from above, the word Messias came to bear this meaning rather than the fact of being anointed. There is a further veiled reference to the fact that the time of Messianic divine favour is inaugurated in the person of Jesus by 'the acceptable year of the Lord', 19. 23. Here, as in Mk 6, the Nazarenes cannot reconcile this aspect of Jesus with the obscurity of his origin. He makes them say ironically: 'You had better begin to uplift yourself before you begin to uplift others', then answers one proverb with another, proceeding with examples from the OT which point the moral that the fact of being a Jew does not necessarily bring God's favour. As St Paul has said already, neither circumcision nor uncircumcision count any longer, but the faith exemplified in these two examples; cf. 3:8; Ac 7:51-54; 22:21-22.

31-34 Ministry in Capharnaum—(Mk 1:21-39). The parallels in Mt are scattered; 4:13-14, 23; 7:28-29; 8:14-16. It will be noted that Lk and Mt never agree together against Mk where all three narrate the same incidents. The following peculiarities may be observed: in 38 Lk brings in Simon without introduction (an anomaly for so careful a writer) having omitted the call of the disciples already given by Mk. But Theophilus has already received the primitive catechesis, so Lk allows himself some latitude. In 40 there is the interesting addition that Jesus cures by the imposition of hands, a detail of importance in view of the ceremony in use by the Church from earliest times; cf. Ac 6:6, 9:12, 17, 13:3, and Lk 13:13. There is a characteristic variation in 43; 'I must bring the good tidings (evangelizare, εὐαγγελισσάσθαι not κηρύσσω of Mk 1:38). 44. The weight of MSS evidence is in favour of 'Judaea'; 'Galilee' is doubtless due to a copyist's correction; cf. Mk 1:39; Mt 4:23. Judaea creates no real difficulty since Lk uses it in 1:5 to signify the province containing ancient Juda with Samaria and 751d Galilee. Moreover he may have additional information about the extent of the ministry such as is seen in Jn.

- e V 1-11 Miraculous Draught of Fish: Call of the Disciples—There is no trace of this miracle in Mk and Mt, but the call of the disciples is paralleled in Mk 1:16-20; Mt 4:18-20, so far neglected by Lk. The conclusion is the same in all three Synoptists, and it is unlikely that the disciples were called twice. It has been suggested that Lk has taken great liberties with chronology by anticipating the miracle of Jn 21:1-14 in order to provide a suitable setting for the call of the disciples; but the two incidents are altogether different. Others suggest, on account of the similarity between 5:3 and Mk 4:1; Mt 13:1-2 (followed in both by the Parable of the Sower), that Lk has anticipated the time of the miracle in order to throw light on 10b. It may be noted that this is not the only instance of Mk's omission of incidents that do honour to Peter. The miracle is of a nature likely to impress fishermen; note the progress from 'Master' in 5 to 'Lord' in 8. Christ's miracles were done that men might recognize in him virtus divinitatis, and it is a quality of divine power that all creatures should be subject to it (ST III, 44, 4). Peter has fished all night, the proper time for fishing, without success; Jesus fishes in daylight, the wrong time, with marvellous success. To a Semitic mind, power of command over the sea and its inhabitants would suggest divine power; cf. Gen 1:1 ff. and Ps 92. This may give the key to Peter's exclamation, 8b. The thought of the Spirit of God dominating the primeval waters, the Creation, the subjection of creatures to man (cf. Ps 8), man's loss of this power through sin (cf. Rom 8:18-23), Peter's failure and our Lord's success: all this leads up to the conclusion that Jesus stands in very special relationship to God. It is worth noting that the first disciple called by our Lord begins with an avowal of sinfulness; though Jesus has cured the sick and reigned over the lower nature, his true mission is to cast out sin and make God reign in the souls of men. Despite Peter's declaration he is called to be associated with the work of Christ. But the force of the incident is this: that Peter and his fellow-disciples are to remember that the plan and method of that work are of God's design. As in the capturing of fish, so in the capturing of men for God's Kingdom, God's way will be found at variance with human standards: a lesson Peter and the rest were very slow to learn. As for Jesus, so for his associates, absolute surrender to the will of God is required. 11. The lesson goes home. The call is not restricted to Simon; but Simon is clearly made the leader, for to him alone is addressed: 'Fear not! from henceforth thou shalt catch men'.

- g 12-16 Healing of the Leper—(Mt 8:1-4; Mk 1:40-45). Here Lk takes up again the thread of Mk which he had dropped in order to insert 5:1-11. Mt inserts the Sermon on the Mount before this incident. Lk's omissions of the signs of emotion and severity in Jesus noted by Mk are characteristic. But he makes the retirement to the desert, apparently caused by the unwelcome attention of the crowd in Mk 1:45, a voluntary withdrawal, indeed a matter of habit (according to the grammatical construction of the Greek).

- h V 17-VI 11 A Series of Disputes with Adversaries—Having thus shown how Jesus gathers around him a little group of sympathetic followers whom he chooses as fellow-workers, Lk proceeds to bring out the contrast that there was another group hostile from the very first. Here begins the description of our Lord's relations with the Scribes and Pharisees, the representatives of official Judaism. It is crystallized in a series of disputes which result in two effects: the adversaries begin as various factions but unite against Jesus, and end by a determination to destroy him (6:11, more strongly stated in parallels Mk 3:6; Mt 12:14). Here again Lk follows the order of Mk 2:1-3:6, while the parallels in Mt are scattered. The reader is referred therefore to the commentaries on Mt and Mk except for the peculiarities of Lk to be noted.

17-26 Healing of the Paralytic—(Mk 2:1-12; Mt 9:1-8). The chief differences between Lk and Mk are that while Mk does not mention the presence of the Scribes and Pharisees until late, Lk prepares the scene in his usual orderly manner. Note his introduction: having gathered his audience he writes 'the power of the Lord [Yahweh] was that he [Jesus] should heal', as though again to indicate that God is directing affairs. The difference of DV and Vg here is due to the reading αὐτοῦ 'them' instead of the more probable αὐτόν 'him'. Lk's literary emendations have sacrificed the vivid character of Mk's narrative. He omits the graphic description of digging a hole through the earthen roof of the house, and makes our Lord address the paralytic as 'Man', instead of the affectionate 'Son'. The presence of Scribes and Pharisees from Judaea and Jerusalem is perhaps the reason of 'Judaea' in 4:44; but in 5:17 Judaea must be accepted in its restrictive sense. 23. As in Mk the comparison is not between miracle and miracle but between the saying and the external manifestation of the saying's result. As forgiveness of sins shows no external manifestation, it does not lay the speaker open to ridicule if he falsely claims to forgive sins. But healing of disease must be externally shown. Our Lord vehemently rejects the accusation of blasphemy, and will not allow that his words of forgiveness have been merely declaratory. For 'Son of Man', see § 746d.

27-32 Call of Levi the Publican—(Mt 9:9-13; Mk 2:13-17). Like Mk, but unlike Mt, Lk refrains from identifying Levi with Matthew; he adds the phrase 'leaving all things', 28, which is reminiscent of 5:11. 30. Read 'the Pharisees and their Scribes' following the preferable reading of Mk 2:16 'the Scribes of the Pharisees'; the Sadducean party also had its own Scribes who were laxer than the former in interpreting the Law. 32. Lk adds that to which Jesus calls sinners, penance μετανοία, change of mind or conversion. The word has already been mentioned in John's preaching, 3:3; cf. 1:16-17. It will be noted that the account of these disputes serves to bring out the nature of our Lord's mission. Having just laid claim to the power of absolving men from their sins, a claim to divine power in the eyes of the Pharisees, 21, he now throws down a challenge to his adversaries by choosing for his intimate disciple a man like Levi, one of that class hated all over the ancient world for its anti-social activities. Lucian groups them with adulterers, procurers and people who overturn the world. Levi was rather a portitor or collector of the customs tax called portorium (probably for Herod Antipas) than a publicanus, i.e. one of the rich financiers who farmed the government taxes. Apparently Levi has done well; he is rich enough to hold a great feast (δοχή reception) to celebrate his calling, at which Jesus and his disciples mix with Levi's colleagues and other guests, classed as 'publicans and sinners' by Mk. This (in Lk) appears to give rise to a double complaint: first about incurring ceremonial defilement by mixing with people who are careless of the legal requirements of Judaic Law, secondly about the failure to observe the fast.

33-39 Dispute about Fasting—(Mt 9:14-17; Mk 2:18-22). Each of the Synoptists approaches this incident from a different angle. In Lk the disciples of John do not appear on the scene except in the words of the opponents of Jesus; in Mt it is the disciples of John who make the objection. Lk adds the interesting detail about the special prayers of John's disciples; he remembers this in 11:1, at the beginning of the instruction on prayer. He understands the objection in the same way as Mk and Mt: if Jesus is setting himself up as a religious leader in Israel, teaching and gathering followers, why does he not follow the example of accepted leaders like the Pharisees or John the Baptist, instead of mixing with such doubtful characters

752a as the publicans? The fast in question is evidently not the Day of Atonement, which was the one annual day of obligatory fasting for all, Lev 16:29. We know that the Pharisees had special fast days (cf. 18:12) and it is not surprising that the followers of such an ascetic as John fasted. There were four or five fasts kept by the devout, such as the anniversary of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the day in question seems from 34 (cf. Mt 9:15) to have been an occasion of mourning. As in Mk and Mt, Jesus answers with one of those striking illustrative parables which mark all his encounters with Pharisees, cf. 31b. There is strong allegorization in the parable of 34, where Jesus makes the striking claim that his presence with his disciples creates a new situation which calls for joy rather than mourning (fasting); cf. 10:23. Not that he condemns fasting as such; far from it, for the days shall come when fasting will be suitable for his disciples—a veiled prediction of his Passion. But the present situation is like a wedding feast, he the bridegroom, the disciples like ‘the children of the bride-chamber’, i.e. the guests or rather the friends of the bridegroom whose business it is not to be sad but to celebrate the marriage of their friend. 36-39. With Mk and Mt, Lk adds further parabolic utterances (Lk alone here uses the name ‘parable’) by which Jesus explains his attitude to the traditional observances of Judaism. Note 36: ‘no one having torn a patch from a new garment putteth it upon an old garment’, rather different from Mk 2:21 and Mt 9:16; but it brings this parable into line with the second: both new garment and old ruined, like new wine and old skins both lost. 38b. ‘and both are preserved’, a gloss from Mt 9:17. The meaning of these parables is much disputed, but it seems to be this: Jesus is indeed setting up as a religious teacher, but not like his adversaries. Everybody had noticed this already; cf. 4:32, ‘they were amazed at his teaching, for his word was with authority’, and ‘not as the Scribes’, adds Mk 1:22. Jesus now says that his teaching is such that it must be put into new men, i.e. into minds not fixed in the grooves of traditional prejudices. His call of Levi, a publican, has just demonstrated this. He does not condemn the old Mosaic observances (as Mt makes clear in 5:17-20 and Lk will indicate later, 16:16-18); they are good in themselves but they have served the purpose for which God gave them. Indeed, if allegory is pressed here, they must be judged to be getting rather old and worn-out. Note the concluding words of Lk in 39 (proper to him; cf. Jn 2:10), where our Lord seems to express a feeling of sympathy for the Jews who find a difficulty in contemplating the abrogation of what they had been taught to look on as sharing the very eternity of God himself. Jesus has yet to make them realize that the Mosaic Dispensation loses nothing of its honour in finding its perfection and completion in him. But it would be false to conclude from these parables that he has any intention of preserving it: to add the Gospel on to the frame-work of the old observances would only spoil both.

VI 1-11 The Lord of the Sabbath—(Mt 12:1-8; Mk 2:23-28). This is the last of the disputes recorded by Lk and Mk at this time, postponed by Mt to a more advanced stage in the conflict between Jesus and his adversaries, and it concerns a question to which the latter attached such importance that the result of the dispute drives them to madness and brings things to a head, 11. It is a commonplace that the Rabbis had rendered the law of the Sabbath so intolerable a burden by their complicated and puerile legislation (Edersheim, Append. xvii) that they defeated their own professed purpose to make the Sabbath not only a day of rest but of delight, when Jews should wear their best clothes and eat their best food. Exaggeration ran rife, some Rabbis holding that even the tortures of Gehenna were suspended on the Sabbath, while if one kept two Sabbaths perfectly salvation was assured. And the Mishnah (c. A.D. 200) taught that desecration of the Sabbath was a crime deserving death. As much of this would appear trivial to Gentile minds there was no need for Lk to add with Mk ‘the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath’. For the rest he follows Mk closely, avoiding the difficulty of reconciliation with 1 Kg 21 by omitting mention of Abiathar. There is no entirely satisfactory explanation of ‘second-first Sabbath’, and the best MSS omit ‘second-first’; it is probably a combination of different glosses. One suggested view is that it means the first Sabbath of the first month (Nisan) the new sacred year, the first ‘first Sabbath’ being the first of the month Tisri, in which the civil year began. The objection made to our Lord is that the action of his disciples is equivalent to reaping; sillier things are found in the rabbinic books. He refuses to descend to discussion on the casuistical point and lays down in reply the broad ethical principle that nulla lex positiva, etiam divina, obligat cum magno incommodo. Since Law is a dictate of the reason for the common good of man, when the observance of positive law is found to be for the harm of the community it is right to dispense with it. The example seems, to Jewish minds at least, rather an extreme one, but our Lord chose it doubtless to draw attention to himself and his mission. Note his startling conclusion: ‘I, as Son of Man, have authority over the Mosaic Law which you all hold to have been given by God’. It is this that probably leads to the determination to destroy him, 11. The miracle in the synagogue, 6-10, provides another application of the principle Jesus has just laid down; there was no pressing need for a cure on that Sabbath day, but he wishes to show his adversaries that their very principles are wrong. It is certainly wrong to do evil on the Sabbath, not because it is the Sabbath but because evil is against the moral law. But not all good things may be done on the Sabbath; some are forbidden by God’s positive law given to Moses. Therefore one must consider what was the legislator’s purpose, i.e. the good of man, and where that is seriously frustrated by the observance of positive law, then the legislator does not intend the law to stand. This is an example of our Lord’s ‘teaching with authority’, 4:32, which caused so much admiration. The Rabbis had drowned even the Ten Commandments in a sea of positive prescriptions, never seeking principles but only some text or rabbinical authority on which to base their teaching. Note the Lucan details: it was the man’s right hand, 6, Jesus again manifests supernatural power in reading thoughts, 8, Lk omits that Jesus looked around ‘with anger’, Mk 3:5.

12-19 Call of the Apostles—(Mt 10:1-4; Mk 3:13-19). f Having broken with the representatives of official Judaism, Jesus now groups around himself new followers—a Church. Lk is peculiar in giving the impression of something of grave import; it calls for a night spent alone in the mountain ‘in the prayer of God’. This is characteristic: cf. 3:21; 9:18 before confession of Peter, 9:29, etc. Lk records in Ac how this practice was kept up by the Church; 13:3. He emphasizes (here and in Ac 1:2) the deliberate choice of the Twelve for a greater number; there were 120 disciples gathered for Peter’s address in Ac 1:15 ff. He insists on the name bestowed, Apostles (not referred to till later in Mk 6:30) and throughout Lk and Ac he shows a preference for this title, contrary to the practice of the other evangelists. Insistence on the note of choice recalls God’s choice of the twelve patriarchs (cf. Ac 13:17) and emphasizes the idea that something new is beginning, the new Israel of God (cf. Gal 3:7-9; 6:16). His order of Apostles differs from Mk and Mt, as these differ from each other; but all observe the same three groups of four, and the same names head each group, Peter’s name always heading the first group. Thaddaeus of Mk, Lebbaeus of Mt, is ‘Jude of James’ in Lk, identified with the Jude of Jn 14:22, the author of the Epistle. Doubtless like others of his time he enjoyed several names, and it is natural that the early Christians should have avoided the name he shared with the traitor. Finally, Lk follows

g 17-49 Discourse on the Qualifications of a True Disciple—Usually called the Sermon on the Plain because of 17a. Lk here forsakes Mk who has no collection of sayings of Jesus. Is this the same discourse as the Sermon on the Mount in Mt 5-7? But the first question is whether these two sermons are here as our Lord gave them. A common opinion today is that both are a collection of his principal sayings which must have been often repeated. Both in Mt and Lk they appear in an artificial setting; cf. Mt 4:23 ff. with Lk 6:17 ff. In both there is a similar mise en scène, in both the same beginning and the same conclusion. Mt makes collections of sayings, parables and miracles. Lk, who prefers a different sort of order, has distributed much of Mt's sermon through his Gospel, putting sayings in their due setting, whether chronological or logical we do not know. St Augustine seems to conclude that Mt and Lk have both taken the inaugural sermon of Jesus to his chosen disciples, each editing it after his own fashion and purpose, § 745a. In Lk the sermon is addressed to disciples and would-be disciples; it forms a programme of the dispositions required of them. 20-26. Like Mt he begins with the opposition existing between the spirit of Jesus and the spirit of the world, exemplified by the Beatitudes to which here Lk adds the Woes (reserved by Mt to much later; cf. 23:13; Lk is a lover of contrasts). Those animated by the spirit of this world seek riches, comfort, pleasure and honour; the disciple is to look for happiness (the Beatitudes begin with μακάριοι, 'happy are ye') in the midst of poverty, privation, tears and persecution. Lk agrees with Mt in proceeding to show Jesus predicting the inevitable clash between these contrary spirits. 27-36. Here, as in Mt 5:44-48, the disciple is warned that persecution is to be met with charity alone, a superhuman charity which involves detachment from worldly considerations, which demands that absolute surrender of self insisted on so often in Lk. 37-45. As in Mt 7:1 ff., warning against the temptation to judge oneself better than others, even while meeting hatred with goodness, mercy and generosity of an extraordinary kind. The disciple must strive to make others better by his example, even correcting them when necessary; but let him begin the work of improvement and correction with himself. Only the good can do good. 46-49. Conclusion as in Mt 7:21-27; let all set to work, not satisfied with listening to their Master but eager to carry out his teaching loyally. Such is Lagrange's summary of the discourse. It will be noted that Lk omits Mt's references to the Old Law; he has not the latter's precise purpose of showing our Lord as the long-foretold Messiah, and showing him in this sermon like a new Moses giving a New Law from the mountain.

i 20. Lk puts simply 'poor' for Mt's 'poor in spirit'; it is clear from the whole sermon that he is not preaching social revolution or beatifying material conditions as themselves the sources of happiness. As in Mt emphasis is here laid on the interior dispositions of soul. Unorthodox critics argue from 20-38 that this teaching anticipates 'a speedy end of the age and the early advent of the Kingdom of God'; a literal application of this teaching 'would be to invite anarchy'. But there is no indication that Jesus is laying down precepts to be followed by all, nor even counsels of perfection which absolve his followers from their social duties. But 'if these words were a little oftener practised in imitation of the Saints, society would rather gain than lose by such heroic examples of charity' (Lagrange). We have just seen the enormous influence exercised by Gandhi, a non-Christian, who practised some of these teachings heroically. 22. 'when they shall excommunicate you (cf. Jn 9:22; 12:42; 16:2) and insult you, and proscribe your name as evil' etc., recalling the proscriptions so common at the beginning of the Roman empire. 32-34. Lk substitutes 'sinners' for 'publicans' and 'Gentiles' in Mt 5:46-7. 35. Difficulty about true reading here; it is maintained that the Greek will not bear the translation of DV and Vg; 'thereby' is a gloss. Some translate 'nothing despairing' or 'despairing of none' or 'making none despair'. But although ἀνεπιζέω is not found elsewhere with the Vg meaning, there is no doubt that such meaning best fits the context. 36. Substitution of 'merciful' for Mt's 'perfect': characteristically Lucan.

VII 1-10 The Centurion's Servant—(Mt 8:5-15, not in Mk; affinities with Jn 4:46 ff., but probably different incident). The incident well suits Lk's aim of showing how the Gospel benefits are extended to the Gentiles. This Gentile centurion is presented in a particularly favourable light even at the expense of Israel: his humanity towards a slave, his religious spirit and kindness to Judaism, the reverence and humility he shows towards Jesus, and finally his 'great faith'. The Church uses his humble confession daily in the administration of Holy Communion. What is the faith on which he is congratulated by our Lord, a faith such as Jesus had not yet found among his fellow-Jews (even the Apostles are not excepted)? Note that from now on Lk begins to record examples of faith; cf. 7:50; 8:25, lack of faith; 8:48, 50. The centurion argues from his own situation to that of our Lord, with all that it implies. He is one fixed ρασσόμενος in a system of authority having superiors above and inferiors below. Whoever Jesus may be, the centurion recognizes him as one set in a system of authority of which the head and source is God, and Jesus has power to exercise this authority to do such a thing as here suggested. In other words the centurion admits our Lord's special relationship to God and the divine character of his mission, a thing that the Jews refuse to do. At the same time he admits his unworthiness as a Gentile to profit by close contact with this Jewish thaumaturge; his Jewish friends doubtless left him in no doubt about the essential holiness of Israel and the essential sinfulness of Gentiles; cf. Gal 2:15; Eph 2:1-3; Lk 6:32-33 with Mt 5:47. The incident is surely the same both in Mt and Lk despite the differences, e.g. that in Mt the servant is called a 'boy', that he is a paralytic, that the centurion comes himself to ask for the cure; such differences, which St Augustine reconciles, do not militate against the identity. Mt has drawn the conclusion in 8:11-12 which we might have expected Lk to draw; but his parallel to Mt 8:11-12 comes much later, 13:28-30.

11-17 Widow of Naim—Only in Lk. The Gentile centurion had recognized in Jesus a person endowed with the mysterious power belonging to God alone, therefore one coming from God. The incident at Naim ends with the same conclusion on the part of Jews: 'God hath visited his people'; cf. 1:68, 78; Ac 15:14. In these last two incidents Lk may be said to sum up what any honest witness might have gathered from the life and actions of Jesus. Naim lies about 8 m. SE. of Nazareth and not far from Sunam where Elias raised the dead boy to life, 4 Kg 4, a fact which is enough to make the rationalist critics throw doubt upon Lk's incident. But neither Elias nor any other prophet had raised a dead person to life by a word; note the extraordinary labours of Elias in 3 Kg 17 and 4 Kg 4. Plummer remarks that most of the recorded cases of the raising of the dead in Scripture were for the sake of women; cf. Heb 11:35. 13. Note 'the Lord' a sudden appearance of the phrase after the constant use of 'Jesus'; doubtless Lk's witness to early Christian usage. Here Lk forsakes his usual reserve in speaking of our Lord and says he was 'moved with compassion' (not, mercy) ἐσπλαγχνίσθη, a word used only of Jesus in the Gospels and only here applied by Lk to him (but see 10:33 and 15:20). 17. Judaea again, perhaps used in its restricted sense in view of the sequel; John's disciples come from the south where their master is in prison at Machaerus, Herod's castle lying east of the Dead Sea.

18-25 Jesus and John the Baptist—(Mt 11:2-19, cf. 6 Lk 16:16). One of the first cares of our Lord's disciples

758e was to determine and record the relationship of their Master to John the Baptist, and therefore what attitude they should adopt to John's followers. That a lack of understanding between the two groups sometimes survived is proved by Ac 18:24-26; 19:1 ff., where as late as A.D. 54-5 persons claiming to be disciples of John appear to be ignorant of the necessity of Christian discipleship. Mk, writing for Roman Christians, has no need to clear up this point and omits this incident narrated by Lk and Mt. In a certain way John the Baptist had overshadowed Jesus by appearing in the traditional garb of a prophet, frightening people with thundering denunciations like a prophet, attracting them by his courage and burning enthusiasm; while Jesus appeared in a very modest manner, quietly preaching in the synagogues; cf. 11:28-30; 12:15-21. It was necessary then to record the fact that John, great as he was, had his raison d'être in his relationship to Jesus; in the designs of God, as in fact, he pointed to Jesus; cf. Jn 1:6-9, 15, 26, 29, etc. But this incident fulfils another purpose in Lk, at one with his theme of Jesus as the manifestation of the goodness and mercy of God. To understand the sense of the question put to Jesus by John's disciples it is necessary to refer to John's preaching, in which he had announced 'a Coming One', ὁ ἐρχόμενος, who was to baptize with the Holy Ghost and fire, who was to separate the wicked from the good. To escape the formidable judgement that was foreshadowed men had to change their lives by penance (μετανοία 'conversion'), for the Coming One was pictured with an axe in his hand to cut down unfruitful trees. As indicated above, the mission of Jesus seems to bear no relation to such a grim foreboding. Indeed there is more than a suggestion here that, if Jesus is the Coming One, why does he not save his witness from prison and death? Cf. Jn 11:37. Traditional exegesis is not inclined to admit that John himself is in doubt; his question is for the sake of his followers in view of his coming death, so that he may pass them on to Jesus. It must be confessed that at first sight the Gospel seems to give the opposite impression. But there is a third explanation based on the difference between the method of John and that of Jesus, of which we have just spoken. In other words John, as Mt 11:2 says, having heard while in prison of the miracles of Jesus which serve to confirm what has been revealed to himself of the person and mission of Jesus, feels a certain surprise and perhaps impatience. Why does Jesus hesitate to declare himself and to use his mighty power to cleanse the threshing floor in the vigorous way that John has foretold? At any rate the reply of Jesus, addressed be it noted to John, seems to suppose that such was the sense of John's question. God's work must be done only in God's way. What that way is has already been indicated in 4:16 ff. 20. The question is not whether Jesus is the Messiah; John had never used the word of him. But although 'the Coming One' was not a current name for the Messiah it certainly suggests a Messianic significance. Hence, although 22 is generally made a fulfilment of Isaian Messianic prophecies in 35:5, 61:1, it may be noted that there is not much identity between these texts and 22. Moreover these texts were not traditional Messianic texts for the Jews; hence 22 must be read in the light of 21, a Lucan addition. Jesus bids his questioners not to form their conclusions from what they see in his appearance, 23, but from his works which, as they might know from the Scripture, manifest the benign hand of God working in the world. This is Lk's thesis, and Jn's too: 'If you will not believe me, believe the works'. The answer seems also to indicate that Jesus has not come as the executor of divine vengeance, which the preaching of John might seem to indicate. The same is gathered from the sermon at Nazareth, 4:18-21, which refers to the same texts in Isaiah. In a word, John had announced Jesus as the one through whom the Spirit of God should be poured out upon the world; our Lord replies that his works prove that this is now taking place in his person; cf. Jn 7:39. Lk

36-50 The Sinful Woman anoints Jesus—The similarities between this story and those recorded in Mt 26:6-13; Mk 14:3-9; Jn 12:1-8, have led to the opinion that the four evangelists narrate the same incident. Latin tradition since the time of St Gregory the Great has been in favour of identity; the general tradition among the Greeks (except for Origen) is that Lk's incident is altogether different and most modern Catholic commentators adopt this view. It must be admitted that the divergences seem irreconcilable. If Lk omits Mk 14:3-9 in his parallel place, that is only in accordance with his common practice of avoiding repetition of similar incidents. The impression is given that this is a woman of abandoned life and well-known as such, though the word 'sinner' would not necessarily mean that for a Jew. Note the relation of this story to 7:29. If Lk omits to name her, that is only in harmony again with his delicate reserve. There is nothing in Lk which justifies identifying her with Mary of Magdala, 8:2, or Mary of Bethany, 10:38 ff. Greek tradition generally distinguishes them all. 38. She comes in to seek Jesus and render him this act of reverence and affection. Why? Presumably, especially in view of 29-35, because she is one of those who have 'justified God' in recognizing Jesus as God's minister for her salvation. She manifests the penance (μετανοία 'conversion') to which he calls sinners; cf. 5:32. The pouring of sweet ointment on the head of an esteemed person was no extraordinary thing; it is noteworthy that she presumes only to put it on his feet; cf. Mt 26:7, Mk 14:3. 40-43. The application of the parable is certainly that love is consequent on forgiveness, though the opposite seems to be stated in 47a; hence the traditional interpretation that charity removes sin, despite the apparently opposite meaning of 50 which Protestant commentators have used to support the doctrine of justification by faith alone. But 47b shows that 47a cannot mean what it at first sight appears to mean, for in that case 47b would be without purpose. Hence 47a must mean, 'wherefore I say to thee, (it is manifest) her many sins have been forgiven because she (shows clear signs that she) hath loved much'. Note what is claimed here in a veiled manner: she was a sinner, Jesus declares her sins have been forgiven, the love she feels in return is shown to Jesus. At the least, then, she treats him as representing God. Note the significance of anointing in the OT, i.e. God's elect, God's representative, priest, king, prophet, Messias especially. A further conclusion Simon is left to draw for himself: he has treated the woman with contempt as one 753h separated from God, cf. 18:9, but if Jesus may conclude from the woman's behaviour that God has forgiven her, Simon too may conclude from his own behaviour towards Jesus that God has not forgiven him. Lk again draws attention to the supernatural power of Jesus in reading thoughts, 40. Simon objects that Jesus must be ignorant of the woman's character; Jesus replies that he knows very much about her, even that her sins have been taken away. 50. Faith here and elsewhere in Lk is not the mere intellectual assent to truths about God under the influence of the will, but an attitude of the whole man, mind and will and affections, towards God, a compound of faith, hope and charity; a belief in God not merely as existing, but as rewarding and full of solicitude for the good of man; cf. Heb 11:6. It also includes a certain attitude towards Christ as God's representative at least; in a word, it sums up the thesis of Lk, God visiting his people in the person and work of Jesus to save them. That is the note on which the incident terminates.

754a VIII 1-3 Women Disciples of Jesus—A brief description, peculiar to Lk, of a preliminary journey of ministry with the Twelve and a group of women. Taken with v 4 (cf. Mt 13:2; Mk 4:1) it furnishes the mise en scène for the parables which follow here as in Mk and Mt. Joanna appears in Lk alone, here and again at the sepulchre, 24:10. All the women have been healed by Jesus of diseases either of body or soul. It does not follow that Mary of Magdala, on the west coast of the Lake of Galilee, has been healed of moral disease; but as seven signifies completion in Semitic thought, it follows that she has been either a great sufferer or a great sinner. Lk gives no ground for her identification with the sinful woman of 7:36-50.

b 4-18 Teaching in Parables—(Mt 13:1-23, 5:15, 10:26, 25:29; Mk 4:1-25). Lk here takes up again the thread of Mk and runs parallel for a considerable space, while Mt's parallels are scattered. We have already seen examples of our Lord's fashion of using argumentative parables to silence the Pharisees; here begin his illustrative parables, i.e. throwing light on the nature and characteristics of the Kingdom of God which he has preached from the start; cf. 4:43. Light is needed because the subject is one of mystery, 10, and his parables are the means by which he brings the hidden things to light, 16-18. It is surely in accordance with the clear drift of these words that we must interpret the difficulty of 10, where Lk is much briefer than Mt 13:10-15, Mk 4:10-12, probably in view of his Gentile reader. He could not omit the warning altogether, seeing that it left such a strong impression on the mind of the early Church. All the Evangelists record it, St Paul insists on it, Ac 28:25 ff., Rom 11:8. The most reasonable explanation of this enigmatical saying of our Lord is that given by Chrysostom (PG 57, 467) and Aquinas (ST III, 42, 3), i.e. the parable is of its very nature apt to enlighten the mind, and its enigmatic form is intended to excite the interest of the hearer. But for the same reason it serves as a sifting process, its enigmatic form ensuring that only those who are well disposed to the speaker and keen on finding out the truth will take the trouble to apply their minds seriously in order to see the meaning of the comparison. Therefore Jesus uses such phrases as 'he that hath ears to hear let him hear' and 'take heed therefore how you hear', as though to say: 'Think well on this: it needs your close attention'. It is only in the above sense that obscurity may be said to be the object of the parables. (For further commentary see Mt and Mk in loc.)

c 19-21 The Mother and Brethren of Jesus—(Mt 12:46-50; Mk 3:31-35). Lk postpones further parables and inserts this incident which comes earlier in Mk; but it is very well placed here just at the moment when our Lord has made his disciples the confidants, as it were, of his family secrets (cf. Jn 15:15). He omits reference to 'brother and sister', perhaps to avoid arousing unprofitable questions in the mind of his reader; the word 'brethren' could have a wider meaning in Greek than children of the same mother and father. The dogmatic tradition of the Church maintains the virginity of both Mary and Joseph. For The Brethren of the Lord see Lagr., S. Marc (1911) 72 ff. and GJC I, 203-5, and §§ 672-3.

22-56 Various Miracles—(Mt 8:23-34; 9:18-26; Mk 4:35-5:43). These four miracles demonstrate in an ascending scale the supernatural power of Jesus and the growing recognition of him by his disciples as one who is a depository of divine authority to be exercised at will. There is a further clarification of the meaning of faith, 25, i.e. such an attitude to Jesus as to one through whom God is intervening in the world for man's good that his mere presence even when asleep gives sufficient ground for confidence; cf. also 48 and 50. The following peculiarities of Lk may be noted: the Greek has 'Master! Master!' in 24, giving a realistic air to the disciples' cry. 43. Luke the physician characteristically omits Mk's remark about the woman being rather the worse for the attention of the doctors. 48. 'Thy faith hath saved thee' as in 7:50, and again in 18:42.

IX 1-50 Stages in the Formation of the Apostles—d Passing over Mk's account of the visit of Jesus to Nazareth, having dealt with that in 4:16 ff., Lk continues to follow the general lines of Mk's narrative while omitting numerous incidents. The omissions are dictated partly by the fact that he has in mind to include a large section, 9:51-18:30, not found in Mk and Mt, although parts of it are scattered through Mt. He therefore omits incidents which are more or less duplications of things already described, e.g. the walking on the sea, the second feeding of the multitude; he passes over the dispute with the Pharisees about purification and the incident of the Canaanite woman's daughter, the former as of no interest to the Gentile reader, the latter because of the apparently hard words spoken by Jesus regarding non-Jews. The mission of the Apostles is followed by the report of what Herod thinks about Jesus, which prepares for the question of what the Apostles themselves think. This leads to Peter's confession, whereupon the Twelve are taken aside for further instruction of a more advanced character. They have reached the stage where they are strong enough to hear the prediction of the Passion, which is to be drilled into them henceforth. The Galilean ministry in Lk, which had opened with the declaration from heaven at the Baptism, closes with the same declaration at the Transfiguration.

1-6 Mission of the Apostles—(Mt 10:1, 9-11, 14; Mk 6:7-13). Here Lk follows Mk pretty closely, but substitutes that the Apostles went out 'announcing the good tidings' for Mk's 'they preached that men should do penance'.

7-9 Herod's Perplexity—(Mt 14:1-2; Mk 6:14-16). The indication given in 6 is sufficient to explain the stir that would naturally be caused through Galilee and disturb Herod, whose perplexity would be better accounted for if Lk had not omitted Mk's story of John's execution. 9b, proper to Lk, prepares us for another special incident added by him in the Passion narrative concerning Herod's interview with Jesus, 23:7-12.

10-17 Feeding of the Multitude—(Mt 14:13-21; Mk 6:30-44). There is little change from Mk here (except of a literary character) beyond the introduction of the miracle in 10b-11, where the mention of Bethsaida indicates a special source; Lk is often careless of topography, and even here he does not tell us how the scene changes from Bethsaida to the desert place of 12.

18-27 Confession of Peter—(Mt 16:13-28; Mk 8:27-39). Lk neglects the mention of Caesarea Philippi; the incident might have taken place near Bethsaida according to the information he gives us. But he adds to Mk and Mt by saying that Jesus was occupied with 754f prayer. Thenceforward he follows Mk save for a change in the words of the confession and his characteristic omission of the reprimand of Peter, Mt 16:22-23; Mk 8:32-33. Arising from prayer Jesus questions the disciples about the opinion of the crowd (in Mk and Mt 'men') concerning him. The answers recall exactly the opinions already given in 8, where it will be noted that nobody had suggested that he was the Messiah; therefore the confession of Peter, in the name of the rest, stands out all the more significantly. Lk's record of the confession is more complete than Mk's, less than Mt's; but it is consistent with what has gone before; cf. 2:11, 26, also Ac 10:38. It adds nothing in reality to Mk's simple formula; and in view of what Lk has told us regarding the origin and person of our Lord, nothing can be concluded, from his omission of Mt's words 'the Son of the living God', adverse to his teaching on the divinity of Christ. In any case, we have said that it seems certain Lk bases himself on Mk's narrative rather than upon Mt's in his account of the Galilean ministry. 21-23. Here Lk, like Mk and Mt, shows our Lord imposing silence on the disciples about what is called the Messianic Secret. The reason for this is plain: as Jesus has already said 7:22-23, he wishes people to judge of him and his mission from the character of his works and not to be led astray by their preconceptions. Moreover he has to guard himself against the misplaced enthusiasm of the crowd (cf. Jn 6:14-15), based as it is upon false conceptions of the true role of God's Messiah, conceptions which seem to persist in his own disciples right up to the end; cf. 24:19 ff.; Ac 1:6; Mk 10:35 ff. (not in Lk). His own disciples are the first to be taught that the Messiah is to complete his destined work in a shocking manner, described by the repeated predictions of the Passion, the first of which appears in 22. Those who have been associated with him in this work must be conformed to the example of their Master in this respect. The prediction of 22 is sufficient to indicate what sort of death he must die, for it the Elders, the High-priests and the Scribes (representing the three sections of the Sanhedrin) are to reject Jesus, that means execution by the only power that has authority to put to death, i.e. the Roman governor. All doubt is removed by the words of 23, where Lk adds that the disciple must bear his cross 'daily'. This verse must be read with the fact in mind (it was surely in the minds of the disciples) that only twenty years before 2,000 Jews had been crucified under the legate Varus for rebellion (Jos., Ant. 17, 10, 10). The penalty of crucifixion had become very common in the provinces of the empire after the death of Julius Caesar, and was common in Judaea under every procurator. 27. Lk concludes with the mysterious promise (in Mk and Mt with remarkable differences) which is interpreted by some of the Fathers as referring to the Transfiguration; others see in it a reference to the fall of Jerusalem, the signal for the complete release of the Church from the shackles of Judaism and the consequent extension of the Kingdom of God in the Gentile world.

755a 28-36 The Transfiguration—(Mt 17:1-8; Mk 9:2-8). As Lagrange says, it is impossible to read the Gospel without seeing the relation of this scene to the parallel scene in Gethsemani: 'they stand in opposition to one another like strophe and antistrophe, but the Transfiguration serves as a sure pledge of Christ's future glory, while Gethsemani shows him to us in the lowest depths of human abasement'. The incident must be joined with the prediction of the Passion; these predictions always end (except in Lk 9:44b) with a promise of resurrection, and it is the glory of the risen Christ that is foreshadowed in the Transfiguration. The chief additions in Lk are characteristic: our Lord is again at prayer while the events begin to happen (cf. 3:21); his Passion is the subject of his conversation with Moses and Elias, who like Jesus (32) appear in glory; the disciples are heavy with sleep as at Gethsemani; it is only when Moses and Elias are on the point of departure that Peter breaks in with his suggestion. 28. Lk is less definite than Mk and Mt about the time, but such is his manner. 30-33. Here, contrary to his usual custom when parallel with Mk, he is much more detailed; Lk evidently attaches much importance to the incident. 'They spoke of his decease', éxodos, Vg excessus. The Gk word is used for death in 2 Pet 1:15; Wis 3:2, 7:6. There is little doubt about its meaning here, and the importance of the incident in Lk's eyes may be gathered from its relation to 24:25-27, 44-47. Moses and Elias, who as Tertullian says certainly stand for the Law and the Prophets, appear 'in glory', ἐν δόξῃ (cf. 2:9), i.e. dwelling with God. They confirm the prediction of the Passion just made by Jesus, thus declaring that such is the design of God. In transfiguratione illud principaliter agebatur ut de cordibus discipulorum scandalum crucis tolleretur (St Leo the Great). 33. Lk's remark that Peter speaks only when he sees Moses and Elias departing justifies the translation, 'Master, it is a good thing that we are here', which is grammatically correct: a good thing, because he and his companions can build some sort of shelter against the sun (σκηνή 'tent' or 'booth') for Jesus and his visitors from heaven. He wishes to detain them. What do they want shelters for? Surely because Peter is under the impression that, supported by such undeniable witnesses as Moses and Elias, Jesus is about to inaugurate his Messianic manifestation to the world (cf. 20). The lesson of 22-27 has not yet gone home, as subsequent events will prove. Lk adds, with Mk, that Peter does not know what he is talking about. 34. The cloud comes as if in answer to Peter's words, here as elsewhere signifying the divine presence; he had suggested making shelters and the divine cloud covers them. God now enters on the scene and speaks as he spoke with Moses on Sinai about the Law, of which Christ is the end; Gal 3:24; cf. Ex 19:9 ff. 35. MS authority is divided between 'beloved' (only) ἀγαπητός and 'elect' ἐκλεκτός. The former looks like a borrowing from Mk and Mt or from 3:22. 'Elect' is a traditional Jewish Messianic title; cf. 23:35 and Is 42:1. The relation between the Transfiguration and the Confession of Peter is emphasized here by the similar command of silence (implied in Lk, explicitly stated in Mk and Mt) with which they both conclude.

37-50 Further Instruction of the Apostles—(Mt 17:14-23; 18:1-5; Mk 9:14-41). The recent events inspire the questions of the disciples now recorded by Mk and Mt but omitted by Lk, who proceeds immediately with the story of the epileptic boy which Mk describes in very great detail to the disadvantage of the Apostles. Lk characteristically passes over what seems to discredit the Apostles and makes the addition that the boy is an only son; a similar addition in the case of Jairus's daughter. But he does not fail to include the somewhat surprising outburst of our Lord in 41, 'O faithless and twisted generation, how long . . . To whom is the reproach addressed? To all. To the disciples who have been attempting the cure during the absence of Jesus with Peter, James and John, but have failed through lack of faith and due means (Mk 9:28-29 omitted by Lk); to the father whose faith is so imperfect (Mk 9:22-23 omitted by Lk); and to the Scribes who have been attacking the disciples as Mk alone shows, 9:14. Lk's abbreviations necessarily obscure the meaning at times. 43b is very Lucan; cf. 7:15. Similarly 44, 'all were astonished at the greatness of God'.

44b-45 Second Prediction of the Passion—(Mt 17:21-22; Mk 9:30-31). Lk makes our Lord take occasion from the recent astonishment and admiration to renew his warning about the future, introducing it with the emphatic 'Lay up in your ears [not hearts] these words'; here, but not in Mk and Mt, the warning is the more serious from the omission of all reference to the Resurrection. Lk is very emphatic about the way the disciples are at a loss.

755d 46-48 Dispute about Precedence—(Mt 18:1-5; Mk 9:33-7). Though Lk, like Mk, omits to record the bestowal of the primacy on Peter at his confession, it is tempting to think that this dispute had its occasion there. 'In a few words Jesus teaches them what are the conditions necessary for spiritual power. He who has the right to command must exercise that right only in the general interest; he is the servant of all' (Lagrange). Lk adds that the really great man is he who makes himself less than others.

49-50 The Unknown Exorcist—(Mk 9:37-41). The instructions conclude as in Mk (not in Mt) with a word about the attitude to be adopted towards those who believe in Jesus but are outside the circle of his chosen disciples. The man in question seems to have been successful in his use of Jesus' name; hence he must have been a true follower. Lk abbreviates again. So ends the Galilean ministry in Lk.

756a IX 51-XVIII 30 Insistent Preaching of Salvation on the Way to Jerusalem—Here begins a very distinctive part of Lk, mostly proper to the third Gospel and comprising about one-third of the total. Unjustifiably it has been called the Peraean Ministry, for only some of its incidents take place east of the Jordan; others have called it the Samaritan Ministry because of the special reference it makes to the people of that district. Perhaps its best name is the Journey Narrative, though it appears to deal with more than one journey; but we have seen that Lk has special sources, and certainly Jn knows of several journeys to Jerusalem. But it can be said that Lk is here concerned principally with the progress of Jesus to Jerusalem for the purpose of fulfilling the divine decree of the Passion which he has begun to announce; cf. 9:51; 13:22; 17:11; 18:31. It is the final events at Jerusalem that Lk has in view all the time, and this it is which gives unity to the section. It is largely composed of discourses, containing thirteen parables proper to Lk. Scattered here and there are some of the logia or sayings contained in the Sermon of Mt chh 5-7. Characteristic of this part, and somewhat of a change from the preceding, is the severity of our Lord's language on occasion; cf. 9:57-62; 11:42-52; 12:20, 56; 13:5, 26-35; 14:26-35. It may be an indication of his source that Lk here shows very little care for topography; the Apostles are named but once, even Peter, James and John rarely appearing. Finally this section contains some of the finest examples of Lk's writing, e.g. 15:1-32.

b IX 51-X 24 Proclamation of the Kingdom of God—The opening verse sets the tone for the whole section. 'Assumption'; the same word (in its verbal form) is used in Ac 1:2 and Mk 16:19 for the Ascension and in the LXX for the taking up to heaven of Enoch and Elias. 52 recalls Mal 3:1 with its reference to Elias and John the Baptist (cf. Mal 4:5 and Lk 1:17; 7:27); in Samaria Jesus and his disciples are in a locality which speaks of Elias. Hence the suggestion of James and John, 54, is a remembrance of 4 Kg 1:10 ff. Note the introduction of 'the disciples James and John' as though they had not yet appeared in Lk. There is very strong MS authority against the inclusion of 55b-56a. 57-62. Cf. Mt 8:19-22. What is said of Jesus in 51 is demanded of all would-be disciples. He 'fixed his face to go towards Jerusalem' in spite of those who tried to persuade him to the contrary; cf. Mk 8:31 ff.; 10:32-4; Jn 11:7-8. So too those who wish to follow him must tread down all obstacles. There is no room for the flabby-minded in the Kingdom of God. 'Let the dead bury their dead'; a hard saying, suggesting to the mind of some commentators that those not preoccupied with the Kingdom of God are spiritually dead; cf. Jn 5:21-29; 11:25. But it may be no more than an enigmatic way of saying that Jesus demands disciples who are ready to renounce home and family ties for the Gospel. This was addressed to a man already called. Such is the meaning of 62: it is impossible to plough a straight furrow unless the eyes are fixed steadfastly on the mark set up by the ploughman. 'Fit' i.e. 'well-placed' and suitable for the work that has to be done.

X 1-24 Mission of the Seventy(-Two)—(Cf. Mt 9:37-38; 10:7-16, 40; 11:21-23 for parallel ideas.) This is proper to Lk although many of the instructions are contained in Mt's mission of the Twelve, a point that need surely cause no surprise. Jesus has therefore gathered round him a large number of disciples 'fit for the Kingdom of God'. In Ac 1:15 Lk shows us 120 disciples gathered at Jerusalem immediately after the Ascension. The disciples are sent out two and two like the Apostles in Mk 6:7, but with this difference that the Seventy-two are sent to prepare for the coming of Jesus himself. MSS differ about the reading seventy-two or seventy. 46. The absorbing thought of the preacher must be his mission; he must have the appearance of a man on a most urgent journey, looking neither to right nor left; cf. 4 Kg 4:29. Their message is urgent indeed: 'the Kingdom of God hath come near', the proclamation with which Jesus begins his preaching in Mk 1:15; this is its first appearance in Lk. 12. 'In that day'; 'in the day of judgement' in Mt's parallel 10:15; understood of the great Messianic Day when God shall appear to vindicate his rights; cf. Dan 7:13 ff. 18-16. The mention of the Cities of the Lake, after 9:51-52, seems out of place; the context is more natural in Mt 11:21-23.

17-24 Return of the Seventy-two—There is a general feeling of joy in which Jesus notably shares, the reason being the subjection of the devils to his disciples, a sign that the Reign of God has begun; Satan's power over men is broken by their power over him. 18 indicates that Jesus was acting through his disciples when they used his name. There is a common opinion that here he was warning them against the danger of pride, but that seems to be contradicted by 19, words echoing Ps 90:13 and paralleled in Mk 16:17-18. DV's translation of 18 is confusing; what Jesus says is: 'I was watching Satan falling like lightning-from-heaven', referring to the swiftness of the collapse of Satan's dominion over men brought about by the preaching of the disciples. 20. The disciples are not forbidden to rejoice over the subjection of the devils; here as in 21b we have the Semitic idiom of comparison: 'rejoice more that your names are written in heaven than that . . .'; 'I thank thee Father that thou hast revealed these things to little ones more than . . .'. 'Names written in heaven'; cf. Ex 32:32; Ps 68:29; Is 4:3, etc. Greek cities kept an exact written roll of those with right to citizenship. 21-23. Remarkable verbal parallels with Mt 11:25-27 and 13:16-17. There is a characteristic addition in 21 where the joy of Jesus, like the whole action of his Messianic career, is attributed to the Holy Ghost; cf. 4:1, 14, 18. For the rest see the commentary on Mt where the context is different and very suitable, i.e. after our Lord's explanation of the purpose of the parables which hide the secret of the Kingdom from the unworthy; but to the disciples it is given to know the mystery of the Kingdom, and the very heart of that mystery is the truth of the Incarnation to which reference is here made. This clear affirmation of the divinity of Christ (and in Mt) is a source of great embarrassment for rationalist critics; some have maintained, without the least support from the MSS, that a later hand has added these words from the teaching of Jn. But, as more orthodox critics have said, the teaching of Lk and Mt here provides one of the closest links between the Synoptic and the Johannine teaching on the person of Jesus. Its affinities to the Fourth Gospel are obvious, yet it comes to us embedded in the earliest Palestinian document Q, probably the earliest of the evangelical sources. We may agree with this while awaiting better proofs of the existence of Q. Note especially that here Jesus is no longer 'the Son of Man', but 'the Son' absolutely.

25-37 Neighbourly Charity—This teaching concludes with the parable of the Good Samaritan, proper to Lk, but the incident which calls forth the parable finds a 756f somewhat similar parallel in Mk 12:28-31; Mt 22:34-40. Some hold that Mk's and Mt's incident is altogether different on account of the very obvious discrepancies. In Mk and Mt the Scribe poses a question, as though commencing a mere academic discussion, about the most important precept of the Mosaic Law; we are to remember that, as traditionally interpreted, the Law comprised some 300 positive precepts and some 300 negative ones. Lk's Scribe begins with a more pleasing request: what was he to do to gain everlasting life? 'Tempting' need not be taken in a bad sense; ἐκπειράζειν will easily stand the meaning of 'finding out by examination'. The mention of everlasting life, new in Lk, comes well after 20 and the recent echoes of Jn who harps on that note. 26. Jesus deals with the man in a friendly way, referring him to the Law of which as a Scribe he is an accredited master. What does the Law say, for the way to life depends on the Giver of that Law? 27. The Scribe replies as any Jew might have replied by quoting Deut 6:5, for these words are the beginning of the Shema, the ritual prayer required to be said by every Jew twice a day. But how many Jews would have added the words which echo Lev 19:18 about brotherly love? The Law, it is true, insisted on this point, but it drew little attention from the doctors of the Law. Such a combination of texts is nowhere found in the rabbinical writings; the prevailing Jewish attitude towards the non-Jew was one of bitter contempt; cf. Mt 5:43. 29. Therefore it looks as if the question of the Scribe here was dictated by his discontent with the common view on this point. Lk seems to present us with another of those pious Jews who have more thoroughly penetrated the true spirit of the Old Law, hence a kindred soul with Jesus.

g 30-37 The Good Samaritan—Though proper to Lk it echoes thoroughly the teaching of his fellow Synoptists; cf. Mt 5:43 ff.; 9:13; 12:7. The significance of the parable is tremendous when we recall the attitude of the Jews to the Samaritans; cf. Eccles 50:25 ff.; Jn 4:9; 8:48. Here the Jews, even priests and Levites, are not only compared unfavourably with a Samaritan, but a Scribe is bidden to sit at his feet and learn the true meaning of the Law. Remember that the Samaritans too followed the Pentateuch and looked on Moses as their teacher. The contrasts are strong: on the one hand the wounded Jew; the priest and the Levite who, as they lived on the offerings of the faithful, were the more obliged to the offices of neighbourliness. On the other hand a hated Samaritan, passing through an unfriendly country and therefore excusable if he hurried to get out of it; but not content merely to render first-aid and leave the victim, he carries him to the inn and undertakes all the charges, paying what was the equivalent of two days' wages, Mt 20:2, and promising to return in case there was more to pay. 36-37. If Jesus concludes by turning the Scribe's question around the other way it is for two reasons: first because the sense of the question was, how far does the obligation of neighbourly love extend? The answer (provided by the Samaritan) is: to everyone in need, Jew or non-Jew, friend or enemy. Secondly, by thus raising the Scribe's question to the sphere of general principles regarding charity and mercy, there is no room left for rabbinical casuistry about Jews and non-Jews, Samaritans and Gentiles. Every man is my neighbour, more particularly the man in need. The parable has always been a common field for allegory: Christ as the Good Samaritan, the wounded man as the human race robbed and despoiled by the devil, oil and wine the Sacraments, the inn the Church, etc.

757a 38-40 Martha and Mary—Proper to Lk. There is great divergence of opinion about the significance of the incident: some think that here Lk intends to show that works of charity are not sufficient: faith is also required; others that the recent parable illustrates the second part of the Scribe's answer in 27, while this incident shows how God is to be loved and sought first of all by contemplation, and thus the contemplative life has a pre-eminence over the active, etc. 38. Lk as usual neglects topographical details, but Jn 11:1 ff. and 12:1 ff. show that the place is Bethany near Jerusalem. Doubtless the parable of the Good Samaritan was spoken on the way up from Jericho to Jerusalem which passes through Bethany. Martha is shown as the mistress of the house; Mary appears for the first time; cf. § 753g. The law of hospitality, much insisted on in the East, would require both sisters to be occupied with the care of providing a meal for the unexpected guests, and it may be taken for granted that Jesus was accompanied by his disciples. 40. Martha is distracted or preoccupied with attention to the preparation of the meal: Lk in no way suggests that she is indifferent to the teachings of Jesus. 'Much serving' does not mean that the guests were already at table; our Lord is teaching. Mary too is distracted, torn away from the thought of the meal by absorption in the words of Jesus. The scene and the words of Martha indicate a situation of friendly familiarity, and it would be as false to interpret her complaint in too serious a manner as it would be to read a grave rebuke into the reply of our Lord. It would be very unlike him to rebuke a woman who, if she is busy, is busy for the sake of him and his friends. Moreover he was a guest; she was the hostess. 41. Note here again 'the Lord' and in 39. 'Martha, Martha, thou art full of care and trouble about many things; but there is need of few things or of one (only)'. Such seems to be the preferable, as it is the more authoritative, reading of the Greek. The repetition of Martha's name gives the reply an affectionate tone; the 'many things' is an obvious reference to the 'much serving' above, while the 'few things or one (only)' is an equally obvious contrast. In fact the plain literal meaning in the circumstances must be that Jesus bids Martha not to go to such trouble for the sake of her unexpected guests; it is embarrassing for them to be the cause of it. One dish alone would satisfy their needs. He concludes with the almost humorous remark of 42b: 'for Mary hath chosen a good part and she shall not be deprived of it' merely in order that she may join in all these preparations which are really unnecessary. It follows that Mary has really chosen well in preferring to listen to his words. The shorter reading of 42a, adopted by Vg and DV, favours the more common interpretation, viz. that Jesus is here teaching the severe lesson that solicitude about the needs of this life stands in the way of 'the one thing necessary'. Objections to that interpretation are that it would be out of place in the circumstances; secondly, what is 'the one thing necessary' here? Listening to Jesus like Mary? But our Lord often warns that merely hearing his words is of no profit, and here it is Martha who is doing the work of ministering to the Lord. We may note in conclusion that until 1950 this passage was the Gospel of the Assumption of our Lady who, in the fulfilment of her maternal office towards her Son, played the part of Martha as well as that of Mary. But like Mary, she 'kept all these things in her heart', 2:19, 51.

o XI 1-13 Teaching on Prayer—The material collected here, except for the parable of the Importunate Friend, is found in Mt 6:9-13 and 7:7-11. We have already noted Lk's insistence on prayer, particularly in the life of our Lord (cf. 1:10, 46 ff., 68 ff.; 2:14, 20, 29 ff., 37; 3:21; 6:12; 9:18, 29; 10:21; 22:32, 42-44; 23:34; 24:53), most of these cases being proper. Here in a short treatise he sets before us the example of Jesus, the model of prayer taught by him, the conditions required for efficacious prayer, i.e. perseverance and faith in the goodness of God. 2-4. In the Our Father, as in the Beatitudes, Lk shortens the form given by Mt. Some hold that Lk's form is the more primitive, that of Mt being amplified for liturgical purposes (cf. the addition in the Syriac version, 'for thine is the kingdom' etc., which is a liturgical addition). But the fact that Mt's form is the one adopted in the liturgy probably shows that it is the more primitive; Lk has the habit of abridging. See Mt 6:9-13 for commentary. 5-8. By d 757d teaching his disciples to begin their prayers with the word 'Father', Jesus wishes to inspire them with confidence; there are two things looked for in the person from whom we seek favours: the ability to do what we require and the goodwill to do it for us. But if God is our Father, then he has our good at heart, and if he is a heavenly Father then there is no need to doubt his ability. To drive home this lesson Lk records a delightful parable for the full understanding of which it is necessary to put oneself in the circumstances of the time: a house of one room, beds spread on the floor, scant means of artificial lighting, all of which go to render more obvious the untimeliness of the request. Allegorization induces conclusions very unworthy of application to God; it is a clear parable with an evident meaning: unwearying and confident prayer. 9-13. But for an added example in 12 and the remarkable variation in 13b Lk gives this teaching as in Mt 7:7-11. The change from Mt in 13b is very characteristic in view of Lk's insistence on the part played by the Holy Ghost: 'how much more will your Father from heaven give the good Spirit (Mt "good things") to them that ask him'? The influence of the Spirit, as in Gen 1:2; 2:7, is always represented as productive of good. The chief good the disciple is to ask in prayer is that he may be like his Father in heaven, and this will be accomplished by the reception of God's Spirit, as Lk has so often heard from St Paul, Rom 8:9 ff., etc.

e 14-54 Beginning of Denunciations of Scribes and Pharisees—Here begins a series of incidents common to Lk and Mt but found very scattered in Mt. Mk has but one parallel, the parables following the accusation of diabolical agency in Jesus, Mk 3:22-27, an incident put by Mt and Mk in the Galilean ministry. The first series of disputes with the Scribes and Pharisees, 5:17-6:11, ended with the threat against our Lord's life; here is the first fulfilment of that threat, an effort to discredit the undeniable miracles he has worked by making out that he is a tool of Satan. That is the key to the very strong condemnations he utters in reply, for such an accusation is a blasphemy against the good Spirit just spoken of, 13.

f 14-28 Satan does not fight Satan—(Mt 12:22-30, 43-45; Mk 3:22-27). Lk omits to say who the adversaries are, but we learn from Mt and Mk that they are Scribes and Pharisees. In Lk the Pharisees do not appear till the denunciations begin in 37-39. As in Mt the accusation of using diabolical agency arises out of the cure of the dumb man (also blind in Mt); both Synoptists attribute the defect of the man to diabolical influence. The ancient Semites, like the modern Arabs, attributed disease to demonic influence, especially such diseases as induce an apparent change of personality, like madness. Rationalist critics maintain that our Lord was subject to the same superstition, and it is common for orthodox scholars to reply that he merely accommodated his language to the current notions of his time. But that cannot be true of all the cases in the Gospels, for our Lord accepts diabolical possession as an objective reality as the Church does still. The fact is that there is nothing theologically wrong in attributing all human ills to diabolical agency from the Fall downwards. By consenting to sin man has subjected himself to the dominion of Satan; Jn 8:34, Rom 6:12-14; the purpose of the Incarnation is to deliver man from the consequences of the Fall and to destroy the reign of Satan through the re-establishment of the Reign of God. All this is reflected here. The only differences between Lk and Mt are Lk's additional demand for a sign from heaven (found later in Mt 12:38), and the unexpected change of Mt's 'Spirit of God' to 'finger of God' in 20; Lk's expression echoes the cry of Pharaoh's magicians in Ex 8:19. The demand for a sign is logical after the accusation; Jesus is required to show a sign that he acts through the Spirit of God and not through the evil spirit. The conclusion in 23 is a very stern hint for the adversaries; if they have so sided against Jesus when he casts out a devil, is not that in itself a sign that they have taken sides with Satan whose reign, as is shown in the allegorical application of the preceding parables, our Lord has come to overthrow? 24-26. This corresponds very closely with Mt 12:43-45, a passage which is variously interpreted. In Lk it seems to express by means of a parable the lesson that the Jews, in refusing to accept the Kingdom of God inaugurated in the person of Jesus and his victory over Satan, have placed themselves in a worse position than that in which they were before; cf. Jn 9:41. It reinforces the warning of 23. 27-28. Lk alone. In the context of Mt and Mk the Mother and brethren of Jesus are here brought in (earlier in Lk 8:19-21). This suggests that our Lady's appearance may have inspired the good woman's words of admiration at the victory of our Lord over his enemies: 'Happy mother', she cries, 'that bore such a son'. The reply of 28 is the same in effect as that in 8:21; Jesus does not deny the woman's affirmation, but he declares that exact fidelity to the will of God (of which he knew better than anyone Mary was so outstanding an example) is cause for greater happiness.

29-32 Jonas as a Sign of the Son of Man—Close correspondence here with Mt 12:38-42, save that Lk has put earlier, 11:16, the demand for a sign. He omits all reference to the whale and application to the Resurrection. The sign of Jonas is his preaching to the Ninevites, Jon 3:1 ff., whom he converts to such thorough-going penance. The Jews come out badly by comparison with the pagan Ninevites, and even with the Queen of Sheba. Note the growing severity of the reproaches and the significance of the claims: Jesus is superior to the Prophets, greater than Solomon. 33-36 Jesus is a Light for those who receive him—(Mt 5:15; 6:22-23). Lk has already used 33 before in the context on the use of parables, 8:16-17, but the verses are well-placed here where our Lord tells the Jews why they fail to see what is staring them in the face; their dispositions are evil. There is plenty of light, and he is that light. The moral application is well drawn out in Jn 3:19-21. 36b. 'the whole (man) shall be lit-up as when the lamp enlighteneth thee with its shining brightness'.

37-54 Denunciation of Pharisees and Scribes—b (Mt 23:4, 6, 13, 23, 25-26, 29-31, 34-36). The section concludes, as does the former series of disputes, with violent rage on the part of the adversaries of Jesus and renewed efforts to close his mouth. On this occasion battle is joined more earnestly; he sees that it is time to show them up for what they are, hypocrites, and therefore a danger to their fellow Jews. From the start we are surprised to see him breaking out into an attack on the Pharisee who has invited him to dinner. Note here again 'the Lord said', 39. 41. An obscure verse but evidently with the meaning that external observance is useless without interior observance; Is 58; Mt 5:20 ff. Hence 'give in alms that which is within' (i.e. inside the cup and platter); this would make them cleaner than all their repeated purifications; Ps 40:1-2. 47-48. Lk makes this more difficult to understand than the parallel in Mt. But perhaps he turns it into a piece of irony. While the Jews show honour to the Prophets by building their tombs, they are seeking an opportunity of killing Jesus, who is the Prophet of the Prophets; cf. 11:32. 53. 'And as he went out thence, the Pharisees . . .'

XII 1-59 Dispositions required in those who seek Salvation—Jesus declares that everything turns on this question of the soul's salvation, for which a man must be prepared to face any loss, to renounce every other good whatsoever. Therefore, too, all must be on the watch constantly for the coming of the Lord, for the chance once lost is lost completely.

1-12 Instruction concerning the Future Preaching of the Disciples—(Mt 10:26-33; 12:32; 10:19-20). In the introductory verse we are shown a great crowd (μυριάδες, lit. 'tens of thousands') so pressing round Jesus that they tread on one another; Jesus renews his warning to the disciples of the heaven

758e (i.e. teaching) of the hypocritical Pharisees, and proceeds with instructions which find a very exact parallel in Mt. The particular points worth noting here are as follows: in 4 Jesus addresses his followers as 'my friends', new in Lk (cf. Jn 15:15); in 8-9 'the angels of God' take the place of 'my Father in heaven' in Mt 10:32-33; in 12 'the Holy Spirit' corresponds to 'the Spirit of your Father' in Mt. Mt's context for the sin against the Holy Ghost is more suitable than Lk's; in Mt it comes immediately after the accusation of using diabolical agency. Here Lk seems to have the disciples rather than adversaries in view, as though to say that a disciple who, after having believed in Jesus and received the Holy Ghost, should then deny him would be guilty of an unforgivable sin; cf. Heb 6:4-6. It is not a question of a sin of its nature unforgivable, for Lk knows that Peter himself will deny his Master. But the prospect here is of one who appears before God still denying Christ. Further 11-12 indicate that, since the Holy Spirit will speak through the disciples when they are brought before hostile judges, to deny Jesus then would be to sin against the Holy Ghost, cf. Mk 13:11.

d 13-34 The Detachment required in a Disciple—The section begins with an incident found only in Lk, followed by another of his special parables. The incident of 13-14 recalls the story of Moses in Ex 2:11-15. The teaching of the Parable of the Rich Fool is in tune with the note that runs all through these later discourses, the supreme importance of the soul and its salvation. If Lk omits the solemn warning of Mk 8:37, Mt 16:26b, it is here in a more graphic form. 21. 'Rich towards God'; either the using of one's wealth for God's service; or laying up treasure in heaven in the form of spiritual goods; or, more probably, using wealth for almsgiving to those whom Lk makes the special friends of God; cf. 12:33; 16:19 ff. As St Ambrose finely says, 'the hands of the poor, the houses of widows, are storehouses that endure for ever'. 22-34. Parallels in Mt 6:25-33; 19:21, with but little change. The ravens and the lilies are contrasted with the Rich Fool. In 25 ἡλικία seems best rendered by 'span' (of life) or 'age'. Thus the Rich Fool is again recalled; he could not extend his life in order to enjoy his hoarded goods. 29b. An addition to Mt, or rather another expression for solicitude; to be 'lifted up on high' is to be suspended, therefore 'be not in suspense' about your needs. 31. Omit 'and his justice' which is a gloss from Mt 6:33. 32. A Lucan addition, thoroughly in keeping with this section, 9:51-18:30, which is remarkable for its alternation of severity and tenderness in the language of our Lord to his disciples; cf. 12:4, 7. For those who are faithful to the spirit of the Beatitudes which are here recalled the Kingdom of God is assured, cf. 6:20. 33-34. Lk here repeats the thought of Mt 6:19-20 and concludes with the same warning: set all your thoughts and desires on the all-important object. In Semitic imagery the 'heart' is the seat of consideration, not of affection.

e 35-59 The Necessity of Watching—According to his usual fashion our Lord concludes his instruction with a call to action; cf. 6:46-49. The insistent note is one of 'watching' but the Greek γρηγορεῖν does not mean watching like a spectator; it is rather to be awake and active, 'looking alive' as we say. Thus the loins are to be girt, i.e. the skirts of the garments lifted up in preparation for labour and marching, as when the Israelites ate the first Pasch in Egypt, Ex 12:11; as the master in 37b girds himself to wait on his faithful servants. The parable (35-38) is peculiar to Lk in this form, but it contains the same lesson as the somewhat similar parable in Mt 25:1-13 which is proper to Mt. There is a strong note of allegory in 37b, for it is not the human fashion for a master to wait on his servants; but this is the Master of 22:27 and Jn 13:5. The conclusion then is that the disciple must be ready for his Master's coming and not weary if he is long a-coming, a conclusion with which Mk ends the instructions of Jesus on the eve of the Passion, 13:33-37. But Lk omits the saying of Mk 13:32 and Mt 24:36 concerning the uncertain time of the coming of the Son of Man, the secret of which is reserved to the Father alone and not shared even by the Son according to Mk. 41-46: parallel with Mt 24:45-50 save for the introduction and the conclusion. This is the sole appearance of Peter in the Journey Narrative. The answer given by our Lord to his question seems to be a fuller explanation of the words of Mk 13:37, the conclusion of a similar instruction. Some see an allegory in the parable of 42-44: Peter is the steward set over all the other servants of the Lord. 47-48. Proper to Lk. Peter has asked whether his Master's warning is meant for others besides the disciples. Here Jesus appears to say that everyone will be dealt with according to his correspondence with the light he has received; if the disciples have been shown special favour (cf. 10:23-24) then so much the more will be expected of them. The same lesson is applicable to the Jews in general who have been privileged to see and hear Christ. 49-50. Proper to Lk but recalling Mk 10:38-39; the patristic explanation is that the reference is to the fire of charity, since our Lord has come to baptize in the Holy Ghost and with fire; cf. 3:16; Rom 5:5. Lk may be recalling again the prophecy of Malachias to which he refers so often earlier; in Mal 3:2-3 the prophet foresees the coming of the angel of Yahweh 'like a refining fire' separating the good from the bad. This would carry on the idea of discrimination referred to in 42-48, where emphasis is laid on the standard of discrimination, i.e. fulfilment or non-fulfilment of the will of God. The thought of his Father's will perhaps here suggests to Jesus what the fulfilment of that will entails for himself, and hence explains 50. Comparison with Mk 10:38-39 seems to show that the baptism here spoken of refers to the Passion. In what sense is our Lord 'straitened', i.e. hemmed-in, constrained, afflicted, until that baptism be accomplished? Perhaps it is an echo of Jn 12:32-34. Or is the source of his affliction the fact that while some accept his teaching, so many refuse? This is suggested by the theme of 51-53, which recalls the words of Simeon, 2:34-35; Jesus is a sign of contradiction. 'To give peace on earth' must not be interpreted as an infinitive of purpose, but of consequence; Lk has not forgotten the message of 1:79; 2:14; 7:50. Mt includes this warning of our Lord in the instructions given at the mission of the Apostles; 10:34-36. 54-59. Parallels in Mt 5:25-6; 16:2-23. The discourse thus concludes with a warning to the crowd about the urgency of the teaching just given; it is high time to be reconciled with God; the judgement of God looms and the result of that judgement is inescapable. Let them read the signs of the times, i.e. the appearance of John the Baptist and the coming of Jesus.

XIII 1-9 A Call to Repentance—Proper to Lk, carrying on the theme of the discourse just concluded. The fate of Israel is at stake, and the Jews will no longer find any advantage over other men. Indeed they will have the mortification of seeing themselves excluded from the Kingdom of God, while those whom they have despised as outcasts from God will be received, 25-30. Therefore while there is time let them bring forth fruits of repentance, a lesson emphasized by the Parable of the Fig-tree. The allegorical application is clear; Israel is receiving the most careful attention from the Divine Gardener, as the presence of Jesus proves, but failure to respond will entail speedy and final punishment. The note of impending disaster is increasing. 1. On Pilate's slaughter of the Galileans, cf. § 72c.

10-17 Further Dispute about the Sabbath—Proper to Lk. The miracle which arouses the dispute exemplifies the above remark concerning God's continued efforts to save Israel; but the response it calls forth from one who represents the leaders of Israel confirms the doleful prognostications of Jesus. In using the words 'whom b 18-30 Three Parables of the Kingdom—The first two are among Mt's collected parables of the Kingdom, 13:13-33; Mk 4:30-32, omitted in the Lucan parallel and reserved for this place where they are connected with the present context; cf. 12:32 and 51 ff. The comparisons which insist on the smallness of the beginnings serve to recall again the blindness and obstinacy of the majority of the Jews, and so provide an introduction to the third parable which foreshadows the reprobation of the Jews and the welcome accorded to the Gentiles; parallels in Mt 7:13-14; 25:11-12; 7:22-23; 8:11-12; 19:30. It will be noted that here, as often in the Journey Narrative, the teaching is occasioned by an interruption from the audience; 10:25; 11:1, 27, 45; 12:13, 41; 13:1. 24-25. Omit 'but' at the beginning of 25 (not in Gk) and join the two verses together as one parable, according to some commentators, though they appear separately in Mt 7:13-14 and 25:10-12. The entrance to the Kingdom is narrow in the sense described by our Lord, i.e. severe renunciation is the condition of entrance. 26 gives a strong allegorical turn to the parable, thus identifying Jesus with the master of the house who admits to or excludes from the Kingdom. 28. 'There', i.e. in that place which means exclusion from the Kingdom; outside the door, where they are shut out from the society of the patriarchs and consequently no longer true children of Abraham; cf. 16:22; 3:8; Gal 3:7 ff. 'Weeping and gnashing of teeth', here alone in Lk but oftener in Mt, expressing sorrow and terror; βρυγμός means the chattering of teeth with fear rather than gnashing them with rage. 30. As in Mt 19:30 and 20:16.

c 31-35 Lament over Jerusalem—Cf. Mt 23:37-39, where there is almost verbal correspondence with 34-35. Mt has the better context, where Jesus is at or near Jerusalem, while in Lk he is in Peraea, the territory of Herod Antipas; Peraea however extended to the west of Jordan and its frontier approached Jerusalem. He is in the neighbourhood of Machaerus where Herod had executed John; hence perhaps the warning in 31. It does not seem clear whether these Pharisees are well-disposed, or merely plotting to get Jesus into Judaea and within their power. His answer fits either case; he will not go up to Jerusalem until the time appointed for him to die there, and until that time nothing shall stop him from carrying out the mission bestowed on him by his Father. 32. The day here spoken of is not to be taken as the natural space of time. 'I am consummated', τελειώμαι, 'I reach the end'. 35. Omit 'desolate', which has been added from Mt 23:38. 'Your house' seems to mean the temple; a foreboding of the cessation of the Mosaic worship. 35b seems to foretell the greeting on Palm Sunday (cf. 19:38) but its parallel in Mt 23:39 follows Palm Sunday. Hence the conclusion of the commentators that our Lord is here speaking of a future event that will take place after his Passion; according to some, his second coming; according to others, the time foretold by St Paul, Rom 11:25, when the Jews shall be converted and recognize Jesus as the Messias.

d XIV 1-6 Healing of the Dropsical Man on the Sabbath—The miracle and the following counsel given to the Jews, 7-14, find no parallel in Mt and Mk. Lk seems to make them the setting for the Parable of the Great Supper which carries on the theme of the previous two chapters: the refusal of the Jews to accept Jesus and the consequent prediction of the incorporation of the Gentiles in the Kingdom of God. After the miracle Lk places the comparison of 5 which he had omitted in 6:6-11, his parallel with Mt 12:9-13; Mk 3:1-6, where it appears. The Greek reads 'son or ox' in place of Vg and DV 'ass or ox'; but the meaning remains the same: a work of charity and mercy such as Jesus had performed was a fulfilment rather than a 759d breach of the Sabbath.

7-14 Advice on Humility and Charity—It may seem e strange to find our Lord as a guest in the house of an important Pharisee after the recent denunciations; but it may be explained by the fact that he is still in Peraea where perhaps the local Pharisees have had little previous contact with him. Lk gives a picture of the Pharisees which is quite in accord with the character of them painted by non-biblical Jewish writings. We are not to suppose that our Lord is advising them to practise false modesty in order to get the better of their fellows. It is suggested that he is again attacking their hypocrisy because they seek an opportunity for self-aggrandisement even in the exercise of the sacred obligations of hospitality. Note that Lk calls this a parable. Does he mean that it is a comparison with the way in which the Pharisees consider themselves invited as by right to the chief places in the wedding-feast of eternal life with God in his Kingdom? Such a disposition secures exclusion rather than admittance. Cf. Prov 25:6-7 which perhaps inspires the parable and gives an allegorical turn to it.

15-24 Parable of the Great Supper—The similar f parable of Mt 22:1-10 is substantially the same though with differences of detail which add to the allegorical significance, e.g. the King makes a marriage for his Son (the Incarnation), he sends his servants (the Prophets) to call men to the feast; they reject the invitation and kill the messengers (cf. 11:47-51), etc. Lk's parable cannot be so treated; its plain application is that God wills good to men and his benevolent design will be accomplished whatever obstacles wicked men put in the way. It is obviously related to the Kingdom of God about which our Lord has lately been speaking, 12:31; 13:18, and it repeats the teaching of these chapters about the importance of allowing nothing to interfere with the soul's salvation. But the possibilities of allegorical interpretation, for the Pharisees who heard it and for us who read it, are clear: those first invited are the religious leaders who consider themselves as the rightful heirs of the Kingdom, or else the nation which prided itself on being God's Chosen People; the poor and wretched of the city brought in to take the place of these could represent the 'accursed multitude that knoweth not the Law,' Jn 7:48-49, with the publicans and sinners; while the outcasts from the highways and hedges might be the Gentiles. By the more gentle rebukes Jesus had addressed to the Pharisees gathered with him at table, 7-14, he had prepared them for the severe warning of this parable, viz. that they were in a fair way to lose their places at the great feast of the Kingdom of God through the contemptuous way in which they had received the invitation of God's chief ambassador, who is now telling them for the last time that the feast is ready.

25-35 The Disciples of Jesus must count the Cost— 760a

The logical link between this and the parable is found in the reprobation of those who rejected the invitation through self-love; he who wishes to imitate Jesus in his devotion to the Kingdom of God must have that detachment which grows out of complete self-surrender. There is a parallel in Mt 10:37-38, but Lk expresses the warning more bluntly with that severity which is one of the marks of the Journey Narrative. Note how this warning is addressed not merely to the intimate disciples but to 'great multitudes'. In 13:17 Lk shows us great enthusiasm among the people after the healing of the infirm woman; doubtless an enthusiasm rising from Messianic expectations of the traditional sort. Our Lord appears to turn on them and say: 'If you wish to follow me, this is what I expect from you; now follow if you dare'. If anyone allows wealth, family affection, even love of life to interfere with the claims of discipleship, then such a one is not fit to be a disciple. Even the prospect of seeing oneself marching in a file of condemned men must not make the true disciple hesitate. The two parables that follow, 28-33, proper to Lk, are meant to illustrate this lesson: count the 760a cost before undertaking the duties of discipleship. They also contain the following implied contrast: in worldly affairs, like building and going to war, money and goods are essential to success; the opposite is true in the great affair of the world to come. 'Every one of you that doth not renounce all that he possesseth cannot be my disciple', surely a divine claim to make. The sense of these parables is not that long consideration is required before a man makes up his mind to be a Christian, but rather that a resolution is demanded fit for every eventuality; and the eventualities may be severe. Even the parable of salt, 34-35, used by Mt 5:13a to show the duty of a disciple to serve as a purifying and enlightening principle for his fellowmen, is here used only in the sense of the warning in Mt 5:13b. Failure to stick to one's resolution as a loyal disciple is severely condemned, and the favourite formula of 35b is used to draw serious attention to the point. On 'hating' father and mother, cf. § 693d.

b XV 1-32 God's Joy in pardoning the Sinner—The prospect and the tone here change; there is no longer a note of severity and renunciation but one of confidence in the astonishing kindness of God towards frail human nature, 'a mercy that even anticipates the repentance of the sinner and pursues him in order to render him worthy of pardon' (Lagr., GJC II 62). But there is more than that, for the Pharisees were familiar enough with the Bible's insistence on the mercies of God; what is revealed here by the Son is the joy that overflows from the Father's heart when he wins back one of his children by repentance. Here is the true meaning of that μετανοία or 'penance' which the Gospel so often insists on. There is little need to explain the three parables in which this truth is illustrated; a truth that is one of the mysteries of the Kingdom of God revealed not only to the disciples but also to them that are without (cf. 8:10). In view of the stern teaching on renunciation just recorded it is a remarkable contrast to find the publicans and sinners drawing near to Jesus to hear him; a clear proof that he could speak with such apparent severity without ceasing to show himself the kind and loving person Lk has presented to us in his earlier chapters. It is only the Scribes and Pharisees whose bitter opposition prejudices them against him however he speaks, and here they are still faithful to the role they have always adopted. These parables are spoken in answer to their complaints against the familiar friendliness our Lord insists on showing to sinners.

c 4-7 Parable of the Lost Sheep—A parallel is found in Mt 18:11-14 but in a different context, the warning against scandal. Mt restricts himself to the bare terms of the comparison; all the details of Lk's version seem so exaggerated that we almost expect the audience to protest that no human shepherd would act in so extraordinary a way: leaving ninety-nine sheep, when the flock is collected at night in the sheep-fold, in order to return to the dark hillside to look for a strayed one; when it is found, carrying the heavy sheep down the hill on his shoulders with joy; rousing his fellow shepherds to share his joy. But that is the precise point of the parable; our Lord's answer to the objection is: 'I agree: no human shepherd would act thus. But that is the way the Divine Shepherd behaves over one of his lost children'. The OT presents God so often in the guise of a Good Shepherd that every Jew must have seen the application; cf. Is 40:11; 49:22; 60:4; 66:12, etc. There is no lack of consideration for the just in 7, nor is there any ironical reference here to the Pharisees (cf. 18:9). It is merely that the just have not been the occasion for such joy as God and the whole heavenly court feel over the conversion of a sinner. The same conclusion in different words is in 31-32.

d 8-10 The Lost Drachma—Proper to Lk and repeating the same theme, as though to add further emphasis. The Greek drachma is roughly equal to the Roman denarius or penny, reckoned a day's pay for a workman. The situation seems to grow in tragedy; before it was one lost out of a hundred, now it is one of ten. Hence there is no improbability in the woman's going to such trouble to find the lost coin, but there is the same improbable invitation to the neighbours to rejoice over the find. The joy of the angels recalls 2:10-14 and contrasts strongly with the grumbling discontent of the Pharisees who, by inference, are not God's friends and neighbours since they do not rejoice with him.

11-32 The Prodigal Son—Nothing parallel to this wonderful parable in any of the other gospels. Lagrange notes that the traditional title is too restricted; it has been well said that a better title would be The Prodigal Father, who was as reckless in loving as the son was in spending. In this parable, which no mortal would have dared to invent, our Lord reveals the very heart of God in order to inspire the sinner with confidence to approach him. It is not now a question of one out of a hundred, or even out of ten, but one of two, and these two the only sons of a loving father. 12-16. The contrasts are striking: the younger son and spoilt child, little sensible of the father's love, almost impatient for the father's death so that he may receive the inheritance, departing as soon as he has got his desire. The following details are masterly: loss of money, a great famine, absolute want, a Jewish hireling under a Gentile master in 'a far country', a feeder of swine. A Jew in a pig-sty with his head almost in the pig-trough! In the allegorization of the parable these details provide a powerful picture of the sad state to which the sinner is reduced when he departs from his heavenly Father. 17-20. At last his eyes are opened to realize his situation; as the Gospel insists, the true basis of penance or repentance (μετανοία) is the sincere admission of sinfulness with a determination to destroy sin by returning to God; cf. 3:3 ff. The suggestion of the parable is clear: all the time that the son has forgotten his father, the father has not forgotten his son, but has looked out daily for his return with longing; hence he sees him 'when he was yet a great way off'. Unlike the Pharisees, he is waiting with love and compassion to make the first move towards reconciliation. 21-24. The erring son is not allowed to finish the confession he has prepared; there can be no question of his being taken back as a hireling: he is restored immediately to the dignity of a son. And lest he be disgraced before the household by his rags and destitution, the father quickly orders a robe of the first quality, a ring for his finger, shoes for his feet; to complete all and bring us back to the thought of the Messianic Great Supper, a feast of the best is prepared with music and singing. This echoes the joy of God and the angels in 7 and 10. 25-30. With sudden contrast here now appears over against the loving enthusiasm of the father, the unfeeling coldness of the other son; we return to the Pharisaic complaint in 2. 31-32. Here is the true description of God's regard for the just: 'Son, thou art always with me and all I have is thine'. The conclusion in 32 is essentially the same as that of the two former parables. It was long the fashion to regard this parable as an allegory of the Jews (the elder son) and the Gentile sinners; but the younger son does not represent the sinner: he is the sinner. Some again regard the elder son as representing the real just, others as the hypocritical just, i.e. the Pharisees. In the former case it might be said that the parable shows how even the friends of God do not always realize the unplumbed depths of God's mercy. But it would be false to the parable to see the Pharisees in the elder brother; our Lord was far from admitting that they had served God faithfully. See Lagr., GJC II 62-7 for an excellent treatment of this chapter.

XVI 1-31 Advice on the Right Attitude to Earthly Goods—All this chapter is proper to Lk save for scattered parallels of 13, 16-18 in Mt. The parables of ch 15 about God's kindness towards the sinner do not alter in any way the fundamental truth that he must be loyally served no matter what the cost; Lk here returns to the duty of renunciation but adds a positive aspect of that renunciation which is full of 761a encouragement. What is to be done with the goods of which a disciple of Christ strips himself? Jesus reminds him that the poor are always with us; therefore let him use his goods to make friends with these special friends of God and so secure a welcome for himself in the world to come.

b 1-18 The Unjust Steward—Many find difficulties in the interpretation of this parable, but the meaning is clear enough especially if an emended reading be given to 9. There is question of a steward who manages the estate of a rich man: the steward is a villicus or farm-bailiff. Accused of bad management (and with good reason, as the parable hints) he is dismissed. How is he to live? Afraid to work, ashamed to beg, he is not ashamed to steal. Therefore he calls up the tenants who pay their rent in kind and with them he falsifies their contracts and so cheats the master further. By this piece of trickery the bailiff thinks to make friends and patrons for himself who will welcome him after his dismissal. The lord's commendation of 'the steward of unrighteousness', this dishonest bailiff, is the great difficulty. Which lord? Surely not the cheated master! But how could our Lord praise such a piece of swindling so contrary to all his spirit and teaching? The answer is, as Lagrange points out, that both master and bailiff are 'children of this world'; the former learns how he has been swindled in a way that will be difficult to prove: 'he prudently decides to treat it as a joke and makes the comment anyone would make in the circumstances: "A rascal, but a clever rascal!"' Our Lord commends neither master nor bailiff. The parable does not say that the bailiff had acted 'wisely' but 'shrewdly', i.e. with a prudence that belongs to the ideals of this world; this is what our Lord (not the master here) means in 8b, where he compares 'the children of this world' with 'the children of light', Hebraisms which denote those who live by the ideals of this world or of the world to come; cf. Eph 5:8; 1 Thess 5:5. If only those who have the light to live with a view to their eternal advantage would show the keenness and sagacity of those who live for temporal advantage! 9. An example of how the children of light might imitate the shrewdness of the steward: 'Make for yourselves [as he made for himself] friends through the means of the mammon of unrighteousness, in order that when it shall be no more with you they may welcome you into everlasting dwellings'. 'Mammon', an Aramaic word (lit. 'something confided' or 'deposited'), used under the form of 'Mammon of unrighteousness' as we speak of 'filthy lucre'. Our Lord does not condemn the possession of wealth absolutely, but demands that in this as in all else a man should regard himself as a steward for God. The day will come when that stewardship shall cease by death; Vg and DV follow the reading 'when you shall fail', but 'when it [i.e. mammon] shall fail you' is the preferable reading; both come to the same meaning. Therefore prepare for that day by giving alms. It is not necessary to conclude that it is the poor, whom we thus secure as friends, who shall themselves welcome us to heaven where they are at home; 'they' may be impersonal as in 12:20. But there is an echo here of 6:20 and 16:22. 10-18. The parable is followed by advice about the unrighteous mammon with which is compared something that is true (not the true mammon as the grammatical construction shows); but it is evidently a contrast between false riches and genuine riches. The contrast between 'that which is another's' and 'that which is your own' may mean the wealth confided to our stewardship by God on the one hand, and our own soul's welfare on the other. Almost verbal parallel between 13 and Mt 6:24.

d 14-18 Denunciation of the Pharisees—The introductory verse is special to Lk, the rest finds parallels in Mt 11:12-13; 5:18, 32. The Pharisaic opposition to Christ's teaching on wealth arises not only from their love of money (φιλάργυροι) but from that traditional Jewish attitude which looked on worldly prosperity as a sign of God's favour. But Jesus insists that God's standards are far otherwise: 'that which among men is lifted up is an abomination before God', lit. stinks in God's face. For 15a see 18:9. The sudden introduction of the ideas in 16-18 may be explained by the supposition that the Pharisees quoted the Law in favour of the traditional attitude. But this is no time, replies our Lord, to look on earthly prosperity as a sign of God's favour, even if the Law did promise it to Israel in return for faithful service. 'The Law had been upheld by the Prophets, of whom John was the last, but from now onwards the Kingdom of God was to be preached' (Lagr., GJC II 71). In what way does 'everyone use violence towards' the Kingdom of God? The Greek says 'everyone advances violently into it'. In view of the demand for stern renunciation it must be concluded that here our Lord means that it is no longer a question of prosperity being a sign of God's favour, but of depriving oneself of everything for the Kingdom of God. In 17, perhaps in answer to an unspoken objection, he adds that what he has said is not against the Law; the Kingdom of God is the beginning of a new order in which the Law finds its fulfilment, for everything in the Law that is necessarily good and true is good and true because it forms part of God's Eternal Law. The remark in 18 seems utterly discordant unless it be taken as a cited example of the way in which Jesus means his teaching about the fulfilment of the Law to be understood. In Mt 19:8-10 he declares that repudiation (remarriage is not included) was against the mind of Moses; he may well claim here then that the Law is brought to its perfection by his teaching on marriage.

19-31 Dives and Lazarus—The parable logically follows: the fact of being rich is no assurance that a man is God's favourite, despite what was asserted to be the contrary teaching of the Law. Here is added the authority of Abraham to show what was the true mind of Moses, for Moses cannot be put in opposition to Abraham. An ancient opinion took this story as real history, and it is true that our Lord does not elsewhere give names to the actors in his parables. But the general opinion is that we have here a true parable. Note the contrasts again: a rich man, finely clothed and sumptuously fed each day; a poor beggar, lying at the gate, famished, diseased, reduced to the extremity of being abandoned by all but the despised curs of the street who also wait to be fed with the crumbs of the rich man's table. Omit 'and no one gave him' with the Greek MSS. The reverse of the medal is shown in 22-24; the beggar sitting close to Abraham in the great feast of God's Kingdom, the rich man in hell tortured by fire and parched with thirst. The situation is thus changed: the beggar is rich and the rich man now begs through the good offices of Lazarus. The request is refused: the change of situation is now irrevocably fixed, and there is no means of bridging the gulf of separation. If it is not said, it is at any rate supposed that Lazarus is not only poor but righteous, the rich man not only rich but living for the things of this world; this is implicit in 27-30. Lk is not here teaching that the poor are necessarily the friends of God and the rich his enemies. 22b-23. 'And the rich man also died and was buried; and in hell lifting up his eyes . . .'. 25. 'Son, remember that thou didst receive thy good things in thy life-time', i.e. the goods thy heart was set upon; 25b supposes the opposite for Lazarus. 27-28. The rich man confesses that he and his brethren have not understood what it is that wins companionship with Abraham, the ideal friend of God; but the excuse is inadmissible because the Law and the Prophets teach precisely that, and what could be more authoritative than the Law and the Prophets in the eyes of a Jew? Thus the parable teaches that Jesus is in full accord with the Law regarding both the significance of wealth and the duty of charity; cf. Deut 26:13; Is 58:5-8; Amos 6:4-6; 8:4-6.

XVII 1-10 Teaching on Scandal, Forgiveness, Faith and Humility—(Mt 18:6-7, 15, 21-22; 17:19; Mk 762a 9:41). Here Lk begins a new theme. He softens down the inevitability of scandal in Mt 18:7 by saying 'it is impossible that scandals should not come', i.e. it is impossible to avoid them altogether. 1-6 correspond in general terms with the parallels in Mk and Mt, but Lk alone records the Apostles' demand for faith; this is their sole appearance under that title in the Journey Narrative. It is not a request for theological faith but, as the context proves, for that confidence in God which is requisite for the working of miracles. Some have supposed that the petition had its motive in the great demands just made by Jesus on the subject of forgiveness. But the answer of our Lord is connected by Mt and Mk with the Apostles' failure to heal the epileptic boy and with the withered fig-tree; Mt 17:19; 21:21; Mk 11:22-23. In v 3 the words 'against thee' (Vg in te) are not in the Greek. 7-10. Proper to Lk. Perhaps our Lord's recognition of the Apostles' ability to do miracles calls for this exhortation to the humble recognition on their part of their uselessness; not that God cares nothing for their services, but they are not to preen themselves on what they do.

b 11-19 Healing of the Ten Lepers—Proper to Lk. The incident occurs while Jesus is still on the way to Jerusalem; a rare indication of place and a peculiar one, 'between Samaria and Galilee'. It is suggested that he had gone north, east of Jordan, crossed the river near Bethshan (Beisan), and now descends west of Jordan towards Jericho where we shall next find him. 12. The lepers stand afar off as the Law prescribed and Jesus gives them the command that the Law enjoins, Lev 13:49; 14:2-4; the Samaritan is included in the command because his compatriots follow the Pentateuch. It is not said that the other nine were Jews, but Lk indicates this; thus the incident serves a double purpose: it shows how the Gospel blessings extend beyond the confines of Israel, and it attacks the unjustifiable confidence of the Jews. The plain suggestion is that the Jewish lepers took their cure as a matter of course, as though God's Messianic blessings were theirs by right of birth. The Samaritan, on the other hand, showed the right attitude: faith, diffidence in his own merits, and consequent gratitude; God was intervening through Jesus on his behalf, though as a hated Samaritan 'foreigner' (rather than 'stranger') he could lay no claim to share in the benefits of Israel. 19b. The incident concludes with a repetition of the formula 'thy faith hath saved thee' (cf. 7:50; 8:48; 18:42).

c 20-37 The Coming of God's Kingdom and of the Son of Man—This instruction is joined by Mt to the discourse on the ruin of Jerusalem, 24:26-28, 37-41, but with a slightly different arrangement. In his usual manner Lk introduces it by means of a question put by a member of the audience, a question quite in keeping with traditional Messianic views which looked for a catastrophic divine manifestation in favour of Israel. This was not in accordance with realities, as Jesus here shows. No need to be on the lookout for the Kingdom of God as one looked out for a new star; 'the Kingdom of God is within [or, among] you'. Whatever be the right word here the meaning is clear; the Kingdom of God was already there, and if the Pharisees did not see it that was because they were looking for something entirely different (cf. 11:20). The patristic interpretation favours in vobis, in your souls; but our Lord would hardly have said that of the Pharisees, though as the Pater teaches, the Kingdom of God is certainly within those who do the will of God. Such a meaning is naturally favoured by Protestants since it supports, as they think, the thesis of an invisible Church. Our Lord is merely answering the question of 20: the Kingdom will not come, because it is already here. Therefore it would not come with a glorious Messianic manifestation. Doubtless this surprised his disciples who had witnessed his miracles and the Transfiguration. In 22-31 he puts an end once and for all to these idle dreams; 'his disciples must resemble neither worldlings whose minds are set on their own temporal interests and pleasures, nor those visionaries who go no further than to look for signs of salvation; they must live like men whose hopes are set on eternity. But at the same time, knowing that the Son of Man will not come till his hour has arrived and when he comes he will come unexpectedly, they must work in constant readiness for the time when he will call them to rejoin him' (Lagr., GJC II 79). 22-24. A reminder perhaps of a previous warning, that he is destined to leave them and this world in a shocking manner; repeated in 25. In those days to come they will long for his glorious return, a prediction fulfilled as the Epistles of the NT show. But they must not let their longing desire lead them into the error of thinking he has come and, like the Jews, go running after a pseudo-Messias; it is useless to go looking for his coming, as fruitless as it would be to look for where the lightning will fall next. In the parallel of Mt 24:26-28 there is mention of the Parousia, the 'presence', 'coming' or 'arrival' of the Son of Man; Lk avoids the term though it is a favourite with St Paul. He prefers the expression 'the Son of Man in his day', not the 'one day' of 22 but the great final Messianic Day when he shall be manifested in his glory; cf. Dan 7:13-14. 28-35. As that coming will be so sudden, let them neither waste their time in seeking for it nor show that indifference to the judgements of God which was manifested in the examples cited in 26-29; many will be taken by surprise and found unprepared in spite of all his efforts (cf. Mt 24:37-41; 10:39). With the example of Lot's wife our Lord returns to the lesson of complete detachment in affection from the things of this world, even from life itself, where the soul's good is at stake. He does not forbid due preoccupation with the ordinary needs of life; it is not the mere possession and use of earthly goods that will determine God's judgements, but the soul's attitude towards these goods; cf. 1 Cor 7:26-35. So two persons may be occupied about the same thing, and it will not appear outwardly why God has accepted the one and rejected the other, 34-35. The 'day of the Lord here' changes to 'in that night', not so much perhaps because the first example is taken from sleep as that there is now a prospect of judgement, calamity and darkness; cf. 12:20, 35-36; 1 Thess 5:2; 2 Pet 3:10. 35b. Omitted in the best MSS; probably added here from Mt 24:40. 36-37. Various interpretations are put upon the disciples' question, e.g. where will be the place of judgement? The sense of the question is to be sought in the answer, the literal meaning of which is plain: when one sees birds of prey (vultures rather than eagles) gathering in one direction, the presence of a dead body may be presumed and found by following them. In Mt 24:28 the parable is used by Jesus to indicate that his chosen ones will flock to him as swiftly and surely as vultures smell out their prey; he is warning his hearers not to be led astray by false rumours, as in 23 above. The difficulty of interpretation in Lk arises from the fact that 37 is separated from that context which it has in Mt. Some interpret it here as meaning: there the judgment will be where sin has been.

VIII 1-14 Further Instructions on Prayer—Proper to Lk. The last instructions contain a note of impending disaster along with an assurance that the Kingdom of God will be realized in spite of every opposition. Lagrange therefore sees in the first of these parables a word of comfort for the disciples. The warning about the need of being ready to forsake life itself recalls memories of our Lord's predictions of the bitter persecutions they will have to suffer for the name of Christ. But let them never forget that they have a Father in heaven who watches over them, who will hear their cry and even revenge them; cf. 6:22; 12:11, 22-32. They had to be warned against the temptation of asking in the days to come why God in his power did not immediately intervene on behalf of his servants: a common complaint at all times with those who suffer persecution from evil men. Hence they must go on b 2-8 The Wicked Judge and the Widow—The application of the parable (allegorization would be unfitting here for it would identify God, 'the father of orphans and judge of widows', Ps 67:6, with this 'judge of unrighteousness') is that if even a wicked man eventually heard the suppliant widow, will not an infinitely just God do justice to his chosen ones? 5b. Insistence here, as in the parable of 11:5-8, on the necessity of importuning till one's prayer is granted. 7b. Much dispute about the interpretation of these words. Are they a question or an affirmative statement? Who are those to whom God will (or will not) show himself patient? Lagrange takes it as a question: 'Will he (God) have patience in regard to them (the persecutors of the elect)?' In other words, if God seems slow to revenge his elect, we must not complain that he seems so long-suffering as to abandon his elect. There follows the answer to the question in 8a; let them go on praying, confident that evil will not finally prevail. The sad prognostication of 8b seems to indicate that although the final victory for God's justice is assured, yet some of the followers of Jesus will not have the resolution and faith to persevere until the end; paralleled in Mt 24:12. The faith in question is the faith already seen in Lk, a conviction that the presence of Jesus in the world signifies the loving intervention of God for man's salvation. Such a faith is supremely necessary in times of persecution, and it is then that confident prayer must be kept up.

c 9-14 The Pharisee and the Publican—Josephus describes the Pharisees as 'a sect of the Jews who esteemed themselves more religious than others and thought their interpretation of the Law more accurate' (BJ 1, 5, 2). Their very name Perushim, 'the separated ones', owed its origin to the fact that they were a class apart, and was originally bestowed on them for their real piety. The typical Pharisee revealed to us in the Gospels and contemporary Jewish writings separated himself from his fellow-men by such a firm conviction of his own righteousness as made him contemptuous of all whom he regarded as incapable of being pleasing to God, e.g. those Jews who showed indifference to the minutiae of traditional observance (cf. Jn 7:48-49), and of course those of Gentile birth. This, as our Lord said, 16:15, was what made the Pharisees abominable to God. 11. The prayer is quite in the spirit of one of the Jewish Benedictions prescribed for daily prayer: 'Blessed art thou . . . that thou hast not made me a Gentile . . . a servant . . . a woman'; very different from the prayer prescribed by our Lord for his disciples, a prayer making no comparisons but springing from a sense of deep-felt need. The Pharisee in his prayer, as in his life, gives the impression of self-sufficiency, the national vice attacked by St Paul in his description of the very purpose of the Mosaic Law, Gal 3:21-25; Rom 3:20; 5:20. 12. His prayer completed, he recalls 'the chief points of righteousness which he has accomplished, considerably exceeding the standard prescribed by the Law. . . . Even the Lord himself could hardly demand more, though he might very well desire a little less vain complacency' (Lagr., GJC II 84).

d 23. With the marked contrast characteristic of Lk, the Publican is presented beating his breast repeatedly (ἐκτρανέει impf.), not reciting a list of God's debts to him but declaring himself to be in dire need of divine mercy. The conclusion of 14 is all the stronger from the fact that it omits formal condemnation of the Pharisee, though the word 'justified', i.e. right with God, responds to the 'trusted in themselves as just' of 9. The parable is the justification of our Lord's attitude to sinners (cf. 15:1) and it ends with a repetition of the warning uttered when he twitted the Pharisees with their itch for precedence, 14:11, a warning which cannot fail to remind us of the spirit of the Magnificat, 1:47-54, and the Beatitudes, 6:20-22.

e 15-30 Right Dispositions for Entry into the Kingdom of God—Some commentators see the end of the Journey

Narrative in 18:14, for here Lk resumes the thread of Mt and Mk; moreover there is now a distinct change of tone. Lagrange prefers to continue it to 18:30 where Lk puts another prediction of the Passion and the commencement of the definitive move towards Jerusalem for the final tragedy. The two incidents narrated here are placed by Mt and Mk also at the beginning of the ascent to Jerusalem from Peraea, but they first describe the discussion with the Pharisees about marriage and repudiation omitted by Lk; cf. Mt 19:1-12; Mk 10:1-12. Lk's omission makes the incident of 15-17 appear abruptly, while it falls very well into place in Mt and Mk after the discussion on marriage.

15-17 Jesus and the Children—(Mt 19:13-16; Mk 10:13-16). Lk follows Mk with characteristic changes: no mention of the indignation of our Lord against the disciples, Mk 10:14, or of his embracing the children whom he makes 'infants', βρέφη. The meaning is very clear; entry into the Kingdom demands the frankness, simplicity and innocence which we love to see in children.

18-30 The Rich Ruler—(Mt 19:16-30; Mk 10:17-31) Each of the Synoptists has special details about this man, but Mk's account is the most natural and vivid. In Lk he is a rich ruler, ἀρχων, therefore belonging to the Jewish aristocracy; Mt adds that he is a young man, a detail implicit in Mk's story too where the man shows that youthful enthusiasm which appears so fittingly after the advice of 15-17; he runs up to Jesus and throws himself on the ground. It is tempting to think that it was Mark himself, cf. the young man of Mk 14:51-52; in both cases the man shows the dispositions of the Mark we know from Acts. It will be noted that Mk alone adds the touching detail of Mk 10:21. The man's question and his whole manner betray his excellent dispositions; he was concerned about that which Jesus has insisted is the only thing of real importance. But he has not yet reconciled himself to the condition of absolute renunciation on which our Lord has also insisted. 19. The reply is essentially the same as that made to the Scribe in 10:26, better expressed in Mt 19:17. 'Do you ask me, a man, about a thing that concerns God alone? What has God himself told you?' 20. It is remarkable that only those commandments are recalled which concern the second of the two great precepts of the Law. 21. The young man makes a young man's reply with the candour and confidence just recommended by our Lord. Whether he was taking a too optimistic view of himself or not, his disposition and enthusiasm earn for him an invitation to become a disciple, i.e. to make the great renunciation demanded by true discipleship. 'Yet one thing is wanting to thee'; note Mt's 'if thou wilt be perfect'. The sudden change from spirited enthusiasm to sad despondency, again so characteristic of the young, calls forth our Lord's warning against the danger of wealth, 24-30, after the young man has departed according to Mk and Mt, a detail neglected by Lk. This teaching is given by Lk as in Mk, save for the omission of the disciples' mystification and Mk's repeated warning 'Children, how hard it is to enter the kingdom of God' (preferable reading of Mk 10:24b). 25. There is no need to suggest the usual far-fetched interpretations of 'camel' and 'needle's eye' in order to tone down the severity of our Lord's warning; the words mean what they say and so give occasion to the disciples' conclusion that no one can be saved. Our Lord's answer, better put in Lk than in Mt and Mk confirms their conclusion but adds that God himself will save those who adopt the dispositions Jesus has recommended. Riches in themselves are neither good nor bad; it is undue attachment to riches leading to their abuse that keeps men out of the Kingdom. God can save the rich man by inspiring him to give away his wealth, or he can save him without such renunciation, which the Law indeed does not demand, provided he acts like a good steward in the sense of the 763h parable of 16:1-9. All the same a great reward is promised to those who, rich or poor, renounce all ties of family or possessions 'for the sake of the kingdom of God' (in Mt 19:29b 'for the sake of my name', in Mk 10:29b 'for my sake and the gospel's sake'). Here as elsewhere Lk substitutes Kingdom of God for gospel in Mk, a word that surprisingly he never uses.

XVIII 31-XXIII 56 Arrival at Jerusalem and Passion

—This section is grouped into four distinct parts: (1) The arrival at Jerusalem; (2) Disputes with the Jewish leaders; (3) The great sermon on the destruction of Jerusalem and the Last Judgement; (4) The Passion. In a general way Lk follows the narrative of Mk with some omissions and the following notable additions: the incident of Zachaeus, 19:1 ff.; Jesus weeping over Jerusalem, 19:41 ff.; prayer for infallibility and primacy of Peter, 22:31 ff.; Jesus before Herod, 23:6 ff.

764a XVIII 31-4 Further Prediction of the Passion—(Mt 20:17-19; Mk 10:32-34). This is Lk's fourth prediction, if we take 17:25 into account. He here omits Mk's note of surprise and fear shown by the disciples, but adds the often repeated remark that what is to happen at Jerusalem is in accordance with the Prophets; this, taken with the conclusion, 34, should be compared with 24:25-27, 45-46. Jesus is now moving up from the Jordan through Jericho; he takes only the Twelve, leaving the general crowd of his followers.

b 35-43 Healing of the Blind Man at Jericho—(Mt 20:29-34; Mk 10:46-52). Omitting the request of the Sons of Zebedee, here inserted by Mk and Mt, an incident which would have made a good commentary on 34 (no parallel in Mk and Mt), Lk joins them in narrating this miracle. There are differences which raise difficulties, e.g. the incident is at our Lord's entry into Jericho while Mk and Mt put it at his departure. With Mk he speaks of one blind man only (name omitted by Lk) while Mt has two. Various suggestions have been made: e.g. the unlikely explanation that Lk tells the story of one of Mt's blind men while Mk deals with the other. Lk's incident seems to be the same as Mk's; but some, in order to safeguard the truth of Scripture, have held that they are describing two completely different occasions. Others have suggested that there is no greater contradiction of the truth of Scripture here than there is in the different order of temptations in Lk 4:1-13 and Mt 4:1-11. Note that 35 merely says 'when he was near to Jericho', ἐν τῷ ἐγγίζειν, which would do either for coming in or going out; Lk is generally careless of topographical details. It is true that later we read 'entering in he walked through Jericho', 19:1, but that is a new incident which need not have occurred on the same occasion, for it is possible that there was a stay of some days in the neighbourhood (cf. 19:5). Some hold there is question of two Jerichos, the old and deserted, and the new. In 42 we have the final repetition of the accustomed formula 'thy faith hath saved thee', given here by Mk also. Lk's conclusion, noting the glorifying of God and the praise of God by the people, is also frequent in Lk and peculiar to him.

c XIX 1-10 Zachaeus the Publican—It is worth noting that while Lk has omitted to mention the name of the blind man (if his miracle is the same as Mk's) he is careful to record the name of Zachaeus. Some think that this is because Zachaeus represents the call of the Gentiles. But was he a Gentile? Jews were willing enough to undertake these posts in the Customs Department, though their fellow Jews called them renegades and hated them as the ancient world hated all publicans and their collaborators. Zachaeus has a Jewish name and a Jewish character. Jericho on account of its situation was an important customs office and would furnish him with good opportunities of profit, if he was none too scrupulous like his colleagues. 8-4. Were it not for the trouble taken by him to see what sort of person Jesus looked like, we might think him moved merely by idle curiosity, stirred perhaps by the rumour of miracles. But the sequel contradicts this; a wealthy man of position will hesitate to risk his dignity in that fashion unless moved by something deeper than curiosity. 5. Perhaps a preliminary confirmation of Zachaeus' suspicions about Jesus, who thus shows awareness of where he is and what is his name. In 6 Zachaeus proves that he is a brother of the publicans of 15:1; there is no doubt about his good dispositions, while the universal complaint of 7 shows what was the common opinion of him. 8. He immediately begins to put into practice our Lord's teaching on the proper use of wealth; it does not appear to be restitution of ill-gotten wealth, for he does not admit that he has certainly defrauded anyone by 'sycophancy', ἐσυκοφάντησα, i.e. by false denunciation in his office as tax-collector; see the same word in 3:14 where John the Baptist gives advice to the publicans and their police. If he has been guilty of injustice, then he is ready to restore as the Law commands, Num 5:6-7, and even to restore fourfold. That his conduct has not been all it should be, however, may be gathered from 10. Thus Jesus is provided with his reply to the grumblers: Zachaeus, sinner and renegade Jew though he be, has not forfeited his right to the promise made to Abraham; and in receiving Jesus into his house, he has welcomed the one in whom the promise to Abraham is fulfilled.

11-27 Parable of the Pounds—In spite of the many differences between this and the Parable of the Talents in Mt 25:14-30, many commentators identify them. Maldonatus, for example, admits the identity and attributes the divergences to the evangelists; it would be safer, according to Lagrange, to say that the differences are due to the handing down of the parable by oral tradition under different forms. In both a master is shown putting his servants to the test; the faithful are rewarded splendidly, the rest punished severely. The conclusion is the same in both. Lk alone, 11, gives the occasion of the parable: Jesus is ascending to Jerusalem and some of his followers still think in spite of all that there is to be a glorious Messianic manifestation. Perhaps there is a hint of the question of the Sons of Zebedee, Mt 20:20-28; Mk 10:35-45, which Lk has omitted. The parable contradicts such hopes; Jesus is not going to act as a political Messiah and start a revolution in order to seat himself on the throne of Israel. He is the King, but he is going on a long journey in order to receive royal investiture from his Father. His true disciples will be loyal to him during his absence. He will return: let them be ready for that event. 12. The comparison is very apt, for everyone knew how the Herodian princes visited Rome in order to receive their kingdoms at the hands of Caesar. What Lk adds in 14 (not in Mt) is precisely what happened when Archelaus went to Rome in 4 B.C. to receive the kingdom inherited from his father, Herod the Great; the Jews sent an embassy to oppose his claim. The Jewish leaders are now acting in just the same manner towards Jesus, though manifestly the allegory must not be pressed too closely. 17. Here Mt's allegorization is stronger; he adds to the reward bestowed the words 'enter thou into the joy of thy Lord'. 20-26. In Lk the idle servant is dealt with in the same manner as in Mt save for small details; he is condemned because he has not watched, i.e. he has not been active and lively in the interests of his master. He defends himself by attributing evil dispositions to his master, an accusation proved untrue by 17, 19 and 24. The remark added in Lk's account, 25, is not intended to reflect jealousy; it is a literary manner of bringing out the generosity of the master which has just been called into question. 27. Another addition in Lk made necessary by his addition in 14. It contains a formidable lesson for the Jewish leaders.

28-40 Triumphant Entry into Jerusalem—(Mt 21:1-9; 765a Mk 11:1-10; cf. Jn 12:12-19). Apart from the short dialogue with the Pharisees, 39-40, Lk's narrative is

b 28. A parallel of Mk 10:32a, omitted previously by Lk. 37. A common custom for the residents of Jerusalem to go out and meet the incoming pilgrims with music and singing. In Lk it is 'all the multitude of his disciples' who praise God 'for all the miracles, δυνάμεις, they had seen'. 'Multitude'; πλῆθος means a great number; cf. Ac 1:15. The numbers and the style of their salutation give reason for the complaint of 39. 38. Omitting the Hebrew Hosanna of Mk and Mt, Lk records the salutation as 'Blessed be he that cometh, the king, in the name of the Lord', which recalls the ὁ ἐρχόμενος of John the Baptist, 3:16; 7:19. Finally he omits their concluding 'Hosanna in the highest' and inserts 'peace in heaven and glory on high', which recalls the song of the angels, 2:14; the angelic prediction is near fulfilment. Lk alone records the objection of the Pharisees in this place, 39, though Mt 21:15-16 places a similar incident later in the temple. Lk here reflects the objection of the citizens in the parable, 19:14; the Pharisees are obdurate in their refusal to welcome the Kingdom of God of which Jesus is not merely the representative but the King. It may be noted that only now, at the end of his career, does he allow any public acknowledgement of himself as the Messiah-King; there is no further need of past injunctions about the Messianic Secret. And even now he admits acknowledgement only as a means of testifying to the goodness of God manifested through the miracles, 37; see his answer in 40 and cf. Hab 2:11.

c 41-44 Jesus weeps over Jerusalem—Proper to Lk and coming well after the last incident; the Pharisees fittingly represent the dispositions of Jerusalem. Another of Lk's striking contrasts: the enthusiastic joy of the disciples, the tears of the Master; their song of peace and glory, his vision of war and desolation, 'the vision of a people delivered over to madness, factions on every side, divisions healed for a time by a despairing rage against a determined enemy who is tightening his toils about the city' (Lagr., GJC II 124). The prediction is so true to life that rationalist critics feel bound to maintain that Lk wrote it after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. 42. If Jerusalem, the city of peace [so the name was interpreted], had recognized the things to her peace today, the evils of that other day would not have come upon her. The thought of peace is recalled by 38 (cf. also 14:32). 44. The details of destruction are an echo of Mic 3:12, the prophet's conclusion of a long denunciation of Israel for her sins; cf. Jer 6:3, 6. All through Lk we are reminded that the Messianic Day is a time of God's beneficent visitation of his people; 1:68, 78; 4:18-21; 7:16, 21-23, etc. For the horrors of the siege of Jerusalem see Jos. BJ Books 5 and 6.

d 45-6 Cleansing of the Temple—(Mt 21:12-13; Mk 11:15-17; Jn 2:14-16). Omitting the incident of the withered fig-tree, placed by Mt after and by Mk before the cleansing of the temple, Lk gives Mk's account of this in shortened form. Jn puts it at the beginning of the ministry, while all three Synoptists 'have put the expulsion of the traders from the Temple during the Pasch immediately preceding the Passion, and this seems to be demanded by their plan, for they mention but one Pasch' (Lagr., GJC I 98), and the Pasch was the reason for the presence of the traders in the temple. Jn gives three Paschs and connects the incident with the first. This is in all probability the correct place, chronologically speaking. See comments on Mt 21:12; Mk 11:15; Jn 2:13 for further discussion. Lk omits the words 'to all nations' from Mk's quotation of Is 56:7, at which Plummer is surprised in view of Lk's universalizing tendency; but it would have been more surprising if he had included them after the recent prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, with all that it entailed for the liberation of the early Church from the bonds of Judaism. See Edersheim I, 370 ff., for an account of the abuses practised in the temple markets.

47-48 Ministry in Jerusalem—(Mk 11:18-19). e Omitting after his manner the details of Mt and Mk concerning the comings and goings from the city, Lk sums up the situation briefly by describing the action of Jesus and its diverse effect on the people and their leaders. Here appear the three categories of the latter which are to be responsible for his death: chief priests, Scribes, and 'the first of the people', i.e. the aristocracy—the three groups making up the Sanhedrin. One of their chief motives is the fear of his growing influence: all the people are hanging on his lips; cf. Jn 12:19.

XX-XXI The Last Teachings of Jesus—The hour of sacrifice drawing near, it is fitting that the whole life of Jesus should now be turned towards the place of sacrifice, the temple. 'Miracles are now done with. All his teaching indicates the clear view he has of what is to come, the fate awaiting him, the punishment about to fall upon the Temple and the people. He manifests a personality far higher than that of the Jewish conception of the Messias, Son of David. The impression is given that he is in command of the shape of events; death is his own free choice. But he prepares his disciples to carry on his work after he has gone' (Lagr., S. Luc 505).

XX 1-8 Question of Jesus' Authority—(Mt 21:23-27; Mk 11:27-33). b Close following of Mk here. Our Lord perseveres in 'announcing the good tidings'; the desire of Jesus to seek the people's good up to the last moment contrasts with the opposite attitude of his opponents towards him. 2. The reason of the inquiry made by the representatives of the Sanhedrin need not be his cleansing of the temple; indeed many of the Pharisees would have sympathized with that in principle, since it was their Sadducean opponents who were responsible for the abuses. As all three Synoptists agree, their chief fear was our Lord's growing popularity. They had not forgotten John the Baptist's ascendancy over the people; cf. 6b. Their efforts are therefore concentrated on the attempt to ruin the reputation of Jesus with the crowd by taxing him with embarrassing questions; there follow several such questions. In this instance he completely disconcerts them by associating himself with the popular enthusiasm for John. If they, the self-constituted guides of Israel, are not able to make up their minds about such a person as John, then he denies their right to ask for the source of his authority.

9-19 Parable of the Wicked Husbandmen—(Mt 21:33-46; Mk 12:1-12). c As in Mk save for literary changes and the addition of the threat in 18. Lk omits the details concerning the preparation of the vineyard but adds the interjection of 16b 'God forbid!' lit. 'May it not be!'. Such a detail would appeal to him since it is called forth by the suggestion of 16a that God will choose for himself another people who will prove more faithful than the Chosen Race. The whole parable is so pointed in its allegorical significance, 'a parable of Jewish history', that liberal critics deny its authenticity; they maintain that our Lord always used pure parables and that allegorical touches are due to additions made in the light of later events. In the parable (the application of which no one could fail to see) the servants were evidently those whom God

766e had sent to his people : God's last hope comes in the person of his beloved Son, clearly his only Son. The killing of that Son is the final crime, and after the last crime comes punishment. Here Jesus claims that he possesses the title of Son of God in a unique sense, thus providing his enemies with just the pretext they wanted for destroying him.

d 20-26 Question of the Tribute—(Mt 22:15-22 ; Mk 12:13-17). The Jewish leaders are under no misapprehension about the meaning of the parable, 19, but they find it necessary to go warily for fear of the crowd ; hence they set spies to find some pretext for handing Jesus over to the Roman authorities (Lk alone). Lk omits to specify the emissaries (Pharisees and Herodians in Mk and Mt) but identifies them sufficiently by the phrase 'who feign themselves just' (20, cf. 16:15 ; 18:9). Using subterfuge themselves, they appeal to his well-known straightforwardness and fearless speaking of the truth. It was known to all that neither Pharisees nor Herodians offered opposition to Roman domination : the latter because they depended on it, the former having even asked for incorporation into the empire on the death of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. 17, 11, 2). But it should be recalled that twenty years before this very question of tribute to Caesar had caused a rebellion which the Romans had put down severely, crucifying 2,000 Jews (Ant. 17, 10, 10). Hence Jesus' answer might have grave consequences with the crowd or with the police. 26. Lk points out that the opponents are completely disconcerted again ; there is nothing in his answer they can seize on to discredit Jesus either with the Roman authorities or with the people.

e 27-40 Question about the Resurrection of the Dead—(Mt 22:23-33 ; Mk 12:18-27). The third question, curiously enough, is one about which Pharisees and Sadducees were at loggerheads (cf. Ac 23:8 ; Ant. 17, 1, 4 ; Lagr., GJC II 142 ff.). Perhaps the explanation is found in the satisfaction of the Sadducees at Jesus' answer to the previous question, for they gave unequivocal support to Rome. Lk runs in accord with Mk and Mt while insisting more emphatically on the theological character of the question. 34-36. Note the Lucan additions 'children of this world', 'children of God', 'children of the resurrection' ; cf. 16:8. These are Hebraistic idioms signifying those who have the characteristics of mortal or immortal life. 37. The Sadducees are disappointed by the answer while their opponents are gratified, 39. A further interesting addition of Lk is 38b, 'for all live to him (God)', a Pauline expression ; cf. Rom 6:10 ; Gal 2:19.

f 41-44 Question of the Davidic Sonship of the Messiah—(Mt 22:41-46 ; Mk 12:35-37). Though Lk agrees with Mk in recording the gratification of the Scribes, he omits the question of one of them now given by Mk which fits in well with the narrative ; but he has already narrated this or a similar incident in 10:25-28. Here he confines himself to the captious questions of the adversaries, so that all may be 'in order'. On this occasion it is Jesus who takes the initiative, perhaps to turn the tables on them. They are seeking to discredit him with the crowd. Having put them to shame with the crowd by making them confess that they can give no satisfactory answer about John the Baptist, he now puts them in a much more serious difficulty by asking them about the Messiah's Davidic origin. Whatever disagreements there were about the Messiah's character, all agreed that he was to be the Son of David. Thus, as Lk has said in 40, he closes their mouths even in the matter of their boasted ability to interpret the Scriptures. At the same time he provides positive teaching about himself ; for if David himself in the Psalms, of which he was the accredited author (cf. Mt 22:43 ; Mk 12:36), shows the Messiah seated at God's right hand, then it follows that the Messiah ranks higher than all the servants of God and is consequently much more than a mere Son of David. Who but the Son of God would be invited to sit at God's right hand ? It is at the conclusion of this incident that Mt has placed the remark that from this time no one dared to pose any more questions, much better here 766f than where Lk has put it in 40.

45-47 Warning against the Scribes—(Mt 23:1-36 ; Mk 12:37b-40). The attack is carried further into the enemy's camp. Note how Mk concludes the last incident by reminding us of the pleasure of the crowd at Jesus' words, and it seems to be the crowd that he warns against the Scribes ; in Lk the warning is reserved for the disciples. Mt expands the theme, including much of what Lk has already said in 11:37-54. Here Lk agrees closely with Mk ; both conclude with the formidable words of 47b.

XXI 1-4 The Widow's Mite—(Mk 12:41-44). Lk 767a abbreviates. The connexion with the foregoing is clear : Jesus has just denounced the Scribes (and the Pharisees, cf. 11:43, 14:7), one of the chief censures being that they 'devour the houses of widows', the biblical type of the poor and forsaken. The Pharisees are φιλάργυροι, 'lovers of silver', 16:14. The two types are contrasted here : the rich man, evidently one of those just denounced, ostentatiously casting his offering into the trumpet-shaped collecting box of the temple ; the poor widow humbly approaching to put in her two mites, the smallest coin in circulation. The lesson is plain ; they have given 'out of their superfluity' ; 'she out of her deficiency hath cast in all the luelihood that she had'. She is an excellent example of that complete self-surrender which Jesus demands of his followers.

5-36 The Ruin of the Temple and the Coming of the Son of Man—In the eschatological discourse (τὰ ἔσχατα, the last things) with which the ministry of Jesus closes, Lk's general plan is the same as Mk's. But he shows greater precision in describing the details of the ruin of Jerusalem, a fact which leads rationalist critics to conclude that his Gospel was written after that event. Mt's eschatological discourse is paralleled by Mk and by what Lk contains on the same subject in 17:20-37, material that Mt and Lk are supposed to have drawn from a common source, such as the hypothetical document Q. Lk shows more care in distinguishing the two themes, the ruin of Jerusalem and the Parousia being confused in Mk. Some have suggested that the Synoptists have blocked together two completely different discourses spoken on different occasions ; it seems unlikely. Hostile critics maintain that in the mind of Jesus the ruin of the temple was the sure sign of the end of the world, and that he consequently was a victim of deception. But it is clear from the Gospels that he distinguished the two events, even if he treated of both at once. The first was to be the sign for the flight of his disciples ; the second was to be a catastrophe from which flight was impossible. The first was predicted as near ; the disciples should see it. As for the second, Jesus refrains from predicting the time ; that was his Father's secret. But why did he deal with both subjects together and thus lead to the possibility of error ? But the error that the end of the temple would be the end of the world was not suggested to men's minds by his words ; every true Israelite was convinced of this already, just as the idea of a world without the city of Rome was unthinkable for the people of the empire. The complete and final destruction of Jerusalem and the temple and the consequent collapse of Judaism and the Mosaic Law ! How could the world go on after that ? Besides, Jewish Messianism, if it meant anything at that time, meant the triumph of Israel and the everlasting supremacy of the Mosaic Law. That is sufficiently clear from the Jewish apocryphal writings. It was therefore necessary for Jesus once more and in an unmistakable manner to disabuse his own disciples of all such notions. He was not that kind of Messiah. (But see the commentary on Mt in loc. for a very different view ; cf. also § 417g.) 5-7 The Coming Ruin of the Temple—(Mt 24:1-3 ; Mk 13:1-4). This prediction is admirably introduced in Mt by our Lord's apostrophe of Jerusalem, including the words 'behold your house shall be left desolate', which Lk has put much earlier ; 13:34-35. Jesus and 767d his disciples were probably on the slopes of Olivet (cf. Mk 13:3) whence they looked down upon the temple. Lk in his fashion omits such details. The disciples call their Master's attention to the mighty buildings and 'the offerings', perhaps the great brazen gates leading into the inner courts which had been given by an Alexandrine Jew; cf. Jos. Ant. 15, 11. But the temple, built for eternity, will soon be no more than a heap of stones, 19:44; Mic 3:12.

8-24 Signs of the Coming Catastrophe—(Mt 24:4-20; Mk 13:5-18). The horrible prediction had called forth the startled question of the disciples in 7b. 8-11. The appearance of false Christs, wars, etc. is not to lead them into the error of thinking that the day of destruction is at hand; Lk omits the concluding apt remark of Mt and Mk, 'these are (but) the beginning of the birth-pangs'. 12-19. The ruin of the city will be preceded by persecution for Christ's sake; by omitting Mk 13:10 'unto all nations the Gospel must first be preached' Lk avoids the possibility of confusing the time of the two great events. What does 13 mean? Either that persecution will provide the disciples with an opportunity for witnessing to the truth, as 14 seems to indicate, or else that the persecutions will provide that sort of witness, μαρτύριον, which is borne by martyrdom; this had already been verified when Lk wrote by the deaths of James, Stephen and others; cf. 16b. 15. Jesus promises to do for his disciples what God himself had promised to Moses, Ex 4:11-12; in Mk it is the Holy Ghost who is made the source of inspiration. 18. This seems either out of place or contradictory of 16b, unless it be taken as a proverbial expression (cf. 12:7; Ac 27:34; 1 Kg 14:45; 2 Kg 14:11; 3 Kg 1:52) signifying that God has control of all in such a way that nothing will happen without his will, and his will towards the disciples is all for their good; if they lose their life it will be for the good of their soul (cf. 12:4-7). Hence the conclusion, 'by your endurance win your souls'; cf. Mk 13:13b, 'he who endures unto the end shall be saved'.

20-24 The Ruin of Jerusalem—(Mt 24:15-20; Mk 13:14-18). 'Lk here puts in clear terms what Mk has wrapped up in symbolical language such as Gentile readers could with difficulty have understood' (Lagrange). The 'abomination of desolation standing where it ought not' is missing, though he retains the word 'desolation' ἐρημωσις and applies it to Jerusalem. ἐρημωσις is an active word meaning 'laying waste'. Jerusalem besieged by armies inevitably recalled to a Jewish mind the thought of Nabuchodonosor's siege and its result, 4 Kg 25:1 ff. That will be the sign for the disciples to flee from the city, for (22 proper to Lk) this is the punishment decreed by God and it cannot be escaped. 24. Here Lk neglects the Marcan narrative and describes in great detail the fate of the inhabitants of the city, concluding with the prediction 'Jerusalem shall be trodden under foot by [i.e. shall be under the heel of] the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled'; cf. Dan 8:13; Apoc. 11:2. The Gentiles are to take the place of the Jews in the divine plan (cf. 20:16 and Rom 11:25).

25-27 The Coming of the Son of Man—(Mt 24:29-31; Mk 13:24-27). The mention of the 'times of the Gentiles' provides an introduction to this theme; Lk's perspective is now carried beyond the ruin of Jerusalem into the future. Omitting the warnings in Mk and Mt about false rumours concerning the second coming of Christ (already dealt with in 17:23-24) he joins them in describing the signs in the heavens and on earth that shall precede the Parousia. In his context the time of the appearance of these signs is indefinite; moreover the fear and distress caused by them are not confined to Jerusalem but spread over the world. 27. The appearance of the Son of Man is described almost in the words of Mk; but instead of Mk's consolatory words about the gathering together of the elect Lk adds the encouragement of 28. Since, however, there is no promise that the disciples are to see the Parousia, it seems that 28 must be referred to the signs that shall precede the ruin of Jerusalem; but 767g Knabenbauer, Schanz and Plummer refer 28 to the coming of the Son of Man. Our Lord always insists that there shall be no warning signs of his second coming. He will come suddenly, when least expected, like a thief in the night; 17:24 and 21:34-36.

28-33 Signs of the Approach of the Kingdom of God h —(Mt 24:32-35; Mk 13:28-31). Here, as in 17:20 ff., Jesus distinguishes between the Parousia and the coming of the Kingdom of God, which in some way is already 'in you' or 'among you', 17:21. Note also the distinction between 'then they shall see' of 27 and 'look you up and lift up your heads' of 28; there is a break in thought. The 'redemption' in 28 may be taken as the liberation of the disciples from the restraining bonds of Judaism which are not only the persecutions proceeding from the Synagogue, but also the hindrances arising from the Judaizers among the convert Jews of which Lk will write in Ac. The destruction of Jerusalem and the temple solved both of these problems, and provided the occasion for the spread of the Kingdom of God throughout the world, the thing foreseen by the Prophets: Is 2:2 ff.; 65:1 ff.; 66:19 ff.; Mal 1:11. 30. 'When they already shoot forth [with leaves, not fruit] you know by looking at them that summer is already nigh; so you also . . .'. Consequently it is not a question of the Parousia but of something the disciples (some of them at least) will live to see, something the date of which can be roughly fixed; therefore the ruin of the city.

34-36 Be Ready for the Coming of the Son of Man— i (Mt 24:42; Mk 13:33-37; cf. Lk 12:41-48). Nowhere in Lk do we find the words of Mk and Mt about the ignorance of the Son concerning the last day; he omits them here; cf. Mk 13:32. There is a distinct change of tone in Lk; no more talk of encouragement as in 28, but a warning beginning with the admonitory formula, 'take heed to yourselves' (cf. 17:3) which takes the place of Mk's parable. We are back in the situation of 17:26 ff., watching for the coming of the Son of Man. Here, as there, that coming will be a day of judgement and sifting. 'As a snare' (or trap) should probably be attached to 34 rather than commence a new sentence in 35; 'that day will come upon you like a snare'; a snare is useless unless laid where least expected; cf. 1 Thess 5:2. Hence, instead of looking out for signs, be always ready. 36. Lk adds the advice to be constant at prayer 'at every time'.

XXII-XXIII The Passion—Like his fellow evangelists 768a Lk attaches primary importance to the story of the Passion; these two chapters account for one ninth part of his Gospel. Here he does not bear such a similarity to Mk as in the preceding part, but shows a clear dependence on some source which is neither Mt nor Mk. His story is composed in order: the plot, the betrayal, the institution of the Eucharist followed by the final discourse, the capture at Gethsemani, the appearance of Jesus before the Sanhedrin, the delivery to Pilate for execution, the crucifixion. There are some changes of order, omissions and additions which distinguish Lk from Mt and Mk. Very notable is the omission of the anointing at Bethany; but that is sufficiently explained by the inclusion of a similar story early in his Gospel and his dislike of repetitions.

XXII 1-23 The Last Supper—(Mt 26:1-29; Mk b 14:1-25; cf. Jn 13:21-38). 1-6. Much as in Mk, but abbreviated, save for the addition that Judas acts at the instigation of Satan, cf. 4:13 and Jn 13:2, 27. The 'magistrates' referred to in 4 are merely σπαρτηγοί, officers of the temple police and therefore Jews; Lk alone mentions them. 7-14. Lk alone mentions the identity of the two disciples sent to prepare the Pasch. He is in conformity here with Mt and Mk about the day of the paschal supper, apparently against Jn who makes the Jews eat the Pasch after the crucifixion, Jn 18:28. Orthodox scholars are divided as to whether the Synoptists intend us to understand that Jesus and his disciples ate the Jewish Pasch; according to some Jesus anticipated the Judaean date by one day, 768b following the calendar of the Galilean Jews. See Lagr., S. Marc (1911) 330 ff. Beyond doubt according to Lk Jesus celebrates the Jewish Pasch as is evident from 15-18. 'This Pasch' is clearly the paschal lamb which lies before him as he speaks (cf. 7); the thought of the immolation of the lamb reminds him of his own sacrifice: 'before I suffer'. It is his final celebration of the Pasch with his disciples, the beginning of the new Pasch of the Kingdom of God in the celebration of which he will be always present with them. Thus he does not destroy but fulfils the ancient rite, as he had promised; cf. 16:17 and Mt 5:17-18. 17-18. In the Jewish rite of the paschal supper there were four separate ceremonial draughts of wine, and this was apparently one of them; but Mt and Mk place words similar to 18 after the consecration of the chalice; Mt 26:29; Mk 14:25. Why the change of order? All three Synoptists here envisage the heavenly feast of the world to come rather than the celebration of Mass. 19-20. The remarkable fact that each synoptist gives a different version of the actual words of consecration furnishes a useful example of the manner in which the evangelists deal with common incidents, which each records after his own manner. It might have been thought that they all would have been scrupulous to observe identical phrasing in such a matter. Lk's version comes nearest, as might be expected, to that of St Paul; 1 Cor 11:24 ff. Note the following changes and additions: in 19 'giving thanks', εὐχαριστήσας, which provides the name Eucharist, instead of Mk's and Mt's 'blessing' εὐλογήσας (cf. Mt 15:36; Mk 8:6 with Mt 14:19; Mk 6:41; Lk 9:16); 'which is given for you' is added after the consecration of the bread, indicating that our Lord has already offered his body to be immolated like the lamb, and that the sacrifice of himself is now an accomplished fact; 'do this for a commemoration of me' is added as in 1 Cor 11:24. 20. 'This chalice is the new covenant in my blood, shed for you'. DV following Vg says 'shall be shed' without authority in the Greek, but 'shed' seems to be parallel with 'given' in 19, indicating a sacrifice already offered. For 'the new covenant' see Ex 24:7-8; Jer 31:31 ff. 21-23. It is only now that Lk makes that reference to the treason of Judas which precedes the institution of the Eucharist in Mk and Mt, as if they wish to remove the traitor from the scene before the solemn moment; cf. Jn 13:21-30. But in Lk it looks as if the giving of his body and blood by our Lord is deliberately contrasted with the contrary action of the traitorous disciple; note the force of 'but yet behold' in 21. In 22 Lk expresses with more pronounced emphasis than Mt and Mk the divine preordination of events, though 22b insists that the crime of Judas is contrary to the will of God.

d 24-38 Last Discourse to the Apostles—It begins with a dispute among the followers of Jesus (strangely shocking in such circumstances) which Mk and Mt have given much earlier, Mk 10:41-45; Mt 20:24-28, after the request of the Sons of Zebedee, where it seems in place. But it is not impossible that such a dispute occurred now, stirred up perhaps by our Lord's recent reference to the Kingdom of God. 25. 'They that have authority over them [the Gentiles] are called 'beneficent', εὐεργέται. The final word gives a strong touch of reality to the scene; εὐεργέτης was a title assumed by more than one of the ancient rulers, including the Roman Emperors; particularly Ptolemy Euergetes (145-117 B.C.) was infamous for his cruel despotism in Egypt. 28-32. Proper to Lk save for 30b which is found in Mt 19:28. Here Jesus renews his accustomed teaching which re-echoes the note of the Magnificat and the Beatitudes. His disciples, by their faithful adherence to him right up to the end, have shared his lowly condition and the trials of his life, such as the enmity of the Jewish leaders, rejection by the heads of the nation, poverty, etc (cf. 9:57-62). Therefore they shall share his reign, βασιλεία, kingship. To Peter a special promise of sharing the prerogatives of his Master is now given, a promise that appears with all the more significance in that it is joined to a prediction about his fall; the weak one is to serve as the buttress of his brethren, not through his own native power but through that which is bestowed on him by Christ. It is of importance to note the different number (sing. and pl.) in the use of the second personal pronouns of 31-32. 31. 'Satan hath demanded', recalling Job 1:11-12. The action of 'sifting' is not here meant as a means of distinguishing the good from the bad, but rather as a violent shaking and disturbance such as is used when wheat is sifted from the chaff. It is the overthrow and ruin of the Apostles that Satan seeks. If our Lord prays specially for Peter, we need not conclude that he is weaker than the others (despite his later fall); it is because more is to depend upon him, as the head, than upon the rest, viz. the solid faith of his brethren. He is to serve as the rock of strength for others in his office as head. Clearly the passage, proper to Lk, supposes what Mt has recorded in 16:17-19, omitted by Lk. The faith of Peter is such as Lk has already described in 5:20; 7:9; 8:25, etc. namely, that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God; nor was this denied by Peter later in 57-60. 32b. 'And thou, having then [in the future] returned, make firm thy brethren'; for the notion of returning in the biblical sense, i.e. to God, cf. 1:16, 17 (Mal 4:4); Ac 9:35; 11:21; 14:15, etc. 33-34. All four evangelists record this; Lk agrees with Jn as to its place, but Mk and Mt put it on the way to Gethsemani. 35-38. Proper to Lk. The apparent contradiction of our Lord's former and later teaching (10:4 ff.; 22:49-51, cf. Mt 26:52) must be explained in this way: he now wishes to impress upon them that although the principles of his teaching have not altered, nevertheless the times have changed. They are about to enter on a situation of the utmost gravity and danger. Compare the advice concerning the way they are to act in 17:22 ff.; 21:8 ff. When he first sent them out it was with the counsel to depend on the goodwill of their hearers for their needs; now there will be no longer goodwill but hatred for his sake. In fact they will be Ishmaels, like men who have no friends and can obtain even the bare necessities of life only by violence; that is the meaning of 'he that hath not (a sword) let him sell his coat and buy one', a proverbial expression, not that he recommends such a measure to his disciples (cf. 12:22). This furnishes the meaning of his answer to their simplicity in 38: 'It is enough'. He does not mean that two swords are enough for their protection, but, seeing that they have not understood him, he says with a smile, 'That would be enough for what I meant'. Some think, less probably, that he answers abruptly to change the subject which they have misunderstood: 'Enough of that'. 37. In confirmation of the advice in 36; the quotation is from Is 53 which deals with the Suffering Servant of Yahweh. Jesus envisages his speedy death: 'the things that have to do with me are coming to their completion'. He has frequently warned his disciples that the servant must not expect to fare better than the master.

39-46 The Agony at Gethsemani—(Mt 26:30, 36-46; 769a Mk 14:26, 32-42). After commencing like Mt and Mk, Lk omits their account of the scandal and flight of the Apostles; he omits also our Lord's promise of a future meeting in Galilee. In the latter omission he is consistent with his plan of dealing only with the apparitions at Jerusalem. The protestations of fidelity made by Peter and the prediction of his fall have already been mentioned, 33-34; Lk does not return to the subject. He abbreviates as usual, omitting to mention the choice of Peter, James and John, the name of the garden, the threefold repetition of Christ's prayers and the failure of the Apostles to keep awake. If he passes over Mk's vivid description of the signs of human weakness in our Lord, Mk 14:33b-35, he emphasizes the agony and its material

b 48. The angelic apparition is proper to Lk; he omitted the angelic apparitions found in Mk and Mt at the end of the former temptation in the desert; 4:13; Mk 1:13; Mt 4:11. Lk alone mentions the agony and sweat of blood, 44. The agony, i.e. contest, striving, mental anguish, was evidently the struggle (or its effect) between the sensitive appetite in our Lord which naturally shrank from suffering and death, and the superior will which voluntarily accepted the divine decree: a struggle which is expressed in the prayer of 42. 'His sweat became like clots of blood falling upon the ground'. Lk says 'like clots of blood', but an actual sweat of blood seems indicated. A similar phenomenon, betraying extremes of pain and mental anguish, is not unknown in the annals of medicine (Hobart, Medical Language of St Luke, 83). The authenticity of 43-44 is much attacked because of its omission in many MSS. But there is good MS evidence for authenticity (N and D, all uncials and cursive MSS and anc. Lat.), the style is Lucan, and none of the Fathers expressed doubts. The omission, particularly in MSS of the Egyptian family, points to suppression on account of theological scruples. The text was commonly used in the 2nd cent. against the Docetists and in the 4th by those who denied the divinity of Christ. 46. The reproach is addressed to all, not to Peter alone as in Mk and Mt.

c 47-53 The Arrest of Jesus—Abbreviated account of Mk 14:43-52; Mt 26:47-56; cf. Jn 18:2-11. One or two additions: the protest against the traitorous kiss, 48, which is very characteristic; the disciples' question about the use of the swords already mentioned, 49; the healing of the man's ear, 53; the description of the enemy, 'high-priests, temple-police (οὐρανοποῖ) and seniors', indicating a delegation from the Sanhedrin, 52; the characteristic conclusion in 53b; cf. 22:3, 31, 37; Col 1:13. The flight of the Apostles is passed over in silence. 51a. Several opinions: either meaning 'Go no further' or 'Let them take me', the latter being the more probable. There is a further suggestion that our Lord is asking the bystanders to give way so that he may heal the injured man: 'Let me get at him'; and still another that the remark is addressed to the enemy asking them to excuse the hasty action of the offending disciple.

d 54-71 The Trial of Jesus by the Jews—Again as in Mk 14:53-72; Mt 26:57-75 (cf. Jn 18:13-27) with changes of order, omissions and additions. The Jewish leaders wish to procure a condemnation by the Sanhedrin on the ground of revolutionary Messianic claims which will provide a reason for handing Jesus over to the Roman governor for execution. Mk and Mt give two meetings of the Sanhedrin, one in the night, the other on the morning of Friday; Lk mentions only the second, as usual simplifying and omitting details not necessary to his main purpose. He is concerned to show how Jesus still dominates the whole situation in spite of all appearances to the contrary; cf. 48, 51, 53b, 61, 69. God's design is being worked out with the complete agreement of our Lord, a thing that puts the prayer and agony at Gethsemani into proper perspective. 54. Agreeing with Mk in describing the arrest and Peter's following Jesus, Lk here prefers to complete the story of the Apostle and thus anticipates the order of Mk (cf. 3:19 ff.). It will be observed that he spares Peter as far as is reconcilable with the truth. The differences of the four evangelists in recording the denials are not of sufficient weight to alter the tradition of a triple denial; it may easily be supposed that Peter uttered several denials to each of his three questioners. Lagr., S. Marc (1911) 380 ff. 61a. This touching and significant detail is recorded by Lk alone. 70. The Sanhedrin, in accordance with their plan, demand if Jesus be the Christ (66; but note the additions to the question in Mk 14:61b and Mt 26:63b); he refuses to discuss the point with them

(67-68, proper to Lk) but tells them more than they ask for by his quotation from the Scriptures; cf. Ps 109:1, and Dan 7:13. They seize on immediately in the question of 70, to which our Lord replies openly. They now have evidence to condemn him for blasphemy, but they have not secured the condemnation which would be more useful for handing Jesus over to the governor as a Messianic revolutionary. Lk has thus brought things to the conclusion he desires, with a clear affirmation from our Lord of his Divine Sonship resulting in his condemnation by the Jewish authorities. The condemnation he leaves the reader to infer, unless it be said that he wishes to be historically accurate and so abstains from crediting the Sanhedrin with something they had no real power to do: only the Roman governor had the power of life and death.

770a XXIII 1-5 Jesus is handed over to Pilate—(Mt 27:2; Mk 15:1-5; cf. Jn 18:28-38). Lk omits the long account in Mt and Mk of the evidence brought by the false witnesses. In the remainder of the Passion narrative he shows more signs of having drawn on sources of his own. His omissions are accounted for by the reasons already mentioned: avoidance of details difficult for a non-Jewish reader, e.g. the Aramaic cry from the cross which caused the hearers to think Jesus was calling on Elias; the custom of demanding the release of a prisoner at the Pasch; the mockery concerning the destruction of the temple, about which Lk has been silent during the trial. Apart from such details he gives all that Mk contains, and none of Mt's additions to Mk, such as the fate of Judas, Pilate's wife, the earthquake and resurrection of the dead. His most important additions are: the sending of Jesus to Herod, Pilate's protest before the Jews, 13-16, the lamentations of the women of Jerusalem, the prayers of Jesus in 34 and 46, the incident of the Good Thief. His insistence on Pilate's assertions of our Lord's innocence leads some to conclude that Lk tries as much as possible to exculpate the Roman authorities and thus prepares for his description of their accommodating attitude towards the Church in Ac; but note the callousness of Pilate recorded in 16 and 22. Lk goes to no trouble, however, to spare the Jewish leaders; the accusation they bring against Jesus, 2, after the conclusion of the trial in 22:71 pillories them as men without scruple.

b 6-16 Jesus before Herod—The Herod in question is Herod Antipas (son of Herod the Great by Malthace the Samaritan) tetrarch of Galilee since 4 B.C. As the Herod family passed as Jews, doubtless Antipas was in Jerusalem for the paschal feast. This incident, proper to Lk, agrees with what he alone records of Herod in 9:7; cf. 23:8. We gather the impression here that Pilate, something like Gallio in Ac 18:12 ff., merely sees an opportunity of freeing himself from an embarrassing situation; let Herod deal with the man since he belongs to Herod's jurisdiction. 9. Jesus refuses to answer; 'truth is of no profit to those who are not sincere' (Lagrange); he had already called Herod a fox; 13:31-32. 11. Herod's answer is to treat our Lord as a fool of no account: 'with his band of soldiers he set him at nought and mocked him, putting on him a fine garment'; λαμπρός means rather 'shining' and 'splendid' than white (cf. 16:19). It was all part of the effort to show up Jesus' alleged claim to royalty as something not worth serious consideration, like the similar incident in Pilate's hall omitted by Lk.

c 17-25 Release of Barabbas—(Mt 27:15-23; Mk 15:6-15). It is generally agreed that 17 is a gloss added from Mt 27:15 to explain the sudden introduction of Barabbas in 18. Lk explains who Barabbas is in 25 with proper comments of his own showing the contrast between Barabbas and Jesus; cf. Ac 3:14-15. Barabbas was probably in prison for the very offence of which our Lord was accused by the Jews in 2, i.e. revolt against Roman authority.

d 26-32 The Way of the Cross—Omitting all reference to the scourging and mockery by Pilate's guard, Lk

770d joins Mk and Mt in relating the incident of Simon of Cyrene. Grammatically he makes the Jews lead Jesus out for execution, a fact that leads to the suggestion that he seeks to exculpate the Romans in order to render his Gospel more acceptable to Gentile readers; but the suggestion takes no account of 26 and 47. The women of Jerusalem may be those charitable Jewish ladies who undertook the duty of attending to the last needs of condemned criminals, a thing that would naturally appeal to the heart of our Lord. The Talmud (cf. B. Sanhedrin 43a) tells us that one of the cares of these pious women was to provide spiced wine for the dying men; cf. Mk 15:23. In 28-29 there is strong reminiscence of the predictions of 21:23. 30. Here as in 29 the words of our Lord echo the thoughts of the Prophets in whose language he so often spoke; cf. Is 54:1; Os 10:8; 9:14. The perspective is still that of the ruin of Jerusalem, God's punishment of the city for the crime it is about to commit. 31. A parable picturing a man so set on kindling a fire that instead of seeking dry sticks he uses green and damp wood; its application is to the present circumstances: seeing that to all appearances divine justice now falls on an innocent person, how will it be when the turn of the guilty comes? Perhaps there is recollection of Ez 20:47. Cf. Prov 12:31; 1 Pet 4:17-18.

771a 32-38 The Crucifixion—(Mt 27:33-38; Mk 15:22-27; cf. Jn 19:17-27). 33. 'When they were come to the place called Cranium' (Kpavíon, skull). Lk omits the Aramaic Golgotha given as Γολγοθά by Mt and Mk. DV has followed Vg which has turned Kpavíon into the Latin equivalent Calvarium. The place of public execution was a rocky eminence; such places are still given the name ras or head by the Arabs. 34a. Proper to Lk; its authenticity is disputed on account of omission by many good MSS, but the weight of probability is in its favour; cf. Ac 7:59. Of whom is Jesus thinking? The Romans? The soldiers, who are Gentiles? The Jews? If the Jews, it would seem that the leaders of the people could not be included, in view of 35 where Lk clearly distinguishes 'the people' and 'the rulers' (omit 'with them' after rulers). The people stand beholding; the rulers stand mocking. Lk here omits the detailed insults relative to the temple, having omitted all reference to accusations about the destruction of the temple during the trial. He joins Mt and Mk in recording the mocking invitation to our Lord to save himself if he be the Christ, the chosen one of God; in Mk 'the Christ, the King of Israel'; in Mt 'King of Israel'. 38. The drink offered to our Lord by the soldiers in their rude mockery, vinegar in DV, is ὄξος, the sour wine that was the common drink of the poorer classes; in Mk this is not given until near the end, 15:36, while Mk earlier mentions the offering of spiced wine, 15:23. This is merely another example of Lk's manner of abbreviating and need create no difficulties for a reasonable exegesis. A further example of his manner is in 38 which he has left till now (before the crucifixion in Mk) where it explains the mocking remark of 37.

b 39-43 The Two Thieves—(Cf. Mt 27:44; Mk 15:32b). Lk alone distinguishes the thieves; according to Mk and Mt both join in insulting Jesus. St Chrysostom reconciles the two accounts by supposing that the Good Thief began by insults and was later converted; Augustine prefers the more likely solution that Mk and Mt are speaking in general terms as Lk does when he says that 'the soldiers' offered Jesus sour wine to drink. 39b. 'Thou art the Christ, art thou not?' (Then) save thyself and us (too); not a confession of faith, but a further example of mockery. 40. What does the Good Thief wish to say? According to some, 'Dost thou not even fear God seeing that thou art under the same sentence (as we, i.e. the Good Thief and Christ) and wilt shortly appear before him?' Or better, 'Thou hast not even the fear of God (in thus allowing thyself to attack him in this fashion) seeing that thou art under the same sentence. But thou and I (suffer) justly, for we are only receiving what we have earned, while this man has done nothing out of place (ἀτοπον)'. 771b The Good Thief associates himself and his companion with Jesus in the same 'judgement', κρίμα. It is possible that the two thieves along with Barabbas had belonged to one of those bands of Jewish brigands (their attitude proves they were Jews) which flourished at this period, and whose real motive was rebellion against Roman domination; cf. Jos., Ant. 17, 10, 8; 18, 1, 1. This was the crime of which our Lord was accused, 23:2; cf. 23:19 for Barabbas and his crime of sedition. Perhaps that is the reason why they are all executed together, the two thieves being hurried to their death through the sudden climax in the plot against Jesus, when they doubtless had hoped for the good fortune Barabbas had met with, Lk 23:42-43. Far from demanding the miracle of an immediate descent from the Cross, the Good Thief asks no more than that Jesus will not forget him when he comes as Messiah in the glory of his kingdom. Jesus rewards his act of faith and hope by the promise that he will that very day make him to be with him in perfect bliss. In the apocryphal gospels the Good Thief is called Dismas. ['Paradise' (LXX rendering of 'Garden' in Eden, Gen 2:18) signified for the Jews the abode of the blessed. Here, if taken literally in its context, it signifies primarily the limbo of the just, to which Christ's soul was presently to descend.—J.B.O.]

772a 44-49 Death of Jesus—(Mt 27:45-56; Mk 15:33-41). Note the following additions in Lk to the narrative of Mk and Mt which he has abbreviated: the failing of the sun, 45, the prayer with which Jesus gives up the ghost, 46, and the emotion of the crowd, 48. The cry of dereliction from the cross is passed over, also the opening of the tombs (proper to Mt), and the enumeration of the Holy Women given by Mk and Mt. He anticipates the rending of the veil of the temple, but that is characteristic of his fashion of grouping together events of a like nature. His omission of the cry of dereliction may well be due to consideration for the susceptibilities of the Gentile convert, who will not immediately understand that our Lord is praying very fittingly with all the thoughts of Ps 21 and not merely those of the opening words. For this cry Lk substitutes other words from Ps 30:6; 'Into thy hands I commit my spirit', which would leave a very different impression on the mind of a raw Gentile convert. παρὰθεσθαι (commend) means 'to deposit, give into the care of, bring forward'; cf. Jn 10:17-18. 47. Lk differs from Mk and Mt in recording the words of the centurion in charge of the execution squad; he makes the centurion call Jesus 'a just man', not 'a son of God'. Augustine says they both mean the same thing, taking 'son of God' in its wide sense. Possibly Lk, realizing how equivocal the phrase 'son of God' could be in the mouth of a pagan, deliberately avoided its use. 48. 'Lk has shown us the crowd first enthusiastic for the death of Jesus, then aghast, 35. Such goodness, such self-forgetfulness in the midst of pain, joined with his readiness to forgive and his piety, nature herself suffering in sympathy with his Passion—the whole spectacle brings about a complete change in the volatile crowd. It is a piece of subtle psychological description' (Lagr., S. Luc 593).

50-56 Burial of Jesus—(Mt 27:57-61; Mk 15:42-47; cf. Jn 19:38-42). Lk's more lengthy description of Joseph recalls the pious group with which he opens his Gospel: a morally good man, a faithful observer of the Law, one of those who look for the redemption of Israel in the true spirit of the Scriptures. The attention here to topographical detail is surprising until we remember 1:1-4; Mt adds that Joseph was a disciple of Jesus. He was also a member of the Sanhedrin and had voted against the condemnation of Jesus, or at least had absented himself from the session. Jn 19:38-39 associates him with Nicodemus, another Sanhedrite, Jn 7:50. 53. Lk insists, with the aid of three negatives in Greek, that the tomb had never been defiled by the presence of another corpse, as though wishing to contrast the reverence of the disciples with the opposite attitude

772c of our Lord's enemies. 54b. 'The Sabbath began to dawn', ἐπέφωσκεν 'was shining'; a curious phrase because it was still the Parasceve, which did not end until sunset on the Friday when according to Jewish reckoning the Sabbath commenced. It is suggested that Lk is referring to the common Jewish custom, well-known among their Gentile neighbours, of lighting lamps as soon as the Sabbath began.

b 1-12 The Empty Tomb—(Mt 28:1-10; Mk 16:1-8; cf. Jn 20 1-18). The general lines of Mk's story are followed with the differences to be noted. The chapter-division here breaks into the sequence of the narrative; this section should begin at 23:55. We have seen that Lk omits to join Mk and Mt in the enumeration of the Holy Women; with his usual foresight he leaves that until the moment when they are to give their testimony of the Resurrection to the Apostles and the disciples, (9-10), when he substitutes the name of Joanna (cf. 8:3) for that of Salome in Mk 15:40. He is not interested in the problem of rolling back the heavy stone; it is sufficient for his purpose to say that it was found removed; he adds that in entering the women saw the body of Jesus was gone. That is the main fact which Mt and Mk leave to be understood while they concentrate on the angelic apparition. Instead of Mk's 'young man' and Mt's 'angel of Yahweh', two men appear suddenly, ἐπέστησαν (cf. 2:9; Ac 12:7; 23:11 for similar description of supernatural apparitions) who both speak. 3. 'The Lord Jesus'; first and only appearance of this title in the Gospels, of common use in Acts and Epistles. 6. Galilee is introduced, as in Mk, but with a different purpose; here it serves merely as a stepping-stone to Jerusalem, from now the centre of the Gospel. 9. Difficult to reconcile this with Mk 16:8 where the women flee in terror without saying a word of the incident, contrary to Mt 28:8. The explanation may well lie in the fact that there is a clear break in Mk 16:8 (the sentence is not complete) and we are so far ignorant of how the original Mk continued. In view of what is known from the other Gospels, we may surmise that the women recovered from their natural fright in time to hand on the message in the way that Lk describes. 10. The lack of agreement about the number and the names of the women is a difficulty only for those who wish the Gospel to be a full and exact account of all the details; but human documents are not written in that way. Here as elsewhere, the thing to be noted is the remarkable independence shown by Lk where he could have copied Mk slavishly had he wished. The discrepancies, far from casting doubt on the reality of the facts, are on the contrary strong arguments in their favour (cf. Lagr., GJC I xi ff.). 12. Some critics wish to eliminate this as a gloss from Jn 20:3-10; there are verbal resemblances with Jn 20:5 and the verse is wanting in certain of the ancient versions. But MS authority guarantees its authenticity; moreover it comes well in Lk after 11, serving to distinguish Peter from the incredulous attitude of the rest. Peter's conclusion from the situation of the grave-clothes is that the body has not been stolen. Thieves would not have stayed to unwrap the corpse. A more complete description in Jn 20:6-7.

13-35 Apparition on the Way to Emmaus—Proper to Lk except for a brief summary in Mk 16:12. Lk alone records the share taken by a larger group of disciples in the ministry of Jesus; here the same group plays its part in the important task of witnessing to the Resurrection (cf. Ac 1:21-22). These two are of those mentioned in 9 but not Apostles; cf. 33. They are not obeying the instruction to go to Galilee, Mk 16:7; Mt 28:7, and there meet the risen Jesus; they are going in the totally different direction of Emmaus, lying W. of Jerusalem, and the sequel leads to the conclusion that their faith is shattered. The site of Emmaus is a matter of much dispute on account of the division of the MSS between the readings 60 or 160 furlongs σταδίων; cf. §82c. Nearly a dozen places have been suggested, but only the following three are now considered: the modern Amwas, lying about 20 m. W. of Jerusalem, which still retains the ancient name though it was called Nicopolis during the 3rd cent. A.D.; Koliniyeh, about 5 m. west, claimed to be the Emmaus mentioned by Josephus, B.J. 7, 6, 6; El Kubeibeh, about 7 m. west. The first is the traditional site, though the majority of MSS give 60 σταδίων and the longer distance seems difficult to reconcile with the Gospel story of the quick return of the two disciples. El Kubeibeh is almost exactly 60 σταδίων, but its claim to be the site cannot be traced back beyond the time of the Crusades. 16. Failure to recognize Jesus may have been due to divine intervention, or possibly because of the characteristics of the glorified body; cf. Mk 16:12; Jn 20:14; 21:4. 18. Another, or possibly the same Cleophas, written Κλωπᾶς in Jn 19:25. Much speculation about the other disciple; Origen says he was Simon Peter (cf. 34), while some have thought it was Lk himself, perhaps because of the old and improbable tradition that he was one of the Seventy-Two. 19-21. An excellent summary of the effects of Jesus' ministry on the different classes: the people, the Jewish leaders, the disciples. 21b. This and the following verse give the impression that they had waited till the third day to see whether Jesus would fulfil his promise of resurrection, and were disappointed. The argument of 22-24 seems to be this: If the women saw the angels, why did not the men-folk see them, the Apostles being so much the more important than the women? And if Jesus had really risen why had he not shown himself? 25. The reproach is directed against their want of intelligence; ἀνόητοι, cf. Gal 3:1. They are like the Jews who have read in the Prophets only the pleasant and glorious things about the Messiah; but they must believe 'all', the pleasant and the unpleasant. Our Lord proceeds to give them a lesson in exegesis from 'Moses and all the Prophets', reminding us of the presence of Moses and Elias at the Transfiguration and the subject of their talk with Jesus; 9:30-31. The important thing is to welcome the Messiah preordained by divine decree, not the Messiah of their grandiose dreams. 29. 'Far spent' is too strong; the day (i.e. the sun) begins to decline from midday. 30. Augustine interprets the action of Jesus as the celebration of the Eucharist and many follow him; but 774e modern Catholic exegesis tends to favour the contrary opinion. The key seems to be in 35. 'The breaking of bread' seems to have been an accepted term for the Eucharist: Ac 2:42; 20:7; 1 Cor 10:16. Some hold that it is the miracles of the multiplication of bread that are envisaged here (cf. 9:16) especially as Lk does not make our Lord celebrate the Eucharist with his Apostles at his later appearance the same evening, when, 41-43, it is an ordinary meal that he partakes with them; but it must be observed that the later eating is intended for a very different purpose. Another opinion is that the disciples recognized Jesus merely from his characteristic way of breaking bread while eating, perhaps with a blessing. Or did they now notice the marks of the nails? 33. In Jn 20:24 only ten of the Apostles were present at this first appearance; but 'the Eleven' had become a general term, like 'the Twelve' previously. 34. 'Saying'; grammatically agreeing with the Eleven and the rest, though another reading (with little authority) makes it agree with 'they', i.e. the two disciples; hence Origen's opinion that the companion of Cleophas was Simon Peter. Confirmation of 34 in 1 Cor 15:5.

d 36-43 Appearance at Jerusalem—Cf. Jn 20:19-23. 'It is I: fear not' is a gloss; perhaps also 'Peace be to you' has been added from Jn 20:19, 21, though there is good MS authority for the latter. 37. This may seem strange after the foregoing, but Lk always insists on the natural fear that results from a supernatural manifestation, 1:12; 2:9; 4:36; 5:10, etc. 42. 'and a honeycomb', probably a gloss. Our Lord retained the imprint of the five wounds in his glorified body as a proof of his identity and also as a sign of his triumph over death. His glorified body retained all its physical reality, including its tangibility and its normal organs, as is shown by his eating the proffered food. On the qualities of the risen body, cf. 1 Cor 15 passim.

775a 44-49 Last Instructions—These last words of Jesus, proper to Lk, demonstrate the consistency of the writer and justify the claim with which he began, that he would set down all things 'in order': not a chronological, but a logical order which would show the enchainment of the events described. From the beginning he insists on the fulfilment of the divine plan in the life of Jesus; he ends on that note. Hence these final instructions weld together the past, i.e. the Scriptures, with the future, i.e. the mission of the Apostles, in the person of Jesus. The sending out of the Apostles is put by Mt at the post-Resurrection reunion in Galilee

(in Jerusalem apparently by Jn 20:21); but these 775a concluding verses of Lk furnish us with a final example of his manner of composition: he arranges his material with more concern about the sequence of ideas than about time and place. But for that we might imagine that this instruction and the Resurrection, and even the Ascension, all took place on the same day. It is to be borne in mind also that Lk, careful writer as he is, already knew what he was to write in his further treatise; there these events are put into their proper perspective, Ac 1:1-10. 44. 'Words' means here events rather than the things about to be spoken of, i.e. 'fulfilled words'. What follows is a repetition of the instruction given to the disciples at Emmaus, 19-27. 'Here Christ reveals the meaning of Scripture (cf. Rom 10:4): first with regard to Christ himself, secondly with respect to the work to be accomplished in his name by others. . . . It is Christ's part to suffer, but as the Christ he must rise again. . . . The victorious Christ to whom God had promised the nations for his inheritance almost disappears from the scene of this world; but if the nations are to be invited to repentance in his name, it is because they are to obtain pardon through his sufferings' (Lagr., S. Luc 614). 47. With the mention of 'penance unto the remission of sins' Lk has very fittingly brought us back to the beginning of his Gospel; cf. 1:17, 77; 3:3. 49. Written with a view to Ac 2:1-4; cf. Ac 1:4; 2:33. 'Power from on high' recalls 'the power of the most high' in 1:35; God himself is the chief operating agent in either case, for all has to do with the same object.

50-53 The Ascension—Cf. Mk 16:19-20. The way e in which Lk here abbreviates the history of the forty days after the Resurrection is characteristic, and perhaps an indication of the fact that he intends to return to the subject. 50. 'He led them out towards Bethany'; in Ac 1:12 he led them a Sabbath day's journey; Bethany is twice that distance; cf. Jn 11:18. Hands lifted up to bless in the traditional fashion, Lev 9:22; cf. Gen 48:14. 51. 'And was carried up to heaven'; words of doubtful authenticity, perhaps added from Ac; but there is not the slightest doubt about Lk's meaning. He has now carried his Gospel to the point indicated in 9:51. 53. Omit 'praising' as a rejected reading of the Gk. The Gospel ends as it began, in the temple. There are still many things to happen before the disciples are forced by circumstances to understand that the paths of the Church and Synagogue lie in different directions.

b Introduction—The Fourth Gospel has always been regarded as touching the highest peak of Christian revelation, and for this reason John the Apostle, its traditional author, is described as 'the divine' and is designated by the eagle that soars high into the heavens. St Jerome wrote that John 'filled to the full with revelation, indited the heaven-sent preface "In the beginning was the Word. . ."', Prol. to Comm. in Mt. Indeed it was the unique sublimity of the 'prologue' to St John's Gospel, 1:1-14, that eventually gained it a permanent place in the Mass as 'Last Gospel'. Though it has always been regarded as canonical (see § 776c) nevertheless the startling character of its teaching and style has raised doubts in modern times as to its historical reliability, on which see §§ 779b-780g.

Canonieity—That Jn has always been regarded as inspired and canonical Scripture hardly requires proof. It is to be found in the best Greek uncial codices of the 4th to 6th cent. (B, S, A, D, C, W) and considerable portions of it appear in many other uncials. The great mass (over 600) of cursives have it. The Egerton Papyrus (early 2nd cent.) contains parts of it mixed with synoptic texts for popular use, showing that at that early date it was already well known and placed on the same level as the Synoptics; cf. M.-J. Lagrange RB 44 (1935) 343. The Chester Beatty papyrus codex of the early 3rd cent. contains portions of it. Jn is likewise found in all ancient NT versions. Allusions to it and quotations from it are found in many 2nd cent. writings, the Epistles of St Ignatius (†115), the Shepherd of Hermas, Justin Martyr, the Odes of Solomon (early 2nd cent.), perhaps also Polycarp in his letter to the Philippians, c. A.D. 115. Some presbyters mentioned by Irenaeus (†A.D. 202) explained the 'many mansions,' Jn 14:2. Tatian embodied the Gospel in his Diatessaron (A.D. 175). The Montanists made much of the Paraclete passages, Marcion incorporating pieces in his own arbitrary gospel; Gnostics like Valentine and Ptolemy used it and especially Heracleon who seems to have been the first to write a commentary on this gospel. We may also mention here the fragment of papyrus (recto Jn 18:31-32—verso Jn 18:37-38) in the Rylands collection Manchester (P 52 Rylands 457) discovered in Egypt and dated about A.D. 130, apparently showing that the Gospel may well have been circulating at that date in that country.

Authorship—If we except the views of the Alogi, obscure 2nd cent. heretics who denied the Johannine authorship, not on historical but on doctrinal grounds, there was never any doubt until modern times, that John, the son of Zebedee and one of the twelve Apostles, wrote the Fourth Gospel. The remarkable differences that exist between the Syn. on the one hand and Jn on the other (see § 778h) are claimed by many moderns as militating against the ascription of the latter to one of Christ's disciples. These differences, however, were equally well known to the ancients and nevertheless they regarded the son of Zebedee as author. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that a cogent reason for the modern denial is, or at least was, the clear and even startling portrayal in Jn of the divine sonship of Christ. If it could be shown that the gospel was not in fact written by one of our Lord's immediate followers, but by a Christian of later date, the force of the historical evidence would be weakened, thus making it easier to deny its claims. It was felt that time must be allowed for the growth of so clear a belief in Christ's divinity as we see illustrated in Jn, and the Tübingen School, for example, assigned to it the date A.D. 160-70. Today, of course, in the light of recent research and manuscript discoveries (cf. § 77b), it is not possible to date it later than the first quarter of the 2nd cent., and since the traditional date for the gospel is A.D. 100, this motive for denying the Johannine authorship has largely disappeared.

John the Son of Zebedee—John and his elder brother

776e James were sons of Zebedee and Salome. Zebedee, living near the Lake of Genesareth (perhaps at Bethsaida), was a prosperous fisherman, who employed paid helpers. Whether we regard Salome as a sister (cousin) of the Mother of Jesus depends on the way we read Jn 19:26 and combine the text with Mt 27:56 and Mk 15:40. In any case, Salome was one of the Galilean women who followed Jesus with their ministrations. She was present at the crucifixion.

John was probably still in his teens when he placed himself with Andrew in the school of the Precursor. From the friend of the Bridegroom he passed to the company of the Divine Bridegroom himself. Then, as Andrew brought Simon his brother to Jesus, so, it seems, John brought James. In those earliest days of discipleship he saw the miracle of the marriage feast of Cana and remained with Jesus till after the first Pasch of the public life. Later he and James were called from their father's boat to join Peter and Andrew as future fishers of men.

After twelve of the disciples had been chosen as Apostles, the two brothers together with Peter formed a privileged group. Mk notes (from the mouth of Peter) that Christ called the two 'Boanerges' or 'Sons of thunder', to mark their ardent temperament, Mk 3:17. The warmth of their personal attachment, no doubt, prompted the ambitious petition which they made one day through their mother for the places of honour beside Christ in his future kingdom, Mt 20:20 ff.; Mk 10:35 ff. On an earlier occasion it was chiefly John who, through zeal for his Master's honour, forbade a Jewish exorcist to use the name of Jesus in driving out a devil, Mk 9:38, and again he wanted Jesus to call down fire from heaven on an inhospitable Samaritan village, Lk 9:54. The privileged three, Peter, James and John, were the only ones chosen to be witnesses of the raising of the daughter of Jairus, of the Transfiguration, and of the Agony in Gethsemani.

f There is no serious reason to doubt that the anonymous companion of Andrew mentioned in Jn 1:40 was John himself. Likewise it seems certain that the same Apostle is covered by the appellation 'the disciple whom Jesus loved', otherwise 'this Apostle would remain without mention in the Gospel, an inconceivable omission', Strachan. 'The disciple whom Jesus loved' figures at the Supper, which Peter and he had prepared, as reclining on the breast of Jesus and inquiring who was the traitor, as standing by the cross and receiving the guardianship of the Blessed Virgin, as running with Peter to the tomb on the Sunday of the resurrection, as recognizing the Lord from the boat the morning he appeared on the shore of Lake Tiberias. He is the one whose destiny Peter tried to learn, when he had been told of his own future martyrdom.

All things considered, and in spite of Ac 4:13, it seems difficult not to identify John with that disciple known to the high-priest, who, after our Lord's arrest, secured Peter's admission to the court of the pontifical residence, Jn 18:15. John's continued association with Peter is emphasized in the early chh of Ac. In fact, the list of Apostles there given shows interestingly how in the Apostolic College the 'Juda' chosen for primacy and the 'Benjamin' chosen for special predilection by Jesus were brought together. While Mt and Lk have the order: Peter, Andrew, James, John, Mk the disciple of Peter has Peter, James, John (the sons of thunder) and Andrew. Finally Ac has the arrangement: Peter, John, James, Andrew.

g Peter and John were together at the Beautiful Gate, Ac 3:1, before the Sanhedrin, 4:13, and visited Samaria together, 8:14. Between A.D. 42 and 44 James was put to death at Jerusalem, and Peter, but not John, was arrested. We do not meet John again till A.D. 49, when he was present at the Council of Jerusalem, to which perhaps Paul refers when he mentions John amongst 'the pillars', Gal 2:9.

As Paul and his disciple Timothy took care of the Church of proconsular Asia till the last years of Paul's life (66-7), it does not seem that John came to Ephesus before A.D. 68. Polycarp who was his disciple (perhaps from the beginning) became a Christian in 69. The tradition recorded by Irenaeus and Polycrates of Ephesus (c 190) supposes that the Apostle spent many years in Asia; that he was relegated by Domitian to Patmos, where he wrote the Apocalypse, that thence he returned to Ephesus under Nerva (96-8), and (if we trust the Syrian chronographer Elias Bar Sinaja) he died in 104, the seventh year of Trajan (98-117).

Various other things concerning John are narrated by ancient writers: his flight from the bath-house because Cerinthus the heretic was within (Irenaeus), his immersion at Rome in a cauldron of boiling oil (Tertullian), his reclamation of a young brigand (Clem. Al.), his repetition in old age of the precept: 'My little children, love one another' (Jerome). One anecdote actually furnished a symbol of the Apostle, namely, the serpent escaping from the poisoned cup. 'Chosen by Christ as a virgin John remained a virgin for ever', a fitting guardian of the Virgin Mother.

External Evidence—The Johannine authorship was in 777a pacific possession until the end of the 18th cent., when the attack was started by the English deist Evanson (1792) and continued by the German rationalist Bretschneider (1820). The traditional authorship has however found many modern supporters among non-Catholics, as for example Westcott, Zahn, Stanton, Drummond, Sanday, Feine and Büchsel. Catholic exegetes are unanimous in affirming the apostolic authorship.

We have only to move backwards from the 4th cent. along the links of the chain of testimony, to realize the strength of the Johannine claim. Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 3, 24) writing perhaps as early as 312 and not later than 323 says summarily: 'Let us indicate the undoubted writings of this Apostle [John]. Surely his Gospel which is read by all the churches under heaven must be the first to receive recognition'. Three-quarters of a century earlier Origen, commenting on Jn, was full of the reverence due to a recognized writing of John, who reclined on the breast of Jesus and received Mary as his mother, apud Euseb. HE 6, 25. And Origen's Master, Clement of Alexandria, in an exegetical work entitled Hypotyposeis, cited by Eusebius (HE 6, 14), joins to an account of the origin of Mk the following important testimony: 'But John, last of all, being conscious that the exterior facts (τὰ σωματικά) had been set forth in the (other) Gospels, after he had been urged by his friends and divinely moved by the Spirit, composed a spiritual Gospel (πνευματικὸν . . . εὐαγγέλιον). About the same time (c 200) Tertullian at Carthage urges the authority of all four Evangelists by name against Marcion (Adv. Marc. 4, 2.5).

Passing backwards to the 2nd cent. and to the chief b churches of the East and West we have Theophilus, a Mesopotamian by birth and sixth Bishop of Syrian Antioch, naming John as author of our Gospel and numbering him amongst the pneumatophoroi or divinely inspired. This was about A.D. 179. A decade later, Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, defending the Quartodecimans in a letter to Pope Victor, appeals to the authority of Philip the Apostle and of John the Apostle, whom they follow in the date of the Pasch 'according to the Gospel' (Eus., HE 3, 31). He certainly refers to the written Gospel of John which seven of his own kinsmen, who were bishops in Asia before him, had also followed. In speaking of John as 'reclining on the breast' of our Lord, Polycrates clearly refers to Jn 13:23 and identifies the Apostle with the Beloved Disciple.

From the same Asiatic circle and from the school of the venerable Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna and a disciple of John himself, comes Irenaeus, the Asiatic Bishop of Lyons. Polycarp is the immediate link between Irenaeus and John. Now Irenaeus wrote his famous work Adversus Haereses in the pontificate of St Eleutherus (175-89). In this work, at the beginning 777b of that very third book which gives the list of Popes down to Eleutherus, Irenaeus adds to his account of Mt. Mk, Lk the following: 'Then John, the disciple of the Lord, who had even rested on his breast, himself also published the Gospel, while he was living at Ephesus in Asia'. The Muratorian fragment (c. A.D. 170) shows that Rome at the same time also held the Johannine authorship; see § 17g.

It seems, however, that we can invoke even more ancient explicit testimony, though scarcely more authoritative than that of Irenaeus. According to two Prologues prior to the so-called Monarchian Prologues, and found in several Latin MSS of the Bible, notably in Val. Reginensis 14 and Toletanus, Papias of Hierapolis is a disciple of John the Apostle, and bears witness to the Johannine authorship, saying that 'the Apostle John wrote it against heretics at the request of many bishops'. The value of this is that it quotes Papias, writing c. A.D. 130. Papias would be nothing less than an immediate witness since he knew the Apostle himself.

The evidence invoked in favour of its canonicity may also be cited as evidence for the Johannine authorship, for even when John is not mentioned by name, there is never any question of any other than the Apostle who is moreover so clearly indicated as such in the Gospel itself.

d Internal Evidence—Jn is not at all an anonymous writing in the same sense as its predecessors, and bears distinctive marks of its authorship. Though it is written in correct Greek, and there seems to be no sufficient evidence for Burney's theory of an Aramaic original, the thought, the rhythm of the sentences and sometimes the grammatical constructions are obviously the product of a Semitic mind. Belief in the Hebrew Scriptures is everywhere manifest whether in the words put into the mouths of others or in the Evangelist's own comments. As examples of the latter, more significant for our purpose, we may cite the numerous texts in which the author sees the fulfilment of OT prophecy, the cleansing of the temple, 2:17, Christ's entry into Jerusalem, 12:14, 15, the unbelief of the Jews, 12:38, the distribution of Christ's garments and the casting of lots for his tunic, 19:24, the piercing of Christ's side, 19:36 f. The author's familiarity with Jewish customs is equally manifest. He understands the importance of ritual purifications, 2:6, 11:55, the Jews' dread of contacts with Gentiles, 18:28, the widespread impression that physical misfortune was the result of sin, 9:2. The Semitic style of the narrative is unmistakable, e.g. in 3:16–21, 31–36. The author prefers to string together sentences by the use of 'and' rather than to use subordinate clauses. Though not unknown in Greek, this is far more common in Aramaic and Hebrew, and suggests a knowledge of these languages. There is a distinct tendency, too, to record Aramaic names of persons and places and to interpret them for Greek readers, e.g. Messiah, 1:41; 4:25, Cephas, 1:42, Rabbi, 1:38, Rabboni, 20:16, Golgotha, 19:17.

The writer's familiarity with the country is even more striking. He is familiar in detail with the topography of Jerusalem. He knows that Solomon's Porch is part of the temple, 10:23, that by the Praetorium there is the Pavement called Gabbatha, 19:13, that the Pool of Bethesda has five porches and is by the Sheep Gate, 5:2. When mentioning places elsewhere he shows detailed knowledge. Cana of Galilee, 2:1, 21:2, Bethany beyond Jordan, 1:28 (to distinguish it from the other Bethany), Aenon near Salim, 3:23. These and many other examples lead inevitably to the conclusion that we have here the record of one who was familiar at first hand with the country and its people.

An equal familiarity and direct acquaintanceship is shown with the actual events. Precise references to time, place, distance, remarks and reactions of persons are scattered profusely throughout the Gospel, often for no other discernible reason than that the writer knew that it so happened. Thus at the beginning of the Gospel the author gives us a day by day account and even the very hour of events, 1:29, 35, 39, 43; 2:1. He often mentions the name of the speaker even when the remark is unimportant, 6:7, 8; 11:16. He observes also that Malchus was the name of the high-priest's servant whose ear Peter cut off, a fact perhaps of importance only to one who was himself known to the high-priest, 18:15. We are told that the five loaves, 6:9, were of barley and that there was much grass at the place of the miracle, 6:10. Lightfoot has moreover noted that the author mentally crosses the Lake of Tiberias as he writes, now speaking of the eastern side, 6:1, 22, and now of the western side, 6:17, 25, as 'across the lake'. The first-hand information is equally evident in such vivid and detailed narratives as that of the scene by Jacob's Well, ch. 4, and the healing of the man born blind, ch. 9. The cumulative effect of these and other details is to induce us to conclude that we owe the narrative not merely to an eye-witness of the events but to one who was particularly receptive of impressions and of specially retentive memory.

It is not difficult moreover to identify this witness in the narrative itself. He speaks not infrequently as from the intimate circle of Christ's immediate followers: e.g. in ch. 1, when our Lord calls his first disciples, and, even more strikingly, at the Last Supper, chh. 12 ff., when, it is certain, there were none present but the twelve Apostles. Moreover he constantly shows himself acquainted with our Lord's inmost thoughts and feelings, 2:21, 24; 11:13, 33, 38. The conclusion is forced upon us that the witness is an Apostle. Which of the Twelve is he? We note the rather singular omission from the Gospel of all mention of the sons of Zebedee by name, whereas in the Synoptics they are frequently so mentioned. Indeed with Peter they are the most favoured disciples of our Lord, cf. § 776e. It is difficult to suggest a reason for this silence in Jn, except that one of them is recording the history, and since James was put to death by Herod Agrippa I in A.D. 42 we are left with his brother John as the author.

We may briefly deal here with a pretended discovery that John was martyred together with James by Herod Agrippa, and therefore was dead before Jn was written. Mk's vivid reproduction of Christ's word promising the two ambitious brothers his cup and his baptism is argued to be a 'prophecy after the event', and should be taken to affirm their common martyrdom in A.D. 44. A fragment of Papias cited by Philip of Side, 430, and Georgios Hamartolos, c. 867, is produced as confirming this supposition. It says that 'John the Theologian and James were killed by the Jews'. Furthermore a Syriac Martyrology of 411 assigns to James and John a common feast on December 27th.

Our first remark is that this assertion demands an impossible Pauline chronology, since it necessitates the dating of the persecutor's conversion between A.D. 27 and 30. Secondly, with regard to Christ's prophecy, the assumption that it refers to an event (apart from the implied denial of real prophecy) gratuitously supposes that the chalice must mean violent death for both brothers, and that their martyrdom is to be regarded as simultaneous. Thirdly, in this hypothesis the silence of Ac 12 regarding John's death would be inexplicable. Fourthly, the title 'the Theologian' is an anachronism, as attributed to Papias, for this title dates from the 4th cent. Such an inaccuracy in citing Papias leads us to the reasonable conjecture that the Bishop of Hierapolis most probably coupled the names of John the Baptist and James the Apostle, both killed by the Jews, one by Herod Antipas and the other by Herod Agrippa. Fifthly, the common feast of James and John does not suppose a common martyrdom. At Carthage, according to a Martyrology of 505, it was the Baptist and James who were celebrated on 27 Dec. In the Syriac Martyrology there is an evident preoccupation with the title of Apostle (Dec. 26:

778a Recent Non-Catholic Criticism—As stated above it is no longer possible to assign a late 2nd cent. date to the Fourth Gospel and it is now generally recognized to have been written more or less at the time allotted to it by tradition. If the Gospel were written about the end of the 1st cent. and if John the Apostle did indeed survive till then, it might be thought to make little difference to the accuracy of the narrative, whether it was written by him personally or by a contemporary. Nevertheless, though the Apostle is now generally allowed to have had a large part in providing the material of the Gospel, it is still denied by many moderns that he actually wrote it. It is suggested for example that the Gospel clearly distinguishes between the writer and the eyewitness in 19:35 and 21:24. It is allowed that in those passages the eyewitness is the Beloved Disciple, John the son of Zebedee. In 19:35, it is argued, the writer of the Gospel is testifying to the truth of the Beloved Disciple's witness, 'his witness is true'. 'He knoweth that he saith true' is a statement by the writer that the Apostle, now very old, is fully conscious of the truth of his witness (Bernard, in loc.). This interpretation is by no means obvious. Why should one who was ex hypothesi not an eyewitness testify to the truth of the witness of one who was? It would surely be more natural to invoke the eyewitness in corroboration of the writer's own statement.

b As for Bernard's interpretation of the following statement ('He [ἐκεῖνος] knoweth that he saith true'), he has to admit that it is quite natural to interpret ἐκεῖνος as the actual writer of the Gospel (cf. Jn 9:37 where Christ uses ἐκεῖνος of himself). But if it does so refer, then we are more or less obliged to identify witness with writer, for otherwise we should have a needless repetition of the preceding sentence. Why should it be thought unlikely that the writer should refer to himself in the third person? After all, St Paul does so in 2 Cor 12:2-5. At the very least Jn 19:35 may equally well be taken in this way and since tradition has in fact always so taken it, we conclude this is the right interpretation. As for Jn 21:24, even if it be conceded that others wrote the verse, so far from weakening the Johannine claim, it is an explicit affirmation that the actual writer is the Beloved Disciple who, we have seen, must be identified with Jn the Apostle.

c It is asked further how we are to account for the strange reticence of the Evangelist regarding the actual name of the Beloved Disciple—Strachan notes the traditional theory that the author, the son of Zebedee, here refers to himself, but that as author, he keeps himself in the background (p 82). 'Yet', he says, 'the terms of such a reference can scarcely be called modest. It is a much simpler interpretation to suppose that the author of the Gospel is referring to someone other than himself. Then the epithet, "whom Jesus loved" becomes intelligible'.

But surely Strachan has smoothed out one difficulty only to raise a greater—for while it is easy to understand why the son of Zebedee does not name himself if he is indeed the author of the Gospel, it is by no means easy to see why the son of Zebedee is not mentioned by name if the Gospel were written by someone else. Moreover, is the title 'the disciple whom Jesus loved' in the mouth of that disciple such an offence against modesty? Given that Jesus had in fact a special predilection for the youngest of the Apostles, John would naturally be struck by the wonder of it and might explain it simply on the ground of his being the Benjamin of Christ's immediate followers and not because of any special merits he might possess. 778e

It is then, it seems, on such grounds as these that we are asked to distinguish between the witness to whom we owe practically all the information in the Gospel and the writer who records it for us, while at the same time rejecting a constant tradition which identifies the two. 'Speaking generally', says Dr Bernard, 'one cannot distinguish by any features of internal evidence, those parts of the Gospel narrative which plainly rest upon the report of an eyewitness, and those which may be referred to the Evangelist', p lxxviii. One should go further. Even if the evidence of the Gospel were compatible with the theory that the writer, not himself an eyewitness, gathered his information from one who was, it is clearly more intelligible on the assumption that the eyewitness wrote it himself. There are whole pages of the Gospel where it is unthinkable that anyone but the witness wrote them—or at least dictated them word for word, which comes to the same thing, cf. Jn 13-17. Indeed Dr Bernard at times seems to allow to the 'writer' of the Gospel a role hardly greater than that of scribe. But no Catholic would object to the suggestion that John, like Paul, Rom 16:22, used a scribe to write down his compositions.

It is further pointed out that the Apocalypse, admitted to be by John the Apostle, has no reticence like the Gospel on this point, but gives the name of John openly and repeatedly—why then not the Gospel also, if indeed the Apostle wrote it? Without pretending to solve every difficulty it may be observed that the Apoc is very different from the Gospel. It is a book of prophecy in which the identity of the prophet has considerable relevance. The Gospel on the other hand is a record of the deeds and words of Jesus Christ in which there is much less need to name the author. Indeed, one may note again (cf. § 777d) that Jn is less anonymous than the other Gospels.

The critics have gone further and attempted to identify the writer of the Gospel as distinct from the witness. It is noted that the author of the Gospel also wrote the Johannine epistles. Now 2 and 3 Jn each starts by naming the writer as ὁ πρεσβύτερος, the Presbyter or Elder. This term, it is argued, is used in Ac 15:4, 22 to distinguish the disciples of the Apostles from the Apostles themselves and this is the sense in which Irenaeus uses the term ὁ πρεσβύτερος τῶν ἀποστόλων μαθηταί, Adv. Haer. 5, 5, 1; 5, 33, 3; 5, 6, 2. There is no example in 2nd cent. literature, they say, of the term 'Presbyter' being used for an Apostle, cf. Bernard, p xlvii. Who is this 'Presbyter' who wrote the Gospel and epistles? The critics refer us to a statement of Papias who, while describing the sources of his information, says he tried to find out all that the 'presbyters' reported as being said by Andrew, Peter, Philip, Thomas, James, John, Matthew, or any other of the disciples of our Lord—and also what Aristion and the presbyter John say. It seems clear that two Johns are indicated here and this is the view of Eusebius himself, HE III, 39; cf. Bardy, DBV(S) 845. Eusebius mentions the fact that there are two tombs at Ephesus bearing the name of John, and suggests that perhaps the John, not the Apostle, wrote the Apocalypse. No one in tradition ever suggested he wrote the Gospel. Yet this is the individual brought in to fill the role of πρεσβύτερος in 2 and 3 Jn, and claim authorship of the 4th Gospel, as well as the epistles. Bernard, adopting substantially the view of Harnack, sums up: 'John the presbyter was the writer and editor of the 4th Gospel, although he derived his narrative material from John the son of Zebedee', p lxiv.

On what grounds is based the assertion that the term πρεσβύτερος is never used of an Apostle? It is necessary of course to exclude, beforehand, its use in 2 and 3 Jn and to interpret Papias' use of the word as 'disciple of an Apostle' though many think he uses it also of Apostles. Moreover the total number 778f of references to 'presbyter' in the literature of the first two centuries is not so large as to warrant any categorical assertion of the kind. Further, the appellation ὁ πρεσβύτερος at the head of 2 and 3 Jn surely singles the author out in a very special way, far too special a way, one might think, for a mere disciple of an Apostle, otherwise practically unknown. Yet on the assumption that it is the Apostle himself, how suitable a name! John, the last survivor of the Twelve, and now no doubt far older than all those he lived with, is surely the Elder par excellence; cf. Bardy, 846, and 1 Pet 5:1.

One further question arises. If the critics are correct, then the composition of Jn was closely similar to that of Mk. As Mk was the follower of Peter and recorded his memories in Peter's old age, so John the Presbyter, a disciple of the son of Zebedee, would have recorded his memoirs in the Apostle's old age.

But if this be so, how can one account for the startling difference in tradition? Whereas the part played by Mk has always been plain in the record of tradition, and the Gospel is under his name, not Peter's, nothing similar is to be found in the tradition of the Fourth Gospel, cf. 'The Replies of the Biblical Commission', § 510-e.

g Purpose and Plan—The Evangelist himself declares his aim, 'These things are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God and that believing you may have life in his name', 20:31. He wrote, not so much to convert as to confirm the belief of those who already believed 'that you may keep believing' (ἵνα ἰσχυρίσθῃτε). The Gospel was mainly meant for Christians. These were not Jewish Christians, otherwise it would not have interpreted simple Jewish terms such as Messias and Rabbi. The Jews John has in mind are not readers, but the hostile mass of the Jewish nation who rejected the Messias.

It seems clear too that the Evangelist, without expressly saying so, wrote against those who are called Antichrist in 1 and 2 Jn. These are the Docetists, who held that the divine Christ did not really have a human nature, and the Ebionites, who claimed that the Word of God dwelt only for a time in the man Jesus, from his baptism to his Passion. Jn demonstrates the reality of Christ's human nature and likewise shows that the Word was made Flesh at the moment of the Annunciation. Finally, Jn's insistence on the Baptist's subordination to Christ ('He was not the light') might be taken as an answer to those followers of the Baptist who were reluctant to transfer their allegiance, 3:25-30.

h That the Evangelist also wrote to supplement the Synoptics appears from a comparison with them. Indeed the explanation of many difficulties in Jn lies in the fact that the author presupposes a knowledge of the Synoptics. 'Thus he omits many things which would have served his purpose, for no other reason apparently than because they were already well known from the earlier Gospels', MacRory, p. xlv. He makes no mention, e.g., of the Transfiguration, or of Christ's confession of divinity before Caiaphas. Again Jn's remark 'For John was not yet cast into prison', 3:24, surely refers to the mention of this event in the Synoptics as indicating the start of the Galilean ministry; and its purpose is to inform the reader that Christ's Judean Ministry took place before the Galilean. Further, there is no account of the Institution of the Eucharist in Jn. In view of the elaborate Eucharistic discourse of Jn 6 and the whole tone of the account of the Last Supper which presupposes the Sacrament of Love, it is clear that John omits the description of its institution for no other reason than that four accounts of it existed already (Mt, Mk, Lk and 1 Cor).

We see then how an examination of the Gospel corroborates the testimony of early writers. Eusebius says Jn expressly records the events before the Baptist's imprisonment, which had been left out by the Synoptics (HE 3, 24); Irenaeus notes that John had in mind

'the error sown by Cerinthus and earlier still by those called Nicolaites', Adv. Haer. 3, 1.

The Gospel seems to fall into the following divisions: 779a

- 7:1-52 The Breach widens
- 7:53-9:41 The Light of the World
- 10:1-11:56 The Good Shepherd
- 12:1-50 End of the Public Ministry

13:1-17:26 The Last Supper

- 13:1-38 Events in the Supper Room
- 14:1-31 Consolation

Characteristics—The Fourth Gospel is an historical book with a dogmatic purpose—things as reconcilable with one another as the earthly life of Jesus of Nazareth is with the stupendous truth of his Godhead. To show that Jesus is the Messias and Son of God, John did not try to write a complete biography—he knew that was impossible, 21:25. His method was to select some of the acts which particularly revealed the divine glory of Jesus, and some of the words in which he revealed himself. The Prologue stands like a divine vestibule exhibiting a synthesis of all that the interior palace of selected history reveals. From beginning to end John sees the glory of the Only-Begotten—the glory of his life, the glory of his passion, the glory of his resurrection, a glory all full of grace and truth. Augustine constantly has recourse to two key-sentences: 'In the beginning was the Word . . . and the Word was made flesh'. Without this key Jn is an enigma.

Since the portrait of Christ in Jn differs apparently from that in the Syn. (on account of notable differences in the discourses and the Evangelist's elaborate use of symbolism) there have been constant attempts to maintain that Jn is in fact not a work of history at all but largely an allegorical composition designed to portray Christ, not as he actually was in life but as he was believed to be at the beginning of the 2nd cent. 'Such a view', notes MacRory, 'reduces the claim to divinity made by our Lord himself in the discourses of the Gospel to claims set up on his behalf by the Evangelist 70 years or more after his death', p. xlix.

Before dealing with the difficulties it is well to note first that the Gospel presents itself as a record of fact. This is stated categorically in 20:30-31. The text of the Gospel bears this out. We find the same historical persons, the Apostles, the holy women, mentioned individually by name, Caiaphas, Pilate, Joseph of Arimathea. The events, too, generally speaking are the same, the Baptist's testimony, Christ's many miracles, the feeding of the 5,000 and above all the details of the Passion. That Jn relates many events not in the Syn. (and vice versa) is accounted for by his intention of supplementing, not repeating their account in detail, cf. above § 778h.

John wrote a spiritual Gospel, as Clement of Alexandria noted, but its historical guarantees are as concrete as the most critical investigator would wish. The whole is chronologically arranged according to Jewish festivals—at least three Paschs or a period of two full 779c years, Jn 2:13; 6:4; 12:1, the feast of Tabernacles (15-22 Tishri), and the feast of the Dedication (25 Casleu). Days and hours are noted precisely, lengths of time are marked exactly, 4:40; 11:9; 12:1; 20:26, or approximately, 2:12. The geographical framework is equally solid, in fact there is more Palestinian geography and topography in the Fourth Gospel than in the other three together, cf. § 777e.

d Events are described not vaguely but with attention to details and with a picturesque realism which falls little short of Mk. Many things omitted by the Synoptics are supplied. Without Jn we should not know of the part played by Philip and Andrew on the day of the first multiplication of bread; neither should we know of the appearance of Christ before Annas, nor the steps that led Pilate to surrender to the enemies of Jesus, nor the part of Nicodemus in the burial of the Lord. Similar things could be said of the dialogue and incidental details in such scenes as that of Jacob's Well and the washing of the feet.

Of miracles circumstantially described there are seven, two associated with Cana, the cure of the cripple at Bethzatha, the multiplication of bread, the walking on the water, the cure of the man born blind, the resurrection of Lazarus—to which we might add the miraculous catch of 153 fishes after the resurrection. All are regarded as signs, the first two being related to the faith which they increased or provoked, and the second pair being closely connected with the Eucharistic discourse. The symbolism of three others is declared by Jesus himself. He cures on the Sabbath to show that he is one with the Father in a coequal continuity of operation; he gives sight to the blind, to show that he is the light of the world; he raises Lazarus, after declaring that he is the resurrection and the life.

e The symbolism of the Fourth Gospel is pronounced and apparently intentional. Nevertheless caution should be used in its investigation lest far more be read into the mind of the Evangelist than was actually there. The opening words of the Gospel 'In the beginning . . .', the reference to the Word as the Light of men, the bringing of new life to men and even the exact arrangement of events into seven days from the Baptist's testimony to the miracle of Cana, reminds us forcibly of the details of Gen ch 1, and can hardly be anything but intentional; cf. Allo, 833. Authors have sought the perfect number seven in many other places in Jn, for example the 7 miracles, but it does not seem that any special significance attaches to it.

We find that Jn gives great prominence to the ideas of Light and Life, and these appear to be constantly represented by the symbols of water and blood respectively. The Life was the Light of men, died on the Cross and from his side pierced by the lance there flowed blood and water, in which many have seen figured the Eucharist and Baptism. One should compare this with the water and blood of 1 Jn 5:5 ff. Allo thinks one may discern a series of 8 events in which these two main ideas are illustrated. Thus: (1) Marriage feast of Cana, water and wine (blood). (2 and 3) Nicodemus and the Samaritan woman, faith symbolized by water, proposed to a Jew and a non-Jew. (4) Healing of ruler's son, 4:46 ff. (5) Paralytic at Pool of Bethzatha. (6) Miracle of loaves (Eucharist) implying wine (blood). (7) Man born blind. (8) Raising of Lazarus. Thus 2, 3, 5, 7 refer to Light, and 4, 6, 8 to Life, while 1 refers to both.

f Granted some symbolism, to a greater or lesser degree, we have now to ask whether this is compatible with an historical work? It should be observed first that we are not here considering parables which are fictitious narratives designed to convey spiritual teaching. The symbolical or typological method is quite distinct and consists in selecting an actual historical event or fact or person and seeing in it or him a spiritual meaning; cf. § 40. Thus Paul in referring to an episode in the life of Abraham in this way, Gal 4:24, does not imply it did not happen but that it symbolizes a spiritual lesson. As Bernard says, 'It is one thing to spiritualize history: it is quite another to put forth as history a narrative which is not based on fact', p. lxxxvi. There cannot be the slightest doubt that it was John's express purpose and intention to record fact. At the same time he does undertake to interpret the facts, as is shown not only by his comments (e.g. 2:21; 4:2; 20:9) but also by his arrangement and selection of material, so as to present his thesis, 20:30, in the most effective way.

g Different Subject Matter—If we had only the Synoptic Gospels we should conclude that Jesus spent almost all his public life preaching in Galilee—and, on the other hand, Jn concentrates mainly on the events in Judaea and Jerusalem. Yet, as said above, the reference to the Baptist's imprisonment in Jn 3:24 indicates that the account is meant to supplement the Synoptics. Again, the Syn. accounts suggest a one-year ministry; yet in Jn, at least three Paschs are referred to, cf. § 791b, implying at least two years. But this need cause no special difficulty, because, as Temple has pointed out, 'the Synoptists provide no chronology of the ministry at all until the last week', p. xi. The impression of a one-year ministry is due rather to an absence of chronological indications. Jn, on the other hand, is careful to give many notes of time, cf. § 779c. On the apparent difference concerning the day of the Crucifixion, see § 802b.

The Fourth Gospel indeed, far from being incompatible with the Syn., is rather their necessary complement, see § 778h. That our Lord should have ignored Jerusalem and Judaea and preached exclusively in Galilee and that he should then have journeyed to Jerusalem, where he was at once put to death, is hardly intelligible. For, seeing that Christ, on his own admission, was not come but to save the lost sheep of the House of Israel, Mt 15:24, he must surely have offered salvation officially and directly to the leaders of the people and to the inhabitants of the Holy City. Indeed how else can we explain his cry of sorrow over Jerusalem (not just Israel), 'How often would I have gathered thy children? . . .', Mt 23:37. The explanation is surely given us in Jn. Moreover Jesus, as an orthodox Jew, would be bound by law to visit Jerusalem at the great feasts, and one can hardly believe he would not take such opportunities to preach to the people.

780a The Discourses—A special feature of the Fourth Gospel is the length of our Lord's discourses. But even more remarkable is the difference between them and those recorded in the Syn. No one can fail to notice, for example, the difference between the Sermon on the Mount or the parables by the lake shore on the one hand, and the discourses of Jesus in the temple on the other. In the former we have elevated moral instruction, homely illustrations from everyday life, an almost complete absence of polemics. In the latter one finds a preoccupation with our Lord's Person and Mission expressed often in difficult language and in a tone of open hostility. The matter and the language are those of crisis—the supreme crisis of acceptance or rejection of his claims. Moreover there seems to be a remarkable similarity in phraseology between what is put into our Lord's mouth and the wording of the rest of the Gospel, so that at times it is not easy to say precisely whether it is our Lord or the Evangelist who speaks, e.g. 3:16 ff. All this has led many to ask whether we have not here the Evangelist's developments of what our Lord originally said, rather than an exact historical record of his utterances.

b To deal with the last point first. One recognizes of course that our Lord's Aramaic has been put into Greek and that in the translation personal characteristics of the Evangelist appear. It must also be admitted that the discourses are not usually reported verbatim in any gospel, as may be seen by the differences in the records of so solemn an utterance as the Words of Institution of the Eucharist. Again, not all that Christ said on any given occasion is necessarily recorded.

780b It may be no more than a summary. Finally the later date of Jn's Gospel would give further scope for the personal characteristics of the Evangelist to appear: though one might reasonably ask whether it might not rather be a case of John's having absorbed his Master's modes of thought and expression after so many years of profound meditation on them, to a greater extent than the other Evangelists.

c As regards the different subject-matter—in the first place there is a different audience. In Galilee Jesus was speaking to the simple, unsophisticated fishermen and peasants, who had no vested interests and no malice in their hearts. In Jerusalem it was otherwise. There he came up against the leaders at once, and they from the beginning took their stand against him, Jn 2:18. This being so, the polemical note could not fail to appear in his dealings with them. Moreover, being learned in the law, the Pharisees would expect to discuss deeper matters than those set before the Galileans. Jesus met and overcame them with their own weapons. It is moreover significant that in the Synoptic Gospels the polemical note is equally prominent when our Lord is speaking directly with the Pharisees; cf. Mt 23.

d It is argued further that the 'self-assertiveness' of Jesus in the Johannine discourses is unlike what we should expect of him, indeed unworthy of him. But surely all depends on whether it is true. That Christ speaks of himself is inevitable if his task is to offer himself for acceptance by the leaders. If his claims were false there would of course be intolerable pride.

It is often conceded that Jn has entered more deeply into the mind of Christ than the other Evangelists, and that his over-all portrait of the Master may give a truer picture than that of the others. But it is maintained that Jn's account is less historical in detail. 'We may sometimes feel sure that this saying or that was uttered by our Lord as it is recorded; but it would be a mistake to look for original and authentic utterances as each the nucleus of a discourse', Temple, p xvii.

e It is true of course that Jn does interpret as well as record. He interprets the significance of events, 19:34-37, and also of sayings, 2:21-22. Might he not also expand our Lord's discourses in a similar way? Some think, e.g., that in 3:16-21 we have the reflexions of the Evangelist, though there is no obvious break after our Lord's words in the preceding verses. So also in 3:31-36 we may have Jn's comments on the Baptist's preceding words. But it is surely destructive of the historical character of the Gospel, so well established as the record of an eyewitness, to maintain that, in effect, we cannot be sure that Christ actually pronounced any of the discourses as recorded in Jn. To those who so readily stress John's supposed inability in his old age to distinguish between what our Lord actually said, and what might be deduced (admittedly under the guidance of the Holy Spirit) from those sayings, we must point out that such a viewpoint does not well agree with the other evidence of the Gospel. If there is one thing which stands out more than another, it is surely the Evangelist's minute attention to details of time, place and persons (see § 777d-e). Is it likely that the man who remembered what was said by the Baptist, Andrew, Philip and Nathanael, ch 1, and on another occasion by Andrew, Philip and Peter, ch 6, that the narrator of the vivid and circumstantial story of ch 9 or ch 12 (cf. esp. 12:12) would be unable to distinguish between his Master's words and his own reflexions? Moreover, even if for the sake of argument, this were conceded as a possibility, we have other factors to reckon with. The readers of the Gospel were not meeting this teaching for the first time. The Gospel was in fact merely the written record of the Tradition which they had cherished continuously over the years. All the evidence shows that this Tradition was jealously guarded and any deviation would be noticed at once. There was indeed theological development almost from the beginning, as one may see from the epistles, but it was not set down as the utterances of our Lord. St Paul for example makes it perfectly clear when he is quoting the Lord directly and when he is issuing instructions on his own authority. Speaking of the Eucharistic Assemblies he says, 'For I have received from the Lord that which also I delivered unto you', 1 Cor 11:23. But 'Concerning virgins I have no precept from the Lord', 1 Cor 7:25; and again, 'But for the rest, I speak, not the Lord', 1 Cor 7:12. Is it reasonable to suppose that Jn who was more historically minded than Paul should have been so vague as to set down his own reflexions as his Master's sayings? It may of course be granted that in reporting the discourses Jn had in mind contemporary needs and selected and arranged his material in order to provide an answer to heretics. We have already seen that this consideration must have been in his mind when arranging the Gospel as a whole.

Strachan, in attempting an explanation of the Johannine discourses, suggests a parallel with the OT prophets. 'When a Hebrew prophet used the expression "Thus saith the Lord", he did not usually mean that the actual words were heard by him with the outward ear, although he may have had "auditions"'. He meant that he spoke with certainty and authority the mind of God on a particular situation. . . . The Fourth Evangelist feels himself to be in the same relation of communion in the Spirit with the exalted Christ as the OT prophet experienced with God', p 17. It is difficult, however, to see any parallel such as Strachan suggests. The OT prophet is generally concerned with communicating to man the mind of God here and now on a particular situation. He is the προφήτης, the speaker on behalf of God, the mouthpiece of God. But it remains clear, generally speaking, that it is the prophet who speaks. He is used by God to communicate the message, but the people know the man through whom the message comes. His personality is not hidden as is so often the case with that of the inspired writer. When the prophet says, 'Thus saith the Lord' all know that the Lord is then and there speaking through him. The Evangelist is in a very different role. His task is to record what the greatest of prophets actually said in definite historical circumstances. Our Lord, the Incarnate Word, was himself the mouthpiece of God. If Jn puts into his mouth what was in fact communicated to the Evangelist at a later date we have a totally different situation. Jn was indeed also a prophet and we have his book of prophecy, the Apocalypse, where it is clear from the beginning that Jn speaks as the mouthpiece of the Risen Lord.

781a Doctrinal Contents—The present slight sketch can only be a rough map to guide explorers on their way of discovery in the really inexhaustible riches of the Fourth Gospel. We give little more than a catalogue of the principal points.

Jesus, Messiah and Son of God—with the emphasis on the Divine Person—is the theme of John. That Jesus of Nazareth is the Israelite Messiah and very God is shown throughout the Gospel in an historical record of Messianic and divine self-revelation consisting of word and work, but all that truth is synthesized in the Prologue. The Prologue presents the Logos as eternal, as distinct from the Father, as himself God, and becoming man to walk amongst men as Jesus of Nazareth. This mystery of the Incarnation is the central message of the Gospel.

The divine Person is called the Logos, a term which in this sense is exclusively Johannine, being given to the conquering, bloodstained, royal Rider of the Apocalypse, 19:13, to the visible, audible, tangible 'Word of life' at the beginning of 1 Jn, and to him who is described as life and light in the Prologue, and appears (without the term Logos) as life and light in the pages that follow.

There is no doubt that John, in presenting Jesus as the Logos, satisfied an age-old groping of the Hellenic 781b mind. As a philosophical term, Logos had first sounded about 500 B.C. at Ephesus on the obscure tongue of Heraclitus. In general it was a principle of organization, order and harmony, and something generically similar occurs in the Nous of Anaxagoras and in the prototype ideas of Plato. Before the Christian era Stoicism had taken the Heraclitean Logos, regarding it as a productive and governing principle in a pantheistic universe. Under the influence of Platonism, but through the Stoic system, the term was 'in the air' of the Hellenic world into which Christianity came. It was associated with whatever men call 'serious, reasonable, beautiful, well-ordered, fitting, lawful, musical, harmonious'. It was Logos that was conceived as making everything just what it should be. But it was neither Stoic thought nor even Judeo-Alexandrian Philonism that directly influenced St John. Between the non-Messianic intermediary abstraction which Philo called Logos and the Logos of St John there is no relationship.

c The personification of God's creative wisdom in the sapiential books of the OT is the real source of the doctrine of the Logos; cf. Prov 8; Wis 7. It was under the influence of these passages that St Paul had already called Christ 'the wisdom of God', 1 Cor 1:24, 'the image of the invisible God', Col 1:15, 'the effulgence of his glory and the imprint of his substance', Heb 1:3. Through his 'wisdom' God created everything, but he also created and conserves and governs everything through his 'word', Ps 32:6. Thus 'wisdom' and 'word' are interchangeable, and St John chose the second—a happy appellation for the Christ who is the divine light of human intelligences and the divine life of human lives. The term Logos, analytically equivalent to supernatural life and light—grace and truth—is a reminder that in Jesus is the fountain of life, and that in his light we shall see light. The 'Word Incarnate' satisfies the Hellenic and human desire for a force which will act on human minds and wills and make the world what it should be.

d The Christology of John presents the Messiahship of Jesus in the colours of royalty—King of Israel, 1:50; 12:13, coming as Zachary predicted, 12:15, King of the Jews, 18:33 ff.; 19:19. But his kingship is not of this world; it is a spiritual kingship, to rule those who will become disciples of that truth to which he bore witness, 18:33–37. Jesus professed his Messiahship to the Samaritan woman, 4:26. Repeatedly he affirmed his mission to the Jews, referred them to the testimony of John the Baptist, 5:33 ff., and of Moses, 5:46 f., and especially to the seal with which the Father sealed him, 6:27. But cf. §§ 618d, 627a, 790f.

The title 'son of man' occurs a dozen times, but the Gospel shows abundantly that the 'son of man' is also the 'Son of God', the Only-begotten, 1:14, 18; 3:16, 18, who has come down from heaven, who claims unity of operation with the Father, who 'is' before Abraham came to be, who had glory with the Father before the world existed, who even says: 'I and the Father are one'. This transcendence however belongs to a man who on occasion was thirsty and tired, who wept at the tomb of a friend and knew disturbance of soul.

His relation to the Father is also frequently mentioned. His task on earth is to glorify the Father, from whom he has divine life, divine knowledge, and—as man—his command to give his life and take it up again for the sheep which the Father has given him. The programme of his life—his food—is to do the Father's will. His one intent is to promote his Father's glory, and therewith is associated his unassailable sanctity. 'Which of you can convict me of sin?'

e Towards men Jesus is the Saviour, to whom he presents himself as the bread of life, as the light, as the door of the sheepfold, as the Good Shepherd, as the way and the truth and the resurrection and the life, as the true vine, a Saviour in every way, not come to judge but to save, and nevertheless appointed by God to judge men finally, because he is the son of man. 781c

The grace of faith given by the Father must draw men to Jesus, to be united to him and live by him. That drawing is very prominent in Jn, the divine attraction being exercised at its utmost by the redeeming sacrifice. 'And I, if I be lifted up from the earth shall draw all men to myself'.

It is, however, the Holy Spirit who is to realize and continue the work of Jesus in souls. The fullest theology of the Holy Ghost and therefore the greatest revelation of the mystery of the Blessed Trinity is given by John, especially in recording our Lord's last words in the Supper-room, which promise another Paraclete, the Spirit of truth, proceeding from the Father, sent by Jesus, and therefore proceeding from both Father and Son. This spirit is to be the perpetual Guide of the Apostolic Church into all truth.

The Church also is strongly outlined by Jn. The 'Spiritual Gospel' does indeed insist on the interior working of grace in the individual soul, but it clearly postulates incorporation into a hierarchical organism. It is only necessary to recall the allegory of the flock and the Good Shepherd, the privileges of the Apostolic College of twelve, the primacy conferred on Simon Peter to prove that Jn proclaims a hierarchical Church.

St John is also—and this is quite in keeping with the doctrine of the Incarnation—a great sacramentalist. The sacraments of baptismal regeneration, of the bread of life, of the remission of sins are vividly set before us, and even apart from these institutionally effective sacraments, the most obvious things of the material world—light, water, wind, the shepherd, the flock, the vine—are all signs of things that belong to the supernatural order of grace, cf. § 779c.

Eschatology is not a marked feature of the Fourth Gospel. The final judgement and the resurrection of the dead are indeed there, but the judgement that discerns the good from the bad is rather represented as taking place here through the attitude which men take towards the truth. In Jn truth is imperious. There can be no neutrality towards it; one is either for or against, and this attitude decides whether a man is a child of light or a child of the devil, the father of lying. The final judgement will only manifest the response which men have given to the voice of Christ.

The moral teaching of Jn is centred in the inculcation of the precept of charity. Its whole code could be summed up in the Pauline phrase: 'Doing the truth in charity'. In all respects the Evangelist is true to his beloved Master, utterly intransigent in regard to the truth of God and with a heart full of pity towards human misery—shedding tears at the tomb of Lazarus.

The two stories told by St Irenaeus and St Jerome sum up St John admirably: his horror of Cerinthus 'the enemy of truth', and his insistence on the precept 'My little children, love one another'—because this is the precept of the Lord.

Integrity—There are only three passages of the Gospel which need discussion under this heading, but it has been considered preferable to deal sufficiently with two of them (5:36, 4, and ch 20) in the commentary. The passage of the Adulteress, 7:53–8:11, remains. Is it by St John?

The case is briefly as follows. Most important MSS and versions omit this passage from Jn. They are B, S, A, C, W, Θ, etc., many minuscules, the Syriac, Sahidic and Armenian versions, many Latin MSS prior to St Jerome. The Greek Fathers do not comment on it, and it seems to have been unknown to Tertullian and Cyprian. Many MSS note it with an asterisk or insert it after Jn 21:24 or Lk 21:38 (Ferrari Group). Moreover, it seems strangely thrown in between our Lord's discourses and has features of vocabulary and style more like the Synoptics.

On the other hand D and six other uncials have it as well as the great majority of cursives, about 100 Evangelia, the Egyptian Bohairic, several Old Latin 781h texts and Vg. It was known to many Greek writers who did not comment on it, even, it seems, to Papias (Eus., HE III 39). The Latin Fathers Ambrose, Jerome and Augustine give it full recognition. Jerome says 'in multis graecis et latinis codicibus invenitur de adultera' (Adv. Pelag. ii. 19), and Augustine supposes it was omitted from some texts because Christ's conduct seemed too lenient (De Conj. Adult. ii. 6). It is mentioned in the Apostolic Constitutions, ii. 24 (4th cent.).

i The difference of style is not conclusive against its Johannine origin, for it is permissible to any writer when dealing with an unusual subject to use words he does not employ elsewhere. Renan even maintained that there is nothing in the passage at variance with the style of the Fourth Gospel. It seems however impossible to prove the point one way or the other.

Is the passage a genuine part of the Gospel tradition? On the assumption that it is not, no adequate reason can be found to account for its insertion in so many texts, which show that it was widely current at least by the 3rd cent. and known in the 2nd (Papias). But in an age when sins of the flesh were punished with severity by the Christian church, as a reaction against pagan licence, the pericope may well have caused surprise and even scandal (as Augustine suggests), and then have been omitted from many texts. With the milder discipline of the 4th cent. the passage would gradually have re-established itself as authentic. The decree of the Council of Trent declaring the Books of the Bible with all their parts as found in the Latin Vulgate, to be inspired and canonical is always regarded as including this passage.

j Time and Place of Composition—It is clear from Jn 21:23 that the last chapter was written when the Apostle was very old; and presumably chh 1–20 were not very much prior to it. St Peter was dead, and the old Jewish world was no more. The Gospel must in fact have been written a long time after the destruction of Jerusalem. The old Prologue already mentioned, § 777c, and also the Monarchian Prologues (3rd or 4th cent.) assign priority of date to the Apocalypse, and as Irenaeus seems decisive on the place of writing, namely, Ephesus, we should conclude that the Gospel was written some time after 96, the year of John's return from Patmos. It seems also posterior to the first Johannine Epistle.

k Suggested Dislocations of the Text—Many modern writers have pointed out that a number of difficulties are to be observed in the text of chh 4–7, which however disappear if chapters 5 and 6 are transposed. The opening words of ch 6 'after these things Jesus went away to the other side of the sea' are oddly chosen if a journey from Jerusalem is meant, which must be so if ch 6 follows ch 5. Which side in this case would be the 'other'? But if ch 6 follows ch 4 there is no difficulty, for Jesus is at Capharnaum, on the west shore at the end of that ch, and amongst the signs referred to is the one recorded in ch 4. Again the words that begin ch 7 'After these things Jesus walked in Galilee' etc. do not seem to follow naturally on ch 6 for throughout the whole of ch 6 Jesus is in Galilee. Nor is there any suggestion in ch 6 that the Jews sought to kill him. But if ch 7 follows ch 5 the retirement from Jerusalem to Galilee in 7:1 fits in perfectly after the hostility shown Christ in Jerusalem in ch 5. Thus we have a smooth succession of events if we adopt the order 4, 6, 5, 7. Further, the order of chapters has an important bearing on the identity of the unnamed feast in 5:1 (see commentary).

l In view of the harmonious sequence effected by the arrangement chh 4, 6, 5, 7, it is surprising that there is no textual evidence whatever that this was in fact the original order, with the exception of Tatian's Diatessaron which can hardly be regarded as proving more than that he also found the story ran more smoothly in the order chh 4, 6, 5, 7.

The transposition was also adopted by Ludolph of Saxony in the 14th cent.

Since the second decade of the present century it 781i has rallied scholars like Meinertz, Lagrange, Olivieri, Joüon, Prat, Grandmaison, Lebreton, Bernard, Braun, Sutcliffe. Others however retain the order attested by all the MSS.

Further discussion of the matter may be found in Sutcliffe, A Two-Year Public Ministry and in a review of this work in DR 57 (1939) 308–39.

Attractive as the re-arrangement may be, it cannot, in the absence of any external evidence, be regarded as more than a possibility.

I 1-18 PROLOGUE

I 1-18—On the doctrinal importance of the Prologue 782a and on the concept and term Logos, see § 781 a, b, c. The most convenient division seems to be: The Word as God and Creator, 1–5; the role of the Baptist and the Advent of the Word, 6–13; the Word Incarnate, whose glory, as fount of grace and truth, is witnessed by the Apostles, by the Baptist, by the Church, 14–18. 1, 2. The phrase 'In the beginning' brings us up to the anterior verge of time from which creation descends, Gen 1:1; when the genesis of things began, the Word already was. This substantive verb was denotes existence and, in the context, pre-existence, self-existence. The Word is, therefore, eternal; and its name denotes that it is a Wisdom-Being, the Offspring of intelligence. The chain-linking of subjects and predicates in 1a, b, c should be noted; Logos links with Logos and Theos with Theos, the order of words in Gk being Predicate-Subject, SP, PS. The Challoner revision of DV had (almost perforce) partially to abandon this order which had been stubbornly retained by the original Rhemish translators. In 1b the preposition 'with' (πρός) marks the Word as distinct from Another called God, but here God has the Gk definite article, to show that the relation is that of person to person. The preposition πρός is actually the one chosen by Aristotle to express the category of relation; it means 'towardness', but in several passages of the NT it is used with the accusative in the same sense as with the dative, namely, of being or dwelling together but perhaps denotes greater intimacy, Mt 13:56. 'The Word was with God' means two not one; but the unity of the divine essence is safe; for 'the Word was God', Theos here (without the Gk article) being a predicate and a noun of essence. This first verse of the Prologue, therefore, attributes to the Word eternity, distinct personality, Godhead. 2. The emphatic Rhemish 'this', changed to 'the same' by Challoner, stands for the Logos of the last stichos, that is, the Logos-Theos—'He was in the beginning with God' is a resumé of his Divinity, his Eternity, and his Personal distinction from him who in vv 14 and 18 is called the Father. The term 'Son', which pervades the whole subsequent Gospel, does not occur in the best Gk MSS of the Prologue except equivalently, for the Word is called 'Only-Begotten', 14, and even 'Only-begotten God', 18. 3–5. The relation of the Word to all creation in general and to mankind in particular is the theme of these three verses. We pass at once from one pivotal verb, that of being to another pivotal verb, that of coming to be or becoming (εἶναι and γίνεσθαι). 3. 'All things'—πάντα without the article meaning all and each—'through him came to be'. Our translation uses by, to exclude the suggestion of instrumental agency conveyed by through. The context, however, sufficiently excludes it, for the Word, being God, cannot be an instrument. Besides, 'Coming to be' here means creation, and creation is an act immediately divine in which no secondary agent can be a partner. The same preposition is used of God the Creator elsewhere (Rom 11:36; cf. 1 Cor 8:6; Col 1:16). The Word is not an instrument of creation, but since the Word

782b is the Wisdom-Person in the Godhead, the quasi-instrumental expression 'through him' is quite appropriate. The next group of words brings us to a problem of punctuation. The absolute universality of the creative action of the Word is emphasized by negative repetition in Semitic fashion: 'Without him nothing came to be'. Many ancient authorities placed a full stop here and began the next sentence: 'What has come to be in him was life'. This reading is traceable from the 2nd cent. through the early Gnostics and their adversary Irenaeus, through most of the Alexandrian, Syrian, Palestinian and Latin writers, in very authoritative uncial codices (except B and S which show no punctuation), in ancient versions and in the MS transmission of Vg. St Augustine, to whom its Platonic touch undoubtedly appealed, seems to have made its fortune in the Latin Church. The Clementine edition of Vg remains indecisive (using a comma only between 3 and 4), but the Roman Missal and Ritual are clearly in favour of beginning the new sentence with the words: 'In him was life'. Mainly through St John Chrysostom (it seems) this latter mode of dividing became almost universal in the Greek Church and in later Gk MSS. It had the support of St Jerome amongst Latins, and is adopted by the vast majority of NT editors and commentators. We translate, therefore (noting the change of tense in the verb γένετον from aorist to perfect and also the emphasis secured by resolving into its components a Gk negative substantive—not-one-thing—instead of 'nothing'): 'Without him came to be not-one-thing that has come to be'. The reading: 'Whatever has come to be, in him was life', though orthodox and beautiful, seems alien to the Evangelist's mind and possibly has its origin in a construe of St John's words by Gnostic commentators. This is a text-critical case in which the authority of the most ancient MS testimony does not prevail against other criteria. 4. The Evangelist next descends from creatures in general to man in particular. 'In him (the Word) was life'. The term life is, of course, to be taken causatively in the sense of Ps 35(36):10—'With thee is the fountain of life, and in thy light we shall see light'. St John is certainly not thinking of plants and beasts, but of man only. Whether 'life' here has the specialized meaning 'spiritual or supernatural life' which it has throughout the whole Gospel (see Bi 1 [1920] 38–58, 213–39) has been doubted, because of the absence of the article. In any case grace does not supplant, but elevates nature, and consequently spiritual life diffused by the Word as a supernatural gift supposes the life of intelligence and free will. However, the rule of context and the opposition between light and darkness seem decisive in favour of supernatural life. Precisely because man is an intelligent creature, supernatural life for him is primarily light illuminating his mind. Hence baptism was called photismos or illumination. 5. The present tense 'shineth' denotes habitual efficacy extending to past, present and future. The light is there, powerful to illuminate at all times. The metaphor 'darkness' has a moral meaning in St John. It is not merely privation of light but opposition to it (cf. 3:19). 'The darkness did not take it'. 'Comprehend' is a good translation, in as much as it conveys the ambiguity of the Gk compound verb κατέλαβεν. The Greek Fathers (Cyril of Alexandria excepted) understood this verb in the sense of 'hostile seizure and suppression' (cf. Mk 9:17). Still, although it is true that the darkness did not overcome the light, this idea does not seem to belong to the sequence of the Evangelist's thought. Therefore, we understand the verb as parallel to the verbs in 10c, 11b, 12a—ἔγνω, παρέλαβον, ἔλαβον in the sense of 'take, receive, welcome'. The darkness was unreceptive (cf. Phil. 3:12 f.). 6–8. To what extent St John has the pre-Christian activity of the illuminative Word in mind, is very difficult to assess. Although indeed the mystery of the

782f Incarnation is first announced in 14, all that runs from 6 to 12 seems nevertheless to refer primarily to the historical appearance of the Word in human form. This is apparently the reason why the Precursor is introduced here, before a series of verses, 9–13, which at first sight seem to refer to the pre-Incarnation manifestations of the Word—to his prophetic advent, as we should say. It is true that from the time of the first promise in Eden the attitude of mankind towards God's plan is implicitly or explicitly an attitude towards the mystery of the Word Incarnate, so that all rejections of the Light in earlier days were only anticipations of the rejection of the Word made flesh. The Precursor is described as a man who appeared on the historical scene ('There came' rather than 'There was'). That he was 'sent from God' marks his prophetic mission: his name denoted the gracious purpose of God, and his whole office was that of a witness to the Light—an office virtually as universal as that of Christ—in order that all might be brought to belief. The negative sentence, 8, emphasizes the role of witness, recapitulates, and prepares what follows—John was a lamp, not the Light (cf. 5:35). 9–13. In spite of a strongly seductive temptation (on grounds of apparent ease and of rhythm) to make 'cometh' refer back to 'light' we stand for the Vg interpretation of 9, with all the older interpreters, Greek and Latin (except Theodore of Mopsuestia), and against most moderns (except Knabenbauer, Médebielle, Lebreton). Challoner supplies the demonstrative 'That'. It is perhaps too much like popular speech to translate: 'There it was—the very Light which enlightens every man coming into the world', but this is really the effect of the emphatic 'was' at the head of the sentence. The redundant adjectival phrase coming into the world, found nowhere else in the NT, is a hebraic pleonasm common in rabbinical writings. The 'shining' of the Word (5) is here 'illumination', but the verb in the habitual present must be understood, as above, of the power to illuminate. The word kosmos means the created universe. 10. It (the light) was in the world and the world came to exist through him (through the Logos-phôs), but the world (here with its moral nuance, meaning corrupt mankind) did not recognize him. The tragic note is stronger in 9 and 10 than in 5, and recurs frequently in chh 1–12. With the reservation already made concerning the central place of the Incarnation in the Evangelist's thought, it is difficult not to see pre-Incarnation rejection of the Light in these words. 11. 'He came into his own (domain)—Israel, his specially chosen people—and his own did not receive him'. Here we may still admit some implied reference to continued Jewish rejection of the Christ of prophecy throughout the ages of preparation, but there seems no doubt that St John already presents the historical advent of the Incarnate Word, and the great refusal of the Jewish people to receive him. It has been remarked that the stylistic motion of the Prologue is peculiarly 'tidal' and difficult of analysis, but it seems that full tide comes here in 11. The deep tragedy of the Prologue also ends here, 12 being introduced by an adversative δέ, a comparatively rare particle in this Gospel. Here begin the glories of the Incarnation. 12. The power given to those who received the Logos-phôs, whereby they were enabled to become children of God, is the grace of faith. Reception of the Word is itself an act of faith, and faith is the means of appropriating the dignity of divine sonship. Faith is not itself filiation, but the foundation and root of filiation. Hence the phrase (explanatory of the act of voluntary acceptance): 'to them that believe in his name'—that is, adhere to him and all that his name (Messias and Son of God) signifies. 13. These 'sons', τέκνα ('offspring' in a very real sense), were not generated from material elements—the blood-products of man and woman—nor from that will of the flesh which is the concupiscence of human sexual life—nor from the deliberate will of man (ἀνδρός, a human father) rationally desiring 783b human propagation, but were born from God. The reading 'was born', referring to Christ, though found in Tertullian, St Irenaeus and (possibly) St Justin has only negligible authority from MSS (Latin and Syriac) and is defended only by a few non-Catholic critics. The supernatural birth of Children of God is a very Johannine idea (cf. 3:3-6; 1 Jn 2:29; 3:9; 5:4, 18).

14-18. The manifestation of the Word now shows itself in all its splendid historical fullness. The term Logos, 1, appears again (and also for the last time in the Gospel) in a sentence that means more for mankind than any sentence ever written by a human pen: 'And the Word became flesh and dwelt amongst us'. The enunciation seems to come with a sudden shock, but the implied connexion between 13 and 14 is unmistakable. Men can become children of God, because the Word became man and entered our family. Borrowing a thought from St Augustine, we may say, that the wonder of 13 merges into the greater wonder of 14. It belongs to theology to explain the depth of these eight words. The exegetical facts are that the Eternal Divine Person, very God of very God, here called the Word, became, at an historical moment, a man amongst men, sharing (apart from sin) the whole frailty of mortal nature signified by the word 'flesh'. Thus he took up his dwelling amongst us, the Gk word literally meaning: 'He fixed his tent amongst us', with allusion to the presence of God amongst his people, this being manifested in their Sanctuary by the symbol of a white cloud. St John could not have been insensible to the similarity of sound (especially perceptible to a Semitic ear) between the word ἐσκήνωσεν ('he tented') and the Shekinah which is the Hebrew term for the dwelling of God in the Israelite sanctuary. This ancient manifestation of the glory of God's Majesty is also before his mind, as he proceeds to tell of the glory of the Word made man. 14c. Using the first person plural and a verb of ocular vision he places himself amongst those who saw with their eyes (cf. 1 Jn 1:1) the glory of the Word Incarnate—that is, the external evidences of his divine majesty in words, miracles, Transfiguration, Resurrection—a glory such as belongs to an Only-begotten (who came) from the Father. The Gk ὡς (Lat. quasi) simply designates the quality or status (of Only-begotten)—the glory which he has as being the Only-begotten. 'From the Father' may be construed with glory or with Only-begotten, but the latter seems more natural, cf. 16:27. 'Full of grace and truth', as far as the adjective goes (for it is indeclinable in the Koiné) may be attached to 'glory' or to 'Only-begotten', but Vg and commentators generally read the second distich as a parenthesis and make 'full' an epithet of the Logos dwelling Incarnate amongst us. Ps 84(85):11 speaks of 'mercy and fidelity meeting each other'. This OT phrase is here found in surpassing fullness, but St John has taken the expression beyond its OT meaning. 'Grace' (a word which only occurs in the Prologue) means something more interior and unlimited than hesed (cf. 16, 17), and 'truth' is not merely the faithful fulfilment of all God's promises but the new revelation of God's majesty and mysterious purpose formerly hidden in the inaccessible light of his divinity. 'Truth' especially stands in contrast to the umbratic revelation and regime of the Old Dispensation. It is a capital concept in St John's Gospel (cf. particularly 4:23; 8:32-46; 17:17; 18:37).

15 seems a surprising insertion, for 16 is the logical continuation of 14, but the Precursor's testimony is of paramount importance in the mind of the Evangelist. As the fact of the Baptist's testimony has been already announced in 6-8, its content is given here. Note the solemnity of the introduction; the perfect form of the Gk verb with present meaning renders, as it were, the permanent proclamation of the great herald's voice: 'This is he of whom I said: He who comes after me [by reason of the time of his ministry] has taken rank before me [in dignity], for he was before me' [by reason of his eternal pre-existence]. 16 adds a third testimony from the experience of the Christian community ('we' standing for Christians, not merely for Apostles as in 14). The grace residing in the Word Incarnate was a plenitude, and not merely a derived but an essential plenitude springing from the fountain of the Word. Of that fullness 'we have all received, that is, grace for grace' ('and' is epexegetic). This phrase, according to a common meaning of the Greek ἀντί, means a succession of graces, and has been variously interpreted—Gospel succeeding Law (St Chrysostom, but improbable, for Law was not grace)—Christian life succeeding faith—better, a continuous succession of graces showing their cumulative abundance. 17. The reason of this abundance is that a new economy has begun. The Law was given as an external ordinance through Moses, grace and truth have come through Jesus Christ. The interior and real has taken the place of the exterior and the figurative. The proper name of the Saviour Messias occurs here for the first time, and thereby the Logos, 1, and the Incarnate, 14, is identified with Jesus of Nazareth, the Christ promised to Israel. 'Truth' means the revelation of God's intimate secrets. 18. No man could have brought such a revelation, for no man has ever seen God (except mediately, like Abraham, Moses and some of the Prophets). 'The Only-Begotten God'—this reading of codices B, S, C, L, the Sahidic, Bohairic, Peshitta versions, and several Greek Fathers is preferred by most modern editors to the reading 'Only-begotten Son' of other Gk codices, some Greek Fathers, the Vg and the Latin Fathers generally—that Only-begotten who is in the bosom of the Father, conscious of all divine secrets with the consciousness of consubstantiality, he (ἐκεῖνος) has revealed (lit. told [it] forth, declared [the true nature of God]). Thus ends this sublime prologue. We now descend to historical narrative and follow almost a whole week of events, which, if the marriage of Cana took place on Wednesday (cf. § 786a), may be plausibly arranged between a Friday and a Wednesday in late February or early March. If we read πρωτὶ for πρωτον in 41, we should have a full week—from Thursday to Wednesday. It is the 'Holy Week' of the dawn of salvation.

1:19-6:72 THE PUBLIC MINISTRY, PART I

I 19-2:12 The Messiah prepares for his Mission—784a
In Jn official Israel is called 'the Jews'; these form a hostile body from the beginning. The movement of the whole Gospel is manifest in these early pages: an opposition developing into national apostasy, chh 1-12, a few faithful who will ultimately gather round Jesus to hear the last secrets of his heart in the Supper-room, chh 13-17, and after the momentary consternation of the Passion, chh 18-19, will rally again around the victorious Master whom they have not ceased to love, chh 20-21.

I 19-34 The Precursor's Testimony before the Jews—
Points to remember are: Jn supposes the synoptic gospels and their account of Christ's baptism; when he wrote, Judaism had fully declared over a period of sixty years and more its hostility to Jesus of Nazareth and his Church. Of the two testimonies here given before Judaism by the Precursor, one, 19-28, is spoken to a delegation from Jerusalem in the absence of Jesus, the other, 29-34, to a crowd [which also included the Delegation—Gen. Ed.] while the Precursor's index finger points to Jesus actually present on the scene.

19-28. We know that the Jerusalemite attitude to John was superficial, 5:35, and quickly unsympathetic, Mt 3:7; 11:18; 21:24-26. Some evidence of hostility may be gathered from the present section, but it is mainly a record of John's answer to an inquisitorial commission. The delegation is a highly official one, coming from Jerusalem, the centre of religious government, and composed of Priests and

784b Levites—the former competent religious experts, the latter probably a sort of escort of temple police. 20. The Delegates refrain from asking the pointed question: 'Art thou the Messiah?' but John answers the general question: 'Who art thou?' very pointedly, and with an emphasis and solemnity which is set in evidence by an introductory formula first solemnly positive, then solemnly negative, and once again solemnly positive, saying: 'I am not the Christ'—a categorical negative which provoked another question. 21. Words of Malachias, 4:5 [3:23], and Ben Sira, Eccles 48:10 f., had given rise to the popular persuasion that Elias should come to anoint the Messiah and manifest him (Justin, Dial. 8, 4). The Baptist partly fulfilled the prophecy of Malachias (cf. Christ's words, Mt 17:10 ff.; Mk 9:11 ff.), for he was Elias in spirit, but to the question of the Jews: 'Art thou Elias?' John answered even more briefly than before: 'I am not'. The question may not have been very serious, for John, in spite of his long stay in the desert, and in spite of his resemblance to Elias in garb and manner of life and fiery zeal, must have been publicly known as the son of Zachary and Elizabeth. Still we cannot be very positive regarding the forgetfulness which a lapse of 30 years can cause. There is, of course, no contradiction between Truth and the Prophet of Truth, for although John was the spiritual Elias of the first advent, he only denied that he was Elias in person. Another question remained. The Jews vaguely believed that some prophet, Enoch or Jeremias, would reappear as Precursor of the Messiah, and they especially built on an imperfect interpretation of Deut 11:15: 'The Lord thy God shall raise up for thee from the midst of thee, from amongst thy brethren, a Prophet like to me: him you shall hear'. Moses' words were a prophecy of prophesying in Israel culminating in the Messiah himself (cf. Ac 3:22; 7:37); the Jews, however, thought confusedly that Moses foretold one whom they called 'the prophet', 6:14, whoever he might be, generally making him a Samuel or an Isaias or some other prophet redivivus. John's answer was categorical: 'No'. St Gregory and other Fathers have admired the Precursor's solid and curt adherence to the humility which is truth. 22. Pressed for a positive answer, the Baptist—never so styled, however, in Jn—applied to himself the words of Isaias, 40:3, concerning the herald of Israel's deliverance from Babylonian captivity. God's return at the head of a redeemed people was a figure of Messianic redemption, and the Precursor is the herald who calls for the preparation of a highway of penance. Coming from the mouth of the Baptist there is a very touching solemnity in the words: 'I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness . . .'. The voice sounds and vanishes, and John realized his role to be just that (cf. 3:30)—to fade before One greater than himself. 24. Some of those sent (ἀπεσταλμένοι most probably without the article) were Pharisees and were particularly interested in ritual ablutions. 25. They asked why he baptized. 26. John explained. His was a simple baptism of water, with no inherent spiritual efficacy beyond its symbolic power of exciting repentance. Hereupon the Baptist turns the minds of his hearers from his own preparatory baptism to the One whose advent he was preparing, and who was already in the midst of Israel, unknown to Israel. 27. He was coming after his Precursor, but as the Perfect after the imperfect, as the Lord after the servant. In the matter of menial service John declares that he is not worthy to perform the lowliest office towards him, even that of loosing the strap of his sandals. It is noteworthy that John speaking to the delegates from Jerusalem does not mention the baptism of the Holy Spirit, but only draws their attention to the 1 Person who is already in their midst. 28. The place is indicated, but Bethania (Bethany) beyond the Jordan has not been identified with certainty. It is, of course, to be distinguished from Bethany on Mount Olivet, less than two miles from Jerusalem. The name of this Trans-Jordanic Bethania seems to have disappeared before the 3rd cent., for when Origen visited the sacred places c. A.D. 215 he found only a Bethabara, which, owing to his influence, but rather against his text-critical judgement, supplanted Bethania in some codices. The two places may have been near each other, for the etymological difference between Bethania and Bethabara is that between Ship-ham and Ford-ham. The place was probably near a ford or ferry of the Jordan and (we should surmise) not very far from the eastern head of the present Allenby Bridge.

29-34.—On the morrow Jesus appeared while John was surrounded by a number of disciples: cf. Orchard, The Rejection of Christ, DR 56 (1938) 410-26. Recently returned from his fast in the wilderness and probably staying for the time being in some hut near the Jordan, the Saviour comes to John to receive testimony. The Matins hymn of St John's Nativity (24 June), the Liturgy, as well as Catholic devotion, and Christian art have emphasized the importance of this scene of 'the pointing finger'. John's words designate Jesus as a Lamb belonging to God and therefore evidently sent by God and to be disposed of according to God's will. The lamb is a symbol of innocence, but whether John at this early stage of manifestation directly indicates that Jesus is a victim cannot be so easily decided—'a sinless Lamb taking away the sin of the world' may be the surface meaning of this word to the crowd, but the fullness of its meaning must include victimhood, for only thus did Jesus actually take away sin. There is an allusion to Is 53:7, but whether John had the paschal lamb or the lamb of daily sacrifice in mind is disputable. 'Sin' is generic and includes all sin original or personal. The next verse, 30, marking Jesus as later than the Baptist in time, but prior in dignity, because of the priority of pre-existence, has been already explained. [It is also the answer to the delegation's question.—Gen. Ed.] 31. John's statement that he did not know Jesus before the day he baptized him is easily understood of a knowledge of visual recognition. John had been in the wilderness for about 20 years. 32 f. Though by divine inspiration he recognized Jesus before he baptized him. Mt 3:14, the definite divinely-revealed sign by which he knew him, so as to manifest him to Israel, was the dove, for thus only the giver of the baptism of water recognized the One who should baptize with fire—the reference here being not only to the thorough purification symbolized by fire, but also (prophetically) to Pentecost. 34. The sentence: 'This is the Son of God', has its plenary sense in the mouth of the Baptist: 'not revealed to him by flesh and blood' but by the voice at the Jordan and the illumination that went with his office of Precursor.

35-51 First Disciples.—That this 'morrow', 35, is the first great day in the autobiography of John the Evangelist is unmistakable. It was also the day on which the Church began to find its Saviour. The solemnity and grace of the simple narrative are equal to the occasion: John the Baptist standing, two disciples near by, a loving look cast by the Precursor on Jesus walking by, the repetition of the great words: 'Behold the Lamb of God. . .'. 37. The two disciples followed Jesus. The heavenly attraction of which Jesus was to speak later, 6:44; 12:32, had begun to exercise its mysterious power. 38. Everything is vivid. Jesus turned and gazed on the two men following him. 'What is it you seek?' is perhaps a better rendering of the tone of Jesus' question, which is memorable as being the first word from the lips of the Saviour in Jn. The disciples' answer shows some embarrassment, but it beautifully and delicately expresses respect (Rabbi) and the desire to spend a while 'at home' with the new-found Master. 39. 'Come and you shall see' is the form which Jesus' gracious invitation has in the best MSS. The writer's precision is to be noted: 'They came, they saw . . . they stayed . . .' from about the tenth hour—from 4 p.m. till dark and (according to the laws of oriental 785a hospitality) that night also. St Augustine's comment cannot be omitted: 'They wished to see where he stayed and to do what is written: "The threshold of his door let thy foot wear: rise and come to him assiduously, and be instructed by his precepts". He showed them where he stayed: They came and they were with him. What a happy day they spent, what a happy night! Let us also build in our heart and make a house for him to visit. Let him teach us, let him converse with us' (Tract. in Joann. in loc.).

b 40-42. Andrew (etymologically Manly) was one of the two; the other is not named, but the narrative is too intimate not to reveal him as the disciple whom Jesus loved; cf. chh 13-21. 41. The remark that Andrew first found his own brother Simon seems to suggest that John later found his own brother James; an implied reference to Philip and Nathanael, 45, seems improbable. The joy of an ancient sage made Heureka an enchanting word, but Andrew's assurance: 'We have found the Messias' was a more momentous heurêkamen than any cry of a scientific discoverer. Messias is, of course, a Grecized Hebrew word meaning 'The Anointed (King of Israel)'. 42. John alone records the original circumstances of the change of Simon's name to Kêpha, which is Aramaic for Rock. Jesus looked fixedly upon him and, as it were, penetrated his soul, Ps 138, before giving him the name, which designated him as foundation-elect of the Church, Mt 16:18.

c 43-51. The fourth day of Jn's chronological sequence marks the beginning of Jesus' return journey to Galilee. The allusion to Jacob's Ladder in 51 justifies the conjecture that the route was westwards to Bethel and then along the chief northern highway through Samaria. 43. Philip ('lover of horses'), Greek-named like his friend Andrew, 6:5, 8; 12:22, was, like him, from Bethsaida, a much Hellenized town on the east bank of the Jordan not far from its junction with the Lake of Genesareth. 44. He was probably predisposed by what he heard from his fellow-townsmen, but, in any case, he promptly followed a single word of invitation from Jesus, and communicated his enthusiasm to Nathanael. 45. This Nathanael (the name being equivalent to Theodore-Deusdedit) is now commonly identified with the Bar-Tolmai or Bartholomew who is closely associated with Philip in the synoptic lists of Apostles. He was from Cana, 21:2, 4 miles NE. of Nazareth. The wording of Philip's announcement to Nathanael would seem to indicate that the latter was a man of some scriptural learning, if not a scribe. Philip's description of Jesus from his putative father, Joseph, is not surprising, and its retention by St John is a guarantee of the historical fidelity of an Evangelist who knew Jesus to be the d Son of God. 46. The uncomplimentary reference to Nazareth is almost proverbial. St Matthew saw verified, 2:23, the prophetic description of a lowly, despised Messias, when Jesus became a Nazarene. What we know of Nazareth from the Gospels, Lk 4:29; Mt 13:54-58, does not give us a high opinion of its people. The sceptical question of Nathanael may, however, have had some local jealousy in it, but he loyally adopted the good method proposed by Philip: 'Come and see'. 47. 'Truly an Israelite' was a eulogy that had religious sacredness in it (since God himself had given the name 'Israel' to Jacob), and the compliment of guilelessness asserted Nathanael's sincerity. Jesus struck the very point of the newcomer's character as a religious man splendidly sincere. 48. There was no lack of humility in the question: 'Whence comes thy knowledge of me?' What Jesus then revealed about a crisis of thought or feeling experienced by Nathanael was clearly an example of the reading of hearts (cf. Ac 1:24). It seems the event referred to was not recent, for, as we are some weeks from the Pasch (cf. 2:13), fig-trees were not yet in foliage. 49. In calling Jesus 'Son of God', Nathanael may indeed have vaguely confessed his divine origin, but our Lord's subsequent words show that he could not have realized its full import. He certainly confessed his Messiahship, for St John regards 'King of Israel' (cf. 12:13, 15) as a Messianic title. 50. Nathanael's act of faith was based on the manifestation of divine knowledge by Jesus. 51. The Master assured him that he should see greater things. The double Amen of solemn asseveration occurs here for the first of two dozen times in Jn. Jesus also used the single Amen, which the Synoptists retained throughout. The vision of heaven open and angels ascending and descending does not refer specially to any definite apparitions of angels between the end of Christ's desert fast (which was gone by) and the day of the Ascension. It alludes to Jacob's dream-vision, Gen 28:12, of a ladder at Bethel (near which place our Lord probably was at the moment), and asserts that the Son of Man in his earthly ministry shall be the centre of communications between heaven and earth—these communications being conceived as angelic goings and comings. The order: 'ascend and descent' is not that of angelic motion but of a ladder the primary purpose of which is ascent. In this sentence the title 'Son of Man' occurs for the first time on the lips of Jesus (31 times in Mt, 13 in Jn). Here it is only necessary to repeat: (a) that the name carried a suggestion of human lowliness and poetic rareness; (b) that in our Lord's time it was not in use either as a substitute for the first singular personal pronoun nor as a Messianic name; (c) that (notwithstanding) it carried a thinking mind to the Messianic vision of Dan 7:13; (d) that Jesus used it of himself with a variety of pointedness which was very suggestive (most often before his disciples, less often before Pharisees and scribes, seldom before the people, and most solemnly of all at his trial before the Sanhedrin); (e) that it had the fascination of mystery; (f) and lastly that being a humble title of the Messias, it did not continue to be used in the Church, being found only once in Ac, 7:55, on the lips of St Stephen, but in this case with deliberate allusion to Christ's solemn answer, when adjured by Caiphas to say who he was.

No one who meditates these 33 verses (which follow the sublime Prologue) can remain insensible to the exquisite charm of the narrative. The voice of the great humble Precursor does its work, and the rally of these early disciples to a greater Master than John is the beautiful introduction to the history of Christianity.

II 1-11 The Marriage Feast at Cana—1. The third day should be reckoned from the beginning of the Galilean journey which covered a distance of some 70 or 80 miles. It may have been a Wednesday, the usual day for the marriage of a maiden. The bridegroom and bride are unknown, and the identifications: Simon the Zealot, John the Evangelist, Susanna, etc., are mere romancing. Cana is not Qāna 8 miles from Tyre, probably not Kirbet Qāna near Sepphoris, but rather Keir Kenna four miles NE. of Nazareth, for which there is a reasonably solid tradition. If, as is likely, Mary was present as a relative, the invitation to Jesus and his disciples would have been on her account, although Nathanael may have had something to do with it. St Joseph evidently was dead. 2. Nuptial festivities lasted a week and were called in Aramaic mišṭifā (drink-festival) with which accords the rabbinical dictum: 'Where there is no wine, there is no joy'. 3. As wine supplies (especially when the family was poor) partly depended on gifts from those invited, the advent of Jesus and five disciples may well have contributed to the imminent (or already complete, Codex S) shortage, quickly noted by the charitable eye of the Blessed Virgin. Her brief announcement of the situation to Jesus is meant as a petition. 4. His answer has created three difficulties: b (1) The term of address sounds severe, if not belittling; (2) the answer seems a refusal; (3) the reason given admits more than one interpretation. As regards the first: 'Woman' both in Gk and Semitic is a title not 786b indeed of domestic intimacy (our Lord would not have used it at Nazareth) but of solemn honour. This honorific solemnity of the word on the lips of Jesus himself may be tested in Jn 4:21; 20:15, but most of all in 19:26, when he addressed his mother from the cross. Concerning the second: the Master's question which literally reads: 'What to me and to thee?' has to be understood from biblical and not modern usage. Therefore it does not mean: 'What concern is it of ours?' or 'There is no need for you to tell me'. In all the biblical passages where it occurs, Jg 11:12; 2 Kg 16:10, 19:22; 4 Kg 3:13; 2 Par 35:21; Mt 8:29; Mk 1:24, the phrase signifies, according to circumstances, a great or lesser divergence of viewpoint between the two parties concerned. In 2 Kg 16:10 it means total dissent; in Jg 11:12 it voices a complaint against an invader. In our passage, also, divergence must be admitted. In a sense our Lord's answer is a refusal, but not an absolute refusal, rather a refusal ad mentem, as a Roman Congregation would say, and the Blessed Virgin understood her Son's mind from the tone of his voice. His first public miracle belonged to the divine programme of his Messianic mission into which flesh and blood could not enter. His answer is therefore an assertion of independence of his Mother, similar to the word he spoke in the temple about his Father's business. The Blessed Virgin's subsequent action shows that the tone of our Lord's protest on this occasion was neither a curt nor an unqualified refusal. On the third point, namely the sentence: 'My hour is not yet come', it is obvious that we cannot read the words as a question: 'Is not My hour already come?' Although the view has the support of Tatian, St Gregory of Nyssa and Knabenbauer, neither the context nor the Gk seem to admit interrogation. 'My hour' has been variously understood as the hour of my Passion when I shall recognize the mother of my mortality (St Aug), or (more probably) the hour fixed for my public manifestation through the working of miracles. 5. Mary, understanding perfectly that our Lord's action would not be a family business, but would nevertheless follow the course of charity, gave orders to the servants with all confidence. 6. The water-pots (perhaps mostly borrowed) were large, for water had to be taken from them and poured on hands and vessels according to the rules of Jewish purification. Stone and not earthenware was proof against legal defilement. Six pots, containing 2 or 3 attic metretae each, would give a total capacity between $6 \times 2 \times 8\frac{1}{2} = 102$ and $6 \times 3 \times 8\frac{1}{2} = 153$ gallons. 7. 'Filled . . . to the brim' shows the water, as it were, peeping out of the vessels and, no doubt, suggested Crashaw's beautiful pentameter: 'Nympha pudica Deum vidit et erubuit—the bashful maiden water saw its God and blushed'. 8. The architrichlinus, to whom the servants were ordered to bring the wine in a smaller vessel, probably in a cup, was to be the first witness of the unexpected provision. He would have been a local expert in convivial arrangements, not a symposiarch of the classic type (cf. Ecclus 32:1). 9. He did not know whence the wine was. 10. But once he had testified to its excellence, the servants could tell the facts. The custom: 'Good wine to fresh palates, and less good afterwards' is not otherwise known from contemporary writings, but we cannot deny its local authenticity—possibly it reflects Galilean parsimony—and it is certainly an outspoken testimony that would have called attention to the miracle, so that this would very soon have become known to all present. 11. This first of Christ's miracles is, like all others, a sign of his divine power showing the 'glory of the Only-begotten'. His disciples had already believed in him, but now they believed more strongly. Catholic piety finds almost inexhaustible riches in these 11 verses (Gospel of 2nd Sunday after Epiphany). The passage shows the sanctity of marriage, the Wisdom of God approving domestic joy, the power of the Blessed Virgin's intercession, and even the law of her mediation. Besides, it suggests the thought that Christ's own nuptials with his Church have begun, the water of the old dispensation is becoming the good wine of the new, and an image is offered of the Eucharistic wine which is to gladden the heart of man. 12 Descent to Capharnaum—Not long after the marriage at Cana Jesus went to Capharnaum—a descent of some 1,550 feet, from 870 above Mediterranean level to 680 below, in a distance of less than 20 miles. Not now but later he made Capharnaum his own city, Mt 9:1, by adopting it as the centre of his Galilean ministry. The more probable and common identification is Tell Hum, but the site of Capharnaum has also been sought at 'Ain Tabigha, Kirbet Minveh and even Kheraze—all of which are within a radius of a few miles. Capharnaum was a very Jewish city, and Peter and Andrew had a house there. It was a natural rendezvous for pilgrims forming into caravans for the Paschal journey to Jerusalem. The present stay, being for this purpose, lasted 'not many days'. 'His brethren' were the cousins or other relatives of our Lord, and were certainly neither full nor half-brothers or sisters (cf. art. 'Brethren of the Lord' for discussion of the evidence).

2:18-3:36 First Judean Ministry.

18-22 Cleansing of the Temple—This cleansing is probably to be distinguished from that which took place on Monday before the Passion, Mt 21:12 f. That such a vindication by Jesus of the majesty of his Father's house occurred twice—at the beginning and at the end of the public life—is not improbable; the differences of detail are not favourable to identification; moreover, Jn and the Synoptists show enough chronological intention in the matter to exclude the hypothesis of one and the same event. [There are however weighty arguments for holding that there was only one Cleansing of the Temple and that it did indeed occur at the beginning of the public life of our Lord where Jn places it. The reason why the synoptic gospels place it at the end may be that Mk and Lk in general follow the arrangement of Mt which is logical rather than chronological, and which accordingly groups all incidents connected with Jerusalem under the last Jerusalem visit.—Gen. Ed.] 18. The 'Pasch of the Jews' marks the feast as belonging to the old order. 'Ascent' was almost a technical term for the festal pilgrimage. 14. The sale of sacrificial animals (oxen, sheep, doves) and the setting up of tables of exchange in the court of the Gentiles, within the sacred enclosure (ἱερόν) meant not only unbecoming noise and movement, Mk 11:16, but also avarice in which not the salesmen and changers only but the temple authorities also had their share. Foreign money had to be changed into the ancient half-shekel (called Tyrian, approximately 1s 6d) payable as annual capitation tax to the temple by every Israelite over twenty (cf. Mt 17:24). 15. Cords were easily picked up in what had really become a market. Christ made a scourge ('as it were' is not represented in the best MSS). The text does not say clearly whether the scourge was used on both men and animals; presumably so, in keeping with the drastic action of spilling the coins (κέρμα) and overturning the tables of the bankers. 16. Though they sold the offerings of the poor, there is no sufficient reason for supposing that the dove-sellers were less guilty than the others. Christ's action stopped short of dispossessing the culprits, and birds in cages could not be driven out. Moreover, the word addressed to the dove-sellers is really addressed to all. 'My Father's house' involves the claim of divine Sonship. 17. This assertion of authority was so striking that the disciples thought of a verse from a Messianic Psalm, 68:10—quoted from LXX with its verb in the future. The verse is not merely accommodated, for in the Psalm the Just One is eaten up by his own zeal, not by the jealousy of persecutors. 18. Although the uneasy authorities had already received the witness of John the Baptist they now demanded further sign to authenticate

787c Jesus' personal authority to act thus. 19. The answer is like that given later to similar demands made in bad faith (cf. Mt 16:4): 'Destroy this Temple'—rather 'sanctuary' (ναός)—and in three days I will raise it up'. The sign is the Resurrection. Consequently, our Lord's words refer in no sense to the material inner sanctuary of the Zorobabelian-Herodian temple. The concessive imperative 'Destroy' is prophetic, and shows clearly enough that the Jewish hostility which was to kill Jesus had begun that day. Such a saying from a Master, whose majestic zeal had just vindicated his Father's house, should have provoked attentive thought, and the history of our Lord's trial and crucifixion shows how it impressed itself; but actually it was now turned to ridicule. 20. A sanctuary 46 years in building to be destroyed and rebuilt in 3 days!—this is the sarcasm, which will be repeated on Calvary. The reference cannot be to the original Zorobabelian temple finished in 516 B.C. and not begun much earlier than 536. The Herodian reconstruction of Zorobabel's edifice is meant. This had begun in the 18th year of Herod's reign (20–19 B.C.) and is generally considered to have been finished only in A.D. 64. If the total includes the 18th year of Herod and counts 46 complete years up to the present Pasch (the aorist οικοδομήθη with ναός not ἱερόν as subject, raises a doubt) we can fix with some confidence of probability the spring of A.D. 27 as the date of this event. [On the other hand Fr Sutcliffe (in A Two Year Public Ministry) has verified the contention of Fr Power B19 (1928) 257 ff. that v 20 is to be rendered: 'This sanctuary has been built forty-six years', i.e. was completed 46 years before, in 19 B.C.—Gen. Ed.] 21. Jesus spoke, however, about the sanctuary of his body, the most holy of all temples. 22. After the resurrection the disciples entered fully into the resurrection texts of the Scripture and this word of Jesus.

d 23–25 Imperfect Converts—The feast lasted 8 days, during which time many believed on account of the miracles worked by Jesus. Miracles are strong arguments of credibility. They prepare the mind for faith, but faith and especially deep faith is not the mere impression of miracles. These new adherents of Jesus at Jerusalem 'believed in his name'—accepted him as a divinely-sent Master. 24. St John's double use of the verb πιστεύω cannot easily be rendered in English. Those men trusted Jesus as a Master accredited by heaven, but Jesus did not trust himself to them. 25. The reason is that he had immediate and intimate knowledge of their dispositions—the 'searcher of hearts' had no need to be told what depth of faith these believers had. He did not communicate himself entirely to them. St Augustine's application to Catechumens is well known, but is only an accommodated sense.

788a III 1–21 Nicodemus—The name is Greek (victorious people), but the Talmud also attests its Jewish adoption. Pharisee and Sanhedrist of the order of scribes (cf. 10) were the religious titles of Nicodemus. 2. His nocturnal visit shows timidity but not cowardice (cf. 7:15; 19:39), and he was also probably moved by a desire to have a quiet talk with Jesus. His approach is respectful (Rabbi) and shows a certain conviction, based on the miracles, regarding the divine mission of Jesus. Nicodemus associates himself with others (probably Pharisees or even Sanhedrists—cf. 12:42, though the Pharisees as a body were hostile). 3. The question of the kingdom of God is what is in the visitor's mind, and it is to this that the solemn answer of Jesus refers: 'Amen, amen, I say to thee, unless a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God'. With the possible exception of Gal 4:9, NT and even Johannine usage stand for 'from above' rather than 'again' as a rendering of ἀνωθεν. So also the Greek Fathers and many moderns. However, unless there is a similarly ambiguous word in Aramaic, our Lord, as interpreted by Nicodemus himself, spoke of second birth, other than one's first natural birth. This justifies our 'again', which represents not only the Latin version but also the Coptic, Syriac, Armenian, Ethiopic and Georgian. Without this second birth (which in any case must be 'from above') a man cannot belong to the kingdom of God ('see' has the sense of experience, enjoy). Kingdom of God occurs only here, 3, 5, in Jn. This term, familiar from the Synoptics, is broadly equivalent to life in Jn and to justice in St Paul. There is no real distinction between seeing the kingdom of God and seeing life, 3:36. 4. Nicodemus, probably an old man himself, reduces our Lord's words to the absurdity of an elder entering his mother's womb to be born again. 5. The answer of Jesus seems to attach itself closely to the impossibility thus crudely imagined. Water is like the material element giving the new birth, the fecundating power being the Spirit (many MSS of Vg have Holy Spirit). This concept is beautifully expressed in the Roman Rite of blessing the Baptismal Font; 'From the immaculate womb of the divine font comes forth a heavenly offspring, born as a new creature'. Water, as the Council of Trent defined (Sess. 7, can. 2), is not to be understood in the metaphorical sense. There is no difference (except one of aspect) between seeing the Kingdom of God, 3, and entering into it, 5. 6. Like begets like. 'What is born of the flesh is flesh'—in the physical (not Pauline-moral) sense of the term—'What is born of the Spirit is spirit', that is, a spiritual being. 7. Jesus forestalls a second expression of wonder from Nicodemus on the subject of re-birth. It is mysterious, but one must not deny its reality because one does not know the whence, and the how and the whither of it. 8. The wind is taken as an analogy or parable. It comes apparently as it wills, and its whisper or growl or howl is heard, but one cannot say where it rises or where it dies away. So, the man born of the Spirit shows effects that are perceptible, but the vital processes of the Spirit are invisible. St Augustine supposes that the Holy Spirit is the subject throughout. If so, there may be a reference to the phenomena of Pentecost. 9. Nicodemus is still puzzled. 10. In view of Scriptural passages like Ez 36:25 f.; Is 44:3, Jesus points to the anomaly of the ignorance of one who (of the two speaking) is the 'master of Israel', i.e. teacher and interpreter of the Law and Tradition. 11. Then to 'the master of Israel' and all like him Jesus asserts his own competence as a divine teacher. Ranging himself for a moment with all competent witnesses in any sphere—or using the plural of majesty (?)—he says: 'Amen, amen, I say to thee, that we speak what we know and we testify what we have seen, and you receive not our testimony'. 12. Then, resuming the first singular, he refers to the incredulity provoked by his revelations on things (like regeneration) actualized here on earth, and argues (a minori ad maius) that the revelation of heavenly things—the mysteries of the divine being—will encounter still greater incredulity. 13. The Word Incarnate—for he is the real subject of this sentence—is the only witness of heavenly things. No one has ascended to heaven, so as to be there and know the things of heaven, but he that descended from heaven. Coming to be visibly on earth in human flesh—this is the metaphor of descent—he who is the Son of Man has not ceased to be in heaven. As the last phrase: 'Who is in heaven' is absent from some of the best MSS, including SB, it may be a gloss, but it is an excellent one, giving splendid prominence to the communicatio idiomatum, or interchange of divine and human predicates. 'Above' and 'below' are spoken of the one Person; 'the Son of God was on earth, the Son of Man was in Heaven. This last sentence, 13, really refers to the Incarnation rather than to the beatific vision, which Christ's soul possessed. 14 f. With the Incarnation the thought of Redemption is closely connected. Faith in the Word Incarnate must also be faith in the Redeemer. 14. 'Necessity' is a dominant idea in the whole passage, 7, 14. Here it is the necessity of Christ's redeeming death that is proclaimed. 'Exaltation' is crucifixion, 8:28; 12:32, 34. The brazen serpent raised by Moses 788d as a divine remedy for poisonous serpent bite, Num 21:4-9; Wis 16:6 f., was a figure of salvation through Christ crucified. The non-poisonous likeness of a serpent looked upon with faith healed poisoned wounds and preserved temporal life: the sinless Saviour in the likeness of sinful flesh heals the poison wounds of sin and gives life everlasting. 15. The negative side of salvation, namely, escape from perdition, is not mentioned in the best MSS, and probably comes from 16.

16-21. The arguments for regarding these lines not as words spoken to Nicodemus but as reflexions of the Evangelist, seem strong enough to establish a serious probability. It is pointed out that dialogue ceases, the verbs are in the past tense, several expressions occur which are Johannine but are not heard elsewhere from the lips of Jesus (e.g. 'Only-begotten', 'believe in the name', 'do the truth'). The last of these arguments is impressive, but on the other hand the language is extremely like that of the Johannine discourses of Jesus; no clear notice of a change of speaker is given; and the things said are very closely connected with the ideas of Incarnation and Redemption, to the consideration of which Jesus had led Nicodemus. 16. The motive and fount of salvation is God's love for the world—that is, for mankind. Love made God give and deliver to death his Son (co-equal with himself), his Only-begotten (infinitely beloved), with a view to the salvation of every believer from perdition into eternal life. 17. Salvation not judgement is the direct purpose of the mission of the

18. Men make their own judgement by their attitude to him, 3:36; 5:24; 12:48. He who believes incurs no damnation. The unbeliever is already in the state of damnation (κρίνεται), for he has established himself as an unbeliever (perfect tense) in the name—that is, in the mission and God-head—of the Only-begotten Son of God. Note again the insistence on this double title of love and dignity, the order of words being the inverse of 16. The making of one's individual judgement in this actual terrestrial present is powerfully put in terms of light and darkness. The working of grace is supposed, but the accent is on the dispositions of men in regard to the light. St Augustine's application is justly celebrated: 'Many loved their sins, and many confessed their sins. He who confesses and accuses his sins is already on God's side. God (that is the light) accuses your sins: and if you also accuse, you are joined to God. There are, as it were, two things: the man and the sinner. God made man, and man made himself a sinner. Destroy what you made, that God may save what he made. You must hate your own work in you, and love God's work in you. When that which you made begins to displease you, then your good works are beginning, in as much as you are accusing your bad works. The beginning of good works is the confession of bad works. You do truth, and you come to the light. What is it—to do truth? You do not fondle yourself, you do not caress yourself, you do not flatter yourself, do not say: I am just, when you are really not—then you are beginning to do truth', Tr. 12 in Jn. The same saint said: 'Sore eyes hate the light, which healthy eyes love'.

21. 'He who does the truth', that is, he who has the disposition that co-operates with truth, 'comes to the light, that his works may be made manifest as being done in God', that is, according to God's pleasure. 'In God', 'with God', Gen 6:9, 'according to God', Rom 8:27, scarcely differ in meaning. The words of 19 ff., as this phrase indicates, are more general than St Augustine's comment and refer to the consciousness of general rectitude of life, which is co-operation with God, rather than to the acknowledgement of sin, which, however, is part of the rectitude or honesty of fallen man, cf. 1 Jn 1:8. Good will or a right heart prepares a man to welcome truth.

many modern commentators who regard 31-36 of this section as reflexions of the Evangelist. Still, there is not the slightest external indication of a change of speaker; the thoughts in 31-36 do not go beyond the Precursor's understanding of the mystery of Christ (although we may admit that the Evangelist gives them something of his own personal style); the phrase 'wrath of God' at the end recalls the stern character of the synoptic accounts of the Precursor's preaching.

22-26. The time is loosely marked as after the visit of Nicodemus—presumably soon after the Paschal Octave, for after the departure of the pilgrims hostility to Jesus would have made itself more felt in Jerusalem. The text shows us the Divine Master in some country part of Judaea—a place of springs or streams, or perhaps near the Jordan. He stayed a considerable time there with his disciples, whom he commissioned (cf. 4:2) to exercise a ministry of baptism, more probably not that baptism which was to give the Spirit, 7:39, but rather a preparatory rite like that of John. 22. The Precursor had come to the west of the Jordan and moved north. Aenon (Ainon, exactly our English Wells) or Salim nearby is situated 8 Roman miles south of Scythopolis (Beisan) by the Onomasticon of Eusebius, by St Jerome (Ep. 73) and Aetheria. There are still five or seven wells within a small radius in this district. Salim 1½ miles nearer the Jordan seems to have left its name in the modern Tell es-Sarem. 24. The indication: 'John not yet imprisoned' is a precious explanatory reference to the Synoptics, who could easily give the impression that Jesus began his work only after the imprisonment of John. 25. The dispute of some disciples of John with a Jew (S corrected, B, L, A) or Jews (S, Vg) about purificatory rites excited in the former a jealousy or group-selfishness towards Jesus which was indeed a felix culpa, for it occasioned the Precursor's very striking testimony. (Or was their jealousy really due to the fact that Jesus was now drawing larger crowds than their own master?) 26. The popularity of Jesus was evidently rising, and that of John falling in proportion. This was intimated in the disciples' report to John. 27-30. No wonder the Catholic Church has always given the Precursor a signal place of honour, due not only to his office but to the high dignity of his humility. These words of his are amongst the greatest and most beautiful ever pronounced by human lips. Their gravity, humility, grandeur, and exquisite beauty need to be 'relished interiorly'. 27. John's mission was from heaven, Mt 21:25; Mk 11:30 f.; Lk 20:4 f., but to pretend to more than was given him would be usurpation. 28. He was not the Christ, but his Precursor. 29. Comparing himself to the chief friend attached to a bridegroom, he says that his role and his joy are just like those of such a sincere friend. When the wedding is being celebrated (Christ was already gathering the bridal body of his disciples; cf. Mt 9:15), the 'best man' can only rejoice at the joyful voice of the bridegroom already happy in the possession of his bride. In this sense John's joy is full. 30. Jesus must increase in the esteem of a multitude of disciples, John must decrease. Let us recall the quaint but fascinating comment which we read in the Breviary (Aug. 29): 'John dwindled by decapitation, Christ grew on the cross'.

31-36. There seems to be no really cogent reason why we should not attribute these words to the Precursor. All other mortals and all other Prophets including John himself are compared to Christ. 31. The One whose origin is absolutely from above is over everybody. Terrestrial and celestial (cf. 1 Cor 15:47) are terms of immense distinction. The earthly has the limitations of earth, the heavenly is supreme. 32. As a witness of the things of God, he who comes from heaven has the authority of One who has seen and heard. No one, however (hyperbole for 'very few'), receives his testimony. 33. To receive his testimony is equivalent to declaring under one's own hand and 788k seal that God speaks the truth. 34. The Divine Envoy's words are the words of God. The total definitive revelation of God is delivered by him, for God does not give the Spirit in limited measure to the Word Incarnate. 35. To the Beloved Son, 'in whom he is well-pleased', God must give and does give the plenitude of all authority. Surrender to him by faith brings life everlasting (begun here, consummated hereafter); on the other hand, unbelief towards the Son means the forfeiture of life and permanence in the state of wrath.

789a IV 1-54 Through Samaria to Galilee—It is only at the beginning of this section that Jn first joins the Synoptists, Mt 4:12; Mk 1:4; Lk 4:14, who begin the public life of Christ in Galilee. The short mission of two days in Samaria, 4:43, is an episode registered only by Jn. Like Christ's brief stay in the territory of Tyre and Sidon at a later date, Mt 15:21 ff.; Mk 7:24 ff., it was intended to show that salvation was not for 'the lost sheep of the House of Israel' only.

b 1-4 Motive of Journey—The Baptist was already in prison, Mt 4:12; Mk 1:14. 1. 'When the Lord therefore understood . . .' (B, C, A, L against S, D Vg). The Master's ordinary human knowledge of providential events usually determined his actions. At this point he knew that the Pharisees (the chief focus of hostility) were aware of the growing movement towards him and his baptism. 2. The remark that he did not himself baptize may be perhaps a further indication that no sacrament was yet administered. 3. Judaea was henceforth dangerous, and so the Messianic light was to rise in Galilee, Is 9:1 f. 4. Some 'necessity' which Jn does not explain compelled Jesus to go through Samaria. If he was in the Jordan valley (and so it seems) the direct way would have been due north, but the Lord seems to have followed a western road, possibly the less frequented, difficult and fatiguing Wady path that passed by modern Dejân. We may conjecture that the 'necessity' of journeying through Samaria was in the providential decree, for later 'Jerusalem, Judaea, Samaria and to the ends of the earth' was to be the Apostolic programme.

c 5-30 Meeting with the Samaritan Woman—The narrative is a little sketch of divine pedagogy. It not only shows Jesus thirsting and seeking a soul but reveals his method. 5. The place named Sichar (Sychar) was scarcely the ancient Sichem, replaced since Seleucid days by the city which Titus later rebuilt as Flavia Neapolis (Nablus, nearly a mile WNW. of Sichem). Though excavations of 1914 and 1926-8 have revealed that Sichem was still inhabited in the reign of Tiberius, nevertheless the name Sychar, the Onomasticon, the Madaba Map and many Itineraries rather favour the modern village of El 'Askar. This place, at the foot of Ebal to the south-east, is three-quarters of a mile to the north of Jacob's Well, which is close to the foot of Garizim. Joseph's tomb, Jos 24:32, in Joseph's field, Gen 48:22, is popularly located about half-way. 6. The 'fountain' of Jacob was really a well supplied from a deep spring. It will be noted that Jesus and the Evangelist keep to the notion of spring (pégē), while the Samaritan woman calls it a well (phrear). Tired from the journey—quaerens me sedisti lassus—Jesus sat beside or on the margin of the well. There are two significant details: Jesus sat thus—just as he was in his fatigue (Chrys.) just as a tired man sits—and 'it was the sixth hour', that is, noon, 'the hour of thirst' (Nonnus). 7. A woman of Samaria, not the city founded by Omri, but of the land of Samaria, came with her pitcher and rope to procure water. If she came from the township of Sychar, the distance was fairly considerable, and the hour was not the ordinary time (either morning or evening) for drawing water. And as Sychar ('Askar) has a copious spring of its own, the woman most probably came from the fields, and we may be sure that a special Providence arranged the details of that day. There is no reason to believe that the woman was known in Samaria by the symbolic name Photina (Lightsome like Latin Lucina) given to her in the Greek Menaea (Feb. 26) and the Roman Martyrology (March 20). Without any preliminary address, Jesus asked for a drink. St Augustine notes his double thirst, physical and spiritual, for he really thirsted for the faith of a human soul. 8. They were alone, for the disciples—a half-dozen perhaps—had gone in a body to buy food from Samaritans who could prove hostile. 9. The woman recognizing a Jew by his speech or by his dress, Num 15:37 f., called attention to the national hatred between Jews and Samaritans. The descendants of Sargon's and Esarhaddon's colonists from Cutha and other eastern cities were regarded as mixed pagans and schismatics. They had been rejected from partnership in the temple of Zorobabel in the 6th cent. marked as defiant schismatics when the apostate Jewish priest, Manasses, erected a temple on Garizim about 400 B.C., ranked with the hated Edomites and Philistines by Ben Sira, Ecclus 50:28; and their reciprocal animosities had survived the destruction of the Samaritan temple by John Hyrcanus in 129 B.C. Josephus (Ant. 8, 11 and 20, 6) joins the Gospels, Lk 9:53; Jn 8:48, in showing that in our Lord's time friendly relations were not to be expected between Jews and Samaritans. 10. From the thought of national hatreds, however, and from regarding him simply as a Jew, Jesus raises the mind of the woman to God's love and to the gift from heaven which his own presence is to her. He has asked for a drink, but he can give her 'living water'—the symbol being that of a beverage like bubbling water from a spring (not dormant water from a cistern) figuring by its freshness a living and life-giving energy. 11 f. The woman now shows the impression made on her fundamentally good heart, for she addresses Jesus as Kyrie (Sir), but shifts the theme to the difficulty of a man with no hauling apparatus getting water from a well 100 ft deep (this being a fair average from the recorded soundings), and also to the unlikely supposition that the stranger is greater than the Patriarch Jacob. She thought: either he means he can get water from this well—but how could he without a bucket, 11, or else he means he can get it from some other well or spring better than this; in which case he evidently thinks himself superior to Jacob, who made this well. No doubt, she suspects that he might be, after all. 13 f. Jesus turns the comparison of himself and Jacob to a comparison of the two waters. The water of Jacob's well relieves thirst only for a time, the water that Jesus gives is itself a perpetual spring, efficacious for life everlasting. The theological name for it is 'sanctifying grace'. Jesus certainly did not set the physical law of water seeking its own level before the Samaritan woman, but this illustration proposed by Menochius is a good one. 15. The woman is deeply impressed. Her answer should not be regarded as sarcastic, but as expressing the naïveté of imperfect understanding. She wants the water, for she now vaguely believes that Jesus is a worker of wonders. 16 f. There is an obstacle, and Jesus reveals it in the moral disorder of this woman's life. 'Call your husband' would have seemed a very natural remark, for a long public colloquy with a woman was not according to custom. The woman's denial that she had a husband was evasive, equivocal, and perhaps a lie, and it concealed ugly facts which Jesus with merciless mercy unmasked, asserting that her words were literally true. 18. The woman's record of five husbands in the past followed by the state of unlawful concubinage in the present would imply that she had contracted five lawful marriages (beginning probably from her fifteenth year), though we cannot tell for certain. It is possible that she may have been divorced by more than one husband. In any case, she is at present an adulteress. 19 f. In acknowledging Jesus to be a prophet she implicitly admits it, and is already 789f sympathetically meeting the light of truth. She raises the question of the true religion in terms of the rival claims of Garizim and Jerusalem. 21-24. Jesus' answer, introduced by a solemn 'Believe me' and a respectful title of address 'Woman', says that the time of particularist cults and local sanctuaries is nearing its end. For the first time in the Gospel record Jesus calls God 'Father', to be adored as such even by the Samaritans. These, heretofore accepting as inspired only the Pentateuch which they often misinterpreted as well, have adored 'what (they) know not' (i.e. know very imperfectly); but the Jews, being the people destined to give the world Messianic salvation have been progressively enlightened by Prophets and Psalmists and adore what they know. Worship in spirit and in truth is interior worship (not excluding bodily acts and ceremonies) carried out in the light of a full revelation. The hour of that spiritual, Catholic, perfect worship has come, for the Revealer is present. Such worship 'in spirit and truth' is the only worship proportioned to the pure spirituality of God. 25. The woman remarks that clarification on these points must come from the Messias, known by the Samaritans from the Pentateuch and called Tabeh ('the Returned' or 'the Converter'). 26. Thereupon Jesus pronounces the first great 'I am' of Jn. The Christ is sitting beside Jacob's Well and is revealing himself to a Samaritan woman. The One vaguely apprehended as a miracle-worker, 15, acknowledged as a Prophet, 19, is really the promised Messias. Such a revelation could be made in Samaria where Messianism was not contaminated with nationalistic and political aspirations.

790a 27-30. Jewish custom was strict in regard to a man conversing with a woman in public. 27. Hence the surprise of the disciples, who concluded that some necessity had occasioned the conversation, but out of respect for their Master they asked no question. Meanwhile the woman (in a state of excitement, for she leaves the pitcher behind) has gone to the city. 29. Forthwith she becomes an apostle. Either Jesus had told her other things from her past life, or the expression 'all I ever did' is very natural feminine hyperbole. She does not doubt that Jesus is the Messias, but she invites the inhabitants of Sychar to test it for themselves. Her persuasive tone easily moves a people naturally curious and not indisposed to spend an hour on something new.

b 31-42 Results—31-34. The disciples expected Jesus to eat. He had been hungry as well as thirsty but had undergone the well-known psychological experience of hunger vanishing before a deeper desire, that of converting a soul. This is the satisfying food that his disciples did not know. They thought that he had received something to eat. He explained that the doing of his Father's will and the accomplishment of his Father's work was the supreme satisfaction of all his desires—it was 'his food'.

c 35-38. The Father's work, which is Christ's work, is to be also the work of the disciples. It results in the gathering of a spiritual harvest. A remark recently made by the disciples, perhaps at the very moment that they came in view of the Plain of Machneh and the fertile valley between Ebal and Garizim, is taken by Jesus as his introductory sentence; moreover, a sufficient sprinkling of white in the garments of the approaching Samaritans would justify the verb of ocular vision. 35. 'Do not you say', etc.: this remark cited from the mouth of the disciples marks a date—January A.D. 29, four months from the wheat harvest. The suggestion that it is a proverb meaning that 'everything takes time' is not likely, and seems excluded by the assignment of a minimum space of four months between sowing and reaping instead of the ordinary or maximum, namely five or six. Besides, the opposition is between four months hence and this moment; see Bover Bi 3 (1922) 442-4. The golden or yellowing harvest of the British Isles is a white harvest under the Palestine sun. From the harvest already in view and represented by the troop of Samaritans Jesus passes to the reapers. 36-38. Let the apostolic reapers have the joy of their work and of their reward, but let them humbly remember the proverb, 'The sower is not always the one who reaps'. The disciples will reap a harvest which Moses and the Prophets and Jesus himself have sown, as laborious tillers of the soil. This thought, while bringing humility in apostolic success, also brings consolation to those who expend apparently sterile labour in what seems an unpromising apostolic field. Cf. 1 Cor 3:6-9.

39. The first-fruits of the harvest from that city were those who were convinced by the woman's faith in the 'Searcher of hearts'. 40. Contact with the Master excited the charity of hospitality in them. Christ accepted, but as his mission was to the House of Israel, stayed only two days—St Augustine's 'two days on account of the two precepts of charity' is perhaps not exegesis but is worth recording. 41. No miracles are mentioned; but many more converts surrendered to the power of truth in Jesus' words. Genuine faith—better than the weak miracle-produced conviction of those in Jerusalem, 2:23—seems like the supernaturalization of an innate sympathy for truth. 42. Besides the human touch in the remark to the woman, note the oecumenical title given to the Saviour in keeping with that worship which belongs particularly neither to Garizim nor to Jerusalem. 'Saviour of the world' occurs only here, as the fruit of Samaritan lips and under John's own pen, 1 Jn 4:14; but cf. Gen 41:45, where the phrase is used of Joseph. For the pagan use of this title, cf. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, p 369. Philip the Deacon was the next preacher in Samaria, Ac 8:5 ff.

43-45 Return to Galilee—It is only by the unlikely supposition that Jn is tacitly alluding to the hostility of Nazareth, Lk 4:24, that our Lord's saying in this context about a prophet in his own country can be referred to any country except his birthplace Judaea, where the proverb had just been verified. Jesus applied the same proverb later to Nazareth, the place of His boyhood, adolescence and hidden life. 45. The enthusiastic welcome of the Galileans is explained by what pilgrims from there had seen Jesus do in Jerusalem—nearly ten months earlier according to our chronology (or two months ago according to those who date these verses June A.D. 28).

46-54 Cure of Officer's Son—46. In Johannine geography Cana of Galilee is the place where Jesus made the water wine. The name naturally became music to St John the Apostle, the guardian of the Blessed Virgin Mary. The man, whose son was sick at Capharnaum, was not a ruler (βασιλευχος of the group of MSS to which D belongs, represented by Vg regulus) but a royal officer (βασιλευς), an official of Herod Antipas, conjectured by some (with fair plausibility) to be the procurator Chusa, husband of Johanna, Lk 8:3. 47. Hearing of Jesus' arrival from Judaea, it seems that he came expressly from Capharnaum, seven hours' journey on foot, though as a royal official he would ride. He must have pressed Jesus to go down to Capharnaum (1,500 feet of descent) that very day, for the boy was dying. 48. Not only did Jesus use reserve towards faith which was mainly the emotional impression produced by miracles, 2:23 f., but he warned against losing the divine significance of miracles by accepting them as merely useful, 6:26, or as feeding the appetite for wonder. Mere wonder-miracles he never worked, Lk 23:8. Hence Jesus combined 'signs and wonders (prodigies)' in the remark addressed in the plural number to the official and meant for others besides him. His faith was, in any case, far below that of the centurion of Capharnaum, Mt 8:8 f., for he considered that Jesus had to be present to work a miracle. 49. The repeated pleading of the father is respectful and touching, especially when we consider that the best Gk MSS have 'my little boy' instead of 'my son'. 50. Note the brevity of the 790g assurance of Jesus, the fewness of whose words in working miracles (cf. Mt 8:3; Mk 5:41; Lk 7:14; Jn 11:43) reminds us of the Fiat of creation. The text can be taken to imply that the believing father set out on the homeward journey at once, but it would have been more in accord with oriental behaviour for him to have spent the night at Cana and to have begun the descent the following day. 51 f. His servants came up to meet him and reported the cure as having happened yesterday at the seventh hour, between 1 and 2 p.m. 53. The father could thus note the synchronism of the cure at Capharnaum and the words pronounced by Jesus twenty miles away at Cana of Galilee. Not only the official became a believing disciple but his whole household, like the household of Cornelius converted in later days by St Peter at Caesarea and the household of Lydia by St Paul at Philippi. 54. St John, with the obvious intention of supplementing the synoptic gospels, here emphasizes two journeys of Jesus from Judaea into Galilee since the events of the Jordan—each arrival being marked by a miracle, one worked at Cana, the other from Cana.

791a V 1-47 A Feast at Jerusalem—Geographical and also exegetical reasons have led many to suspect that the original order of Jn was chh 4, 6, 5, 7, on which see § 781*k, l*. Ch 5 shows the opposition of the Jews definitely marshalled—that is, the leaders of the nation at Jerusalem, especially Pharisees. If the time is a Paschal festival, we have the striking sequence that similar opposition asserts itself vigorously in Galilee a little later, and on the same sabbatarian grounds, Mk 2:23 ff.; Lk 6:1 ff.; Mt 12:1 ff. In Jn, however, which concentrates on the opposition at Jerusalem, the charge against Jesus, though connected with an alleged case of Sabbath-breaking, soon centres on his claim to equality with God—the real reason for their compassing his death.

b 1-9 Miracle at the Pool of Bezatha—1. In writing 'a festival of the Jews' the Rheims translators assumed the non-authenticity of the Gk definite article before 'festival'. Certainly MSS and versions, numbered and weighed, leave a strong critical doubt. Editors generally vote for the omission of the article, but in this case we here meet the sole instance of Jn speaking vaguely of a festival and the sole instance in his Gospel of the absence of the article before this particular word. The reading has a bearing but not a necessary bearing on chronological calculation. Without prejudice to the very respectable probability of a public evangelical ministry of only two years and some months, we follow the system suggested by our interpretation of 4:35, and give preference to a ministry of three full years and four Paschs of which this festival would be the 2nd. Of those who transpose ch 5 some hold the festival of 5:1 to be the Pasch mentioned as near in 6:4 (Joüon, Braun, Sutcliffe), others hold for Pentecost (Lagrange), while other supporters of a two-year ministry make it a lesser feast—that of Trumpets (Durand) or Purim (Prat). However unlikely it might seem, we cannot, of course, say a priori that Jesus would not have gone up to Jerusalem for what was New Year's Day or even for the very much secularized feast of Purim or 'Lots'. [If Purim be the feast in question, then a two-year Ministry is likely. —Gen. Ed.] 2. The original Rheims version adhered over-literally to the pre-Clementine designation of the Pool, translating 'upon Probatic'. Neither should it be translated 'a Pool (called) Probatic', as the present Vg text has it, but a swimming pond (κολυμβήθρα) near 'the sheep-gate', that is, at the NE. corner of the Temple Area. The place-name is probably Bezatha (S, Bethzatha), meaning ' (Quarter of) the (Rock) Cutting' rather than Bethsaida (B, W, Vg) or Bethesda (A) which last some have favoured with perhaps not sufficient critical detachment from its beautiful symbolic meaning: 'House of mercy'. Excavations made less than 40 yards NW. of the Crusaders' Church of St Anne have brought to light 791c this nataloria, a great oblong with four lateral porches and a fifth central dividing porch. 3b. Here the sick lay 'waiting for the moving of the water'. Critically the participial phrase is very doubtful, being absent from S, B, C, L, A and the doubt is even greater for 4. The Decree of Trent (Sess. iv) does not forbid us to regard the words as a gloss, since the form of 4 varies very much even in the Vg MSS. Neither does the Church in her Liturgy intend to decide the question, when she assigns Jn 5:1-4 to the feast of the Archangel, St Raphael, precisely on account of this 4th verse. [Since v 7 refers to a moving of the water it would seem that a glossator felt it necessary to insert this explanation of the phenomenon.—Gen. Ed.] 5. Every priest knows St Augustine's ingenious d tropological accommodation of the 38 years of infirmity, according to which perfection symbolized by the number 40, when diminished by 2 symbolizing the two precepts of charity, becomes imperfection and infirmity—it should not, however, be presented as exegesis! 6. In reply to Jesus' question the man expressed his desire to be cured, especially because his malady was connected with personal sin, 14b. 7. The man, who seems to have been a paralytic, was powerless to reach the source of health without a helper. 8. The thaumaturgical words of Jesus are like those spoken to the paralytic of Capharnaum, Mt 9:2*f.* Krabbatos (Lat. grabatus) is a Macedonian word denoting a rudimentary bed, generally a simple mat. 9. The cure was immediate.

10-16 Sabbatarian Grievance—10. There are more e than twenty, perhaps as many as forty, sabbatarian carrying prohibitions in the Mishnaic treatise Shabbath, the carrying of an empty bier or bed being included by implication—in fact, carrying any material burden in the usual way was regarded as forbidden. 11. The logic of the restored man's answer is that a miracle-worker will be ready to answer for himself. 12. The Jews ignore the miracle and concentrate on the violation of the Sabbath. 13. As Jesus had withdrawn, before a demonstration should take place in such a crowded spot (cf. Mt 12:16-21), the man did not know who had healed him. 14. The good spiritual effect of the miracle is probably to be recognized in the man's visit to the temple. The warning given by Jesus shows that in this case there was personal sin behind the infirmity. It is not always so, 9:1-3, and here we cannot say whether sin was the direct physical cause of the malady or the moral cause of such a particular form of penal retribution (cf. 1 Cor 11:30). 15. The man's report to the Jews was not a denunciation but a solemn attestation of the identity of his benefactor.

16. [Both verbs are in the imperfect tense in Gk, and could signify: 'Therefore the Jews began to persecute Jesus because he began to do these things on the sabbath'. Jn would then be noting the first employment of a new technique of persecution subsequently used with effect in Galilee.—Gen. Ed.] The Jewish persecution on account of this cure evidently took the form of a direct reproach.

17-30 Claim to Divine Sonship—17. Jesus' answer, 792a in which he claims identity of activity with his Father, is the key to 19-30. It reads: 'My Father is working (even) till now, and I (too) am working'. 18. As St Augustine acutely remarked: The Jews understood what the Arians did not understand. The Arians denied the equality of the Son with the Father, which those blind Jews, those murderers of Christ understood from the words of Christ himself. 19-30. The subject of these difficult verses is not the Word simply but the Incarnate in his consubstantial oneness with the Father and his authority towards men as the giver of divine life and the judge of those who refuse to believe. There is unity of activity between the Father and the Son and also co-equality of dignity and honour. The Son (and he Incarnate) works miracles and gives life, because his Father works (through the 792a one divine nature) the identical works; it is likewise the Son Incarnate who judges the living and the dead, and precisely because he is man he does so by the final visible judgement which permanently fixes men's voluntary attitude towards him. It is well to keep the concrete circumstances of the discourse in mind, for all the deep theology which this short passage yields is not the immediate object of exegesis, which simply explains the text.

- b 19. When Jesus implied that his action in curing the man was no more Sabbath-breaking than the incessant action of God in the world, the Jews rightly inferred that he made himself equal to God. Jesus does not deny this, but affirms it more strongly. The equality is ineffably real, because it means oneness of action. Jesus is evidently speaking of divine works such as the miracle just wrought. Action depends on knowledge, and there is a perfect communion of knowledge between the Father and the Son, so that the Son cannot do anything except what he 'consubstantially' sees the Father doing. 'To see', says St Thomas, 'is to receive the divine knowledge'; St Augustine had already said that both to hear from the Father and to see was to be from the Father, Deus ex Deo. Following a suggestion of St Cyril of Alexandria we might crystallize the thought in Greek terminology by saying that the homognosis from which the common action comes is really homoousia. There is no divine work that the Son does not do together with the Father, and not merely after the manner that human brain and hand work together in writing, doing the same thing but differently. The Son does every work 'in like manner', that is equally. There is no question of the Son just imitating the Father. 20. The metaphor of 'showing' on the part of the Father corresponds to the metaphor of 'seeing' on the part of the Son, and, as St Thomas points out, the love of the Father for the Son is rather the sign than the cause of this community of knowledge and operation. Greater and more astonishing works of divine power are yet to come from the Word Incarnate. 21. Jesus turns to the idea of life—by which, with St Augustine, we understand supernatural life, which is primarily the life of the soul but also includes the resurrection of the body on the last day. Consequently, the dead whom the Father raises and makes to live are sinners. Of these the Son is equally the free Resuscitator and Vivificator. 22. When it is said that the Father does not judge any man, but has given all judgement to the Son, it seems that, in accordance with the constant signification of kplous in Jn, we must understand not a judgement of discussion but of condemnation, viz. exclusion from eternal life. 23. This communication from Father to Son demands that all men give the Son co-equal honour. In fact, refusal to honour the Son is refusal to honour the Father who sent him. 24. Acceptance of the word of Jesus and belief in his divine mission infallibly gives eternal life (i.e. grace destined to be consummated in glory). The true believer does not incur damnation, but by the act of belief (informed by charity) has definitely passed from the death of sin to the life of supernatural grace. 25. The world is an immense necropolis, but the hour is coming, yea rather now is, when those spiritually dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God calling them to life, and those who hear with the virtue of faith shall have life. 26. The Son's power of giving life comes from his having it. To have life in himself essentially, not participatively, is his prerogative as much as it is the prerogative of the Father. 27. Moreover, the Father has given him power to exercise judgement, for the visible giver of life (Son of Man) must visibly exclude the unworthy. 28 f. This visible function at the termination of human history evokes the thought of the general resurrection. To remember that he is the One who shall call all men from their tombs to different destinies according to their works will make what he has said appear less amazing. It is quite clear in this statement that not faith alone but works rooted in faith shall decide 792d the resurrection of men to life rather than to the judgement of condemnation reserved for those who have done evil things. 30. Using the first person and a device of speech known as inclusion, Jesus applies the word of his exordium, 19, to his office of judge. In this as in other divine works he can do nothing from himself. Note that while he used the verb 'to see' when speaking of himself as operator, he uses the verb 'to hear' when speaking of himself as judge, but when there is question of a condemnation which, as involving executive authority, is particularly a decree of the will, the justice of it is referred to the conformity of Christ's human will with the divine will. Let us remark in conclusion that no one may say that he has understood these 12 verses perfectly, for they are full of the mystery of the Incarnation.

31-47 Jewish Incredulity—All this is both believable and to be believed, and the Jews have ample testimony of it. This Jesus proceeds to show, appealing by condescension to the testimony of the Precursor, 33-35, but chiefly to the testimony of the Father, 32, given in the works that Jesus does, 36-38, and given also in the Scriptures, 39 f., 45-47. He shows at the same time that the cause of the Jews' infidelity was their self-seeking vanity, 41-44.

31. Jesus could and did, 8:14, testify to himself, but here he makes a concession to the legal axiom that no one is to be believed when testifying in his own favour. 32. The true testimony that Jesus can evoke is that of his Father, although he does not yet clearly say so. 33. Meanwhile, ad abundantiam iuris, he refers to the recent and true testimony of one commonly regarded as a Prophet, recalling the declaration made by the Precursor to the solemn delegation sent from Jerusalem. Quite evidently John declared the truth. 34. Not that Jesus needs human testimony, but he will use the impressiveness of John's emphatic words to help the Jews to salvation. 35. Unfortunately they have behaved like children. Before that burning and shining lamp (not yet, it seems, extinguished but hidden behind the walls of Machaerus) they were delighted for a time, but soon turned away on the facile pretext that John was a demoniac, Lk 7:33. 36. His divine works are the greater testimony to which Jesus can appeal. Of the two exceedingly difficult verses, 37, 38, which follow, the best interpretation seems to be that which supposes an allusion to Deut 18:15-19. It is substantially this: The Father has left testimony (whom your fathers at Sinai asked neither to see nor hear any more save through Moses); and what is more, the word of God you have not abiding in you, because you do not believe the Prophet, Deut 18:15, whom he has sent. From this Jesus passes to the testimony of the Scriptures. 39 f. The absence of any other exhortatory imperative and the implied contradiction between seeking life in the Scriptures and rejecting the Giver of life, seem to commend the indicative: 'You search' rather than the imperative 'Search'. In writings that contain the words of life and show the Messias the Jews seek what suits their own ideas and consequently they do not come to Jesus, in order to have life. 41 f. Jesus says this, not because he seeks glory from their coming to him, but because he knows that it is through want of genuine love of God that they have gone astray in their quest. 43. The Envoy of God they will not accept, but a pretender they are always ready to receive—a truth only too well demonstrated in the later history of Judaism, which, it is said, records 64 false Messias, 25 of whom are known by name. 44. The real obstacle is what we should call hypocritical respectability—the fundamentally wrong disposition called human respect. The seekers of self and human praise are far from faith, access to which is in the humble desire to please God alone. 45-47. The accuser of the Jews shall not be Jesus but Moses in whom they have set their hope, but whom notwithstanding they refuse to believe. If they believed Moses, they would believe the Christ of whom Moses wrote, when he recorded 792g the words on the Seed of the woman, Gen 3:15, the blessing of Abraham, 12:3, the heir of the sceptre of Juda, 49:10, the Star arising out of Jacob, Num 24:17, the great Prophet, Deut 18:15. How can disciples of Moses, 9:28, who pride themselves on their knowledge of the written word, 7:49, and yet do not really believe it, have faith in the mere spoken words of Jesus? Let us remember that Jewish Scribes and Pharisees were worshippers of the letter, 2 Cor 3.

793a VI 1-72 The Bread of Life—The time interval between chh 5 and 6, according to the chronological system here adopted, is almost a full year [but only two months if Purim is the 'feast' of ch 5.—Gen. Ed.], which may be filled up by a synoptic harmony based on Mk 2:23-6:29. This episode—the longest Galilean piece in Jn—includes (1) the two miracles of the first multiplication of bread, 1-15, and of Christ walking on the water, 16-21, (2) the Eucharistic discourse at Capharnaum, 26-59-60, with an introductory prologue giving a composition of circumstances, 22-25, and an epilogue showing 'the discernment of spirits' on the theme of the Bread of Life, 60-61-71-72. The miracles that precede the Promise prepare the way for belief in it, for he who fed more than 5,000 miraculously can feed the world eucharistically, and he who walked on water as on solid ground can command and suspend other conditions of matter, in order to be sacramentally present to feed the souls of men.

b 1-13 First Multiplication of Bread—The miracle is the only one narrated by all four evangelists, the most vividly picturesque description being that of Mk, to which however Jn adds some precise details, such as the question addressed to Philip individually and the discovery made by Andrew.

1-4. Jn's opening indication of time denotes only sequence, without any chronological precision. What direction the journey across the Lake took is not stated but, unless the context decided otherwise, it should be as obvious as trans Tiberim was to a Roman. The crossing was from the western shore, on the northern curve of which stood Capharnaum, the missionary city of Jesus, to the eastern side dominated on the north by Bethsaida Julias. The Sea of Galilee, also called the Lake of Genesareth, Lk 5:1, is named by Jn only (cf. 21:1) from the city built on its western shore by Herod Antipas, between A.D. 26 and 28, and named Tiberias after the reigning Emperor. This name of the Lake had established itself when Jn was written. The occasion of the journey is gathered from the Synoptists. Mt 14:12 f. connects it with the Precursor's murder, and thus it may be interpreted as a temporary withdrawal from the murderer's territory to that of Herod Philip. Mk and Lk 9:10 date it after the return of the Apostles from a mission; and the former specifies that the Master wanted to give the Twelve a rest from the exhausting work that followed their return, Mk 6:31. 2. Popular enthusiasm had been running very high; and while Herod imagined that the Miracle-worker of Galilee was John returned to life, others were ready to regard him as Elias or the Prophet, Deut 18:15. The miracles worked on the sick made the crowds (augmented by Paschal pilgrims) observe the departure of Jesus and also urged them to follow him. They flocked to the same destination on foot, Mk 6:33. 3. The mountain on which Jesus sat with his disciples looked out on the Plain now called El Bateha. There is an indefinable solemnity in this simple session. 4. The proximity of the Passover is doubtless marked for a special reason. Twelve months hence the festival of the Jews will give place to 'the new Pasch of the new Law'.

d 5-9 5. Till the afternoon, Lk, and the approach of evening, Mt, Mk, Jesus taught the crowds, Mk, Lk, and healed their sick, Lk. Mk notes his pity for their abandonment and his care for their hunger, which latter Jn epitomizes in the gesture of Jesus surveying the crowd with his eyes and in his question to Philip on the possibility of buying bread to feed them. A dismissal of the crowd, who could scatter and find food in the surrounding villages had already been suggested by the Apostles. 6. The question addressed to Philip was a test put to one who seems to have been a business man. Jesus himself knew what he would do. 7. The contemporary local price of bread is unknown to us, but Philip estimated that the wages of a labourer working six days a week for eight months would not suffice to procure a little for each of the many gathered there. 8 f. Andrew, who like Philip was from Bethsaida, found a boy with five barley loaves (the food of the poor) and two little fishes salted perhaps at Taricheae, the 'Salt Fish City', at the SW. corner of the Lake. As three of those small flat Palestinian loaves were required to give one man a fairly abundant meal, Lk 11:5, the supply discovered would have made a picnic for only two or three, or at most five persons. Hence Andrew's question: What are these among so many?

10-13 10. Mt, Mk and Jn note the grassy verdure of the place where the 'Lord prepared a table in the wilderness'. The grass also marks the springtime. Five thousand men, as well as women and children (not estimated but presumably in inferior numbers) sat down or reclined in companies of 50 or 100, Mk 6:40. Mk's description is exquisitely graphic. They looked like flower-beds on the green. 11. Jesus took the loaves. Jn does not note the gesture of looking to heaven, which owing to the analogy of the situations has passed from Mt, Mk, Lk to the Qui pridie narrative in the Latin Mass, but Jn does use εὐχαριστήσας instead of the εὐλογήσας of the synoptists. This verb deliberately repeated in 23 should be regarded as a distinct allusion to the Eucharistic significance of the miracle. The distribution was made by the Apostles, Mt, Mk, Lk, the bread being multiplied either antecedently, or when passing from the hands of Jesus, or (most probably) in the hands of the Apostles. From the loaves and likewise from the fishes each received not the 'little bit' envisaged by Philip but a full meal. 12. The gathering up of the fragments was an act of reverential economy towards the gift of God. 13. The place of the Twelve is put in evidence by the 12 baskets—Jewish travelling baskets were almost proverbial (Juvenal, Sat. III, 15; Martial, Epig. V, 17). Let us take St Augustine's advice and not merely look at the outside of the miracle, like a man who admires calligraphy which he cannot read. Mental comprehension, not mere ocular or imaginative apprehension, should be our endeavour, when we read this miracle on Laelare Sunday. The same Word, 'by whom are all things', feeds the world from a few grains of corn, and the same also multiplies himself Incarnate on thousands of altars.

14-15 Effect of the Miracle—14. Though the scribes distinguished, the crowds often identified the Prophet of Deut 18:15 with the Messiah. The recent death of the Baptist, the growing fame of Jesus, the national fervour of the time shortly before the Pasch worked together with the miracle to precipitate a popular conclusion. In identifying Jesus with the Prophet the crowds also echo the great festal Psalm: 'Blessed is he that cometh', etc. 15. The rising ferment that would have seized Jesus and set him on the throne of David could have been known by our Lord in an ordinary human way, as Jn's aorist participle suggests. He fled again into the mountain himself alone. No doubt his prayer was like that of the night before he chose the Apostles, Lk 6:12, for the great Eucharistic crisis was at hand.

16-21 Christ walks on the Water—16. The embarkation of the Apostles, as darkness was setting in, was not spontaneous. Jesus, wishing to prevent the contagion of popular Messianism from catching them, compelled them to depart, Mk, Mt. 17. The journey to Capharnaum was only some 4 miles almost due west, but Mk indicates, 6:45, that they first turned north-west towards Bethsaida (then much nearer the shore of the Lake than the modern Et-Tell which occupies its site). Some scholars hold without sufficient grounds that there were two Bethsaiidas, an eastern and a western. Supposing only one, the Apostles would have expected Jesus to join them there. When he did not do so, they would have turned the boat towards Capharnaum. 18. The adverse wind which stirred the sea against them as they rowed was evidently a north-westerly, strong but not tempestuous. 19. As the stadion is nearly an English furlong, they had only proceeded between three and four miles at the fourth watch, i.e. about 3 a.m., Mt, Lk. Then Jesus appeared walking on the water, drawing near the boat, Jn, but moving as if to pass it by, Mk 6:48. 20. He revealed himself. 'It is I; be not afraid' is given by Mt, Mk and Jn. Mt alone records the incident of St Peter and the growing perception of divine sonship. 'Truly thou art the Son of God'. Jn had no need of recording these, but certainly they prepared St Peter for the magnificent act of steadfast faith that was to come, Jn 6:69 f. 21. As the verb translated: 'they were willing', is one of desire fulfilled, it means that the Apostles did actually take Jesus into the boat, Mt, Mk. The wind ceased, Mt, Mk, but we cannot say with certainty whether Jn indicates a further miracle (one of velocity) when he tells that 'immediately' the boat reached land. The landing-point broadly indicated by Mt and Mk as being at Genesaret may have been as far south as Dalmanutha (some place north of Magdala). This and the miracles demanded by local people would explain how Jesus reached Capharnaum only in the evening, when the Sabbath had begun.

794a 22-25 Narrative Introduction to Eucharistic Discourse

—22. Jn describes the situation on the east coast next day. The crowd that still remained, having bivouacked at El-Batcha, knew that the only boat had left the evening before, and Jesus had not gone in it. 23. In the course of the morning other boats from Tiberias came near where the miracle preceded by 'the Lord's thanksgiving' (eucharist) had taken place. 24. As Jesus had not appeared and was nowhere to be found, as many as could made the westward journey to Capharnaum on the available boats, seeking Jesus. 25. They found him. Jn does not say when or where, but clearly that same day, and probably in the evening, at the synagogue of Capharnaum, 59-60. In asking when Jesus had come they certainly also wanted to know how he had come.

b 26-60 The Eucharistic Discourse—The numbering of verses is according to Vg. It is sufficient to note here once for all that 51 of Gk text makes 51, 52 of Vg and DV, and so the latter's 52-72 correspond to 51-71 in Gk test. The Eucharistic character of this discourse is supported by cogent arguments and can claim patristic favour dating most probably from Ignatius of Antioch. Justin and especially Irenaeus can also be cited. The Antiochene Chrysostom, St Gregory of Nyssa, the two Cyrils of Jerusalem and Alexandria not only stand for the Eucharistic interpretation but are pronounced 'realists'. Not merely on account of the allegorism of Origen but for other reasons also, the metaphorical interpretation (eating Christ by faith), which amounts to 'spiritual communion', has had its vogue in the Church. Though St Augustine can be shown to have understood the discourse eucharistically, later theologians failed to understand sacramental realism owing to his strong emphasis of two points, namely, (a) that we must eschew anything like Capharnaite carnalism, and (b) that we must look for the fruits described in Jn 6:26-58 in the ecclesiastical unity of the mystic body of Christ; cf. de Lubac, Corpus Mysticum, 296. c The second emphasis was undoubtedly due to his anti-Donatist preoccupations. His treatment of the matter greatly influenced the Latin Middle Age; and, moreover, 14th and 15th cent. polemics against Greeks giving the Eucharist to infants and against Bohemian ultraquists strengthened the 'spiritual' interpretation. In 1551 (Oct. 11) the Council of Trent used 6:58 as a Eucharistic text, but, in view of a controversy that took place and continued during the Council, Session XXI (16 July 1562) expressly left the rival interpretations of Jn 6 untouched. Today, however, Catholic unanimity on the Eucharistic interpretation of 6:51-59 is almost absolute, and very few non-catholic interpreters now deny it. It is another case of a tradition being obscured and reasserting itself. If the discourse is not a Promise of the Eucharist, the silence of John the Beloved on the Sacrament of love would be a positive enigma; the bread of the future to be given not by the Father but by the Son of Man, 27, the clear impression made on the crowds and the disciples, the strongly emphatic comparison with manna, the insistence d outrance on Flesh and Blood as food and drink—very food and very drink—all these things in the non-eucharistic hypothesis would be unintelligible.

Some commentators have held that 26-58 are two or three discourses united together, and Westcott finds not only distinct themes but also distinct audiences at 26 (crowds), 41 (Jews) and 51 (where the words begin which scandalize disciples). A close examination will, however, show that our Lord from 27 and therefore from the beginning intends to promise the Eucharist. Subsequently his words have the unity of a discourse which is partly a dialogue. Having introduced the subject of a spiritual bread, 27, he identifies it with himself, the One come down from heaven, 35, who can satisfy hunger and thirst, but in believers only. Here unbelief asserts itself in whispered murmuring, and the unbelievers are called by the name 'Jews', which Jn habitually uses for the hostile party. Having explained the necessity of faith, 44-47, Jesus resumes the 'manna' comparison (32 parallel to 49), and by using the verb 'to eat' for the first time shows that 48-59 have reference to a food really or physically eaten. There is gradation of parts, not splicing of pieces.

26-34 Material Bread and the Bread of Life—This piece of dialogue marks the great distinction between the bread of physical sustenance (whether it be that of El-Batcha or the manna of the wilderness) and the Bread that nourishes eternal life. 26. Jesus does not answer a merely curious question, but touches at once the great fundamental fault in the enthusiasm that surrounds him. In the bread of El-Batcha they only saw the temporal blessing of good food, not the spiritual meaning of the miracle. 27. With the same method as that used at the Samaritan Well, Jesus tells them to labour for, that is, to strive to acquire another food, not a perishable food but a food having usefulness for life everlasting. The Son of Man will give this food, empowered as he is to do so by the seal or mark of authentication and approval which the Father—namely God himself—has set upon him. 28. The crowd like true Mosaists interpret the verb 'labour' or 'work' of many works commanded by God. 29. Jesus tells them that the one basic work which God requires of them is belief in himself whom God has sent. 30 f. The Samaritan woman had said: 'Art thou greater than Jacob?'—here also the crowd understand that Jesus claims to be greater than Moses, and they demand a miracle greater than the manna that fed the children of Israel in the desert for forty years. They quote in free form Ps 77(78):24 characterizing the manna as bread from heaven. 33. Again Jesus follows the same line of thought as at the Well of Samaria. Bread from heaven! Yes, but not the bread from the very heaven of God. Moses did not give that bread but the Father (now) is giving the bread from heaven, that is truly such, or really worthy of the name. 33. The giving is the Incarnation which is for the life not of one people but of the whole world—the life being supernatural life. 34. The reaction of the crowds hearing of this Bread of God . . . coming down from heaven is just like that of the Samaritan woman: 'Sir, give us always this bread'. 35-40 Jesus the Bread of Life for those who believe f —Here there is a difference, but the parallelism is not g 41-47 Necessity and Nature of Faith—41 f. Descent from heaven, so emphatically asserted, clearly meant divine origin. Hence the murmur of a hostile group called 'Jews' when such a claim was made by one whom probably they usually called Jesus Bar Joseph (cf. 1:45) and who is elsewhere referred to as 'the carpenter, the son of Mary', Mk 6:3. 43 f. The murmur reveals unbelief and rejection of the gift of God. Faith is again spoken of as an act of 'coming' and the cause of this salutary motion is the Father drawing. Faith works as a divine attraction but not a compulsion destroying human liberty. St Augustine's famous comment, which may be read in Tr. 26 in Joannem or in the Breviary (Feria IV infr. Oct. Pent.) is a most beautiful passage. Whosoever is thus efficaciously attracted, Jesus will raise him up on the last day. 44. Faith is due to the interior action of God mentioned by the Prophets, notably Is 54:13 and Jer 31:33 f. It is this interior hearing and learning from the Father that brings a soul to Jesus. Hearing is perception and learning reception, but neither implies immediate vision of the Father. 46. This belongs exclusively to him who is from God. He has seen the Father. 47. Solemnly concluding this part, Jesus says: 'Amen, amen, I say to you: He that believeth (in me) hath everlasting life'.

794f entirely broken. The first great 'I am' came later in the conversation with the Samaritan. At this point Jesus pronounces at once his second great 'I am': 'I am the bread of life'. In Samaria he touched a moral impediment in the life of the woman; here at Capernaum, the hindrance is a lack of faith. The act of coming to Jesus which attains the satisfaction of hunger is the same as the faith which remedies thirst for ever. 36. Jesus states the tragic fact that the crowds have seen him and still see him (perfect) and yet do not believe. 37. The fault is theirs not his, but Jesus explains the situation in terms of what we now call efficacious grace. They come who are given to him by the Father and Jesus cannot but welcome all that the Father gives. The use of a global neuter certainly insinuates that the faithful come to Christ in the social unity of a body. 38. It is towards this body that Jesus must carry out the salvific will of his father, which is the programme of his life. 39. That programme or will of his Father is described as Jesus' task, namely, to lose nothing of the 'entrusted all', but to save completely even to the resurrection on the last day. 40. Human liberty, which has not been expressly envisaged in this 'giving' by the Father, is clearly indicated when the salvific will is declared to be this: 'That every one (individually) who seeth the Son and believeth in him may have life everlasting and I will raise him up in the last day'. Belief is a free act. Jesus' work is to save and resurrect; faith leads to eternal life and final resurrection. The language of these verses is remarkable. The Father gives us socially—for we are saved socially—to his Christ, but we come individually. It belongs to Christ the Envoy to lose nothing of what the Sender gives him (cf. 17:12) but to save completely. On our part we have to believe individually in the Son, in order to have the life everlasting and glorious resurrection which the Father wills for us.

795a 48-60 The Bread of Life is the Flesh of Jesus—What has preceded has been on the mystery of the Incarnation, but now he promises the institution of the Blessed Sacrament. So far Jesus has not used the verb to eat, although he has spoken of hunger and thirst satisfied by the Bread of life. His hearers only have spoken of the manna eaten by the fathers in the wilderness, 31. This reference to the Mosaic miracle he now takes up and sets the promise of the Eucharist, in a form which is really the starkest realism, over against the manna. 48. He repeats: 'I am the bread of life'. 49 f. Those who ate the manna as a physical food died. b 50-52. This bread from heaven is one that man may eat and not die. The spiritual life which the food confers is eternal, and will not cease because of any limited efficacy in the food. It can only cease through spiritual suicide. He who eats this bread of life has spiritually that posse non mori conferred by the fruit of the tree of life. This is said negatively, but in the next verse the bread of life is emphatically called living bread, and the effect of eating it is declared to be that the participant shall live for ever. To this is added the startling assertion: 'The bread that I will give is my flesh for the life of the world'. This is the future giving by the Son of Man for which 27 has prepared us. It is not immediately the Father's gift as the Son Incarnate is in 32. The Bread is given to be eaten, but it is identified with the flesh of Jesus—his human body—given for the life of the whole world of mankind. The sacrificial character of the phrase seems almost certain and has been admitted even by non-catholic scholars. For centuries the old textus receptus made this sacrificial sense unmistakable by inserting the phrase 'which I will give' after flesh and defining not bread but flesh (cf. Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:24).

53. Not merely a murmur but the articulate sound of controversy and dissent made itself heard amongst the Jews, but Jesus only becomes more emphatic, and, if we may say so, more shocking to Jewish feeling. The expressions only grow in solemnity and explicitness and realism. 54. To the eating of flesh, as a condition of life, is added the drinking of blood, which might have been conceived as positively horrible in view of the Noachic, Gen 9:4, and Levitical blood-prohibitions, Lev 7:26; 17:14. 55. The negative assertion of 54 is now emphasized by a positive pronouncement which sums up the whole strength of the discourse: 'He that eateth My flesh, and drinketh My blood, hath everlasting life: and I will raise him up on the last day'—here eternal life and resurrection are both mentioned for the third time. No better comment could be sought than the words of Ignatius of Antioch who wrote some ten years after St John. He called the Eucharist: 'the medicine of immortality, an antidote that we should not die, but live for ever in Christ Jesus', Eph 20.

56. The word for eating used in 55, namely τρώγω, d is even more surprisingly physical than before. Though it cannot be translated by the crude words 'munch' or 'crunch', it really has some of their realistic strength. Jesus therefore says: 'My flesh is true food, and my blood is true drink'. True or very represent the best attested Gk reading preferable to truly or indeed. 57. The effect of eating Christ's flesh and drinking his blood is mutual vital immanence by the mixing of vital give and take. It is the sacrament of fellowship in the divine nature and of actual charity. St Cyril of Alexandria's illustration from two pieces of wax melted together is classical, and St Thérèse of Lisieux gave us a living commentary on this verse when she described her first communion not as a meeting with Jesus but a fusion. 58. It seems that it is the flow of life from Christ in the proportional analogy of the communication of life from Father to Son that is guaranteed in the words: 'he who eats me shall also live by me', although the translation for me is possible and is modelled on Jesus' fidelity as an ambassador of God.

59. The discourse ends in a repetition (figure called 'inclusion') of the comparison with manna: 'This is the bread that came down from heaven. Not as (your) fathers did eat manna and died. He that eateth (τρώγων) for the fourth time—cf. Gk text 54, 56, 57 = Vg 55, 57, 58) this bread shall live for ever'.

A supplementary word must be said on the necessity of the Eucharist as enunciated in the nisi pronouncement addressed directly to the sceptical Jews in 54. That necessity is absolute, in the sense that without the 'thing' or grace of the Eucharist there is no salvation, for the Eucharist signifies, effects, and perfects the unity of Christ's mystic body, outside of which no one can be saved. Total deliberate refusal to eat the flesh of Christ would exclude from super-

795e natural life and entail damnation. But the grace of union can be obtained by desire—personal desire, in the case of adults, and the maternal desire of the Church in the case of baptized infants. For infants the sacrament of faith, which is baptism, is necessary in every way, since the actual sacrament is for them, who cannot yet have desire, the only gate to salvation, but the Church incorporating them baptismally thereby desires the Eucharist for them, and, if we may use figurative language, the baptized infant immediately opens his little mouth for the Bread of life—in other words, the recipient of the sacrament of faith is already hungry for the sacrament of charity, which is the Eucharist. The Church has never regarded sacramental communion as necessary for infants; yet the Council of Trent (Sess. 21) did not condemn ‘antiquity’ for giving the Eucharist to infants, the custom being local and justified by some circumstances of the times, under the approval of holy bishops. The same Session of Trent also declared that no argument to establish a general precept of communion in both kinds can be drawn from this chapter ‘however it be understood according to the various interpretations of holy Fathers and Doctors’

f 60. ‘These things (Jesus) said, teaching in the synagogue in Capharnaum’. Codex D as well as Aug and several codices of Vg add ‘on a Sabbath’. Most probably the Eucharistic Promise was made in a Sabbath discourse, delivered on Friday evening or Saturday morning. If so, the multiplication of bread took place on Thursday—another link with the Eucharistic institution. The place was probably the synagogue built by the centurion, Lk 7:5, whose words of humility we use before Holy Communion. The ruins of a synagogue of later date, built possibly on the same site, now stand splendidly restored at Tell Hum. A lintel of the edifice represents a pot of manna surrounded by vine-leaves and grapes. Surely a providential reminder from Jewish hands!

g 61-67 Effect on Disciples—The Jews, who had never believed, doubtless remained in their unbelief. The discourse proved a test for the faith of certain disciples. 61. Interpreting our Lord’s words like Capharnaïtes—a name coined by exegetes for those who misunderstand through materialistic or even a cannibalistic imagining—many of his disciples declared the promise hard, that is, offensive and unbearable. 62. Their comments were only whispered, but Jesus knew in himself what they were, and said: ‘Is this a stumbling-block to you?’ 63. He knows the scandal caused by his words, but he neither revokes nor dilutes anything of what he has said. The elliptic question: ‘If then you see the Son of Man ascending where he was before . . .?’ is intended, not as Maldonatus thought, to increase the scandal, but to rectify what was simply a cannibalistic interpretation. The ascension will perhaps surprise the recalcitrants more, but it will eliminate their chief difficulty about eating the flesh of One who in celestial glory takes his place where he was from eternity. 64. The words which follow are variously understood. St Cyril of Alexandria, one of the greatest of all expositors of this chapter, has rallied many. He equates ‘the spirit that quickeneth’ with the divinity of Christ, and ‘the flesh that profiteth nothing’ with the mere human nature of Christ. It is, however, an interpretation which a rigorous application of the law of context would seem to exclude. Taken with what goes before and comes after, the words rather refer to the unspiritual, carnal-minded disciples. It is the spiritual view given by faith which gives life; carnal understanding is profitless. The words spoken by Jesus are the object of spiritual understanding, and in this way only are life-giving; cf. 8:15. 65. Hence Jesus shows his knowledge of their unbelieving minds, a thing he knew from the beginning as he also knew the one who was to betray him. 66. That, he explained, was the reason why he had insisted that no man can come to him unless it be given to him from the Father. In humility of Spirit we may recall the words of St Augustine: 795h Nondum traheris? Ora ut traheris. Pray that the Father may draw you to his Son. 67. Here another tragic word of the Evangelist sounds over the first schism. The Eucharistic bond of unity divided many disciples from Jesus. ‘They walked no more with him’. The fault was not in Jesus; it is not in the Bread of life. So it happened also in the 16th cent.

68-72. Attitude of the Twelve—God will not compel i human freedom. Free choice must rule the life of man. In that day of defections the test question is put to the Twelve, 68, ‘Will you also go away?’ 69. We must be perpetually devoted to Simon Peter for the magnificence of his answer: ‘Go away, to whom?’ Jesus could do without them, but they cannot do without him who has the words of eternal life—words that lead to everlasting life and give it. 70. Peter’s profession of faith is certainly less full of heavenly inspiration than that made later near Caesarea Philippi, but scarcely less full of human emotion: ‘We have believed (faith comes first) and we have known (intelligence follows belief) that thou art the Christ, the Holy One of God’. Copyists conformed the last phrase to the confession of Caesarea Philippi, but the better MSS are decisive. 71. Peter spoke for the Twelve, but Jesus announced that of the Twelve whom he had chosen one was a devil. It was a lesson of fear and humility for the whole company, who did not then know who the secret apostate was. 72. St John names him here, interpreting the word of Jesus in the light of events. He was the only Judaean in the apostolic college: Judas, the son of a certain Simon of Qerioth, a place which is, perhaps, to be identified with Carioth Hesron, Jos 15:25, the modern Khirbet-el-Qureitein, 13 m. S. of Hebron.

VII-XII THE PUBLIC MINISTRY, PART II

In the Fourth Gospel, which is the history of light and darkness engaged in a tremendous duel, chh 7-12 form a distinct block. They tell of the supreme combat which Jesus joined with the hostile leaders of his nation at Jerusalem in revealing himself as the Envoy and very Son of God. The two great dominant ideas of light and life partition this section between them. After ch 7, which is a first general sketch of the conflict, Jesus reveals himself as the Light of the World, 8:1-9:41. This revelation takes place at the joyful festival of Tabernacles and is illustrated by the cure of a man born blind. With the parable—allegory of the Good Shepherd—Jesus comes forward more particularly as the Giver of Life. This revelation of the Good Shepherd, giving his life that his sheep may live, continues through the festival of the Dedication and the raising of Lazarus and closes with the decision to put him to death, 10:1-11:56. What remains, 12:1-12:50, tells of the approach of the Paschal festival and the coming of Jesus to meet the hour of which he had so often spoken, the hour appointed by his Father, an hour not of defeat but triumph. He enters Bethany and Jerusalem. The favourite ideas of life and light (in the reverse order to that of the Prologue) occur again at the end of this section, where also figure some reflexions of St John on the tragic blindness of the Jewish people.

7:1-52 The Breach widens.

7:1-13 Circumstances of the Ascent to Jerusalem—

1. In refusing to transpose ch 5 (cf. § 781i) into what seems illuminating proximity to ch 7, and in following the probability that the time of the miracle of Bezatha was a Paschal feast, we committed ourselves to a gap of nearly 12 months between the first declaration of deadly hostility to Jesus at Jerusalem and the Eucharistic crisis close to another Pasch which marked the decline of his popularity in Galilee. Then six months separated the proximity of this spring festival of the Jews, 6:4, from the approach of the autumnal festival of Tabernacles, 7:2. [This gap of 18 months is of course a serious objection to the view that the 796b feast of Jn 5 was the second Passover of the public life, for Jn 7:11-24 makes it clear that the miracle of 5:8 was still fresh in the minds of the Jews. The difficulty disappears if we can assume that the feast in question was the feast of Purim. It would also disappear if the original order of the chapters was chh 4, 6, 5, 7, the present order being the result of a dislocation occurring probably before the publication of the Gospel.—Gen. Ed.] Jn seems to insinuate (in spite of 7:11) that Jesus did not go to Jerusalem for the second last Pasch of his life. He went from place to place in Galilee, because of the set design on his life on the part of the Jews in Judea. Chh 15-18 of Mt with their parallels help to fill the void. It was a time of withdrawal from the synagogue and concentration on the training of the Apostles, important events being a circuit which brought Jesus into Phoenicia and then eastwards into Decapolis; then from the eastern side of the Lake to Dalmanutha; thence north for the famous day of Caesarea Philippi, after which occurred the Transfiguration on Thabor and what seems to have been the last visit to his missionary city of Capharnaum. The sentence, 7:1, in which Jn notes these journeys in Galilee (and about it) also marks the end of the Galilean ministry. Events described in Lk 9:51-19:28 are connected by that Evangelist with journeyings towards Jerusalem (9:51; 13:22; 17:11, cf. 19:28), but it seems almost impossible to assign them a convincing chronological order.

d 2. The feast of Tabernacles (Sukkoth, more properly booths or huts) was a harvest festival celebrated at the middle of the seventh month (determined by the moon of the autumnal equinox and therefore often coinciding with the beginning of the Roman October). The feast lasted a week (15-21 Tishri) to which a supplementary day of high festival was added, Lev 23:34 ff. Its characteristics were vintage joy, the joy of living in improvised huts of leafy branches erected everywhere in and around Jerusalem in memory of Israel's pilgrimage in the wilderness, waving of branches (lulab of palm, willow, myrtle, and ethrog of citron), many sacrifices, sounding of trumpets, illuminations in the court of the women, libations of water from Siloe mixed with wine. The ceremonies underlined seem to have special bearing on Christ's reference to the outpouring of the Spirit, 37 ff., and to himself as the light of the world, 8:12.

3. The 'brethren' of Jesus—his cousins—were those who had once tried to restrain him when he seemed over-zealous, Mk 3:21. Now they want him to appear more in public by passing to Judaea—an apparent indication that he had not been to Jerusalem for the last Pasch, nor perhaps for 9 months (Dedication feast) or 12 (Tabernacles of last year) or even 18 (the Pasch of Bezatha).

4. The brethren emphasize the apparent contradiction of working miracles and thereby wishing to be a public personage in obscure Galilee. They want him to show himself to the great world in the centre of Judaism.

e 5. They had but an imperfect idea of his Messianic mission, since he was bringing no worldly glory to himself and them.

6. Christ's answer means that the right time for a public ascent to Jerusalem involving a triumphant manifestation had not yet come—there were yet six months to Palm Sunday. The right time for the brethren is any time.

7. They have the peace of the worldly with the world; not so Jesus who has the hatred of the world for condemning its badness.

8. Although the text-critical balance between the reading οὐ, 'not,' and οὐπω, 'not yet', is rather even, it seems that Jesus really said he was 'not' going up to this festival, meaning that he was not going with his brethren in the public manner they desired. A scribal change from οὐ to οὐπω, in order to avoid the appearance of dissimulation, is more probable than the reverse. The reason given is the same as before. The appointed time for the public encounter with the full hatred of Jewry has not come.

9. When the caravan set out, Jesus remained in Galilee.

10. Not more than

4 or 5 days later he set out for Jerusalem, but as an unknown pilgrim—probably even without the company of the Twelve.

796c 11. The enemies in Jerusalem were on the look-out.

12. There was much whispered talk in the groups that gathered in the city. Those who considered his way of life said he was good, those ruled by human respect agreed with the hostile verdict that he was an impostor (cf. Mt 27:63, on which Aug. makes the touching comment: 'This name was given to our Lord Jesus Christ, for the consolation of his servants').

13. The friends were not brave enough to speak openly 'for fear of the Jews'.

14-24 Jesus teaching in the Temple—14. Mid-festival f would be the fourth day. Jesus teaches in the temple for the first time.

15. The Jews who, in this context, would be chiefly Pharisee scribes, could not deny his knowledge of Scripture, whereas they knew for certain that he had never frequented a rabbinical school. Hence their outspoken surprise.

16. Jesus' learning is not that of a self-taught man. What he teaches (as man) has a higher source, namely the One who sent him. St Augustine's beautiful comment which is read in the Breviary (Tuesday after 4th Sunday of Lent) referring the words to eternal generation rather than temporal mission is true theological interpretation rather than literal exposition. It amounts to this: His doctrine is himself and he is the Word of the Father—his own personal self and yet not his own. In this place, however, it is rather as an Envoy that Jesus speaks.

17. Discernment of the divine origin of the teaching belongs to those who have the sympathy of an obedient will towards God and his truth.

18. Another test—a moral one—is in the conduct of the Speaker. To seek only the glory of Another who has sent him is not the conduct of a self-constituted philosopher, but of One whose very disinterestedness commends him as truthful and free from the injustice (impiety) that is opposed to truth.

19. As hostility to Jesus parades under the mantle of Mosaism, he takes up the charge of the event at Bezatha and unmasks the pretended loyalty to the Law of Moses which masqueraded as its justification. To all whose intentions towards him were murderous Jesus can say: 'None of you keepeth the law'.

20. 'Why seek you to kill me?' The crowd, part of which at least may not have been aware of the real situation, set this down as persecution mania. 'Thou hast a demon' was a common expression for, 'Thou art mad'.

g 21 ff. Jesus, ignoring the remark, turns to the case which occasioned the murderous intention of the Jews. The cure of Bezatha was no violation of the Law of Moses. The introductory 'therefore', 22, seems to cover the whole process of reasoning but belongs logically to the conclusion, namely, that the Law of Moses was higher and more human than mere sabbatarianism. The law of circumcision on the eighth day—really pre-Mosaic or patriarchal, as the parenthesis says—was such as to include those infants whose eighth day from birth was a Sabbath. So plain was it, that these were to be circumcised and cared for on the Sabbath, that the rabbis formulated the maxim: 'Circumcision ousts the sabbath'. One of them (about A.D. 100) even argued that since allowance was made for circumcision which affected only one of the 248 members of the body, much more consideration should be had for the whole body. Our Lord's argument is rather this: If a beneficial operation like circumcision carried out on the Sabbath only fulfils the law of Moses, why be angry with One who healed a whole man (perhaps both body and soul are meant) on the Sabbath?

24. Just judgement according to properly legal and impartial weights and measures must be deeper than superficial appearances.

25-30 Jewish Comment on Christ's Origin—25. The h miscellaneous and changing character of the crowds or of prominent elements in them throughout these vivid chapters should be kept well in mind. In the last section Jesus had addressed a hostile group, probably Pharisees, mixed with pilgrims or others who 796h knew nothing of a set design to kill him; here a more indifferent group of Jerusalemites appear amidst a crowd somewhat favourably disposed. 26. These Jerusalemites think that the apparent explanation of our Lord's freedom of speech is a change in the national leaders. Have they turned from homicidal enmity to recognition that he is really the Christ? 27. But like Trypho about A.D. 130 (Justin, Dial. 8) they hold that a man known to be from Galilee does not fulfil the common Jewish conception of a Messiah who should be of unknown or mysterious origin. 28 f. Jesus fixed on this matter of origin. 'Crying out'—which means not shouting but taking a higher and more solemn tone—he told them that he who came from Nazareth (as they thought) was not a self-appointed Prophet but an Envoy sent by One who was a true Sender. The adjective 'true' (ἀληθινός) does not mean 'veracious' but 'really such'. The Sender is not known to them, but the Envoy does know the One from whom he has his embassy. 30. Thereupon a move was made in the crowd to arrest him but the arrest did not take place. The immediate reason is not given, but Jn indicates the higher providential reason: 'His hour was not yet come'.

1 31-38 Believers and Emissaries of the Sanhedrin—31. The many who believed under the impression of this word of Jesus were persons who had heard of the many miracles worked in Galilee. The text affords no evidence that Jesus had recently worked many miracles in Jerusalem. 32. On the hostile side, the Pharisees are the prime movers. Here we have the first official measure taken against Jesus by two Orders of the Sanhedrin. 'The chief priests' (now mentioned for the first time in Jn) and the Pharisees (scribes) sent guards (Levitical police officers) to arrest him'. No doubt, the guards were instructed to act with caution, for the crowd was divided in its sympathies. 33-36. Jesus, knowing that there could be no arrest, till his hour was come, warns his audience that the time is short. Of the three things that he declares, namely, the shortness of his stay, his speedy return to him who sent him, the subsequent frustration of Jewish desire to find him or come to where he is—of these three they seize only on the last. With a disdain which Palestinian Jews commonly nourished, they thought of him as going to the Diaspora or Jews dispersed amongst Greeks, especially in such places as Alexandria and Rome, and even as teaching the Greeks themselves. The repetition in 36 shows that they were particularly puzzled by the words: 'You shall seek me and shall not find me: and where I am, you cannot come'. The words are best understood of Jewry's continually frustrated quest for a true Messiah, ever since Jesus of Nazareth, whom they rejected and continue to reject, ascended into heaven. The teaching of Jesus has really gone to the Gentiles, and the irony of their remark, 35, has fallen on the Jews themselves.

1 37-39 Promise of Living Water—37f. It seems that the last great day of the festivity was not the supplementary eighth day (22 Tisri) but the seventh—a day of processions, hosannas and special libations. The water of Siloe poured from a golden vessel may have been the occasion of our Lord's words, pronounced by him standing and with the solemnity of a proclamation. Two variant punctuations involve variety of interpretation. Irenaeus, Cyprian, and some other ancient authorities read: 'If any one thirst, let him come to me. And let him who believes in me drink. As the Scripture says: From within him rivers of living water shall flow'. In this case, the source of living water indicated by the Scripture would be Christ himself symbolized by the Rock, of which special mention was made in the liturgical chant of Ps 104(105):41 accompanying the libations: 'He rent the rock and water flowed—it ran in the wilderness like a river'. This interpretation, depending on what is really the earliest known punctuation, has in its favour that there is reference to a particular Scripture; it supposes that Christ, already symbolized in Jn by the Temple, the Brazen Serpent, the Manna, now appears as the Spiritual Rock from which believers must drink the profusion of the Holy Spirit; cf. 1 Cor 10:4. Nevertheless, however desirous we might be to adopt this grammatically defensible interpretation, which would make the words of Christ an echo of the beautiful promise of Isaiah: 'You shall draw waters in joy from the fountains of salvation', 12:3, and which would also supply a theological argument for the Filioque, the natural and obvious connexion of the whole passage seems to favour the punctuation commonly received, and adopted by DV. In this case, it is from the heart of the believer that the rivers of living water shall flow. The scriptural reference would be to many passages of the OT, for instance, the effusion of water (and spirit) in Is 44:3 (cf. 55:1; 58:11), the pure water of Ez 36:25 and especially the water from the temple in 47:1-12, the irrigating fountain of Jl 3:18, the open fountain and living waters of Zach 13:1; 14:8. It is not one river but many rivers that shall flow, for the gifts of the Spirit are various, 1 Cor 12. 29. Jn explains that the water did signify the Spirit. The realization of this promise came at Pentecost. Jn says in language commonly employed when comparing the very little to the very great, that the Spirit was not yet given. Its effusion in such abundance, as a widely distributed gift, and with such every-day frequency was to be consequent on the glorification of Jesus; cf. 16:7.

40-44 For and Against—The effect on the crowd takes four different forms. Some declare Jesus to be the Prophet of Deut 18:15; some say he is the Christ; others object that he came from Galilee and was, as they thought, neither a descendent of David nor a Bethlehemite by birth—both scriptural marks of the Messiah, Ps 131(132):11; Is 11:1; Jer 23:5; Mich 5:2; others wished to end the matter by arresting him, but again no one laid hands on him.

45-52 Sanhedrin Scene—45 f. Amongst those most favourably impressed were the guards who returned to the Chief Priests and Pharisees empty-handed. They could not arrest One who 'spoke as no man ever spoke'. 47 ff. The Pharisees dub them as victims of imposture, try to confound them with the example of the religious and intellectual aristocracy, and pour their scorn on the crowd whose ignorance of the law makes them nothing less than a 'cursed crew'. The words were pronounced in anger, but the habitual contempt of the Pharisees for the common people was very great. 50 f. The brave stand of Nicodemus—for it was really such—showed that a Sanhedrite, a Pharisee, and a distinguished doctor of the law shared in the sympathy of the benighted guards towards Jesus. Nicodemus simply insisted in the name of the Law, Deut 1:16 ff., that no man should be condemned 'unheard'. 52. They abuse Nicodemus as if he were a Galilean—which to Judaeans ordinarily meant stupid, as Boeotian did to Athenians. 'Search (the Scriptures) is a gloss even in Vg) and see that out of Galilee a prophet riseth not'. They forgot that Jonas was from Gethsepher and that Isaiah had foretold the rising of a great light in Galilee.

VII 53-VIII 11 Forgiveness of an Adulteress—This pericope is certainly canonical Scripture. If it is also part of Jn (see § 781h, i, Integrity) its place here is easily understood. The 'most joyful feast' of Tabernacles with its circumstances of camping out and crowding was not always exempt from moral disorder. 1. The Mount of Olives from which Jesus came to the temple at dawn is not elsewhere so named by Jn; cf. 18:1. 2. The people came early (cf. Lk 21:38; Ac 5:21) and Jesus sitting—as in Galilee—began to teach them. 3. Scribes and Pharisees—there is no other example of the combination in Jn—i.e. lawyers and legal zealots, bring a woman taken in adultery and set her well in view. 4. There is no need of an inquiry, for they attest that she was taken flagrante delicto. 5 f. The 797a Law, as they combine its statutes, appointed the death penalty for adultery, Lev 20:10, and stoning was specified for the infidelity of a betrothed woman, Deut 22:24. The question: 'What sayest thou?' was meant to destroy the ascendancy of Jesus over the people. What the party expected was a sentence of mercy which would publicly brand Jesus as one who flouted the Law of Moses. Even a rigorous sentence would make him lose in the eyes of the crowds. To embroil him with the Roman authorities is not an intention that clearly manifests itself yet. Most probably Jesus, in writing with his finger on the ground, wrote neither the sins nor the names, Jer 17:13, of those spiritual adulterers who were seeking to embarrass him. It was simply the gesture of a man not attending to their captious question but absorbed in something else. 7. In his divine response to their persistence Jesus carries the matter into the secret tribunal of their own consciences: 'He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her'. Jesus did not thereby announce a principle that sinful persons may not judge or punish a criminal, but he gave the accusers the discomfort of feeling their hypocrisy. 8 f. As he turned again to the silence of writing (that is meditatively making figures on the ground) they retired one by one, the oldest first, because quicker to take in the situation, and on account of their dignity more fearful of further possible embarrassment before the people. All accusers gone, there was only Jesus and the woman standing before him in the midst of the crowd. 10. Looking up he said, 'Woman, where are they . . . ? Has no man condemned thee?' 11. Her simple, respectful answer shows that she felt in some way that she had found not a Judge but a Saviour. The absolution given by 'him who had power on earth to forgive sins' is here negative in form: 'Neither do I condemn thee' (present rather than future). He does, of course, condemn the sin which he remits. Hence the admonition: 'Go and (from) now sin no more'.

c 12-20 Discourse at the Treasury—The place is the gazophylacium or place of the collection boxes within the court of the women, where stood the great candelabra for the illuminations of the feast of Tabernacles, now perhaps already terminated but fresh in the memory of everybody. The light recalled the pillar of fire which had guided the Israelites through the wilderness. This is the third great 'I am'. 12. As the Word of God and universal Revealer of heavenly truth Jesus is the light not of one nation but of the world. The image is probably from the column of fire, but God, Ps 26(27):1, and the Messias, Is 49:6, are called light in the OT. To 'follow' the light means discipleship consisting in active faith, which delivers from the darkness of human ignorance, error, and sin. 'The light of life' is light coming from the living God (the Word 1:4) and leading to life everlasting. 13. The Jewish objection is: Self-testimony is legally worthless—presumed not true, as not being receivable. 14 f. Jesus who condescendingly had let this axiom pass after Bezatha, 5:31, does not do so now, when the light of his self-revelation has grown stronger. Thorough knowledge is a guarantee of testimony, and Jesus knows himself thoroughly—is fully conscious of his origin and his destiny. Hence his testimony has inherent value. The Jews, ignorant both of his origin and his destiny, condemn with a prejudice based on mere appearances, or fleshly, human views, such, for instance, as would exclude a Nazarene carpenter without a moment's consideration. With such a superficial condemnatory judgement Jesus judges no one. 16. As there is now question of judgement not testimony, Jesus seems to say here: If I judge (when the time comes) my judgement is all that a judgement should be (ἀληθινός), 'for I am not alone, but I and the Father that sent me'. He reminds them that, although he has come to save, he will be their judge one day 'since the Father has given all judgement to the Son', 5:22. Then he passes to the twofold testimony which fulfils all legal requirements. 17. Deut. 19:15 was constantly quoted to show the legal sufficiency of the testimony of two witnesses. 18. Here the condition is fulfilled, for Jesus witnesses by his words and the Father by miraculous works and the prophetic Scriptures. 19. The question: 'Where is thy Father?' is not a reference to Joseph of whom the thought could not occur in this context; rather it is the sneer of unbelievers at appeal to the testimony of one who dwells in light inaccessible—calling a witness from the clouds, as it were. Hence the answer: 'Neither me do you know, nor my Father; if you did know me, you would also know my Father'. 'Perhaps' derives from forsitan, a misleading Latin rendering of the Greek particle ἄν. 20. The place of this discourse is given as indicated above. It is because the arrest of Jesus was sought at every moment, that Jn notes so often that it did not take place, 'because his hour was not yet come'.

21-30 Christ's approaching Departure and Passion—f This discourse repeats the warning that the time for decision is short; it strongly asserts that Jesus is the divine Envoy he claims to be; and it declares that his claim will be recognized in the light of the cross.

21. Since this first word is repeated, with an insertion, from a former occasion, 7:34, and is again referred to at the Last Supper, 13:33, it is clear that Jesus meant it to be very solemn. After he shall have gone (six months from now) the Jews shall seek him—that is, shall seek the Messias that he is, although their unbelief rejected him—and they shall die in their sin of unbelief. Their responsibility, therefore, is personal and so great as to lead to obduracy. 'Whither I go, you cannot come'. 22. With more odious mockery than before, 7:35, they think of Jesus committing suicide and thus signaling himself as one of the great failures of the world. 23. 'From beneath' and 'from above' as also 'of this world' and 'not of this world' are descriptions that mark the Jews and Jesus as belonging to different spheres. The natural man who lives by his five senses and has his heart fixed in the earth cannot receive the spiritual things that are apprehended by faith. 24. On account of their terrestrial blindness, Jesus says twice that the Jews shall die not only in their sin of unbelief but in all the sins (Gk text) from which faith justifies. To the phrase: 'Unless you believe that I am'—supply 'what I claim to be' (cf. 28; 13:19). 25. They ask the question: 'Who art thou?' as if he had not been telling them. The first words of our Lord's answer are difficult and have received many interpretations. DV 'The beginning, who also speak to you' is as clear as Vg seems to be, but what St Jerome left to the Latin Church was not qui et loquitur but quia et loquitur, which is anything but clear. It is to the Gk and to the Greek Fathers that we must turn. The words τὴν ἀρχὴν ὃ τι (or ὅτι) καὶ λαλῶ ὑμῖν may be translated: 'At the beginning [i.e. absolutely] what I say to you'. The meaning will then substantially be: '(I am) just what I say I am'. Considering, however, the depth of incomprehension which the Jewish question supposed, it seems better to follow the exposition, wholly or partly given by the Greek interpreters and most satisfactorily worded by St Chrysostom and his school: 'Indeed, why do I continue to speak to you at all?' Such a rebuke, similar to Mk 9:18, is not alien to the context, and it has the advantage of doing justice to the verb λαλῶ and to the particle καί. 26. The sequence of thought seems to be: rather than say more about myself as you expect me, 'many things I have to speak and to judge of you'. But (I content myself with affirming once more that I speak the truth), he that sent me is true and I speak nothing in the world except the things I heard from him. 27. 'And they understood not that he spoke to them of the Father'. We must, therefore, suppose a different audience from that at the gazophylacium, 18 f. 28. When they shall have crucified the Son of Man—lifting up is a veiled but sufficiently intelligible 797h expression for crucifixion probably quite as clear in Aramaic as our 'swing' for 'hanging' but more dignified, 3:14; 12:32—then they shall know, to their loss and pain and not to their gain, that he was what he said, and that he had only acted and taught as an Envoy of the Father. 29. There is perpetual unity of action between the two, for the whole programme of Jesus is the will of the Father—'I do always the things that please him'. 30. Many began to believe at this first mention of the mystery of the cross—intelligite gloriam crucis ipsius—genuinely, indeed, but not with full freedom from the trammels of human respect, 12:42.

1 31-47 Matters of Spiritual Paternity—31 f. Initially the words are addressed to the convinced believers (μεμνησκότες), but the strong mixture of hostility in the audience soon appears. Perseverance is the mark of true discipleship, and the truth of Christ known and practised is the great emancipative power. 33. The perverted pride of Abrahamite blood (race-religion) was conspicuous in the Jews and had been denounced from the beginning by the Precursor, Mt 3:9. It asserts itself here. Children of Abraham were never slaves (at least by voluntary submission to an alien yoke), they said, and therefore needed no emancipation. 34. Jesus solemnly points to the spiritual slavery of sin. 35. Whereas the slave has no permanent rights in a house, the son has. 36. Therefore emancipation by the Son will be true emancipation. Thus far, on the question of freedom from slavery. 37. With regard to their Abrahamitic dignity, it does not show itself in practice. 'You seek to kill me, because my word takes no hold, does not root itself in you'. 38. Knowledge in terms of 'seeing' is reserved to Jesus in Jn. He speaks what he has seen with (i.e. in the bosom of) his Father; the Jews do what they have heard from their father.

39. They indignantly raise the cry of their Abrahamite paternity. Jesus tells them that their works show them to be no true children of Abraham. 40. Homicidal intentions and voluntary resistance to heavenly truth is not the mark of Abraham. 41. There is another father whom they imitate—neither God nor Abraham. They understand this at once (in terms of their Scriptures, e.g. Jer 2:20) as meaning that they are the children of a people that has spiritually prostituted itself to the service of a false divinity. 'We were not born of fornication, we have one Father, God' (original Rheims Tr.). 42. Their conduct gives them the lie, for they do not love the Son and the Envoy of God. 43. They do not know his language, because their dispositions make them incapable of understanding his word. 44. Then comes the fearful sentence: 'You are of your father the devil, and the desires of your father you will do. He was a murderer and an enemy of truth from the beginning'. His original pride was untruth, so that the truth is not in him; by lying deceit, Gen 3, he brought death into the world, Wis 2:24. In this place Christ does not mention the envy of the devil which, however, belonged to his murderous hatred of mankind. That he is a liar and the father of lying has special prominence. Falsehood has, as it were, become his second nature.

k Hence the Jews, in resisting the truth spoken by Jesus, have ranged themselves in the family of the devil. In the words of Apoc 2:9 'they are the synagogue of Satan'. 46. Jesus is supremely worthy of credence, for no one can convict him of sin: 'If I (the unassailably holy) speak the truth, why do you not believe me?' 47. He concludes with a declaration meaning the same as his solemn assertion before Pilate, 18:37, but here the form of words is: 'He that is of God heareth the words of God. Therefore you hear them not, because you are not of God'. It is to be remarked that Jesus, at a moment when he is convicting the Jews and their father, the devil, of sin, openly challenges them to convict himself of any sin whatever. True, they accused him of breaking the Sabbath, of associating with sinners, of drinking wine, but these were charges launched by hypocrisy. They do not hear him because by moral disposition they are of the devil; their lives are not dominated by the spirit of obedience to God. 797h

48-59 Insult and a Great Climax—In this series of 1 discourses the great climax occurs in 58: 'Amen, Amen, I say to you, before Abraham was made, I am'. No thoughtful Israelite could hear such a saying without thinking of the words: 'I am who am', Ex 3:14, spoken from the burning bush by him who called himself the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob (ibid. 15). The gentle and strong Saviour brings this climax out of an atrocious affront.

48. Those whom truth exasperates easily turn to insult. 'Samaritan' was as opprobrious as apostate (cf. Ecclus 50:28), and 'thou hast a devil' meant in this context 'impious madman'. 49. Jesus, who had found faith in Samaria and who was later to speak the parable of the Good Samaritan, Lk 10:30 ff., and to praise the grateful Samaritan, Lk 17:18, took no notice of this national term of insult. 49. The sons of the devil who treated him as demoniacally insane he answered with a simple denial, adding: '(Rather) I honour my Father, and you dishonour me'. 50. It belongs not to Jesus himself but to the Father to vindicate his Son's honour, which he does by a judgement of condemnation—an allusion to the vengeance that was to fall in A.D. 70. 51. Turning doubtless once more to the group of believers he said: 'Amen, amen, I say to you, if any man keep my word, he shall not see death for ever'. He meant spiritual death, which primarily strikes the soul but also excludes the body from a glorious resurrection. 52 f. The Jews, with the malice inherent in their unbelief, twist the words to mean escape from corporal death, experience of which was not so much 'seeing' as bitterly 'tasting'. Jesus was thus making himself greater than all the great dead, including Abraham and the Prophets. That was the utmost arrogance of self-glorification. 54. Again Jesus remits his glory to the care of the Father whom the Jews called their God. 55. In reality they did not know God. They lied in pretending they did, but on the contrary, if Jesus should say he did not know him, he would be like the Jews themselves—a liar. To know is to obey, for truth is lived in charity, Eph 4:15. 56. What follows is stupendous. 'Abraham your father rejoiced (in the hope and desire) of seeing my day: he saw it and was glad'. The day is the whole time of the Incarnation rather than any single day. Abraham could only have seen it by supernatural vision, either by prophetic light in the revelation concerning his seed, Gen 12-3, or in the theophany of Gen 15:8 f., or in the theophanies which many Fathers held to be apparitions, of the Logos, Gen 18:2, or in the joy and divine consolations of the birth of Isaac, the child of promise, Gen 21:1-5. The last of these seems the most probable. That day was Abraham's Christmas. The hypothesis of the Patriarch's spirit seeing the actual day of Christ from Limbo may be considered less tenable. 57 f. The Jews, inverting our Lord's words, proclaim the absurdity of a man under 50 claiming to have seen Abraham. Jesus was probably between 35 and 40 at the time. St Irenaeus thought he was near 50 (Haer. II, 22, 5 f.). We need not suppose that he looked older than his age. The Jews used the round number of a half-century—hundreds and fifties being common reckonings even then, Mk 6-40. 58. The solemnity of the words: 'Before Abraham came to exist, I am', defies comment. 59. In the ears of the Jews it was horrible blasphemy. They wished to stone him then and there. Jesus hid (by calmly mixing in the crowd) and left the temple.

IX 1-41 Sight is given to the Man born Blind—Much 798a comment would only serve to blunt the fine edge of this graphic, animated and fascinating page. It is the finest description of varying attitudes and reactions in the Gospels. Closely connected with the foregoing revelation of Jesus as the Light of the World, it tells 798a of a miracle of physical illumination, 1-7, its public confirmation, 8:12, its victorious emergence from a triple inquiry, 13-18, 19-23, 24-34, its sequel in the spiritual illumination of the healed man, 35-38, its significance as indicated by Jesus himself, 39-41. The following points are to be noted. 1. Some time probably elapsed between the attempt to stone Jesus and this miracle. 2-4. The question of the disciples (first mention since 6:68) does not suppose belief in metempsychosis but a popular unphilosophic notion of disease being a punishment of prenatal or parental sin. The providential purpose of this man's congenital blindness was really a manifestation of Jesus through one of the works which he must work till the day of his mortality ends in the night of death. 5. As long as ever he is in the world, he must visibly be the 'light of the world'. It is to emphasize this that he works the miracle. 6-7. The dust moistened with spittle may be reminiscent of the creation of Adam, or symbolic of the Word made flesh, but the washing in the pool of Siloam (SE. of Jerusalem) etymologically denoting the water sent from Gihon through the tunnel of Ezechias more clearly symbolizes the baptism by which the divine Envoy illuminates. The man went home from the pool with sight restored. 8-12. The discussion raised amongst neighbours and others who had known the blind beggar results in evidence which has the vigorous brevity of three very positive verbs: I went, I washed, I (looked and) saw. 13-17. The fine matter-of-fact positiveness of the healed man appears also in the first inquiry, for while the Pharisees dispute on the case of a Sabbath-breaking miracle-worker, he affirms his belief that the man is a Prophet. 18-23. The fear of the parents to involve themselves in a statement that could be construed as a confession that Jesus was the Messiah is easily understood, for any Jews, especially poor people like these would quail before the threat of excommunication—not apparently the nezīpha (or one week's ostracism under reprimand), nor the niddui (like a Lent of public penance) but the herem (a major ban which made its subject a pariah). 24-34. The second citation of the healed man or rather attempt to bully him into false testimony under adjuration—'give glory to God' meant: 'Tell the truth', Jos 7:19—leads to a fine duel between hypocrisy and simple truth. The native humour of the brave respondent gives his answers a caustic turn. Abuse—the arm of the defeated—becomes the resource of the Pharisees. Against their 'we know that God spoke to Moses; but as to this man: we know not whence he is', the man speaks a 'we know' of common sense justified in every particular by the concrete circumstances of the case. The Pharisees proceed to a final fury of arrogant abuse and excommunicate him for the crime of being miraculously cured on the Sabbath. 35-38. Jesus (sought and) found the out-cast. Now he only saw the light of day, but, by his courageous confession that his benefactor must be from God, was also coming to the light of truth. That further spiritual illumination Jesus also gave him 'Dost thou believe in the Son of Man?' is the better attested reading. The man certainly believed there and then that Jesus was the Messiah, and probably in the full divine sense of the term, for adoration in Jn seems to mean latría only. Certainly the synagogue that had cast him out was already the blindfolded institution which we see represented by St Paul, 2 Cor 3:15, and by medieval art. The city of Saint-Paul-Trois-Châteaux in the valley of the Rhône claims that its first bishop St Restitut was the man born blind. Whatever the historical verdict may be, the claim deserves to be mentioned. Provence also boasts that he succeeded St Maximin as Bishop of Aix. 39-41. The judgement of discrimination which Jesus came to exercise in the world is shown by this narrative (cf. Lk 2:34). The little ones, with no pretence to be learned or seers, come to see, and those who have 'the key of knowledge' become blind (cf. Mt 11:25; 23:16 ff.). When the Pharisees ask if they also are blind, Jesus answers that theirs is not the blindness which takes away responsibility.

X 1-XI 56 The Good Shepherd.

X 1-21 The Parable of the Door and the Good Shepherd—This piece is often called an allegory. It is really not such, but a parable, which our Lord applies to himself according to two terms of comparison, namely, the Door of the sheepfold and the Shepherd of the flock. As the application itself is allegory or extended metaphor, the whole may be called a parable-allegory. We can find in it a rather complete definition of the Church charmingly conveyed through a description taken from Palestinian pastoral life. It is no wonder, then, that the fulfilment of the promise made to Simon Peter, Mt 16:18, is expressed in the same language as this parable, Jn 21:15-17. The parable is connected with the foregoing by a certain association of ideas. A sheep (the man born blind) expelled from the synagogue by the false shepherds of Israel is received by the Good Shepherd. In those who heard the parable, it also evokes that miracle of illumination, 21. Nevertheless, it is the beginning of a new series, and is connected by a common basic idea with the revelations of the Feast of Dedication, 26. It is clear that Jesus, the Light of the World, here shows himself as the Giver of life—a qualification which is sealed, some weeks after the Dedication, by the resuscitation of Lazarus at Bethany, less than two miles from the gates of Jerusalem. This event occasioned that fateful conciliar pronouncement of Joseph Caiaphas, 11:50, in which Jn sees a divinely-ordained prophecy that Christ will realize his own parable of the Good Shepherd, 52.

1-6. The picture of the sheep-pen contains all the necessary elements of the instruction to be conveyed—the walled or palisaded enclosure protecting the sheep brought back from their pastures for the night, the door which is open to shepherds but not to thieves who enter in some other way, the scene of the morning, when the shepherd comes from his home or his camp to lead out his sheep to pasture, the pastoral call and its recognition by his own sheep, the familiar solicitude which shows itself in calling the sheep individually by name, the docility with which the flock, ready to fly from a stranger, throng on the heels of their true shepherd. Though the picture was evidently a 'proverb' from everyday life (which is St John's word for the Hebrew māšāl, which the Synoptists call a parable or similitude) the audience did not understand its purpose. 7-10. Jesus therefore makes the first application and explains: 'I am the door of the sheep' (and of the shepherds). 8. 'All others as many as came before me (πρὸ ἐμοῦ probably authentic) are thieves and robbers'. St Chrysostom and many commentators have thought that false Messiahs like Judas the Galilean or Theudas, Ac 5:36 f., are chiefly meant, but the verb 'are' in the present tense seems to refer it to those immediate false shepherds who are the scribes and Pharisees. The sheep did not hear them; cf. Mt 9:36; Mk 6:34. In the prophecies of Ezechiel, 34:1-24, God had manifested his intention of taking over the shepherding of his people from self-seeking shepherds and handing it to a Davidic Prince. 9. When Jesus declares himself the door of safety for all who enter by him, he means primarily shepherds, but thereby he is also the door of the sheep who through him enter to safety and go out to wholesome pastures. 10. Whereas the thief's intention is destructive, the purpose of Jesus is life-giving. He came that his sheep may have life and have an abundance (of it)—grace, glory, resurrection from the dead.

11-18. In the application of the idea of shepherd, the contrast is not with thieves but with hirelings, and anyone who is presumed not to have an owner's devotedness towards his own sheep. The allegorical description of that devotedness is carried to hyperbole, in order to fit the reality in Jesus. No shepherd could reasonably make a voluntary sacrifice of his life, that 799d his sheep might be safe, but the Good Shepherd has actually done this.

11. The single sentence 'I am the good shepherd' has a whole world of biblical and ecclesiastical souvenirs clustering about it (Ps 22(23) and 79(80); Is 40; Jer 23; Ez 34; Zach 13; Lk 15; the shepherd of Hermas, the inscription of Abercius, the famous sculptured type of the Roman catacombs). Here Jesus says at once that the excellence of 'the (great) shepherd of the sheep', Heb 13:20, is to be found in his self-immolation on behalf of his sheep. 12 f. The hireling, whose interest is salary, has no such devotedness. We can easily find an interpretation of the 'wolf', although it belongs to the literary plenitude rather than to the essence of the parable. 14 f. He repeats 'I am the good shepherd' ad incrementum orationis, and in order to introduce a new trait, that of intimate mutual knowledge of affection between Shepherd and sheep, and also in order to affirm that he fulfils the sublime ideal of pastoral self-devotedness by giving his life for his sheep. The reciprocal knowledge of charity between Shepherd and sheep is proportionately analogous to that between the Father and the Son. The Gk word translated 'lay down' (my life) may represent either the metaphor of total giving, or of depositing a price, or putting off life (like a garment). 16. The sheep of the Good Shepherd are not all to be found within the enclosure of Israel hitherto the only pen established by God himself—but other sheep Jesus must bring from outside, and they shall hear the voice of the Good Shepherd, and there shall be one flock (not 'fold', which, however, is no real distortion of the sense) and one shepherd (cf. Eph 2:13-16). [There is no doubt that ποίμνη (grex) 'flock' is the correct reading in 16b, though 'Fold' (ovile) appears in the Vg and thenceforth universally in mediaeval Latin writers. 'This fold'—the contrast is not between a fold of the Jews and a fold of the Gentiles, but between the fold of the Jewish Church which excluded the Gentiles, and the 'flock' of the Christian Church which was to include them. 'Other sheep'—here signify simply the Gentiles. MacRory (op. cit. 7th ed) comments: 'We have three very important declarations in this verse. (1) The faith was to be preached to the Gentiles; (2) Christ was to have but one flock, composed alike of Jews and Gentiles; (3) That one flock was to have one supreme visible head'.—Gen. Ed.] 17. Jesus returns to the idea of self-immolation. For the reason (because he is obedient unto death) the Father loves the Word Incarnate, laying down his life on the cross, in order to take it up again in the resurrection of the third day. 18. His is an entirely free oblation of his life 'No man taketh it away from me'—if we read took (with S, B and papyrus 45) there would be reference to the attempts to stone or arrest him—'but I lay it down of myself'. It is as God that he says this, and adds moreover 'I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it up again'. But it is as man that the Word Incarnate received a command from the Father—according to NT usage a precept not a more intimation of good-pleasure usually called a beneficium.

19-21. Once again the result in the audience was disagreement. Some said these were the words of a demoniac and a madman; others said that neither those noble words nor the miracle on the man born blind could come from a demoniac. As the parable of the Good Shepherd is a Sunday Gospel (2nd after Easter) it will be useful to sum up the doctrine of this whole section very briefly. The sheep come from the Jewish and the Gentile world. Unity is maintained by pastoral authority and care, that of the one Shepherd Christ and of the shepherds that rule in his name—those that come in by the door. There is union of mind and heart between sheep and shepherd. The flock feeds on the wholesome pastures of truth, the sheep individually are consoled by the compassionate solicitude of the Shepherd and they follow him with affectionate docility. The whole flock finds life in the death of the Shepherd and his resurrection. That great sacrifice willed by the Father, freely offered by Jesus, crowned with life after three days, centres the love of the Father on the Shepherd—and, let us add, should centre the love of the sheep on their Good Shepherd. Gratitude, one of the greatest human motive powers, should grow out of the consciousness that he came that we may have life and an abundance of it.

22-39 The Great Discussion at the Dedication Festival 8

—This festival called in Hebrew hanukkah was instituted by Judas Maccabeus, 1 Mac 4:52; 2 Mac 10:5, as an eight-day solemnity beginning on 25 Casleu (Kislev), the ninth month of the Jewish year—therefore opening approximately about the third week of December. As commemorating the renewal of worship in the temple in 165 B.C., after the profanations of Antiochus Ephiphanes, it held an important place in the festal calendar. Having presumably occupied the time between Tabernacles and Dedication in the Judaeoan and Transjordanian ministry which Lk 9:15-11:13 probably records in the main, Jesus came to Jerusalem for this feast. 22 f. The occasion is marked in a short historical introduction. The season (winter) is mentioned for the sake of Greek readers and to explain why Jesus walked in Solomon's Porch, the eastern side of the temple running along the western verge of Cedron and sheltered from desert winds. St Augustine could not resist referring the words to the human atmosphere: 'It was winter, and they were frigid'. 24. They gathered around him and pressed him to declare himself. Their question is really a demand that he should finish this suspense of uncertainty for them and say plainly whether he was the Christ. Hitherto Jesus had proved that he was, but had not expressly said so. 25. He had said so sufficiently, however, and they did not believe, but now as before it is to the proofs, namely the works he has been doing in the name of his Father, that he refers them. His words are going to take them higher than his Messianic title up to his dignity of Son of God, consubstantial with the Father. 26. In terms of the Good Shepherd parable he tells them the reason of their unbelief. Because of their bad dispositions they are not of his sheep—the Father does not draw them, 6:44. As St Augustine is strongly predestinationist in commenting on this verse, it should be emphasized that the Jews do not receive the grace of faith, because they are voluntarily as blind as a man who shuts his eyes and refuses to open them. That they are not 'of his sheep' is their own fault. 27. The description of the sheep as those who hear the Shepherd's voice, those whom Jesus knows, those who follow him, reproduces the thought of the parable, 3 f., 14. 28. 'Everlasting life' which occurs just a dozen times in chh 3-6 recurs here, Jesus gives it to his sheep and they shall (as long as they are his sheep) never fall to destruction. No one (either with the stealth of the thief or the violence of the robber) shall snatch them from his hand. It is the power exercised by the violent that is particularly envisaged, and this notion of the Shepherd's unconquerable power to keep his sheep from every adverse force is the point of connexion with the difficult verse that follows. 29. DV gives the reading of Vg which has the support of the Greek B (Vaticanus) and the Latin Fathers. Translated literally (with the original Rheims) this form of the text says: 'My Father, that which he hath given me, is greater than all'. Both the relative pronoun (ὃ) and the comparative adjective (μεῖον) are neuter gender. The rival reading followed by the Greek Fathers Basil, Chrysostom, Cyril, makes both words masculine and says: 'My Father, who gave to me is greater than all'. There is no need to refer to the mixture of the two readings in many MSS. The second reading, asserting that the Father who gives the sheep to Jesus is greater (in power) than all makes an easy sense, but for that very reason may be suspect. The grammatically neuter reading is more difficult. The thing given has been understood by St Augustine 799i and St Thomas of the divine nature (and power) given in eternal generation by the Father to the Son; others understand the thing given as the sheep, not simply as sheep but as something given by an omnipotent giver to an omnipotent keeper, as the context demands. The words that follow will fit any of these three senses: 'No one can snatch them out of the hand of my Father'. It is evident that the hand of Jesus is equally omnipotent, for no one can snatch the sheep out of his hand. 30. 'I and the Father are one'. St Cyril who follows the easier reading of 29a crystallizes his interpretation of these few words in the two adjectives homouiosios, homodynamos—consubstantial, com-potent. Similar language is used by Basil and Chrysostom. Because the Arians said that union of will was meant—unanimity or concord of the Father and Christ—the champions of orthodoxy interpreted this text repeatedly (Athanasius about 50 times). Two brief citations will suffice as a summary of patristic thought. 'Unum ad naturam referimus, sumus ad personarum distinctionem', Jer. 'Quod dico, unum, audiat arianus; quod dico, sumus audiat sabellianus. Non dividat arianus unum; non delect sabellianus sumus', Aug.

k 31-39. The Jews understood the magnitude of the claim and again threatened stoning—bringing the stones, rather than finding them near in the Porch of Solomon. 32. Jesus does not withdraw this time (cf. 8:59), but asks them to state their motive. Of the many good works he had shown them from his Father, for which particular good work did they want to stone him? 33. They answer: 'Not for a good work'—whatever it might be—but for blasphemy'. The accusation is quite formal: 'Thou, being a man, makest thyself God'. 34. Jesus does not deny the charge, nor mitigate what he has said, but leads them to reason upward from a Scripture text, according to the favourite rabbinical process of qal wahömer—from the less to the greater. Ps 81(82):6 (a text of the Law in the wider sense of the term) introduces God addressing the judges of Israel in the solemn words: 'I said: "You are gods"'. 35. The appellation is God's own and registered in an inviolable Scripture. 36. Therefore, a fortiori, it is not blasphemy to apply it to one of higher dignity. That one is Jesus whom the Father has consecrated and sent into the world, as his anointed, holy Envoy. It is not blasphemy for him to say: 'I am the Son of God', this being the equivalent of what he had said above. If 'god' is a metaphor in Ps 81:6, it does not follow that 'Son of God' is a metaphor here. 37. It is a higher dignity proved by works which Jesus does as works of his Father. If his word is not sufficient—although it is—at least they should believe those works, so as to recognize and know that 'the Father is in me, and I in the Father'. This mutual in-being is a unity of being and nature and signifies an identity such as Jesus later impressed on his Apostle Philip in the same words, 14:10. Therefore, the discourse returns to the earlier assertion of consubstantiality: 'I and the Father are one'. 39. The Jews did not think that he had retracted, for they wished to seize him, but 'he escaped out of their hands'.

i 40-42 Departure to Perea—Jesus returned across the Jordan to the place where he gathered his first disciples—the place where the Precursor was first baptizing. Away from the hostile environment of Jerusalem, many believed in him; and the memory of John became a motive of belief. Whereas the Precursor had worked no miracles, all he had said of Jesus was true.

800a XI 1-44 Lazarus called from the Tomb—This is the supreme miracle of the public life, the one which manifests 'the glory of God' most signally on account of its circumstances; it is also most decisive in its results, for it led the Sanhedrin to decree Jesus's death. It invites meditation rather than annotations. The narrative divides itself thus: (a) the Saviour's journey to Bethany, 1-16; (b) the meeting with Martha and Mary, 17-32; (c) the miracle, 33-44;

(d) the reactions, 45-53; (e) the retreat of Jesus to Ephrem under virtual sentence of death, 54-56.

1-16 Bethany (the name being variously interpreted by scientific and popular etymologists as House of poverty, of affliction, of Ananias, of obedience) was situated on the eastern slope of the southern shoulder of Olivet, less than 2 miles (3,000 yards) ESE. from Jerusalem. The village where Martha and Mary lived is mentioned without name in Lk 10:38, but is here named by Jn and described as the village of Mary and Martha her sister. 2. Mary is named as the anointer with reference probably to Lk 7:37 rather than to Jn 12:3. Although the matter is likely to remain a disputed question, there is a sufficiency of indications in the Gospels to give reasonable assurance to those who, with St Gregory the Great and the Latin Liturgy identify Mary of Bethany with the sinner of Lk 7:37 and Mary Magdalene; cf. §§ 739b, 753g. The sickness of Lazarus (Grecized from Eliezer) is set at the head of the narrative. His sisters, knowing the danger to the life of Jesus in Judaea decided to inform him only at the last moment. Lazarus died while the messenger was on the way to Transjordan, i.e. to some place not far from that other Bethany, 1:28. 3. In the circumstances no request is conveyed but a simple intimation: 'Behold, he whom thou lovest is sick'. Aug. says beautifully: 'It is enough that thou know; for thou dost not love and leave it at that'. 4. In the ordinances of God's providence the sickness was not unto death but, through the raising of Lazarus, for the glory of God, who thereby glorifies his Son, the worker of the miracle. Note especially that Christ foretells this miracle no less than four times, 4, 15, 41, 42. 6. Jesus, therefore, though he loved the family at Bethany, waited two days. 7. His subsequent 'Let us go into Judaea again' alarmed the disciples. 9-10. With the little parable of the day and the night Jesus tells them that nothing can happen till the evening of the Passion comes. 11. Then he announces the sleep of Lazarus his friend which the Evangelist renders by a Gk verb from which we get our word 'cemetery', to signify the 'dormitory' of the dead. 12-14. As the disciples take him to mean ordinary sleep (a good sign in a sick man) he then says plainly that Lazarus is dead. 15-16. Being absent he did not intervene to cure him—a subject of joy, because of the salutary effect which his greater intervention will have on the faith of his disciples. When Jesus repeats: 'Let us go', Thomas speaks a word of decision—the decision of a generous pessimist. 17-32. The death and burial of Lazarus took place probably within a few hours of the departure of the messenger. So four days had elapsed when Jesus came to Bethany. 19. The mourners (called Jews without the usual hostile meaning) were many, on account of the nearness of Jerusalem, and mourning was maintained with gradation of rigour for 3, 7, and 30 days—compare our Catholic 3rd, 7th and 30th day. Mary was the more celebrated of the sisters, 11:1, but Martha was the mistress of the house. 20. Hence she went to meet Jesus. The dialogue is magnificent. Note the feminine delicacy and vaguely conceived hope of Martha's first word. 23-24. In answer to our Lord's assurance: 'Your brother shall rise again', she makes profession of her faith in the final resurrection, a religious tenet of Judaism that had been growing in clearness since the Maccabean persecutions (cf. 2 Mac 12:43 f.). No doubt she had a latent desire of something more immediately consoling. 25-26. Jesus demanded an act of faith in himself as 'the resurrection and the life', in the sense of his being their cause or giver, cf. 6:39, 40, 44, 54. 27. Martha's response was magnificent. Though she did not think clearly of the miracle that was to be, she must have felt that the words portended something unusual. 28-32. She called Mary, who came and, with more emotion, repeated Martha's original words. 33-44. Deeply moved by sympathy (ἐμψυμάσθαι) Jesus asked to be led to the tomb. 35. The sentence

800e 'And Jesus wept' loses some of its original force by the addition of 'and' to Jn's asyndetic manner, and loses something in accuracy by use of the same verb as that which denotes the weeping or crying of Mary and the Jews. The Gk word (ἐδάκρυον) means that Jesus broke into silent tears. 36-37. This sign of friendship moved some, and excited criticism in others, who asked if Jesus could not have prevented his friend's death. 39. Again giving expression to his feelings of compassion (the verb seems to suggest that Jesus felt angry with Death or the Prince of Death), he ordered the tomb to be opened. Martha only thought of the decaying body of her brother and had to be reminded that she must only have faith in him who will presently

f show her the glory of God. 41-42. As man Jesus had already made the submission of prayer to his Father and now publicly thanks him for the answer to it already granted and just about to be realized. Jesus wished to make the raising of Lazarus a clear proof of his divinity by calling God to witness to the miracle before it had been wrought. They took the stone from what seems to have been a subterranean cavern without an antechamber and closed not with a round stone running in a level groove but with a horizontal stone. 43. From this cavern Jesus calls the dead man. Jn has three Gk words for what were probably only two Aramaic words spoken by Jesus with the solemnity of a loud voice. 44. Lazarus came forth, bandaged as he was and with hands and feet and eyes impeded by the attire of the grave. In order to bring the astonishment of the bystanders to the concrete matter of fact before them, Jesus said simply: 'Loose him and let him go'. From the 4th cent. the tomb of Lazarus was shown where stands the present village of El-'Azariyah (from Byzantine Lazarion).

g 45-53 The Pharisees resolve to kill Jesus—The miracle had the usual opposite effects. Some believed; others blinded by the light denounced the matter to the enemies of Jesus among the Pharisees. A miracle was no crime, but the growing popularity of the wonder-worker was a danger to the worldly hopes of Judaism. 47. The chief priests and Pharisees (scribes) gathered in council. The whole discussion centred on the influence which these undoubted miracles were gaining for Jesus. If things go on thus, all will believe in him, and that will mean the end of the temple of Jerusalem and of the Jewish nation. 49. The gruff counsel of Caiaphas was interposed to cut the debate short. 50. He insisted 'that one man should die for the people and that the whole nation perish not'. 51. In the sense of the speaker it was merely a political utterance, but God, as Jn remarks, gave the words of the Pontiff of the year (such Caiaphas was from A.D. 18-37) a higher prophetic meaning. 52. Jesus was to die, in order to gather the scattered children of God into one as 'the Israel of God', Gal 6:16. 53. From this moment the death of the Son of God is decreed by the chief Council of the Jews. They will choose a suitable time and make show of legal forms, but the matter is decided.

h 54-56 Jesus retires—His hour was not to sound till the Pasch of which he was to be the Lamb. He therefore retired from Jerusalem to spend the remaining weeks away from hostile manoeuvres. The city of Ephrem to which he went is probably the present village of Et-Tayibeh, about 12 miles N.E. of Jerusalem on the edge of the wilderness of Bethaven. Early pilgrims to the Pasch were already beginning to move. There was much talk about Jesus, especially because the chief priests and Pharisees had given orders that his whereabouts should be reported in view of having him arrested.

801a XII 1-50 End of the Public Ministry—The last journey of Jesus from Ephrem to Jerusalem was a circuit, for we are certain that he passed through Jericho. It is probable that the events and words given by Lk between 17:12 and 19:28 belong to those few days. On this hypothesis Jesus would have touched Galilee once more (at Jenin?), then passed into Peraea, and finally made the journey to Jerusalem via Jericho from near the place where his public ministry began. Jn's account of the days which preceded the intimate farewell of Holy Thursday groups itself in six sections which naturally arrange themselves in pairs. The supper at Bethany, 1-11, and the triumph of Palm Sunday, 12-19, are closely associated by the Evangelist with the miracle of Lazarus; the words occasioned by the petition of some Greeks form two discourses—both under the sign of the cross—namely, that of the grain of wheat, 20-26, and that connected with the Saviour's first prayer of trepidation at the approach of his Passion, 27-36; what remains consists of two solemn summaries, one from the Evangelist, 37-43, and the other from the lips of the Divine Master himself, 44-50.

1-11 The Supper at Bethany—Mt, Mk, Jn tell of the anointing at Bethany. Jn marks the date. 'Six days before the pasch', probably on the Friday evening that began the Sabbath of 8th Nisan, Jesus came to Bethany. Since his return from the grave, it is Lazarus that gives prominence to Bethany. 2. The supper was on the evening of the Sabbath. Simon the (ex-) leper, probably a friend rather than the father of Lazarus, was the host, Mt 26:6, and Lazarus one of those reclining at table with Jesus; Martha was serving. It was Mary's magnificent gesture which made that supper memorable wherever the Gospel is preached. Anointing the head of a distinguished guest with perfumed oil was quite a common courtesy, Lk 7:46, and it is this act that is given prominence on this occasion even by Mk, who emphasises the profusion of unguent involved in the woman's act of breaking the neck of the alabaster which contained it. 3. Jn on the other hand draws attention to the anointing of the Saviour's feet and the extraordinary act of the woman in wiping the ointment off his feet with her hair. Since towels would obviously have been available this incident becomes readily intelligible only on the assumption of the identity of this Mary with the sinner of Lk 7; and thus her act is also a recalling of the events of her conversion. Nard pistie (genuine) precious, probably the Indian product from the nardostachys jatamansi of the Himalayas, had a penetrating aroma, and Jn (probably with conscious thought of the symbolism) notes that the whole house was filled with the odour. 4-8. Mt and Mk, if they do not use a plural of category, show that several disciples joined in criticism of the apparently wasteful gesture, but Jn points to Judas Iscariot as the leading and vocal objector. To say that his estimate of the price of the unguent meant so many French francs, or English pounds is mere mathematical equivalence, for 300 denarii actually represented the salary of a whole lunar year earned by an ordinary workman working six days a week. 6. 'took the things. . .'. Jn tells that the pretended solicitude of Judas for the poor was really the avarice of a thief who had been appropriating contributions to the money-box (γλωσσόκομον originally a musician's 'tongue-box') which he administered. 7. Mt and Mk show that the Divine Master's defence of Mary's action drew attention to its character of anticipated embalment. The words in Jn mean the same, but we must supply an ellipsis: 'Let her alone (she did not sell it) that she might keep it against the day of my burial'. 8. The proximity of the Saviour's death is also brought out in the words: 'the poor you have always with you, but me you have not always'. 9. Unmixed spiritual motive is rare in human crowds. The attraction of Jesus and curiosity as regards Lazarus brought a great throng of Jews to Bethany, of whom many believed. 10. The decision of the chief priests to kill Lazarus as well was involved in the fearful logic of their purpose to destroy the influence of Jesus. But Aug. asks: 'Could he who raised a dead man not raise a murdered man?'

12-19 Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem—The Johannine description of the triumph of Palm Sunday joins that of the Synoptists, but Jn alone mentions palm

801d branches. 18. In the acclamations of the crowd, taken in the main from the great festal Ps 117(118), he gives prominence to the Messianic title King of Israel; cf. 1:50. Since he supposes the synoptic narrative, he omits many details such as the presence of its mother with the colt that served as a mount for Jesus, but he joins Mt in pointing to the fulfilment of Zach 9:9, which reads 'Rejoice exceedingly, daughter of Sion', etc. Jn quotes the text freely from memory, and substitutes 'Fear not' for 'rejoice exceedingly'. 16. It is again recorded that, as on the occasion of the purification of the temple, the fulfilment of Scriptural prophecy in the events of the day did not come home to the disciples till later, 'when Jesus was glorified'. 17. The enthusiasm of the crowd is connected with the raising of Lazarus, of which some had been eyewitnesses, while others knew from reliable informants that Jesus 'had done this miracle'. 19. The Pharisees who were the prime haters and deadliest enemies of the 'King of Israel' expressed their envy in many ways that day (cf. Mt, Lk). Jn records their sense of frustration and their admission that 'the (whole) world is gone after him'. Characteristic of St Augustine's tractates on Jn is the question: 'Why are you jealous, blind crowd, because the world has gone after him, by whom the world was made?'

20-26 The Gentile Visitors—Some men, Greek in language and non-Jewish in race, had come to Jerusalem to worship the one true God whom they (like the centurion of Capharnaum and Cornelius of Caesarea) had learned to know through the influence of the synagogue. The legend of Abgar connects the origin of the Syrian Church of Edessa with these pilgrims. 21. Wishing to have a private talk with Jesus of whom everyone was speaking, they approached Philip, the Apostle from Bethsaida Julias. His name was Greek and he probably spoke Greek. 22. Philip consulted Andrew his fellow-townsmen, his senior in the school of Christ, and his helper in embarrassment, 6:5-9. Together they told Jesus. 23. It seems clear enough that Jesus did not say yes. These men were moved by the triumph of Palm Sunday which was not the real triumph of Jesus. His name was to be great amongst the Gentiles in another way. That is what his answer—the parable of the grain of wheat—shows. The hour of the glorification of the Son of Man, which is now so near as to have already come, is the hour of the Passion—to be followed, of course, by the resurrection, ascension and sending of the Holy Spirit. f 24-25. Thereupon he enunniates that immolation is the condition of spiritual fructification. The grain of wheat is an example. It has the germ of life in it, but that germ does not germinate into the production of other living grains, unless it is subjected to a process of death and burial in the earth. The interests of spiritual, supernatural life must take priority over everything. To love the lower natural life more is to lose the higher; to hate (which means to love less and subordinately) what is life in this world is the means of self-preservation unto life everlasting. This is the law of self-denial so often proclaimed by the Saviour, of which the highest act is martyrdom. 26. It is the law of all the ministers or servants of Christ to follow their Master. To be with Jesus in glory—'where I am' by the anticipation of proximate realization—it is necessary to follow after him in the way of the cross. Such servants the Father will honour and crown.

g 27-36 Agony of Spirit—Jn alone relates this Agony as the Synoptists alone relate the Agony in the garden. The cross frightens us, but it also frightened Jesus, who clearly showed us that he has known every experience of human weakness (apart from sin) that would fit him to be a compassionate priest. 27. The vivid image of a cruel death brought to Jesus a tremor, freely permitted, of fear. The first Gk words of Jn's version of the Saviour's utterance are an echo of a verse of the Judica, Ps 42(43):6, which is also echoed in the Tristis est anima mea of Gethsemane. The parallelism with the agony in the garden is striking: 'My soul is troubled'—'my soul is sorrowful unto death'; 'what shall I say?'—'he fell on his face praying' . . . ; 'Father, save me from this hour'—'Father . . . take away this chalice'; 'but for this cause I came unto this hour. Father, glorify thy Son'—'not my will but thine be done'. 28. The voice from heaven is, however, not like the angel of the Lord strengthening him in Gethsemane. It will be remembered that the voice of his Father was heard at his baptism and his transfiguration. On those occasions it came to accredit the Divine Messias. Now, before the Passion, the voice of God tells that the name of his Father has been glorified in the life of Jesus and shall be glorified in his death. Like the voice addressed to Saul on the road to Damascus, this voice was not understood by all the bystanders. 30. While they disagreed, some saying it was thunder, others an angel speaking, Jesus told them that the voice had not come to assure him but to assure them. He explains to them how God will be glorified in him. 31. The judgement which is to fall on the world is a judgement of condemnation, for κρίσις has its usual meaning in the mouth of Christ. The world is the hostile mass of men and its Prince is Satan, who is now about to be cast out of his dominion. In this sense Christ immolating himself is, as Simeon foretold, set for the ruin of many. But Christ is the Saviour. 32. Lifted up on the cross he shall draw 'all men' rather than 'all things' (Vg but not so strongly attested by Gk MSS and Fathers) to himself. The 'all' is not numerical but excludes every distinction of race or people. 34. As exaltation meant crucifixion, the crowd fell into a discussion about the contradiction between the idea of a Messias reigning for ever, Ps 109(110); Is 9; Dan 7, and a Son of Man who was to die. 35. Without entering into the discussion, Jesus renews his warning that the light is before them and the time short. 36. Jn says that after these words he hid himself, because he did not stay in Jerusalem but retired to Bethany at night.

37-43 The Reflexions of the Evangelist—In the following reflexions the tragic note of this Gospel sounds again. So many miracles encountering so much unbelief! What is to be thought of it? That 'he came to his own and his own received him not' is from a human point of view the great 'scandal of Jesus'. But there is no scandal. 37. The want of success of Jesus amongst the lost sheep of the House of Israel was due to a perverse disposition foretold in the prophetic Scriptures. 38. It is from what has been called the Passion of Christ according to Isaiah, 53:1 ff., that Jn takes the first oracle describing Israelite unbelief. 40. The more difficult text cited freely from Is 6:9 f. had been used by Christ himself, Mt 13:14 f., and by St Paul, Ac 28:26 f., of the same kind of incredulous obstinacy. The difficulty is in Jn saying that the Jews could not believe, because Isaiah had foretold that they would not, and the text itself attributes their blindness and hardness to God blinding and hardening them. What is predicted in Scripture belongs to God's foreknowledge which is infallible. Therefore the Scripture must be fulfilled in the obstinacy of the Jews as well as in the treason of Judas, 17:12, but clearly that does not necessitate the action of the culprits any more than visual knowledge in the eyewitness of a murder necessitates the murder. In the blinding and hardening we have the mystery of the distribution of grace and its efficaciousness or non-efficaciousness. 41. Isaiah said these things because (rather than 'when') he saw his glory, so that the Evangelist identifies Jesus with Yahweh of the famous Isaian vision. Hence Jesus knew how his work amongst the Jews was to turn out. 42-43. Like Paul later, St John notes that the infidelity of the Jews was not absolutely universal. Many, even amongst the Sanhedrites, believed, but through fear of the Pharisees and of expulsion from the synagogue—human glory hindering zeal for the glory of God—they did not publicly profess their belief.

44-50 Recapitulation of Jesus' teaching—In the last j

801] summary the Evangelist recapitulates from the lips of Jesus the main ideas of the various discourses. Jesus had demanded faith in himself as an Envoy of God. 46. He had repeated that he came into the world as the Light of the World. 47. He had said that he was a Saviour to save, not a Judge to condemn. 48. Nevertheless, by their attitude to his word men condemn themselves and by that same word they shall be condemned on the last day. Practically the first and the last word of this part of the Gospel, 1:4 and 12:50, is 'life'. 49-50. Jesus came into the world with his Father's command to execute and that command is life everlasting—its whole purpose is to give eternal life to those who receive Jesus and keep his words. 'The things, therefore, that I speak, even as the Father said unto me, so do I speak'. 'See', says Chrys., 'how everywhere he shows himself united with him who begot him and that there is no separation'. To see Jesus is to see the Father, to hear Jesus is to hear the words which the Father gave him to speak.

XIII-XVII THE LAST SUPPER

802a The earthly ministry of the Christ to his own nation is finished. Through their leaders and as a people 'the children of the kingdom' are standing in the darkness outside, when Jesus retires with his twelve apostles to eat the Paschal supper. That he did eat a Paschal supper with them is all but certain from the synoptics, but there is nothing explicit in Jn either about such a celebration or about the institution of the Eucharist. While the Synoptists narrate the things done at the Last Supper, Jn magnificently supplements them with a narrative which is mainly a report of the Saviour's words. The whole comprises three great sections: (1) ch 13, an historical prelude (washing of the feet, separation from Judas, and a touching preamble about the Passion, the new commandment, Peter's denial); (2) 14-16, the great discourse divided by a gesture of movement into 14 and 15-16; (3) 17, the sacerdotal prayer for unity.

b XIII 1-38 Events in the Supper Room.

XIII 1-17 Washing of the Feet—Jn has not a word to indicate or describe the place of the Last Supper, but he gives a precious date. Both here and in 18:28 he clearly indicates that the Sanhedrists were not themselves eating the Paschal supper, while Jesus was gathered with his own in the supper room (cenacle). Unless we suppose an improbable official transference of the Pasch of that year to 16 Nisan, the dates must be as follows: Jesus celebrated the Pasch on the evening which began 14 Nisan on the official calendar; he was crucified about noon 14 Nisan; the Jewish paschal supper began an hour or two after the Saviour's burial. It is disputed whether Jesus anticipated the date of the Pasch by his own authority (Fouard, Le Camus), or adhered to a Pharisaic rather than a priestly (Sadducee) dating (Vosté, Prat), or followed a different (Galilean) observation of the moon (Lagrange, Braun). Let it suffice to say here that recent studies seem to have given very strong probability to the opinion that Jesus ate the Pasch and instituted the Holy Eucharist after the sundown that closed Thursday 13 Nisan, died on a Friday which was 14 Nisan—a combination which gives very considerable probability to April 7, A.D. 30 as the date of the Redemption. (Nevertheless April 3, A.D. 33, still has its patrons, and their arguments are not negligible; cf. § 676b.)

c 1. St John loves prologues. They always sound the note of solemnity. Here 'his hour', so often mentioned before, is defined (with an allusion to the Passover) as the hour of his passage from this world to the Father. The proofs of love which he had given to his own had been many. Now he gave his final proof of that love (unto death, says Aug.); or as the Gk phrase 'to the end' may also signify, he gave them supreme proof of his love (Chrys., Cyr.). 2. What follows brings a terrible shock of contrast. The supper was in progress (δείνου γινόμενου, rather than 'when supper was done'), but the devil had sown treachery in the heart of one of the company, who is now named 'Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon'. Jn had named Judas with similar emphasis when chronicling the day of the Eucharistic promise, Jn 6:72. 3. There is another antithetic step from the baseness of Judas, to the sublime dignity which Jesus knew was his—universal sovereignty, divine origin, approaching glorification. 4f. And we follow yet another step of contrast as Jesus fully conscious of this greatness rises from table to perform a menial act for all his apostles, including Judas, while they reclined at table (their feet outwards). A lesson in humility is, in this context, the obvious intention of Jesus, and as such he himself explains it, 12-17. The customary ceremonial required a washing of hands, but Jesus added the washing of their feet. It is really humility doing a service of charity, this latter virtue being the one which has chief prominence in the magnificent commentary provided by the liturgical texts of Maundy Thursday. The further purpose of symbolic purification, though popularly assumed since Orig. and Aug., does not clearly result from the text. Jn notes every detail of the Saviour's actions, as if the wonder with which he then viewed the Lord thus serving his servants, still transpired through his pen. 6. Jesus began with Simon Peter, for we cannot conceive the impetuous apostle holding his protest, while the Lord washed the feet of one, or two, or eleven others. 7f. English word-order blunts the force of St Peter's protest, as it sounds both in Greek and Latin. The contrast between 'thou' and 'my' in the apostle's words implies loving adoration expressing itself with utmost emphasis and vehemence. The amazed tone of the refusal comes from him who had declared Jesus 'the Christ, the Son of the living God'. Even when Jesus asks for acquiescence, adding a promise of explanation in the future, 12-16, Peter remains obstinate. 'Never', he said. As the refusal proceeded from love, but not according to knowledge, Jesus overcame it by the proper weapon: 'if I wash thee not, thou shalt have no part with me'. In this threat with which Jesus subdues Peter's love, it cannot well be loss of sanctifying grace, or loss of partnership in the Eucharist or in the priesthood or the apostolate that is meant—all interpretations proposed by different commentators—but rather dissociation of mind from the humiliation of the Passion (cf. Mt 16:23). 9. The fear of any sort of separation from Jesus drives the ardent apostle to the other extreme of offering his hands and head also to be washed. 10f. One who has taken a bath needs no subsequent partial washing, for total cleanness excludes the necessity of partial cleansing. This seems the most satisfactory interpretation, as the words 'but' and 'his feet' are absent from many of the best Gk and Vg MSS. It is in order to show his knowledge of the treason of Judas that Jesus passes to the moral sense saying: 'You are clean, but not all'.

12-17. Resuming full attire and his place at table, Jesus explained the lesson. The disciples called him the Master and the Lord, and such he really was. Humble service of one another (washing of feet being a type of all humble services) is what they must learn from this unique Master and Lord. The Church, while keeping the washing of feet in the liturgy of Holy Thursday, has not regarded it as a permanent sacramental, much less a sacrament. It is a generic example given by the Saviour; and the solemn sentence under double Amen emphasizes that the servant being less than his Lord and the apostle being less than his Sender must not be above doing such things. It is not the knowledge, but the practice of such an example that brings the happiness of true discipleship.

18-30 Elimination of the Traitor—It is from such happiness of true discipleship that Jesus passes to indicate the presence of a miserable apostate, with-

802f out, however, revealing the person to the company. The happiness mentioned did not belong to all the twelve. 18. Knowing everything, Jesus had chosen them all as members of his apostolic college (cf. 6:71), but that one should, by his own fault, betray the confidence shown him was foreseen in the prophetic Scriptures. The text of Ps 40(41):10 is cited according to the Hebrew. The brutal treason of Achitophel, table-companion and intimate counsellor of David, is described as the backward kick of a horse against his Master. Achitophel was the type of Judas. 19. Jesus is careful to make this known beforehand, 'that, when it shall come to pass, you may believe that I am'—the suppressed predicate being 'what I revealed myself to be', namely, the Messiah, the Son of God. The undetermined 'I am' on the lips of Jesus is particularly reminiscent of the majesty of 'I am who am'. 20. This grandeur of Jesus, Messiah and Son of God, supplies, it seems, the connecting link between 19 and 20, which latter verse derives the dignity of the faithful apostles from the dignity of the Messiah and the dignity of the Father who sent him. It is conceivable that the thought of this divinely high apostolic dignity brought on the disturbance which Jesus freely allowed to arise in his spirit, as he turned his mind to the traitor apostle. Though he had twice touched the subject of uncleanness, 11, and treachery, 8, in the apostolic group, he had not yet spoken directly. 21. Now, however, he solemnly attests with emotion, 'Amen, amen I say to you, one of you shall betray me'. Only one knew it was himself, but the eleven were in consternation and in doubt, each about himself (as the synoptics show) and each vaguely about everyone else. St Peter, as usual, wished to cut an intolerable situation short. Placed possibly at the right-hand curve of a horse-shoe arrangement of cushions round a more or less circular table which was probably only slightly above the level of the floor, Peter was near enough to communicate with the disciple in front of Jesus, who was reclining with his head about the level of his Master's breast. Here the Evangelist for the first time covers his anonymity with the beautiful and distinctive title 'the disciple whom Jesus loved'. With a gesture of the hand and in a whisper Peter said to John: 'Who is it?' The familiarity with which John leaned his head back to get the information is charmingly expressed in Gk by the adverb 'thus' (cf. 4:6), that is, just as a bosom friend would do. 26. The sign, a dipped morsel, shows that the supper was not yet finished—an indication that the Eucharist had not yet been instituted. The morsel was not the Eucharist, and was probably a cake of unleavened bread, dipped in the special sauce called charoseth. This sign, of which the whispered significance was known only to John, was a gesture of friendship towards Judas, but it finally hardened him. 27. 'After the morsel Satan went into him' to clench the decision of betraying Jesus. By the words: 'that which thou dost, do quickly' Jesus separates himself from one who had already completely gone over to the enemy. So well had the reputation of Judas been guarded that the company understood the Master's words of a commission to the bursar regarding some festal expenses or almsgiving to the poor. 30. Judas went out immediately. 'And it was night'. To adapt a phrase of Aug., night went out into the night; Judas was going to the Prince of Darkness, separating himself from the Light of the World for ever. There seems to be a growing tendency to rally to the probability (though it is only a probability) that Judas had not received the body of the Lord and was not a priest. [It would be certain if the Eucharist was instituted between the second and third cups of wine and water, as Judas seems to have gone out before the second; cf. § 720a.—Gen. Ed.]

803a 31-33 The Glorification of Jesus—Separated from the traitor and thereby set on the way to his Passion the man Christ regards his glorification, soon to be accomplished on the cross, as virtually realized. 32. Since he is to glorify God by his Passion, God will glorify him; 'in himself' may refer to the glorified or to the glorifier. The resurrection and ascension, forming a unity with the Passion, are regarded as immediately imminent. It is after this verse that many harmonizers insert the institution of the Blessed Eucharist. If so, the term of endearment: 'Little children' (of which this is the only recorded instance from the lips of Jesus) represents the glow of the heart which we now venerate as the Eucharistic Heart. In any case, it introduces a touching adieu, for the Master announces at once his proximate departure and visible withdrawal from his own, in such wise that they cannot accompany him.

34-35 The New Commandment—Jesus gives the old commandment of Lev 19:18 as a new commandment. Mutual fraternal love, as promulgated by the Saviour, is new because of the entirely new standard 'as I have loved you'. The first 'that' introduces the commandment; 'as' fixes the standard; the second 'that' manifests the deliberate placing of that standard—in other words, Jesus' intention in loving us was that we should love similarly—unselfishly (Cyr.), gratuitously (Chrys.), efficaciously, rightly (Aquinas). 35. Charity is the badge of true disciples of Christ. Tertullian (Apol. 30) sets it down as a note which pagans recognized in the Christian community. 1 Jn is full of the exegesis of this commandment. We should also recall the precious information transmitted by St Jerome (in Gal.) that St John in extreme old age could preach nothing else but 'My little children, love one another'. Aug. has the beautiful thought: As Christ the Saviour loved us to save us, so charity should be a thirst for the spiritual salvation of our neighbours, all of whom God wills to be saved. It is primarily amongst disciples in the Christian community, but extends to others without exception, that they also may be disciples.

36-38 Peter's Love and Presumption—St Peter was totally absorbed in the departure of Jesus and fixed in the thought that wherever the Master went he should follow. When Jesus said 'not now' but later, Peter made the bold profession of love and presumption which brought from Jesus the terrible reminder, in the form of a prophecy of the Apostle's triple denial, that fervour does not avail without the consciousness of personal weakness and a correlative dependence on divine grace. Recall the touching prayer of St Philip Neri: 'Lord keep thy hand upon Philip, or Philip will betray thee'. The cockcrow mentioned is the second of Mk—that of the third or fourth watch—before which Peter shall have thrice denied the Master (the life, says Aug.) for whom he thought himself ready to die.

XIV 1-31 Consolation—The whole discourse, chh 14-16, constitutes a farewell address. Consolation predominates in 14, while the developments of the two succeeding chapters are more exhortatory. The said consolation comes very opportunely to allay the consternation with which the prediction of Peter's denial must have filled the eleven. All that is said is meant to reinforce the consolatory word: 'Let not your heart be troubled'—a phrase occurring in 14:1 and 27. The burden of the thoughts is that the departure of Jesus is not abandonment. The Apostles shall have the assurance of his being their Precursor to paradise, of his future return to take them, and of his permanent interest in them, 1-14, they shall have the assurance of his Paraclete present with them, 15-17, the assurance of Jesus' own interior and living presence, 18-24, the guidance of his Paraclete, 25, 26, and finally the peace with which he bids them farewell as well as the joy that his triumph shall bring them, 27-31.

1-14 The Way to the Father—The movement of this first section is towards the Father in heaven, to whom Jesus is the way, and with whom he is one God. 1. The remedy for troubled hearts is faith in God and in the Christ. Whether we read a double imperative: 'believe . . . believe' (Chrys., Cyr., Hil.), or (with Vg

803e an indicative 'you believe' and an imperative 'believe'; God and Jesus are on a level of equality. 2. 'Many mansions' mean that a multitude shall come to the bliss of the Father's house. Diversity of merits (Aug.) is true theology, but not the plain meaning of 'many mansions' in this context. If it were otherwise—if there were only a few mansions—Jesus would have said so, because his departure was really for the purpose of preparing a place for his own. We must not conceive this preparation in a quasi-material sense of fixing places, but rather understand it of the Saviour's work as intercessor, sender of the Holy Spirit, helper of his combatant soldiers. Thus by preparing the occupants, he prepares the place which they shall occupy. 3. His return to take them is at the hour of death for each individual (personal, Veni, Domine Jesu) and for the whole Church at the Parousia, Apoc 22:20. 4. They knew vaguely that he was going to God by the way of obedience. So he told them that they knew both the goal and the road. 5. Thomas, a man of slow, critical mind, objects that they did not even know the goal or destination. 6. Thereupon Jesus gives both the goal and the way their full clear meaning. The Mediator is the way (to be followed by faith and obedience), inasmuch as he is the truth showing the heavenward path, and the living force that causes movement towards the goal, which is an unending vision of truth and an unending possession of life. Coming to the Father is necessarily a supernatural filial motion realized through the Son. There is only one Son in whom we are sons, only one Mediator who is our way to the Father. On earth we are wayfarers (viatores). 7. The orientation towards the Father which Jesus gives is perfect. To know him is to know the Father in the unity of the one divine nature. To see him with the eyes of faith is to see the Father. 8. This mention of seeing the Father raised in the mind of Philip the idea of a theophany, such as was granted to Moses, Ex 33:18, to the 70 elders, Ex 24:9 ff., or to Isaiah, 6:1 ff. Hence the apostle who had said to Nathanael, 'Come and see', now says 'Lord, show us the Father, and it is enough for us'. 9. Jesus pointed out, in a tone of gentle reproof, that even in more than two or three years Philip had not penetrated his Master's identity with God. 10. He therefore repeats the teaching of that famous day of the dedication feast, 10:25-38, when he had said, 'I and the Father are one'. The statement of 10:38 is here reiterated in inverse order: 'I am in the Father and the Father in me'. Identity of nature means that the words of Jesus are the words of the Father. In-being and immanence express the ineffable union of the Father and the Son. 11. Jesus spoke with an authority that commanded belief; cf. Mt 7:29. His word was enough to elicit belief when he said 'I am in the Father and the Father in me'. He is now speaking not to Philip only but to all the Apostles. 12. If they hesitated with regard to his mere word, they should believe in his divinity because of his divine works. From the mention of these works he proceeds to tell them solemnly ('Amen, amen') that hereafter anyone believing in him shall do the same works (works of the same kind) and even greater ones. The meaning is not precisely that Peter's shadow was to cure the sick, whereas Jesus only cured them with a word or a touch. No apostolic miracle that we know surpassed the raising of Lazarus and many others of Jesus' miracles; but the results to be achieved by the Apostles and the Church were to be greater, for example, the conversion of the world, the interior transformation of souls through the communication of the Holy Spirit, the admirable development of the little mustard-seed which the Saviour cast into the earth in the days of his mortality. 13. The power to perform such stupendous works shall not be from the Apostles themselves but from Jesus raised to glory with the Father. He makes it clear that he will do the work, even when the apostolic prayer is addressed to the Father 'in his name'. For the Father is to be glorified in the Son. 14. Similarly when Apostles pray to himself and ask something 'in his name', he will do it. Jesus is, of course, not speaking of the twelve only, but of the apostolic efficacy of the prayer of the Church at all times. Petition 'in the name' of Jesus means not merely the use of the formula: in nomine Christi or per Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, but intimate apostolic union of mind and heart and intention with the Saviour. We have explained the Rheims text, but it should be noted that in 13 the Gk MSS and the best critical text of Vg read: 'whatsoever you shall ask in my name', the words 'the Father' being omitted. The addition, however, gives the true sense of the verse.

15-17 The Paraclete, the Spirit of Truth—'Love in deed and in truth', that is, love shown by keeping the commandments is the condition of the action of Jesus in the world. On behalf of the Church loving his petition to the Father is efficacious. The Father 'will give another Paraclete'. This purely Gk word used by Jn four times of the Holy Spirit, 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7, and once of 'Jesus Christ the advocate of sinners', 1 Jn 2:1, means literally 'one called in', as helper, pleader, defender, patron, advocate (especially in a lawsuit). Its active meaning is the usual one. In this discourse the Gk word is either retained (Syr., Copt., Vg, Aeth., Goth.) or translated as 'Consoler' (Syr.-Pal., Arm., Georg., Slav.) or as 'advocate' (Vg in Ep). Consoler is quite a good rendering, if we understand it to include assistance, advice, protection, intercession, everything, in fact, which is required to sustain and strengthen spiritually. The Paraclete shall remain not a short time only with his recipients, but for ever. 17. He is the spirit of truth, communicating truth and therefore irreceivable by the world placed under the dominion of the Father of lies. The antipathy of the corrupt world and of the merely natural man to spiritual teaching is like congenital blindness. Reception of the Spirit is itself vision and knowledge of the Spirit. Such vision is possessed by the Apostles (and the apostolic Church) because of the presence of the Spirit, which presence and its interior character is expressed by the two prepositions 'with' and 'in'.

18-24 Presence of Jesus and the Father—The advent of the Spirit is really the advent of the whole Trinity. Jesus in heaven is not like a departed parent leaving orphaned children. Invisible to corporal eyes (i.e. to the world) he shall be visible to the eyes of faith, which faith is a contact between the living Church and its living Saviour. The day of Jesus' coming is Pentecost and every day in which he manifests his spiritual presence. 20. 'In that day' there will be the recognition of faith that the Christ is in the Father (with whom as Son he is one God), that the disciples are in him as living members, and that he is in them by infusion of the life they possess owing to their incorporation into him. 21. Again the condition of love is formally stated. Active love of the Son draws down the Father's love and also the Son's responsive love, which is an intimate manifestation perceived by faith and even sometimes experimentally felt. 22. Judas (more commonly called Jude, not the Iscariot) expressed his surprise. His surprise was just like the former surprise of the brethren of the Lord to whose number Jude belonged, 7:4, that Jesus should have mentioned no manifestation of himself to the world. 23. Jesus answered by continuing on the same line of thought. Practical love of Jesus calls down the Father's love and brings a joint visitation of Father and Son, not passing but abiding. 24. The non-observance of Christ's word is non-observance of the Father's word. Hence such conduct excludes from the divine visitation and manifestation, which is really love meeting love.

25-26 The Paraclete as Teacher and Guide—The connexion between 25 and 26 shows that the function of the Paraclete as Teacher and Mentor will be to give full understanding of the teaching of Jesus. 26 is a Trinitarian verse, for the Father sends the Spirit

d 27-31 Farewell—The conclusion shows an example of Semitic inclusion. The discourse ends as it began in words of encouragement, with a slightly enlarged repetition of one phrase: 'Let not your heart be troubled, nor let it be afraid'. It has often been noted that Latins greeted by wishing health, Greeks by wishing joy, Semites by wishing peace. 27. The peace (a real tranquillity of order within the human soul) which Jesus wishes is a legacy and a gift, not a mere formula such as the world uses. The peace of Christ excludes both disturbance and pusillanimity. As at the beginning, the Master couples the thought of his departure with that of his coming (his constant coming). As a matter of fact, his departure, instead of being a cause of sorrow, should be a cause of unselfish joy proceeding from the love of benevolence, 'because I go to the Father: for the Father is greater than I'. The greatness of the Father over the Son was conceived by some early Fathers as the relation of giver of the divine nature to him who received it by generation. Though theologically justifiable in the sense of priority of relationship, this conception is not exegesis. Jesus is speaking as the Word Incarnate and as one going to the Father by the glorification of his humanity. The Word as Son was equal to the Father; the Word Incarnate as man was less than the Father.

e 29. As the departure was to be by the scandal of the Passion, Jesus notes that he is telling all this to his Apostles beforehand, in order to keep their faith from succumbing to the shock of events. 30. Little time is left. The prince of the wicked world—the inspirer of Judas and Jewish hatred—is coming, but against Christ the sinless he has no power. 31. If Jesus delivers himself to the Prince of Darkness, it is to show the world that he loves his Father and carries out his Father's command. After the signal 'Arise, let us go hence', he must at least have left the table and gone to another part of the house. It is difficult to suppose that he spoke chh 15-17 on the way to Gethsemani. Some suppose that we have in chh 15-16 a supplementary collection of paralipomena spoken earlier in the supper and closely connected with 13:31-35; others think that 27-31 are dislocated and should conclude ch 17.

f XV-XVI Exhortation and Encouragement—These two words characterize what is most characteristic in this piece. It builds up the unity of the body of Christ by insistence on vital adhesion to the Saviour and on the cohesive bond of mutual charity, 15:1-17. This fellowship conceived as a living vine and a fruitful fraternity shall have to face the perpetual hostility which the world showed towards Jesus himself, 15:18-25; it shall, however, stand and bear its witness to the Saviour in the strength of the Paraclete, 15:26-16:15. The rest is an epilogue of leave-taking which assures the Apostles that they shall have a perpetual source of joy in him and an invincible confidence that his victory over the world shall be theirs, 16:16-35.

g XV 1-8 The Vine and the Branches—This is almost a pure allegory, the parabolic element in it being very small. The metaphor of the vine and the vineyard signifying the house of Israel is frequent in the OT. It is found in a beautiful canticle, Is 5:1-7, in Jeremiah's divine pleas against Israel, Jer 2:21, in a passage of Ezechiel most closely akin on the negative side to our present allegory, Ez 15:2-8, in the Philo-Ephraimite poet of Ps 79(80)—as also in Jacob's prophetic image of Joseph, Gen 49:22. 1. 'I am the bread of life, I am the light of the world, I am the door, I am the good Shepherd, I am the resurrection and the life, I am the way, the truth and the life'—to these six great assertions this seventh and last 'I am' is now added, as the Saviour's own image of the Church which is the extension of himself, the total Christ, the mystic body of Pauline and Catholic theology. The allegory may have some relation to the Eucharistic wine which the Apostles had drunk, but in any case 'true vine' is the man Christ hypostatically planted in the Godhead and realizing the fecundity and excellent fruitage of the vine-image. The cultivation of it is attributed to the Father. 2. A fruitless branch is lopped off like Judas; the fruit-bearing branch is pruned by the pruning-knife of trials, and thus relieved of noxious excrescence becomes more fruitful. 3. The pruning 'clean' of the Apostles is the result of the word Jesus has spoken to them not only that night but during his whole ministry. 4. Vital immanence—the Eucharistic word of 6:57—is what the disciples must maintain by faith and charity—really by sanctifying grace which is inseparable from the virtues of faith and charity. The branches do not give but take the sap of life from the vine; therefore there is no fruit without immanent adhesion. 5. In indicating the meaning of the metaphor 'I am the vine, you the branches', Jesus says that union secures abundant fructification, 'without me you can do nothing'—a sentence which according to patristic interpretation and the authoritative declaration of the 2nd Council of Orange shows the necessity not only of habitual but of actual grace. These six words exclude every sort of Pelagianism. 6. A separated vine-branch is proverbially useless, destined only to be cast out, to wither, to burn in fire. Nothing could be stronger than St Augustine's comment: Aut vitis aut ignis—either the vine or the fire (of gehenna). 7. Mutual union of vine and branch means also efficacious prayer, which is the indispensable means of fruitful life. 8. Fruitfulness and discipleship, which is union of mind and heart with Christ, go together, and in them the Father has received glory, the moment they exist.

9-17 Union of Charity—9. The greatness of Christ's love for his disciples is seen in the comparison: 'As the Father loved me'. They must make sure that his love for them continues. 10. The observance of his commandments, which is the real proof of that union of wills which is called love, will ensure the permanence of Christ's good pleasure towards them, just as in Jesus' own obedience the Father always acknowledged his beloved Son. 11. These words Jesus has spoken, in order that he may have the joy of the vine in its branches, and that the branches may have the full joy of abundant and precious fruit. 12. He reduces his commands to one which includes all: 'that you love one another, as I have loved you'. 13. The standard is Jesus' own love, and the measure is that 'greater' and greatest measure of generosity which will make one ready to sacrifice life itself on behalf of one's 'friends', who in this context also include one's enemies, who do not return one's love. 14. Again the proof of friendship with him who is Lord and Master, is conformity of will in obedience—idem velle, idem nolle, ea demum firma amicitia est, to will the same, to nill the same, is really firm friendship'. 15. Servants receive orders but are not given reasons, friends are treated as intimates and admitted to the master's secrets. So Christ made known to his disciples all that he heard, as man and teacher, from his Father. 16. Most striking characteristic of all, his love was totally gratuitous. He chose them, not they him. This choice is brought back once more to the allegory of the vine: 'I have appointed you that you should go and bring forth fruit, and your fruit should remain'. In the wonderfully bold metaphors of Ps 79(80), the apostolic tendrils of the true vine were to propagate the growth of salvation to the sea and to the Euphrates and to the ends of the earth. Such fecundity is not the result of natural activity but of prayer drawing everything from the Father in the name of his Christ. 17. All these things that Jesus enjoins have one purpose, 'that you love one another'.

18-XVI 4 Hatred on the part of the World—The external response of the world to this apparition of divine charity in its midst will, strange to say, be 805a hatred. Persecution is really a mark of the true Church. A Christian will never be surprised at it; rather will he expect it. Christ has forewarned us.

18. He tells us: 'It (fixedly) hated me before you' (μεμίσηκεν).

19. The reason of the hostility is found in the fact that the aspirations of disciples of Christ are clearly and categorically opposed to the aspirations of the world. A dissimilarity which is a perpetual reproof must be disliked and hated. 'Not of the world', rather 'chosen out of the world', are the qualifications that make the disciples of Christ a sign of contradiction. 20. Servants cannot look for better treatment than their Master received. Persecution from many, submissive love from some will be their lot, as it was his. 21. The name of Christ is the real sign of contradiction, and hatred is heavily charged and intermixed with culpable ignorance: 'they know not him that sent me'. Jesus is speaking of the Jewish world. 22. The advent of Jesus, their Christ, and his message to them has deprived them of all excuse for their unbelief. 23. Hatred of Jesus is simply hatred of God the Father. 24. His works—unique works such as no one ever did—leave them without any plea to excuse them from sin. They have seen him and they have (fixedly) hated him and his Father, whose words the words of Jesus were, and whose works were his works. 25. So it was predicted in their law (i.e. their Scriptures), for a Psalmist said in a Messianic Psalm, 68(69):5: 'They hated me without cause'; cf. Ps 34(35):19. The connexion between 25 and 26 seems to be that the inexcusability of the unbelieving Jewish world will continue, for testimony to Jesus will also continue through the Holy Spirit and the Apostles who were with him from the beginning. Thus Jesus seems to refer chiefly, if not exclusively, to the years of active Jewish persecution and to the time which had its horizon in the fall of Jerusalem. 28. In a sentence, from which a little compendium of the theology of the Holy Spirit might be extracted, the Master now points to the Paraclete as a witness of himself. The Paraclete's relation of origin or procession from the Son is implicit in the fact that the Son sends him. He shall equally come from the Father (in this temporal mission), but the eternal procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father is commonly held to be explicitly stated by the use of the present tense, 'who proceeds from the Father'. That the Spirit is a person appears clearly, for although the 'Spirit of truth' is neuter in Gk, this name is immediately followed by the masculine personal pronoun 'he' (ἐκεῖνος). The Apostles are witnesses of Christ, as having been with him from the beginning (cf. Ac 1:21 f.: 10:37 ff.); their testimony is distinguished from, but also united to, the testimony of the Holy Ghost (cf. Ac 5:32; 15:28). XVI 1-4. These premonitions are a shield against such terrible shocks as might well make them stagger—excommunication from the synagogue, persecution to death which is actually considered by the persecutors (such as Saul was) as an act of homage to God. Culpable ignorance shall be behind it all, but for the persecuted to be forewarned is to be forearmed.

b XVI 5-15 The Work of the Holy Spirit—5. In this precise way Jesus had not yet told of the future stubbornness, fury and fanaticism of Jewish persecution. He does so now because he is going, and they know where he is going, since they have ceased to question him. 6. From their own (not really disinterested) point of view they see only the sorrowful aspect of his departure. 7. He therefore tells them of its utility to them. It is the necessary condition of the sending and advent of the Spirit. The benefits of this advent may be summed up as three, (a) the evidences of the divinity of the Holy Ghost, (b) the abundance of his outpourings of grace, (c) the spiritualization of the Apostles' love of Jesus. 8-11. The Spirit will impeach the world and put it in the wrong on three points: sin, justice, judgement. The world thought Jesus to be guilty and itself guiltless; the world thought that justice was on its side; the world thought that it had no condemnation 805c to incur. The Spirit will show all these suppositions to be false. In the first place, the Spirit will give clear evidence that Jesus was the Messiah, and in doing so will lay their sin at the door of the Jews as being a sin of unbelief, a sin against the light. Three thousand in Jerusalem made that admission on Pentecost Sunday, Ac 2:37-41, and every conversion of an enemy of Christ will involve the same confession. Secondly, the Spirit will attest that it is not a culprit who ascended into heaven and sits at the right hand of God. As the Apostles preach, as charismata abound, as the Church grows, it will be clear that justice and sanctity belonged to Jesus and not to the Jews who killed him as a malefactor. Thirdly, it will appear that in the battle between Christ and the Prince of this world, it is not the Christ who has succumbed to adverse judgement. Satan has been struck with a sentence of condemnation (κρίματα) and has been cast out of his dominion; cf. 12:31. The destruction of idolatry and the expulsion of demons from the possessed were to be amongst the proofs of this, Ac 8:7; 16:18; 19:12.

12-15. Whereas towards the world the Spirit is an accuser from whom there is no escape, towards the Apostles he is Christ's great substitute to guide them into all religious truth. 12. To render his teaching explicit and clear in detail, Jesus still needed to speak many words, too many for his hearers to take in that evening. He will, therefore, complete their instruction through that other Paraclete. For the fourth time the advent of the Spirit is promised to them, and for the third time he is called 'the Spirit of truth' (14:17; 15:26; 16:13; 'Holy Spirit' in 14:26, cf. 20:22). 13. 'But when he, the Spirit of truth, is come he shall lead you into all truth'. This may mean the revelation of new truths left unrevealed by the Christ, but the view that the Spirit is an internal illuminator rather than a revealer seems more in keeping with the context of this discourse, 14:26, and of the whole Fourth Gospel (1:16-18; cf. 1 Jn 2:20-27). In the person of Jesus and his manifestation of himself up to the day of his ascension, Ac 1:3, and sometimes to individual Apostles after the ascension, Ac 9:4; Apoc 1:1, we would seem to have the full final revelation, in the explicit understanding of which the Church shall ever grow through the illuminating action of the Paraclete. Thus the Spirit of God (substantial love) would be the fecundating principle to secure the Church's living penetration of the deposit given by the 'Image of the invisible God', Col 1:15, in implicit fullness. In Jesus 'all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hidden', Col 2:3. The Spirit is not an independent speaker. 'Whatsoever he shall hear (BWD Vg against 'hears' of SL) he shall speak'. By particular prophecies and still more by full confidence in the Christian economy (as voiced, for instance, in Apoc) 'the things which are to come he shall show you'. 14 f. As Jesus glorified the Father, the Paraclete shall glorify Jesus, receiving and showing what is common to the Father and the Son. This statement implies the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son as from a co-principle.

16-24 Jesus' Departure and Return—Jesus puzzled the Apostles by telling them that in 'a little while they should not see him' and again in 'a little while they should see him'. The addition 'because I go to the Father' is not authentic in 16, but is added by the Apostles in 17, from what they had already heard, 16:10. Thus they make the subject of their inquiry, 'the little while' and 'the little while', even more enigmatic. The enigma has received many explanations. Aug. terminates the first 'little while' at the ascension, and extends the second to the judgement and the final bliss of heaven. In this explanation the second 'little while' is by no means little, but it is urged that the ages of time, however many, are short, a thousand years being like a day in comparison with eternity. Another interpretation, approved by Aug.

805e and followed by Aquinas, has the favour of the majority of modern commentators (Maldonatus, however, being a very notable exception). The first modicum extends to the crucifixion and burial of Jesus, the second terminates with his resurrection. Thus the 'little whiles' are respectively less than 20 and 40 hours in round numbers. After his resurrection they saw him and rejoiced with a joy which no one could ever again take from them. 20 ff. The two states of sorrow and joy are illustrated by the Saviour's parable of a woman in childbirth. 23 f. It is objected that whereas he says that in that day they will ask no further questions, after the resurrection the Apostles still asked some questions, Jn 21:21; Ac 1:6. But Christ evidently means that his resurrection will put his disciples in a permanent condition of certitude about the meaning of what he has said to them. That certitude brought by the resurrection is crowned at Pentecost. Jn himself notes more than once that, when Jesus was glorified, they understood many things that had for formerly been impervious to them, 2:22; 12:16. Then they shall also understand the impetratory power given them in the Saviour's mediation—a thing they had not thought of while he was with them in his mortality. 'If you ask the Father anything in my name, he will give it you'. Aug. emphasizes the last word, and argues that only prayer for one's own needs is certainly infallible. It seems difficult to say that Christ intended to affirm this. The order of words in Gk would rather put the emphasis on 'in my name'.

g 25-32 Conclusion—Even with the tragic note of human weakness sounding so clearly in them, no words could be more comforting than these few verses. 25-27. 'These things I have spoken to you in allegories'. What Jesus had said in the language of symbol and allegory was obscure, but the hour of full light is coming, when 'I will show you plainly of the Father'; cf. 14:26. That hour shall begin with the resurrection and the mission of the Holy Spirit. Then petition shall be made in the name of Christ—the Apostles and the Church after them shall pray per Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum—and although the living intercession of the Saviour on behalf of his own shall go on perpetually, 1 Jn 2:1-3; Heb 7:25, the very fidelity of the Apostles' love for Jesus will draw the benevolence of the Father upon them, for they have believed that he came forth from God. 28-30. With a clearness which, at that moment, seemed new to the eleven he said: 'I came forth from the Father and am come into the world: again I leave the world and I go to the Father'. No one can miss perceiving not only the clarity but the majestic grandeur of this word—a veritable compendium of the Fourth Gospel. The Apostles felt that it answered all the questions they wanted to ask about that enigmatic 'little while'. Not only do they recognize plain speaking ('thou speakest no allegory'), but they feel that Jesus has been reading the secrets of their hearts. 'By this', they say, h 'we believe that thou camest forth from God'. 31 f. He does not doubt the sincerity of their faith, but he speaks a prophecy of human tragedy and divine grandeur. The faith of the Apostles is not solid enough to stand the storm of crisis that is to break that very night. The picture is: His intimates dispersed, Jesus alone—but not alone, for the Father is with him. 33. To comment on the final word of eternal encouragement would be to spoil it: 'These things I have spoken to you, that in me you may have peace. In the world you shall have distress, but have confidence, I have overcome the world (νενίκηκα)'. It is equivalent to saying: My victory over the powers of evil will be yours. St John remembered it when he wrote to the Churches of Asia: 'This is the victory which vanquished the world, your faith', 1 Jn 5:4. Jesus has not conquered without conquering in his body which is the Church. Aug. writes: 'They had confidence and they conquered. In whom but in him? For he would not have conquered the world

if the world conquered his members. Hence the Apostle says: "Thanks be to God who gives us victory", 1 Cor 15:57, and he added immediately, "through our Lord Jesus Christ"'. 805h

XVII 1-26 Christ's Sacerdotal Prayer for Unity— 806a

The sacerdotal or pontifical character of this majestic prayer of the Saviour is noted more than once by Cyr. Alex. in the course of the ten long chapters which he dedicates to its exposition. It is, of course, v 19 that sounds the specifically sacerdotal note. But the pontifical tone of the whole and the fact that the prayer is a sort of preface to the Passion justifies the title of 'sacerdotal prayer'. However, the theme of it is the unity of the Church through the glorification of the Saviour. The exordium of that great sacrificial prayer, the canon of the Roman Mass, shows some affinities, of which an emphatic supplication for unity is not the least. Christ, as we saw, had probably left the supper-room, 14:31. That he was in the open air (possibly on the flat roof of the house) is suggested but not postulated by the gesture of raising his eyes to heaven. Certainly such a gesture, carefully noted by Jn, would have had more external solemnity, if made under the stars and in the light of the Paschal moon. The prayer is patently tripartite, for Jesus first prays for himself, 1-5, secondly for his Apostles, 6-19, thirdly for the whole Church to be won by the preaching of the Apostles, 20-23. The final epilogue of petition is addressed in two parts to the Father for the reunion of all in glory with Jesus, 24, and for the Church militant as set apart from the world in union with Jesus, who is the revealer of the Father and the total object of the Father's love, for he is the beloved Son gathering the Church through the grace of adoption into intimate unity with himself, 25 f.

1-5 Jesus prays for Himself—The vocative address b 'Father' opens the prayer and also opens the special petition of each part, 5, 11, 21, and furthermore opens the two parts of the epilogue, 24, 25. Let it be remembered that the prayer follows on a series of words which had begun with the announcement: 'Now the Son of Man is glorified . . .', 13:31, and ended with the encouragement: 'Have confidence, I have conquered the world'. For the third time, 6:5; 11:41, Jn contemplates Jesus lifting his eyes to heaven. 'The hour has come' means that the Passion is about to begin. It is that Passion which will win for Jesus the glory which as man he now asks at the right hand of his Father. 2. 'Even as thou hast given him power over all flesh, in order that . . .'. The lordship of Christ over all flesh, i.e. over the whole human race, is realized by this glorification, given in view of a further glorification of the Father by the Son. The whole function of him who is 'Lord and Christ' is to give eternal life to those who will receive it by living and abiding faith. 3. Therefore the Saviour defines e what eternal life consists. It is faith here and vision hereafter, neither of which is arid knowledge but knowledge glowing with charity. The object of such knowledge is the one true God, as distinct from polytheistic idols, and of God's Envoy Jesus Christ. This is perfect Monotheism in the Trinitarian Messianism of the Incarnation. A difficulty has been raised regarding the use of the appellation 'Jesus Christ'. Nowhere else does the Saviour call himself thus. It may be a redactional addition of the Evangelist (Lagrange, Huby, Braun). As usual in our Lord's words (cf. 5:24) eternal life possessed by the knowledge of faith here is in the forefront, the knowledge of vision being implicit or in the full perspective. 4 f. The 'work', by the fulfilment of which Jesus has glorified the Father, is the Passion already regarded as consummated. It is to the Passion that the glorification of the Redeemer is constantly referred (cf. Phil 2:9 ff.). In praying for the glory which was his with the Father, before the world was, Jesus asks that the full glory of the Word should show itself in the Word Incarnate—that he might be set in enjoyment of the glory of

- d 6-19 Jesus prays for the Apostles—Petition for the Apostles begins at 9, the preceding words being an introductory preface in which Jesus enumerates the claims which they have to the benevolence of his Father. 6 ff. Given to him out of the world as out of a mass of corruption, he has made known the Father's name to them. This election is the first fact which entitles them to special consideration. Secondly, they belonged to the Father by the goodness of their dispositions under the guidance of his loving providence. Thirdly, he gave them to Jesus by that interior attractive force of faith which drew them to him (cf. 6:37, 39, 44, 66). Fourthly, they had surrendered mind and will to the teaching they had received from Jesus, recognizing that all he had was from the Father, accepting his words, acknowledging his divine origin, and believing in his heavenly mission. 9. Jesus who prayed for his crucifiers does not absolutely exclude the world from his prayer; he is interested in the conversion of the world, 23; but here he is specially praying for the Apostles. In any case, he could not pray for the world as the world—except for its conversion—because the unspiritual world is hostile to God (cf. 8:43; Jas 4:4). His prayer for the Apostles is founded on three reasons, which have reference to the present moment. 9b-11a. They belong to the Father as being his Son's very own. Indeed, the Father and the Son have all in common—'all my things are thine and thine are mine' (cf. Lk 15:31 for half the phrase spoken by a father to a son). Moreover, Jesus has been and is glorified in them, for they have persevered in their faith, even when others fell away, 6:68 f. Besides, at his departure, they are now about to be left alone in the world. 11b. It is here that the direct petition for them begins. It is a petition for holiness—for apostolic consecration to the service of God and of truth in the midst of a corrupt world which serves 'the father of lies'. Hence Jesus places the epithet 'holy' before 'Father'. One recalls the great vision of Is 6 in which the Prophet learned the great distance between God and human corruption so vividly that he constantly calls God 'the Holy One of Israel'. 'Holy Father, keep them in thy name (that divine name) which thou hast given to me'. Which not whom is the reading of the best MSS (BSCLAW etc.). The 'name' is the divine essence manifesting itself in its attributes of power and wisdom—these together with the divine nature having been communicated from the Father to the Son. The petition is that the Apostles should be kept united in mind and will and heart, realizing a unity modelled on the ineffable pattern in which all is one in a distinction of persons.
- f 12-14. Up to the present, Jesus has kept them, so that none of them fell into such temptation as brought permanent rejection (cf. 18:9), except 'the son of perdition'—a Semitism of metaphorical relation denoting destiny, like 'son of gehenna', 'son of death'. Judas was destined to perish, but by his own fault. The Scripture had foretold it, Ps 40(41):8. The treason of Judas, foreseen as the result of the traitor's own malice, was an element in the plan of redemption. This prayer spoken by Jesus in the world is to secure for the Apostles a full participation in the serene joy which he himself had in the accomplishment of his Father's will. The professors of heavenly doctrine will surely be hated by that world which holds to an earthly philosophy. 15. Jesus does not ask that they should be taken out of the dangerous environment—this would be the end of their apostolate—but that they be kept from contagion—'evil' here seems to be the sum of evil influences rather than the personal evil one, although Johannine usage in his first epistle favours the latter. 16. 'They are not of the world, as I am not of the world'. To keep them from evil, however, is only the negative side of what Jesus desires for his faithful ones. 17 ff. The culmination of his prayer for them is: 'Sanctify them in the truth, thy word is truth'. What is asked is that God should 806e consecrate them for the priestly office of preaching the truth, for what St Paul calls the 'hierarchy of the Gospel', Rom 15:16. Their mission is the continuation of the mission of Jesus. 19. 'And for them do I sanctify myself, that they also may be sanctified in truth'. A word of the same generic signification will vary its sense according to the subject. Jesus consecrates himself. That consecration is not the hypostatic union, nor the 'unction' of his humanity by the Holy Spirit, but the priestly consecration of himself as a victim on the cross. The sacrifice of Christ gives the Apostles a sacrificial consecration for their work in a true sense ('in truth' without the article). It is obviously not an external consecration such as that operated by the sacrifices of the Old Law. It is a sanctification of a kind corresponding to the sacrifice that makes it, and is therefore an internal sanctification; cf. Heb 9:13.

20-23 Jesus prays for the Church—20. The prayer passes to the generations to come, to all believers whose faith is founded on the Apostolic teaching. 21. What Jesus asks for them is unity—a unity of souls, imitative of the Divine Trinity (and, no doubt, a social unity of bodies in which St Cyril sees the effect of the Holy Eucharist)—a unity which will be a proof to the world that God is here. 22. The glory which Jesus received and which he has given to his Church—to all faithful disciples of the Apostles—is not so much the glory of miracles and wondrous concord (Chrys.), or the glory of Christ's humanity resplendent in the Church (Aug., Thom.), but rather the fundamental glory of divine filiation (Ambrose, cf. 1:18). Adoptive sonship includes everything else and especially that unity like to the union of the Father and Son, which is the central petition of this prayer. 23. 'I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one; and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them even as thou hast loved me'. Again we have a clear echo of the grace of the Eucharist, 6:57 f. SS Cyril and Hilary and many commentators after them were not wrong in thinking that it is through the Eucharist that this prayer of Jesus is realized. It is through the 'concorporating' sacrament that the Church is enabled to show the world that the Father loves the Church as he loves his own Son. It is really one love, for the Church is Christ.

24-26 Epilogue—The final petition is that all this magnificence may be fulfilled in the vision of heavenly glory. The glory of the Word shining in his humanity, which we now see through the dark medium of faith, is the final reward. Let us note the strong Volo with which Jesus prays for this: 'I will that where I am, they may be with me, that they may see my glory'. This glory is the glory of the Godhead in the Word Incarnate. Such glory, communicated to the sacred humanity in accordance with a divine decree of predestination, manifests the eternal love with which the Father has loved his Son. We may also say—and it is well for us to feel and relish it interiorly—that this strong Volo of the Saviour shows magnificently how 'he loved his own who were in the world and loved them unto the end'. He wants his apostolic Church with him in the glory of heaven. The petition ends here, for the remaining verses, 25 f., opening with the title: 'Just Father' separate the Church—as the Lady Electa (to use a Johannine phrase)—from the deliberately blind world. 25. The recognition in deed and in truth of the mission of Jesus is what saves men 'from the perverse generation', Ac 2:40, or world, which St Augustine calls by the fearful name of massa damnata. To the word 'know' (recognize) in 25 corresponds the word 'make known' in 26: 'I have made known thy name to them'—to the Apostles as foundations of the Church—and will make it known'—after the resurrection myself, and after Pentecost by my Spirit—'that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them'—as proved by the gifts of grace—and I in them'—by the immanence which gives 806i them life in abundance. The profundity of these concluding words did not escape Aug.: 'How', he asks, 'comes it that the love with which the Father loved his Son is in us also, except for the reason that we are his members, and in him we are loved when he, the whole Christ, is loved by the Father—that is, the head and the body?' (Tract. 111).

XVIII-XI THE PASSION AND RESURRECTION

807a XVIII-XIX The Passion—In recording the events of the night and the day that began in Gethsemane and ended at the rock tomb beside the place of crucifixion, Jn only narrates incidents omitted by the Synoptists or, if he rejoins them, otherwise supplements their narratives. The chief headings of the Passion according to Jn are: the arrest of Jesus, 18:1-12, his appearance before Annas and Caiphas synchronizing with the triple denial of St Peter, 13-27, the first interrogation before Pilate, 28-38a, the second interrogation—Ecce homo and condemnation to the cross, 19:1-16, the crucifixion, 17-22, the division of garments, 23 f., the last words and death of Jesus, 25-30, the piercing of the sacred side, 31-37, his burial, 38-42.

b XVIII 1-12 Arrest—1. The journey with which this chapter opens began at the house of the Cenacle (Supper Room) in the SW. quarter of Jerusalem and possibly followed an old Jewish or Maccabean road discovered in recent years by the Assumptionist Fathers. The Water Gate near the Pool of Siloe would be the most probable exit from the city. Turning to the left or north, Jesus and the eleven would have skirted the eastern slope of the old Jebusite site of the city of David and of the temple esplanade, outside the Porch of Solomon. The crossing of 'the brook of Cedron'—literally meaning 'the winter stream of turbid (water)'—is mentioned only by Jn, probably with some reminiscence of the pathetic crossing of the same torrent by David, as he fled from Absalom, 2 Kg 15:23. The garden to which Jesus went is named Gethsemane (Oil-press) by the Synoptists. The property evidently belonged to a friend. 2. Judas knew that place on Olivet, because it was a favourite retreat of Jesus; cf. Lk 21:37; 22:39. 3. The arresting party, to which Judas acted as guide, Ac 1:16, was composed of Roman soldiers and Jewish guards. The former, described as a cohort commanded by a tribune, 12, would in strict parlance number 600 men—or at least 200, this being the strength of a manipule often denoted by the same Gk word (σπεῖρα). Thus the whole party was an armed band of soldiers, Levitical police and lackeys of the chief priests, 10. The lanterns and torches on a night when the moon was full, would have been largely a matter of military routine. 4. Jn, who omits the kiss of Judas, is careful to note the full foreknowledge and sovereign freedom with which the Saviour gave himself into the hands of his enemies. The little dialogue, 4-8, with its accompanying circumstances is most awe-inspiring. 5. The band, with which Judas stood, answered the question: 'Whom seek ye?' by using the ordinary designation of the Master: 'Jesus of Nazareth'; cf. Mk 10:47; Lk 18:37. The words, 'I am he', uttered by him who could say: 'I am who am', caused what Jn undoubtedly attributes to miraculous power, namely, a backward stampede, involving an impressive fall to the ground of many, at least, of the arresting party. 7-8. The same question having been asked again and answered, Jesus demanded free departure for his companions—not calling them disciples, in order to save them more surely from arrest. 9. A word of Jesus, 17:12, had guaranteed the eleven against their moral destruction (which could have happened if they had been arrested), and so Jn does not seem to extend the word unduly to preservation from physical destruction. 10. In describing the apostolic act of violence which ensued, Jn alone names Simon Peter as the one who struck the blow, joins Lk in specifying the right ear, but is the sole recorder of the name Malchus, said to be a Nabataean name 807d (Heb. Melek) equivalent to our Rex or Roy—these being used in English both as baptismal and family names. Malchus was a servant of the high-priest, not one of the temple police. 11. In reprimanding Simon Peter, Jesus made a clear reference to the words of his agony in the garden, otherwise omitted by Jn: 'Chalice', of course, means the portion assigned to one (in a banquet), not what comes to him by the chance of a lottery cup. 12. In arresting Jesus they bound him, for the traitor had said: 'Lay hold on him and lead him away carefully', Mk 14:44.

13-27 Before Annas and Caiphas—This narrative raises a difficulty which must be treated briefly here. 24 suggests that Peter's first denial, 15-18, and the first examination of Jesus, 19-23, took place in the house of Annas, who in this hypothesis, is called high-priest in 15, 16, 19, whereas in 13 and 24 the title is given (as elsewhere in Jn 11:49) to Caiphas. As the Synoptists place Peter's denials in the house of Caiphas, one part of the difficulty has been met by supposing that Annas lived in the same pontifical palace as his son-in-law, the Pontiff of the year. Hence the courtyard of Caiphas was also the courtyard of Annas. As there is no trace of a topographical tradition marking a distinct palace of Annas before the 14th cent., this supposition is tenable; but what of the title 'high-priest' being given to Annas? Lk 3:2 and Ac 4:6 are appealed to, but the appeal does not clear the Johannine narrative of confusion. A transposition of 18:24 after 18:13 rectifies the situation. This transposition is not purely arbitrary, for it has the support of the Syro-Sinaitic MS, of Cyril of Alexandria, and (it is said) of a minuscule codex 226, which, however, puts 24 in the middle of 13. Certain reasons of internal criticism drawn from the omission or fluctuation of a particle (δέ or οὐδὲν) at the beginning of 24 are also alleged. However, the transposition, though not devoid of probability, does not seem to stand before the united voice of the MSS and versions. The difficulty can be satisfactorily met (even without supposing one palace), by understanding 'high-priest' of Caiphas only and taking 24 as introductory to a resumption of the history of Peter's denials. The whole passage is so evidently a series of reminiscences, that 24 (though seeming to be out of its logical place) is quite characteristic of the evangelist's style. Jn alone mentions that Jesus was brought to Annas first. It was an act of courtesy, for the old man was a political power and notoriously shrewd in managing business affairs. Called Hananus (Hananya=the Lord is merciful) by Josephus, he had attained the high-priesthood through Quirinius in 6 B.C., was deposed by Valerius Gratus in A.D. 15, but still succeeded in having five of his sons (Eleazar, Jonathan, Theophilus, Matthias, Ananus the Younger) elevated to the high-priesthood. Lk 3:2 sets him before Caiphas (the actual high-priest) in marking the pontifical year, and in Ac 4:6 he is also named first. Jn gives as reason for this present act of deference to Annas that 'he was the father-in-law of Caiphas, the high-priest of that year'. 14. Caiphas, whose personal name was Joseph, was altogether 17 years high-priest, 18-36, and was also, as Jn 11:50 reveals him, a politician rather than a priest. Jn here cites the Pontiff's decision of some weeks earlier, to show that the case of Jesus was prejudged. 15 f. Two disciples, Simon Peter and another, followed Jesus. The studious anonymity as well as the association with Peter indicates the evangelist himself. Some have thought of the young man who had fled in Gethsemane, Mk 14:51 f. How the son of Zebedee came to be known to the high-priest has not been explained, but is not thereby made incredible. A word from him to the portress obtained admission for Peter. 17. Her question to the Apostle (expecting however a negative answer) shows that she knew his companion was a disciple. Peter denied discipleship. 18. April nights can be cold at Jerusalem. Hence the brazier in the courtyard, to which Peter drew g 19-23. The palace of Caiphas in which this first interrogatory was held, as well as the two judicial sessions of the night, Mt 26:57-68, and of the morning, Mt 27:1, Lk 22:66-71, is traditionally located (since the pilgrim of Bordeaux 333, it seems) near the Cenacle, south of the Sion Gate, now called Neby Dâūd. The claims of the Armenian Monastery of Mount Sion are still upheld, but since 1927 the sanctuary brought to light by the Assumptionists and named Saint Peter in Gallicantu has found strong defenders (Marchet, Power). 19. The questions of Caiphas have reference to two points—disciples whereon a political charge might be grafted, and teaching, in view of religious consequences. 20. Jesus, taking full responsibility, says nothing about the former, and in regard to the latter refers the Pontiff to the public witnesses of his quite open teaching—given in synagogues and in the temple. 22. This just and dignified answer earned him a blow with the open palm from a guard, who pretended zeal for the honour of the Pontiff. 23. Jesus, whose teaching on turning the other cheek, Mt 5:39, is most often to be observed by a peaceful interior attitude of soul, calmly reminded the striker that one under accusation can demand proper justice and the proper forms of justice—testimony against him, if he speaks ill, respect for his person, when he speaks well.

h 24. The short sentence or note which says that Annas sent Jesus bound to Caiphas is inserted here as something which the Evangelist recalls for the purpose of continuing the account of Peter's denials. 25-27. Nine denials of his Master by Peter can be counted in the Gospels, if variations of persons, circumstances, and verbal forms are taken into account. But all insist that the denials were three. Three distinct times, when called to answer by one or more persons at once, Peter denied our Lord. The first denial had no variety of circumstance; the second and third had. Hence they are variously reported according to the particular circumstance or set of circumstances apprehended by the witness. Jn sets these last two denials in relation to queries from bystanders at the brazier, and from a relative of Malchus. The (second) cockcrow, as we said, 13:38, may have been as close to daybreak as the beginning of the 4th watch, 3-6 a.m.

808a 28-38a First Interrogation before Pilate—28. The praetorium to which Jesus was brought from Caiphas was the residence of the governor. The procurators of Judaea, who were subordinate to the imperial Legate of Syria, resided habitually at Caesaraea, but came to Jerusalem for the great festivals or whenever a concourse or other circumstances endangered public tranquility. About Pilate's place of residence at Jerusalem there has been a difference of opinion. The Herodian palace near the present Jaffa Gate would seem to be naturally indicated as the Jerusalem residence of the supreme Roman magistrate, and we know from Josephus (BJ 2, 14, 8; 15, 5) that a quarter of a century later the governor Gessius Florus lodged there. Pilate also by the famous incident of the shields would have signified his intention of doing so. On the other hand, the arx Antonia or vast fortress-palace built by Herod at the NW. angle of the temple area was undoubtedly the most central and best post of vigilance. Especially, when the air was electric, it would be the proper place for the Governor to lodge. Since the 13th cent. the Via Dolorosa has begun from there, and excavations made between 1927 and 1932 in the property of the Sisters of Sion seem to have given reasonable grounds for connecting this place with the Lithostrotos of Jn 19:13. Probabilities in favour of the Antonia have therefore decidedly grown in recent years. The time was morning, probably as early as 6 a.m. by our clocks. The Sanhedrists did not enter the pagan residence to avoid legal defilement which would prevent them from taking part in the Paschal rites that evening. Meanwhile they were defiling their consciences with murder. Jesus, we may suppose, was conducted at once to a judgement hall within, entering, perhaps, by the northern long side of the great quadrangular fortress. 29. Pilate is now mentioned for the first time. Procurator of Judaea since A.D. 26 he is known to us not only from the Gospels but also from Philo and Josephus. His haughty and imprudent contempt of Jewish religious susceptibility is shown by two desecrations of the city, first with ensigns bearing the image of Caesar, and secondly with shields similarly adorned which he set up in the Herodian palace. He also offended Jewish feeling by the appropriation of temple monies for the building of an aqueduct. He was often cruel; cf. Lk 13:1. It was an act of cruelty against Samaritans that led finally in 36 to his deposition by the Syrian Legate Vitellius. The Gospels, however, show that he had something of a Roman sense of justice, was at once sceptical and superstitious, but above all weak as an upholder of right, when his position was thereby threatened. He feared above all things the frown of Tiberius Caesar. Jesus seems to have impressed him from the beginning. So, when he went out (on to a balcony?) to the Jews, he demanded very categorically the formulation of their charge. 30. Having come only for the ratification of a capital sentence, which they could not carry out themselves, they were taken aback. They retorted that they would not have delivered up a fellow Jew to Pilate, if he had not done wrong. 31. Before this vagueness, Pilate pretends to understand the matter as a minor (non-capital) charge, to be judged by themselves according to Jewish law. Thereupon they make it clear that they want the death penalty, admitting that they have not the ius gladii or power of execution. 32. Thus Jesus, as he had foretold, Mt 20:19; Jn 3:14; 8:28; 12:32, was to die by the Roman provincial penalty of crucifixion.

33. Pilate proceeds to an interrogation in the hall within. Of the three charges given by Lk 23:2, namely sedition, anti-fiscal agitation, pretending to royal sovereignty, the governor takes only the last which was laesa maiestas or treason in a very definite sense. '(So) thou art the king of the Jews', is, as the context shows, an assertion uttered with something of an interrogatory tone. Pilate would have expected a negative answer. 34. Jesus distinguished: Did that statement come from Pilate (a Roman) or from others (namely Jews)? If king meant a rival of Tiberius, No; if it meant the Israelite Messias, Yes. This was what was implied in the question of Jesus to Pilate. 35. The latter, having signified that the affair against Jesus was all a Jewish matter, asked definitely: 'What hast thou done?' 36. Jesus does not answer this question, except by clearly defining what his kingship is. It is not of terrestrial origin. If it were, his guards—the military force which in that hypothesis he would have had—would have striven against his arrest. Consequently his kingship is not 'from hence'—terrestrial—and therefore he is no Palestinian rival of the majesty of Roman Tiberius. 37. Pilate, surprised at an avowal of kingship of any kind, asked: 'Art thou a king then?' The answer given by Jesus is Yes. He is a Teacher-King, born and present in the world to proclaim the royal authority of truth. 'Every one who is of the truth (joined to it by the filial sympathy of true goodness, cf. 3:21) heareth my voice', i.e. obeys me. 38a. Pilate showed the scepticism of his soul by the question: 'What is truth?' but went no further. It is at this point that Pilate sent Jesus off to Herod; cf. Lk 23:6-12.

38b. When Jesus was brought back from Herod's court, Pilate, convinced that he had only to deal with a philosopher or a dreamer, went out and again informed the Jews: 'I find no cause in him'. Up to this Pilate has done his duty as a Roman magistrate, but he did not follow out the course of justice by immediately releasing the prisoner. The sending of Jesus to Herod, Lk 23:6-12, was the beginning of compromise; the proposal of the minor penalty of 808d flogging, Lk 23:16, was a further step on the way of weakness. 39 f. Jn only mentions as a first subterfuge the proposed preference of Jesus to Barabbas (Son of Abba—rather 'Masterson' than 'Fatherson' in our English style of names). This suggestion of amnesty likewise violated the innocence of Jesus. Jn tells briefly that the preference was given by the Jews to Barabbas, and ends with one of those characteristically tragic sentences: 'Now Barabbas was a robber'.

809a XIX 1-7 Scourging and Ecce Homo—1. Pilate ordered the scourging. Generally a preliminary of crucifixion, it was administered with the horrible flagellum made of thongs or the still more horrible flagrum armed with bone or metal. The mode of executing the penalty is described elsewhere, § 721h. 2 f. The soldiers themselves took the initiative in the mockery of the crown of thorns. Jn mentions the crown, the purple garment, the mock-imperial salute (imitation of Ave Caesar imperator), the blows with the open hand; he omits the reed, the genuflexions, the spittings. 4. Pilate seizes on what he considers a new opportunity of saving Jesus. Disfigured by the wounds and blood caused by scourges and thorns, and wearing a crown and a robe that made him look much more pathetic than any tinselled pretender to royalty could possibly be, Jesus was led out. 'Behold the man' was intended to excite pity or (in the more brutal) such a kind of laughter as would wish to push tragedy no further. 6. In the chief priests (here mentioned for the first time as a group directing hostilities before the praetorium) and in the Levitical guards it only excited more emphatic hatred. The cry 'Crucify, crucify', recorded for the first time by Jn and with the stark brevity of verb without object (attested by the best Gk and Lat. MSS) represents a frenzy of hatred. Pilate stiffens before it. There is both sarcasm and strong contempt in the words: 'Take him you and crucify him: for I find no cause in him'. For the third time in Jn (4th in the harmonized narrative) Pilate says, 'I find no cause'. 7. The Sanhedrists being stung by the scoff at their dependence on Rome to carry out a capital sentence, their fury turns back, in spite of their plans, to the religious charge. For a capital crime against Roman law they substitute a crime against Jewish law—blasphemy, punishable by the Jewish code with stoning or (failing the power to stone) by execution in the Roman way, i.e. by substituting the Roman penalty of crucifixion. The words: 'He made himself the Son of God' can have nothing but their full sense. Otherwise the blasphemy statute of Lev 24:16 could not be invoked.

c 8-16 Last Interrogation and Sentence—8. Pilate must have already felt, at least vaguely, that no man ever faced jealous hatred like this man. Hence his scepticism could not prevent him, on hearing of Jesus' claim to be 'Son of God', from suspecting that the prisoner might be more than human. 9. It was, however, superstitious fear and curiosity rather than love of truth that prompted his question: 'Whence art thou?' Jesus did not answer. 10. Pilate's remark in the face of this silence shows that he conceived himself as supreme arbiter of the prisoner's liberty and life. 11. The answer of Jesus refers to the present situation—to the power of the death-sentence towards which Pilate was drifting. 'The power given from above' does not refer to Pilate's civil jurisdiction. Pilate has the power to crucify by a permissive decree of God not authorizing the crime but permitting the event in view of the redemption of the world. 'Therefore he that hath delivered me to thee, hath greater sin'. The one who has greater sin is Caiaphas rather than Judas. The latter's treason was indeed blackest of all, but is not presumed known to Pilate, who had moreover already said: 'Thy own nation and the chief priests have delivered thee up to me'. The 'therefore' is exceedingly difficult to interpret. The logical connexion implied in it would seem to be conveyed most satisfactorily by the following paraphrase: 'You, Pilate, a pagan and under God's permissive providence an instrument in this crime, partly unwilling, though sufficiently responsible to be a sinner, have sin indeed, but for the very reason of your lesser and his greater responsibility, the spiritual ruler of Israel who handed Israel's Messiah over to you has greater sin'.

12-16. As Pilate is now seeking to release Jesus it is clear that the religious charge has failed; and since the political charge has also failed, there is only one thing left, to play on Pilate's fears for his own security. The Sanhedrists now play their last desperate card and wrest the death-sentence from Pilate by intimidation. 12. After the last word of Jesus—'And from this' is both temporal and logical—Pilate tried to release him. He is deterred by the threat of denunciation to the emperor. Not to be 'a friend of Caesar' was a serious matter, when the Caesar was Tiberius who, as Suetonius informs us, was atrociously severe where there were suspicions or charges of treason—'judicia maiestatis atrocissime exercuit' (Vita Tiberii, 58). 'If thou release this man, thou art not Caesar's friend. For whosoever maketh himself a king declares against Caesar'—this was decisive. 13. Pilate had Jesus brought out and set up his tribunal—the folding curule chair of a Roman magistrate—in the place . . . called Lithostrotos' (from the remarkable pavement), but also known by the Hebrew (Aramaic) name of Gabbatha, meaning a height or eminence rather than a bare front (also etymologically possible). 14. Jn also carefully notes the time. Parasceve (preparation) had become synonymous with Friday, but here it probably means the preparation day before the Pasch. It was actually Friday, Mk 15:42. The hour was approximately the sixth (probably about 11 a.m., cf. Mk 15:20 'the third hour'). Defeated but haughty towards those forcing his hand, Pilate said: 'Behold your king'. 15. Another frenzied cry for the crucifixion of their victim—and Pilate responded with the deliberate question: 'Am I to crucify your king?' To which the leaders of the theocratic people said: 'We have no king but Caesar'. 16. According to legal form the sentence had to be read—as being irrevocable. A usual form of sentence was Ibis ad crucem—'Thou shalt go to the cross'. All that Jn says however is that Pilate delivered him to the Jews that he might be crucified (by an execution squad of four Roman soldiers under the command of a centurion).

16b-22 The Crucifixion—Jn is very brief regarding the via dolorosa. He does not repeat what Mt, Mk, Lk had recorded of Simon the Cyrenean, nor the sympathy shown by some women of Jerusalem, Lk. It was of course the soldiers, not the Jews, that took Jesus (and led him out). 17. The cross which he carried would, on the basis of probabilities established by ancient references to crucifixion, be the patibulum or cross-beam only. The upright, which the Gk word σταυρός more properly indicates, would in this case have been already erected at the place of execution. Nevertheless, all the narratives suggest that Jesus carried a heavier weight than a mere cross-beam; the use of one and the same word by Jn identifies the instrument which Jesus carried with that beside which his mother stood; Tertullian who knew the facts of crucifixion, writing against Jews (Adv. Jud., 10), says very confidently: 'Jesus carried his cross on his shoulder'—note singular number, for the patibulum was lashed over both shoulders. Jesus, therefore, probably carried the whole cross, which was a crux immissa (not decussata or commissa), having an upright above the cross-beam, to which an inscription could be affixed; cf. § 722b. The place of crucifixion was called Golgotha (Aram. Gulgulta), meaning skull, not because the skull of Adam was unearthed there to receive the flow of Christ's blood—a beautiful conception still often represented on crucifixes—nor because it was like a head in the imaginary topographic skeleton of Jerusalem, but simply because it was a hill promontory b 18. Jn repeats, in a different form of words, what the Synoptists recorded of the crucifixion of Jesus between two thieves (Is 53:12—but the citation in Mk 15:28 is possibly a gloss imported from Lk 22:37). 19. The form of the title of the cross, given substantially by Mt, Mk, Lk, is most probably reproduced with verbal accuracy by Jn. As Pilate had to write the sentence of crucifixion, the words 'Jesus of Nazareth King of the Jews' would be excerpted from some such formula as: Jesum Nazarenum Regem Judaeorum crucis supplicio animadverti placet. With the same evident unwillingness the proconsul Galerius Maximus pronounced a similarly worded sentence of decapitation on St Cyprian. 20. Pilate would have written Jesum Nazarenus Rex Judaeorum with his own hand in Latin (the language of administration) and then ordered the same to be written in Greek (the language of lettered people and of pilgrims) and in Hebrew (Aramaic, the spoken language of Palestine). 21 f. His firmness in refusing to change the title of the cross was a magistrate's insistence on the irrevocability of a Roman sentence, mixed with a desire to have this revenge on the Jews; but, in God's providence, Pilate's inscription stands as a perpetual monument of the Kingship of Jesus of Nazareth.

810a such as Arabs in Jerusalem still call rās (head). As the Calvary under the roof of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is most probably the true site, we can calculate the length of the via dolorosa—from Antonia to Golgotha—as something over one-third of a mile.

c 23-24 Division of Garments—Here Jn adds notable clarifying details. None of the evangelists say that Jesus was crucified in absolute nakedness, but that was undoubtedly the rule, and the Fathers and most commentators have supposed that there was no departure from the rule in this case. Judging from passages in the Talmud, Jewish feeling was against total nudity even in capital executions. The blasphemous (and cent.?) graffito of the crucifixion from the Paedagogium of the Palatine at Rome cannot indeed be adduced as evidence on this point, but it is worth noting that it shows a loin-cloth. Four pieces of the clothing in which Jesus went to Calvary fell to the four soldiers of the execution squad. These (cloak, cincture, sandals and head-dress?) were divided. The completely woven unsewn tunic was too valuable to tear into pieces. They cast lots for it, and thus literally fulfilled the prophecy of Ps 21(22):19 here cited by Jn, but of doubtful authenticity in Mt. This seamless coat or tunic (which Trier and Argenteuil claim to possess) has, at least from the time of St Cyprian, been regarded as a symbol of the unity of the Church.

d 25-27 Jesus and His Mother—Jn draws a marked contrast, difficult to render in translation, between the soldiers who did these things and the little group that stood beside the cross. 25. The balance of the opening phrase (even as estimated by the maker of the Syriac Peshitta) leads us to distinguish not three but four women beside the cross of Jesus. The disputed point is whether 'his mother's sister' is 'Mary of Cleophas' or another cousin of our Lady. The general love of anonymity and reticence shown by Jn would suggest that if she is the latter we must identify her with Salome, his own mother, who was certainly on Calvary that day, Mk 15:40. As Mary Cleophas is identifiable with 'Mary the Mother of James the less, and of Joseph', Mk 15:40, Jn most probably mentions the same three women as Mk, but Jn alone names the Saviour's mother, §673b. The incomparable comment of St Ambrose at the end of a letter to the clergy of Vercellae (Vercelli) should be read in PL 16, 1218. Part of this eloquent page is found in the Breviary

e (Sept 15). 26 f. The literal or immediate sense of Jesus' words: 'Woman, behold thy son' (addressed to his mother) and 'Behold thy mother' (addressed to Jn) is a last touching fulfilment of the fourth commandment. Jesus provides for his mother, and the privileged legatee of this precious trust is 'the disciple whom Jesus loved'. 27b indicates this clearly: 'From that hour (comparable in many ways to the 10th hour of that wonderful first day 1:39) the disciple took her to his home'. The further spiritual meaning (which attaches a declaration of the universal spiritual maternity of Mary to these words) is barely suggested by Origen in the 3rd cent., and is not clearly enunciated (except rhetorically by George of Nicomedia, friend of Photius) either in the east or the west, till it finds its theologian in Rupert of Deutz (1070-1129). The position of this interpretation in the Church today scarcely permits us to regard it as an accommodated sense. Jn is mystically the representative of the human race called to be spiritual children of the Mother of Jesus. This motherhood of Mary was, latently at least, the mind of the Church from the earliest times—'hoc perpetuo sensit Ecclesia' (Leo XIII, Sept. 5, 1895—cf. Pius XI, Rerum Ecclesiae, Feb. 28, 1927).

28-30 Last Words and Death of Jesus—Of the first f three words of petition, pardon, and piety spoken by Jesus on the cross, Jn has only the third just dealt with; of the last four words of desolation (moral suffering), thirst (physical suffering), consummation, and voluntary surrender, he has two: 'I thirst' and 'it is consummated'. 28. He fulfilled Ps 68(69):22 (cf. Ps 21(22):19) when he said the former of these. The soldiers had sour wine with them—a mixture of acid wine and water called posca. A sponge, which served for some purpose or other, formed part of their apparatus. This they dipped in the vessel and fixing it on sprigs of hyssop they offered it to him by means of a reed or cane, as Mt and Mk had already narrated. Jn added the detail of the hyssop. To read ὑσσώπῳ on a javelin instead of ὑσσώπῳ, as many now do, is not only an unreasonable preference of one codex (476 London) against all other MSS and the ancient versions, but also supposes what, on consideration, is an unlikely scribal lapse. Moreover, it supposes the improbability that 'reed' or cane in Mt, Mk stands for the shaft of a javelin. 30. 'It is consummated' means that the work of redemption is accomplished. So it really is at the moment that Jesus, after the seventh word recorded by Luke, bows his head and dies.

31-37 The Transfixion—This passage is the biblical 811a and historical basis of devotion to the Sacred Heart. Its devotional riches may be gathered from the 8 homilies assigned for that Feast and its Octave in the Breviary. Here only the main points of the history are noted. 31. It was very much the concern of the Jews that the bodies should be removed before sundown of that Parasceve or Friday. Deut 21:23 ordered this removal of an 'accursed one' (cf. Gal 3:14) executed on a tree, and in this case the sacred Sabbath just about to begin was also the Paschal solemnity. Hence the request to Pilate for crurifragium (breaking of legs with a hammer or club to bring about immediate death from muscular cramp or shock) and removal. 32. Soldiers (apparently not the execution squad) came to carry out the order. The legs of the two robbers were broken. Jn mentions a 'first', but we do not know which it was. 33 f. The soldiers (two at least) b took timely notice that Jesus was dead. One, however, wishing to make assurance doubly sure, struck the side of Jesus with a lance (a broad-headed spear) intending, no doubt, to pierce the heart. The word for 'struck' or 'pierced' (ἐνύφεν) had become 'opened' (ἔννοιεν) in the codices from which the Latin version was made. Hence Augustine's famous reference to the evangelist's 'watchful word'—not really a blunder, however, because Jn's verb means 'to pierce', which is equivalent to opening. The soldier has been named in hagiographic legend, Longinus (or Spearman). 'Immediately there came out blood and water'. As Jesus had been dead some time, the phenomenon was extraordinary, as the eyewitness Jn certainly recognized. Many attempts have been made to give a physiological explanation, but none of them seems adequately to explain the impression which Jn registers here and in his first epistle, 811b 5:6. Many hold that the water was serum which owing to Jesus' intense sufferings collected in the pericardium; cf. IEC, March 1951. But whether the double flow was miraculous or whether it can be explained on natural grounds, as many physiologists claim, is immaterial. There is no doubt about its reality. The Fathers have therefore rightly taken the two liquids as symbols of Baptism and the Eucharist, and, in consequence, see in these regenerating and life-giving streams the graces which produce a second Eve (the Church) from the side of the second Adam sleeping on the cross. 35. That Jn invokes the knowledge of Jesus to corroborate his own testimony is suggested by the word ἐκεῖνος (Lat. ille), but perhaps the pronoun has not its full classical Greek force here. In any case, the testimony is very solemn. 36 f. Two Scriptures were fulfilled in what had happened: the typical precept not to break the bones of the Paschal lamb, Ex 12:46; Num 9:12, and a word of Zacharias 12:10, taken from a passage which undoubtedly refers to Messianic times and to the Messiah himself. Jn only changes the accusative pronoun from first to third: 'They shall look on him whom they pierced'; cf. Apoc 1:7.

d 38-42 Burial of Jesus—Jn here supplements the synoptics. Joseph of Arimathea (which is Ramathaim-Sophim, the birthplace of Samuel, now Rentis, 8 miles N.E. of Lydda) is described as a disciple by Mt, and by Jn as a secret disciple. His fear of the Jews vanished at the great hour, for he went boldly to Pilate to ask for the body, Mk. Nicodemus figures in Jn's narrative only. The quantity of aromatic mixture, which he brought, was very considerable (72 lbs avoirdupois of myrrh, a dried Arabian gum, and of aloes, an odoriferous wood crushed fine or powdered). The intention was not embalment, and there was no anointing; the women intended doing that later, Lk, Mk. The spices would have been strewn on the shroud, but principally on the funeral bench and within the sepulchral chamber. Jn mentions only smaller bands of linen used for tying. These are to be distinguished from the sindon or shroud, Mt, Mk, Lk, and the napkin over the face, Jn 20:7. The shrouding was according to Jewish custom but hurriedly done, and we should say (in view of the intention of the women) that it was provisional; cf. Barnes, The Holy Shroud of Turin, London 1934. Jn alone tells us that the new tomb was in a garden. Finally, it is not unfair to say that DV failed to render the solemn cadences which 19:42 has both in Gk and Latin.

812a XX 1-XXI 25 The Risen Saviour—That, on the Sunday following the crucifixion and burial of Jesus, the tomb in which he had lain was empty, and that he showed himself alive from the dead many times that day and during forty days are the best certified facts of human history. For thirty years and more eyewitnesses were proclaiming these facts to the world, and shaking the world with their proclamation. The fragmentary written record of their evidence which we possess in the four Gospels is unassailable, but, like all evidence of the kind, it presents difficulties of harmonization. This work of distinguishing persons and moments and other circumstances, so as to eliminate apparent contradictions, belongs mainly to commentators on the Synoptists. Jn concentrates on the empty tomb, on the first appearance to Mary Magdalene, and on three appearances to the Apostles as a body or in representative numbers. His narrative touches the synoptic narrative at four points only. These will be noted as they occur. Jn unites both Judæan and Galilean appearances, for after the three appearances at Jerusalem he records a fourth on the shore of the Sea of Tiberias. This makes the Gospel end serenely, on an April or May morning, beside the waters where the Apostles were formerly called to be fishers of men. The last page dedicates its final words to Simon Peter, the Supreme Shepherd of the Lord's sheep, and to the disciple whom Jesus loved. Chapter

XX without its epilogue is really the record of an apparition marked by a miracle, 1-14, to which are attached the conferring of the primacy on Peter, 15-17, the prediction of his martyrdom, 18-19, and the rectification of a misunderstanding about Jn 20-23. XX 1-10 The Empty Tomb—The Johannine witnesses of the empty tomb are first Mary Magdalene and then the two Apostles Peter and John. 1. After the Sabbath, Mt, Mk on the first day of the week—our Sunday, Lk, Jn—Mary Magdalene came to the tomb (not alone, but with other women). Jn agrees with Lk on the early hour, 'while it was yet dark', but seems to differ from Mk who says that the sun had risen. As it seems likely that the women had been staying over in Bethany, the difficulty is solved by distinguishing the moment of setting out from the moment of arrival. Whereas in Mk the three women saw the stone already removed, Jn only records the presence and action of her on whom the impression of the empty tomb was most rapid and vivid. 2. He does not say that Mary looked into the tomb, but the sequel supposes it. She ran back at once to tell the Apostles. The repetition of prepositions seems to indicate that she found Peter and John in different places. Her report is rapid: 'They have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we know not where they have laid him'. The use of the first person plural shows that she had not gone unaccompanied. 3 f. Peter and John ran to the tomb. John's youth is sufficient reason for his outrunning Peter. 5. Bending down to the low opening, he saw the bandages but did not go in—retained possibly by some strong emotion or more probably by respect for Peter. 6 f. The latter entered and found complete evidence that the body had not been removed; for bodysnatchers would surely never have carefully divested the body of its linen bands before taking it away. The bandages were not in a confused heap, but were 'lying' on the ledge (in the shape of the body and not folded up?). And the napkin that had been over his head was lying apart and carefully rolled up. 8 f. John perceived the truth at once, and with the light of his faith saw the meaning of some Scriptural prophecy of the resurrection (probably Ps 15(16)). 10. Each went his way, but Lk shows Peter 'wondering in himself'.

11-18 Appearance to Mary Magdalene—As Aug. says d so beautifully: 'When the men went away, a stronger affection kept the weaker sex fixed in the same place'. 11 f. Mary was so completely absorbed in the grief of her loss, that she only just noticed the two white-robed figures within. 13. To the question of the angels she has only one answer, 'they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him'. 14. She turned back, possibly because, while she was answering, the angel at the foot of the funeral bench was fixing his eyes on someone outside. Jesus was standing there, but either because he did not show the appearance which she had known, or because of tears in her eyes, or because of her state of soul she did not recognize him. 15. His double question was identical with that of the angels. With her fixed idea regarding the removal of the body, Mary grasped at what seemed some hope of finding it. This man (whom she thought to be the gardener) could tell her. In her request to the stranger she names no name, only him, him, him, as if the whole world should know who he was. In saying: 'I will take him away', it is 'the audacious Mary Magdalene', as St Thérèse called her, who speaks. 16. Jesus spoke then. In the sound e of the name Mariam from the lips of the Saviour we should meditate the voice of the Good Shepherd calling his sheep by name. In calling him Rabboni Mary used a form of address which had more solemnity and respect in it than Rabbi. 17. A gloss in some MSS says: 'She ran forward to touch him'. Most probably she did take hold of his feet, for the words 'Touch me not', representing a Gk present imperative, mean 'Do not cling to me'. The reason of the prof 19-23 Appearance to Ten Apostles—Lk places this apparition after the return of the two disciples from Emmaus. The Apostles had reassembled during the day. The collegiate term 'eleven' is used by Lk for those gathered, but there were actually only ten. Jn seems to consider the Apostles only, though some others were present, Lk 24:33. Faith in the resurrection had already established itself, for Jesus had appeared to Peter during the day. Nevertheless, Mk tells that the pilgrims from Emmaus were not believed. The joy of the resurrection, it seems, did not exclude the feeling expressed in the popular phrase that some things are too good to be true. The place of reunion is probably the Cenacle. 19. The news of the empty tomb and the calumny that the body had been stolen by disciples of Jesus, Mt 28:13, was no doubt already circulating in Jerusalem. Hence the fear which made the disciples hide behind closed doors. Jesus, whose glorified body needed no open door to enter by, suddenly stood in their midst. The salute 'Peace be to you' must have sounded like a general pardon.

812e hibition is that just now she must be a messenger, apostolorum apostola. The content of the message is that he is risen and is still with his brethren, till he ascends to his Father—not immediately. There are many interpretations of these difficult words, but the above seems the simplest. 18. Jn records that Mary delivered her message; Mk registers the incredulity of the disciples, 16:11.

g 20. Proof beyond all doubt of the identity of the Lord was given by the wounded hands and side which he showed them. 21. The exhibition of these signs of redemption was a fitting introduction to a repetition of 'Peace be to you'. The words that follow conferred on the Apostles the same mission which the Word Incarnate had from the Father, to be exercised in the name and with the authority of Jesus himself. 22 f. By the symbolic gesture of breathing upon them he signified that he was communicating the Holy Spirit—a partial anticipation of the gift of Pentecost. The words: 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost' made the meaning quite clear. The power of remitting and retaining sins, clearly supposes judicial authority exercised over sins in a tribunal. Accordingly the Church has perpetually understood this act of the Saviour as the institution of the sacrament of Penance (Trent, Sess. 14). Thus the sacrament of pardon was instituted under a double sign of the Saviour's peace, on the most joyful day of the world's history. It should be noted that in the intention of Christ who gave this power to the members of an apostolic college, Thomas, who was absent, also received it.

h 24-29 Appearance to the Eleven—The case of Thomas, in whom Jn took a special interest, 11:16; 14:5, is very important because, as St Gregory remarks, the slow surrender of Thomas is of more advantage to strengthen our faith than the more ready faith of all the believing Apostles. Besides, the act of faith made by the believing Thomas is the fullest and most explicit of all the confessions of faith recorded in the Gospels. 24. For the third time Jn mentions Thomas, and for the second time interprets his name, which means 'Twin'. A blend of scepticism and pessimism goes with a melancholic temperament, such as seems to have been that of Thomas. He had probably lost heart more than the others during the Passion, and his absence from the reunion on Easter Sunday may have been due to a hard-headed attitude towards such wishful imagining as he would have thought Mary Magdalene's message to be. However, this is partly conjecture. 25. The fact is that he met the joyful announcement of the Apostles 'We have seen the Lord' with a most exacting demand for proof. He required every sort of experimental test, before he would believe that the Crucified was risen. 26. And he remained in this stubbornness a full week, till Jesus appeared in the same circumstances to all the Apostles, including himself. Again our Lord gave his peace, 27, invited Thomas to apply his tests, and added: 'Do not become 812f an unbeliever but a believer'. This is the force of the Gk words, which indicate that Thomas had not lost the virtue of faith, but was on the way to losing it. 28. The Apostle, we may feel certain, did not approach to touch Jesus in the way he had demanded, but immediately made his sublime act of faith. The words he spoke do not seem to be either an exclamation nor a vocative, but an elliptic proposition: 'Thou art my Lord and my God'. Rather than a confession of the Messianic character and divinity of Jesus, it is a double confession of his divinity. 29. If we read the words of Christ, which follow, as an assertion, we must understand them thus: 'Because thou hast seen me (risen), thou hast believed (me to be God)'. It is better, however, to read them as a question: 'Is it because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed?' No, because believing does not require seeing. Hence the beatitude (the last evangelical beatitude) of believing without seeing. The more faith is an interior supernatural light—the more it is independent of the support of merely human arguments, the better it is.

30-31 First Epilogue—There are two tenable explanations of this first epilogue. Either the Gospel originally ended here and Jn later added ch 21 with another epilogue, or this first epilogue was originally at the end of 21 and migrated here, when presbyters of Ephesus, gathered around Jn and under divine inspiration, added the final epilogue. The first epilogue sums up the whole purpose of the Fourth Gospel. This writing was not intended as an exhaustive record of the signs wrought by Jesus. The evangelist made a choice of a certain number of facts and discourses, in order to confirm disciples in their faith regarding Jesus as Messiah and Son of God, so that believing they may have life in his name—the life meant being everlasting life.

XXI 1-14 Manifestation at the Lake—1. After the Paschal octave, the Apostles returned to Galilee. The homes of many of them were near the sea of Tiberias. 2. Seven of their number were to be witnesses of a second miraculous catch of fishes. Simon Peter was the chief, and with him were Thomas, whose name is again interpreted, Nathanael (Bartholomew) designated here as a native of Cana, the (two) sons of Zebedee, and two whose identity we have no means of establishing. Some commentators, appealing to Jn's habitual reticence about himself and his, regard 'the sons of Zebedee' as a gloss, but the MSS should be decisive. 3. Six disciples therefore went with Peter (probably from Capharnaum) and spent a fruitless night fishing on the lake. 4. As morning was coming (rather than 'when morning was come'), a figure appeared standing on the shore, a hundred yards away. He was not recognized as Jesus, presumably because of the distance and the obscurity of early dawn, and perhaps also because Jesus did not himself wish to be recognized immediately. 5. To draw attention to the miracle about to take place Jesus asked them: 'Young men, have you any fish?' The word of address is one of familiarity, and the Gk substantive, which means something-to-eat-with-bread, is in the circumstances a polite synonym of 'fish'. The unwillingness with which fishermen admit that they have caught nothing is probably reflected in the curt 'No' that came over the water. 6. As the boat was probably moving south close to the western shore, the order to put the net out on the right side meant putting it out where fish were less likely to be. Nevertheless the catch was enormous. 7. John was the first to recognize the Master—ubi amor, ibi oculus: love gives eyesight. But if John was a better contemplative, Peter was more prompt in action. His undress meant that he was clothed only in a sort of overall (without tunic) which he quickly girded to come to Jesus directly, more by wading than swimming through the water. 8. The others followed in the boat, dragging the net. 9. The breakfast prepared by Jesus on the shore is a touching instance of his solicitude for hungry c 10 f. His order to bring some of the catch was only intended to provoke the count. The number 153 has been given many symbolic meanings, mostly in the sense of the catholicity of the Church (Jerome's 153 species of fishes) or the total number of the elect. St Augustine discovered—one can hardly guess how—that 10 (the commandments) and 7 (the gifts of the Holy Ghost) in the addition of the whole series 1, 2, 3 . . . 17 give exactly 153. That the net was not rent suggests the unity and integrity of the Church. The net was used by Christ himself for a parable of the kingdom of heaven. 12-14. The kindly invitation, the respect of the disciples, who knew who he was and in a sense did not know, and yet did not question him, the charity of the risen Lord ministering—these show that the intimate contact of friendship with Jesus is always the same, yesterday, today, and for ever. 14b. Jn numbers this as the third manifestation to the disciples in a body.

d 15-17 The Primacy of Peter—After the meal Jesus proceeded to an act which was of the utmost importance for the future of his Church. From the first day Jesus had called Simon son of John Kēphā, 1:42, and had declared many months ago that on 'this rock' he would build his Church, Mt 16:18. Weak as the Rock was during the Passion, the prayer of Jesus for the future confirmer of his brethren, Lk 22:32, was necessarily efficacious. Therefore the Rock is restored to its proper strength in a triple profession of love intended to undo the triple denial. The questions and the answers show that the devoted but presumptuous Peter has found the strength of his devotedness in humility. The whole admirable drama, in which Peter's love of his Master is turned to care of his Master's sheep, is founded on the parable of the Good Shepherd. The first question of Christ, with its term of comparison 'Lovest thou me more than these?' was evidently set against the Apostle's boast 'Although all shall be scandalized in thee, I will never be scandalized', Mt 26:33. Peter does not now dare to say that he loves more than the others, but he does assert that he loves, and appeals to Jesus' knowledge of his heart. The emotion of his third answer, under the sadness of being asked three times, is most touching. To each response the same commission corresponds, expressed in a variety of terms which give it emphasis. 'Feed my lambs—shepherd my sheep—feed my sheep' mean the same thing, for there is no reason for the supposition that sheep and lambs mean pastors and people. The whole flock (all the sheep of the Good Shepherd) are committed to Peter's care. To understand this commission as anything less than a primacy of authority over the universal church is to falsify the text. The passage has been dogmatically interpreted in this traditional sense by the Vatican Council, Dz 1822.

e 18-19 Prediction of Peter's Martyrdom—A vision of Peter's future destiny is annexed to the supreme commission with the solemnity of a double 'Amen'. 818c

The chief shepherd will follow the Good Shepherd even in the manner of his death. The words have some of the mysterious obscurity of prophecy. Against the liberty of Peter's younger days (girding himself and walking where he pleased) is set this mysterious future event of his old age. If the counterpart contains only two terms, namely, girding by another, as an old man is helped to dress himself, and being led to a place not naturally desired (a place of execution), the prophecy envisages a violent death only, not the mode of death by crucifixion. The extension of the hands must therefore be the term specifically corresponding to crucifixion, but as the extension of hands is set before girding and being led away, it is difficult to discern how it must be conceived. If the order is part of the prophecy, we must suppose the prisoner lashed to the patibulum before being girded and led out to execution. Jn writing after Peter's death notes that Jesus said this 'signifying by what death he should glorify God'. The words 'Follow me' which Jesus spoke immediately afterwards to Peter are so general as to include imitation, 'even to the death of the cross'.

20-23 Rectification concerning John's Future—The f Prince of the Apostles there and then did turn his footsteps to go with Jesus, but seeing John walking just behind, he was seized with a friend's interest in the beloved disciple. Affection and curiosity moved him to ask the question, 'Lord, and this man what?' (as the original Rheims translates). The change of si to sic in many Vg MSS and the adoption of that reading in the Clementine edition has given us the present Vg translation. But read: 'If I will have him to remain till I come, what is it to thee? do thou follow me'. This answer really means: Even if I should let him remain till my second coming, what concern is it of thine? Follow me and leave the destinies of others in my hands. In view of a current rumour making Jesus say that the beloved disciple would not die—a rumour which spread on account of his longevity—Jn here draws attention to the exact form of the word of Jesus concerning him.

24-25 Second Epilogue—The mixture of first plural g with first singular in these final words seems to justify the view that St John dictated them surrounded by the presbyters of Ephesus, but cf. 1 Jn 1-2. These, according to the Muratorian canon had requested him to write the Gospel, and are now giving testimony of its veracity together with him: 'This is that disciple who giveth testimony of these things, and hath written these things: and we know that his testimony is true. But there are also many other things which Jesus did: which if they were written every one, the world itself, I think, would not be able to contain the books that should be written'. Semitic hyperbole, no doubt, like comparing a people to the stars of heaven in multitude or to the sand at the lip of the sea, but how amply justified by the multitude and the magnitude of the things which Jesus did!

b Authorship—Ancient tradition and the internal evidence agree in assigning Ac to Luke the Physician, the author of the Third Gospel. (1) External Evidence. The Muratorian Canon (c 170) makes this attribution, and adds that St Luke was present at events he relates. Irenaeus, Adv. Haer., III, 14, 1, is equally clear, quotes from Ac as Scripture, and emphasizes its trustworthiness. The 2nd cent. ancient Latin and other Prologues of the Gospels, after mentioning St Luke as author of the Third Gospel, add that he also wrote Ac. In the 3rd cent., Clement of Alexandria, Stromata, V, 12, and Origen, C. Celsum, Bk VI, 11, are both explicit. Tertullian defends the book against Marcion and others, and in De Jejunio 10, names St Luke as its author. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. III, 4, confirms these early witnesses from Rome, Asia Minor and Gaul, Egypt and Africa. Even earlier still, Ac is cited by Clement of Rome, cf. Ep. 2 and Ac 20:35, and Ep. 59 and 26:18, by Ignatius, Magn., V, 1, and Smyrn., III, 3, and by Polycarp, Phil. 1 and 2. The sole exception to the witness of antiquity is a homily falsely attributed to St John Chrysostom, Hom. II in Ascensionem, PG 52, 780, which declares that the authorship of Ac is variously assigned to Clement of Rome, Barnabas and Luke. The Homilist seems to have confused Ac with Heb, which ancient writers give to Clement or Barnabas. (2) Internal Evidence. Luke is nowhere mentioned, but Ac purports to be a continuation of the Third Gospel. In 1:1 there is a reference to the First Book, which described the 'things which Jesus began to do and to teach'. That book had been written so that Theophilus might understand the instruction he had 'already received, in all its certainty', Lk 1:4. Its author now writes for him this second book to describe the spread of the Faith after the death of Jesus. Style, grammar and the words used confirm that the two books are from the same pen.

More cogent still, the second part of Ac, describing the journeys of St Paul, contains a travel journal by one of his companions, written in the first person. E. Norden, Agnostos Theos (1913) 318, has shown from Cicero and from reports of magistrates to the Senate, that it was usual in ancient times to incorporate eyewitness accounts or diaries, in the first person, when a writer could vouch personally for what he related. Just such a document, in the first person plural, the 'We Sections', is found in 16:10–17; 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1–28:16. The Travel Journal is interrupted, and the first person ceases to be used, whenever its author is no longer present. If we work out from Ac and the Epistles who were St Paul's companions during the periods covered by the 'We Sections', St Luke is the only one who was always present, and moreover, unlike the rest, he is never present when the ordinary third person is used. The vivid diary of the eyewitness must clearly be his work.

The way in which St Luke inserts his journal in the narrative implies that he is the author of the whole of Ac, and this is fully borne out by vocabulary, grammar and style. These have been examined minutely, both in the Travel Journal, in the rest of Acts, and in the Gospel, cf. Jacquier, LX, Hawkins, Horae Synopticae (1909) 174, Harnack, Luke the Physician (1907) 26. Even in the account of the sea voyages and the shipwreck, where a number of nautical terms are used which are not found elsewhere, the style and vocabulary remain that of the rest of Ac and the Gospel. St Luke was a man of letters, he knew the value of sources, and wished it to be known when he had been an eyewitness of the facts he related.

The characteristic traits of the Third Gospel can nearly all be paralleled in Ac; cf. Intro. to St Luke. The hand of Luke the Physician, Col 1:14, can be seen in the technical accounts of the healing of the lame man, 3:7, of Publius, 28:8, and elsewhere. St Luke's tenderness shows itself, e.g. 20:37; 21:13, and his emphasis on the part played by women, e.g. Tabitha, Lydia. There is the same love of the poor, and of those not attached to riches, the same universalism, cf. § 817e, and the same insistence on prayer, cf. § 820f.

Date of the Book—Although there is no tradition, since the time of St Jerome at least the conclusion has been drawn from Ac itself that it was written during or at the end of St Paul's first captivity, in A.D. 63 or 64. There is never a hint of the fall of Jerusalem, and yet that event so affected the relations of Christians and Jews, and the controversy within the Church concerning the Mosaic Law, that it could hardly have failed to leave some trace. A little earlier, in 64 A.D., the Persecution of Nero began, yet in Ac there is no suggestion of trouble brewing. On the contrary, the empire is shown as friendly, and when the narrative closes, St Paul is found in the capital of the Roman world, preaching freely, and with converts in Caesar's household. Cf. § 843a. There is never an allusion to 815a St Paul's martyrdom, though his sufferings are foretold. His own prediction that he would not return to Ephesus, 20:35, is given, although it proved false in the event, as St Luke could hardly have failed to note, if he had been writing after St Paul had returned to Asia. Ac ends suddenly, without our being told how the trial which had brought St Paul to Rome, ended. The obvious deduction from this has always been that St Luke concluded his narrative because he had no more to say. Perhaps St Paul was still a prisoner. More probably he had just been released, because his Jewish accusers had failed to appear. St Luke tells us that he remained a prisoner for 'two whole years', and to his readers this seems to have conveyed that he had fulfilled the statutory period during which an accused must wait for his accusers to appear; cf. *H. J. Cadbury in Beginnings, 5, 326 ff. Thus St Luke would be telling us how and why St Paul was released, but he does not insist on it, because the result of the trial was negative, and did not add to the vindication he had already received from the imperial authorities. It has been argued that the sudden ending was due to St. Luke's intention of composing a third volume, and that when he called the Gospel his 'first' volume, Ac 1:1, and not 'former' he implied as much. However πρῶτος is often used of the first of two in 1st cent. Greek, e.g. Lk 2:2, and an historian does not break off his narrative like a serial novelist, if he can avoid it. It might be added that the 'primitive' tone of the earlier chapters, and St Luke's unfamiliarity with the Epistles of St Paul also help to rule out a late date for Ac. We may safely conclude that it was written in Rome, before the great fire of July 64, which let loose the Neronian Persecution, and which was perhaps the immediate cause of the hurried ending of the book, cf. § 843i.

815b St Luke's Sources—A doctor, from Syrian Antioch, who joined St Paul on his Second Journey, and returned to Jerusalem with him at the end of his Third, remaining for years his constant companion, St Luke was able to obtain the most direct information, cf. § 744b. A doctor was a man of importance, familiar with the great, and practising a liberal art. Such a one knew how to collect the materials for a history, and in the case in hand, how to combine his own notes and memories, with the documents he had copied, into an artistic whole. Indeed St Luke in the introduction to his Gospel, 1:2, explains how carefully he collected his information from eyewitnesses, and his treatment of St Mark reveals how faithfully he used his sources.

For the sources of Ac 13-28 there is no need to look beyond St Paul himself, his companions, and St Luke's own observation. Written documents were also used. e.g. the Travel Journal, a copy of the Apostolic Decree, the letter of Claudius Lysias, etc. As to chh 1-12, the vividness of so many of the accounts suggests strongly that they are the work of eyewitnesses, whom it was so easy for St Luke to consult, whether at Antioch, or during the two years A.D. 58-60, of St Paul's captivity at Caesarea, the home of Philip the Evangelist, 21:8. At Antioch and Jerusalem he must have met the chief figures, and he betrays the interest that 'old disciples' have for him, 13:1; 21:16. At Rome he certainly met St Mark, Col 4:10 and 14; Philem 24. It has even been argued that in these chapters St Luke was following a Marcan source, as he had for his Gospel, cf. RB 29 (1920) 555, and 30 (1921) 86. The strongly Semitic colouring of these early chapters has also suggested their dependence on an Aramaic original; but this is difficult to prove; nor should it be forgotten that the first community at Jerusalem was bilingual, and that at the election of the seven Deacons the Greek-speaking Christians were in a considerable majority. Owing to the faithful way in which St Luke copied out his sources, and (since he was writing a history) arranged them in more or less chronological order, it is still possible to dissect them. This has been done very convincingly by L. Cerfaux, La Composition de la première partie du Livre des Actes, ETL, 13 (1936), 667-91.

Thus the narrative from the Ascension till the end of the day of Pentecost must come from the Twelve, and 2:41 to the end of ch 5, where the horizon is limited to the Temple and Jerusalem from the Jewish Christians of the Holy City. The account of the Deacons and St Stephen in 6 and 7 gives the story of some of the Hellenist Christians, and reveals their more universalist point of view. Then follow Acts of Philip, 8, the Conversion of Saul, and Acts of Peter the Missionary, 9:31-11:18, all perhaps preserved at Caesarea. From Antioch comes the account of the beginnings of the church in that city. Careful study has revealed the fullness of St Luke's documentation, and the faithfulness with which he reproduced it.

815c Historical Value—What has been said as to the authorship, date and sources of Ac proves, putting aside Inspiration, how reliable it is. The extraordinary accuracy of St Luke has also been demonstrated by the recent discoveries of archaeology. The story of the 'conversion' of Sir William Ramsay, who had been brought up to regard Ac as a 2nd cent. forgery is well known, and the archaeological evidence can be found in his books. 'Every incident described in the Acts is just what might be expected in ancient surroundings. The officials with whom Paul and his companions were brought into contact are those who would be there. Every person is found just where he ought to be: proconsuls in senatorial provinces, Asiarchs in Ephesus, strategoi in Philippi, politarchs in Thessalonica, magicians and soothsayers everywhere. . . . The magistrates take action against them in a strictly managed Roman colony like Pisidian Antioch or Philippi, where legality and order reigned: riotous crowds try to take the law into their own hands in the less strictly governed Hellenistic cities like Iconium and Ephesus and Thessalonica', The Bearing of Recent Discovery on the Trustworthiness of the NT (1915) 96. Cf. also *E. J. Bicknell in A New Commentary, 1928, 'On all sorts of little points connected with the names both of persons and places the author has used a most careful discrimination. . . . Nowhere can he be convicted of a mistake. On many points on which he used to be supposed to be in error he has now been proved to be correct'. Cf. too, Jacquier, cccxv; DAFC, 'Epigraphic', 1428, and *S. L. Caiger, Archaeology and the NT, 1939.

There are eighteen speeches in Ac, which occupy about one-fifth of the book. It has often been suggested that these are literary inventions, and that St Luke was following the recognized practice of Greek historians, in thus enlivening his history. However Polybius at least took a stricter view, and there is every reason to suppose that St Luke shared it. We know how careful he was over our Lord's discourses in his Gospel, in accordance with the promise of his prologue, Lk 1:4, and the evidential aim of his 'second book' made the same fidelity no less necessary there also. It is a gratuitous supposition that accuracy in detail and fidelity to sources stopped short at the speeches. Those that we have are, of course, only summaries. Shorthand notes would have been taken at the time, or the substance of a speech written down from memory. The speeches themselves bear strong marks of their authenticity. Thus those of St Peter contain both words and ideas found in 1 Pet, and not found elsewhere in Lk. The Descent into Hell is found in NT only in 2:24 and 1 Pet 3:19. Gamaliel speaks like the liberal Rabbi he was. St Stephen's speech is full of Aramaisms, follows the Jewish method of argumentation, and is far less respectful to Jewish religion than St Luke ordinarily shows himself. On parallels between St James' speech and his Epistle see J. Chaine, Épître de St Jacques, lxxiii. The resemblances between St Paul's speeches in Ac, and his Epistles are particularly striking. Numerous Pauline expressions can be pointed to, OT texts are cited in the same way, and there are many doctrinal points of contact. Justification by faith and the impotence of the Law are insisted on, in the 'programme speech' to the Jews of Pisidian Antioch. Cf. F. Prat, op. cit. I (1945) 54 ff., and Jacquier, cclxvii.

816a The difficulty of reconciling the accounts given in Gal and Ac of the controversy over the Mosaic Law has been brought forward against the historicity of St Luke. The two versions can be sufficiently harmonized, once the difference is realized between St Paul writing in the heat of conflict, to preserve the liberty of his converts, and St Luke, the sober historian, who reduces the controversy to its proper proportions, and is anxious to bring out the fundamental unity of the Church. Indeed one more confirmation of the accuracy of St Luke can be derived from the Epistles of St Paul. St Luke certainly did not use them among his sources, and, as the 'We Sections' prove, he was absent when they were written, or, in the case of the Captivity Epistles, they did not come within the framework of Ac. Many events referred to in the Epistles find no place in Ac, yet the correspondence between them is considerable, and all the more valuable for being indirect and accidental: e.g. the great apostolate at Ephesus, Ac 19:10 and 1 Cor 16:9, St Paul's intention of going to Rome, 19:10 and Rom 15:23, the accounts of the evangelization of Thessalonica or Corinth, the collection for the poor at Jerusalem. Ac and the Epistles supplement each other, and once their differing viewpoints are recognized, can be harmonized without difficulty.

d Purpose and Theme—The analysis of Ac reveals that it is not a complete history of the first years of the Church. We are told nothing of the founding of the Church in Rome, nor of the later history of St Peter. This was partly perhaps because St Luke writes only what he can vouch for, but many episodes that he knew about are similarly omitted, e.g. much of the history of St Paul, and the later history of the churches he founded, and the development of the organization of the Church. Gospel and Ac form a whole. Both are written to strengthen and enlighten faith. After the history of the visible Christ comes the history of Christ working invisibly through his instruments. The Apostles are to 'preach unto all nations, beginning at Jerusalem', and to be the witnesses of Jesus, Lk 24:47-48. For this purpose they will 'receive the power of the Holy Ghost coming upon' them, and will 'be witnesses unto' Jesus 'in Jerusalem and in all Judaea and Samaria, and even to the uttermost parts of the earth', Ac 1:8. The theme of Acts is the fulfilment of this last command of Our Lord. The book is written to demonstrate the wonderful expansion of Christianity through the world, begun and carried on by the power of the Holy Spirit. We see the Church gradually breaking through the Judaism in which it was born, and spreading to the Greek and Roman world. This universal preaching involves a tragic struggle with the narrow spirit of Jewish religion. Owing to the force and enlightenment of the Holy Spirit, the work of Jesus is accomplished. After the Acts of Jesus in the Gospel come the Acts of the Holy Spirit. Hence the aim of St Luke is not to give a systematic history of the Church, but to describe the Holy Spirit at work founding it, and enabling it to break in upon the pagan world, although it was rejected by the Jews.

817a Doctrinal Content—Being a historical work, by one who had no great interest in theology, it might be expected that little doctrine could be found in Ac. But the Christian Faith is essentially a piece of history, that of God's intervention in the affairs of mankind; and Ac is the only history we possess of the Coming of the Holy Spirit, and his guidance of the Church during the first momentous thirty years. The four Gospels describe the Incarnation and work of Jesus Christ, and this is the fifth Gospel, that of the Holy Spirit, a unique gospel, and so especially precious.

The doctrine to be found in chh 13-28 is most naturally studied in the context of the theology of St Paul. Hence in what follows attention will be concentrated chiefly on the first twelve chapters, and the insight they afford into the faith and teaching of the Church in Palestine, between A.D. 30 and 45. Indeed a full study would require a subdivision of these twelve chapters, and the separate consideration of the teaching to be found, and the advance made in the sources as outlined above, § 815d. Only thus can be seen, for instance, the step forward taken by St Stephen and the deacons, or the progress made when the pagans were preached to at Antioch. But see on 6:1, 8 and 11:19-26. One further distinction must be made in considering the doctrine of Ac, namely, that between the apologetic discourses of the Apostles, destined for those outside, and the fuller teaching to be gleaned from the lives and prayers of the Christians themselves. Jews and Gentiles had to be led on step by step, and told only the mysteries they could grasp. This helps to explain the archaic character of the earlier discourses, and is one more proof of the accuracy with which St Luke reproduced his sources. The narrative of the life of the first disciples is most valuable in that it brings out incidentally the primitive Christian teaching and faith. Here we find the divinity of our Lord continually affirmed implicitly, and eventually explicitly, and the activity of the Holy Spirit making his own Person known. We see too, the Church, in which alone the Spirit is given, united in love, under the authority of St Peter and the Apostles, its members living a 'new life' of joyful union with God, whose Holy Spirit they have received.

God the Father—The revelation of the Blessed Trinity in the NT was made by showing gradually, and through actions more often than through words, that two other Persons besides the heavenly Father, are the One God of Israel. Hence the concept of the Father in Ac, is that of the true God already to be found in the OT. He is the Creator, everywhere present, 4:24, 14:14, 17:24-28. He reads all hearts, 15:8, and governs all things by his Providence, 1:7, 2:23. Further, he raised Jesus from the tomb, 2:24; he promised the Holy Spirit, 1:4, and from him Jesus received the Promise, 2:33, which was poured out at Pentecost. Through the Holy Spirit the Father works in the Church.

Jesus Christ—In the apologetic preaching, the Apostles generally speak in a veiled way of the divinity of our Lord. They begin by showing that he is the Messias. This is the triumphant conclusion of St Peter's discourse at Pentecost, that Jesus is 'both Lord and Christ', i.e. Messias, 2:16-36. His Messianic character is proved from prophecy, miracles, and especially the Resurrection. In the next section, 2:40-5:42, our Lord is referred to by Messianic titles found here only in the NT. He is παῖς θεοῦ, 3:13 (see comm.) the Suffering Servant. But the title has also the sense of 'Son' of God, and that seems to be its meaning when it is used within the new community, 4:30. St Paul preached without any reserve that Jesus is the Son of God, 9:20; 13:33. Another Messianic title used in this section only, and presumably discarded as veiled teaching became unnecessary, is the 'Just One', 3:14. At all events, the greatness of the Messias is revealed by his powers. He sends the Holy Spirit, he forgives sins, he is the author of life, 3:15, he is the one saviour of all men, whose name is powerful like that of Yahweh, 4:10 ff., he is to be obeyed like God, 4:19, he sits on the right hand of God, and is the judge of all men.

Jesus is also 'Lord', Kyrios; see on 2:36. In the early discourses, this title implies that the Messias has the royal powers of God. Through learning the functions of the Messias, the Jews were led on to realize his Nature. In 10:36 he is the 'Lord of all men', a much stronger phrase; cf. Phil 2:11 and Apoc 19:16.

The attitude to our Lord within the Church gives, as has been said, a far clearer insight. There the title 'Lord' has become a divine name. Kyrios, the LXX translation of Yahweh, is the Gk word chosen to describe the name and being of God, and it is now applied to Jesus, as indeed it was in the Gospel, 4:33; 7:58-59; 9:1. He is the 'Lord who knows all hearts', 1:24, like his Father. Many other phrases refer to Jesus by this divine name, and it is not always easy 817d to decide whether he or his Father is meant. We may note especially 'faith in the Lord', i.e. Jesus, 5:14; 11:17, and 14:22. Even more revealing are the relations between Jesus and his first followers. Just as God was invoked in the OT, so, and among Jews the fact has an extraordinary significance, Jesus is invoked now. Those who call on the name of the Lord will be saved, J1 2:32, and Ac 2:21, and Christians are those who call on the name of Jesus, his saints, 9:13-4, 21. They pray to him, 1:24, and turn to him in the moment of trial like St Stephen, and he comes to their aid. They are one with him, 9:4, and in his name they are baptised. Indeed it is a privilege to suffer or die for this name, 5:41; 9:16; 20:24; 21:13. He appears himself from time to time, when guidance is needed, to Ananias, to Peter, to Paul. Paul especially, receives his mandate from Jesus, 26:16, and is encouraged in his missionary labours by such visions, 18:9; 23:11. Lastly, Jesus is with his followers through the Holy Spirit he has sent, the Spirit of Jesus, 16:7. On the very explicit 20:28, 'church of God which he has purchased with his own blood', see comm. Even apart from these later texts, how little separates this faith in practice of the first disciples from the teaching of St Paul and St John! St Luke had no doubt that it was the same faith all through.

e Salvation the Work of Jesus—There is no salvation in any other name, 4:12, cf. 3:16. Through this saviour men obtain remission of sins, 5:31. He is the cause of our salvation, 3:19, 26; 10:42-43; 15:11. Thus St Peter; and St Paul teaches the same, 13:38-39; 16:31. This salvation is connected with the death of Jesus. He is the 'Suffering Servant', and his pains have redemptive value, 8:32-35; cf. 3:13, 18. The discourses of St Peter, St Stephen and St Paul develop the identical theme: the crime of the Jews in killing the innocent Messiah, and thus, as had been foretold, fulfilling the plan of God, for the salvation of the human race. Our Lord is the saviour of all men, Gentiles as well as Jews, 'whomsoever the Lord our God shall call', 2:21 and 39, and he is to be preached to the uttermost parts of the earth, 1:8. This universalism is never in doubt, the only hesitation is over the extent to which Jewish observances are still necessary.

As to the earthly life of our Lord, Ac refers to nearly all the chief events. He comes from Nazareth, and is of the house of David, born of Mary. John the Baptist prepared the way for him, 13:24-25. Beginning in Galilee, he preached, and worked miracles, and appointed Apostles, 10:41-42. After his death and resurrection, his appearances are described, 1:3; 10:40-41; 13:31, and his Ascension. He sits on the right hand of God, and will come to judge the living and the dead, 3:20; 10:42; 17:31, all of whom, just and unjust, will rise again, 24:15, 25.

818a The Holy Spirit—To explain the miracle of Pentecost St Peter refers to the Spirit promised in Joel, the Spirit or Power of God, spoken of in the prophetic and sapiential books. Ac is concerned, more than any other book of the NT, with the activity of this Holy Spirit of God, called now 'the Spirit' (9 times), now 'Holy Spirit' (18 times), now 'the Holy Spirit' (24 times), twice 'the Spirit of the Lord', and once 'the Spirit of Jesus'. The divinity of the Spirit is not in question. Jewish tradition affirmed it. The Spirit of God is divine, as the spirit of man is human, and, as we now learn, to lie to the Holy Spirit is to lie to God, 5:3. The works attributed to the Spirit, inspiring prophets and sanctifying believers, are divine works. And so in Ac too, we find that God spoke by the mouth of the prophets, 3:18, 21, and the Holy Spirit also, 1:16; 4:25; 28:25. What has to be shown is that the first disciples saw here a Person distinct from the Father and Jesus.

b The Holy Spirit manifests himself especially through his gifts and his activity, and it is through these that we are led to realize that he is a distinct Person. Our Lord promised the Apostles power, 'when the Holy Spirit shall come upon you'. He comes, and they speak 'according as the Holy Spirit gave them to speak'. He spoke through the ancient prophets, and he also speaks through the NT ones, 11:28; 21:11. Much more, it is he who continually guides the Church and the Apostles. He is a 'witness' along with them, 5:32. He gives instructions to Philip, 8:29, and to St Peter, 10:19, and the great decisions are made by him in conjunction with human persons, 'it hath seemed to the Holy Ghost and to us', 15:28. The missionaries go out under his orders, 13:2-4. He guides them, 20:23, sometimes holds them back, 16:6-7, and appoints bishops, 20:28. He consoles, 9:31, works miracles, 10:46, 19:6. Sin against him is terribly punished. At every crisis he intervenes, 7:55; 11:28; 20:23. Finally, he is the object of a special teaching. Those who are ignorant of him, though they may know of the Father and Jesus, are not yet true disciples, 19:1-7. If as yet there are no prayers to the Holy Spirit, this is due to the way in which the economy of salvation was revealed to us.

The Blessed Trinity—In Ac we see the three Persons, but the mystery of the Blessed Trinity, in this historical work, is nowhere didactically set forth. It is none the less presupposed. In 1:4 the Holy Spirit is promised by the Father, and in 2:33 Jesus sends down this Promise, whom he has received from his Father. In 2:38-39, we see God calling men, who are then baptised in the name of Jesus, and receive the Holy Spirit. Then the Spirit of the Lord, 8:39, is also the Spirit of Jesus, 16:7; cf. J. Lebreton, S.J., Histoire du Dogme de la Trinité, 1 (1927) 342-78.

The Gift of the Spirit—The Holy Spirit is the principle of life, who animates the new community. His work of spreading the Gospel, and enabling the disciples to bear witness has already been described. Sometimes he works by the charismata, gifts of tongues, etc., or by strong inspirations enabling their recipients to benefit others. Thus we are told more than twenty times that the disciples or their hearers were filled with the Holy Spirit. This is true especially of the key figures, whose activity and witness are so important for others, Peter 4:8, Stephen, Barnabas, for the vital work at Antioch, where Paul must come, 11:24, and Paul himself, 13:4, 9.

Besides the transient work of the Holy Spirit, Ac speaks of his permanent presence, the Gift hidden in the hearts of the faithful, after Baptism, 2:38; 5:32. This Presence sometimes reveals itself externally, 6:3-15, for the Holy Spirit gradually transforms and makes holy those in whom he dwells. The new life of the Spirit begins to spread through the world, and thus Ac shows us the fulfilment of our Lord's promises in Jn 14-16. St Luke's favourite name for the disciples is 'those of the way', those following the new way of life, 9:2. Of this new life Christ is the author, 3:15, the Apostles are to preach it boldly, 5:20, the Gentiles share it, 11:18; 13:48, and failure to preach it is to be the cause of death to others, 20:26.

Common Life—St Luke loves to depict the fervour and holiness of the first disciples, and the joyful union and charity between them, all effects of the Gift of the Spirit, 2:42-47; 4:24-35; 13:52. The force of his description is weakened in translation. All persevere 'with one mind', 'together', even before Pentecost, when they were 'all together in one place'. Later they were 'in communion', 'had all things in common', 'continued daily with one accord', and increased daily together. They prayed 'with one accord', 'had but one heart and soul', and 'all things were common unto them'. There were shadows, from the first, as Ac tells us, but the Apostles did their best to teach and reproduce the life they had led with Jesus. So their followers gave themselves up to the Spirit. They sold their possessions to buy the treasure of the Kingdom. They lived and prayed together, thus becoming the model of all in the future who would wish to lead a religious life. Mutual charity persevered. Tabitha, 9:36, is one example. The b The Church—From the first, the new life is lived in a community, and one that is autonomous. The outpouring at Pentecost brings it to life, and within it alone is the Spirit given. It is called the Church in the earliest documents, 5:11, cf. L. Cerfaux, La Théologie de l'Eglise suivant St Paul, Paris 1948, esp. pp 87 and 144. Its leaders realize that they have a mission to the whole world, and that when necessary they must obey God rather than the highest authorities in Judaism, 5:29. The breach with the Synagogue becomes formal once Gentiles are admitted into the Church without circumcision. This proved that the Church could no longer be considered a Jewish sect. It was the new Israel, the new chosen people, 15:14. It was necessary to reaffirm the principle at the Council of Jerusalem, and there St Peter implied that the Jewish law no longer bound even Christian Jews. It was still generally observed by them, however, and only after the fall of Jerusalem was the breach with the Synagogue complete.

c An Organized Society: the Apostles—Our Lord in the Gospel gave the Apostles their authority, and fixed their number, which, after the death of Judas, had to be made up. Ac shows them to be (1) Witnesses to the life and Resurrection of Jesus, which are the basis of the new faith, 2:32; 4:20; 5:30-32; 10:39; 13:31. (2) Teachers, for Christians must obey the teaching of Jesus, be 'disciples', and have faith in him, if they are to enter the new society. They must accept the 'didache', 'the doctrine of the Apostles', 2:42; 10:36-43, 'the things that are of Jesus', 18:25; 28:31, i.e. the Gospel, our Lord's life and teaching. This the Apostles had received from their 'one Master', and its content fuller than what the NT has preserved for us, is represented in part by the discourses in Mt. (3) Rulers guided by the Holy Spirit, who was promised to them in a special way. Hence, their momentous decisions are also those of the Holy Spirit, and men who lie to them, are said to be lying to him. Much more, the Gift of the Spirit depends on them, for God only gives the Holy Spirit to those 'that obey him', 5:32, that are incorporated in the Church by baptism. The one exception is the Descent of the Holy Spirit on Cornelius and his household, even before they had been baptized. But here a direct divine intervention was necessary, to ensure the admission of Gentiles into the Church without conditions. Yet, in spite of their high Gift, they have to submit at once to authority, and be baptized, 10:44-48. Normally none can receive the Spirit of Christ, who have not entered the body of Christ. The Apostles have their powers from the first. There is no development. They admit the first converts, men give them their property as to God, they can delegate their powers, and are able to pronounce the severest punishment on those who threaten the good name and discipline of the Church. Their prerogatives include the working of miracles, prophesying and the understanding of the Scriptures.

d The Primacy of St Peter—If in the Apostles we can see the beginnings of an authoritative hierarchy, even more in St Peter can we trace the first lineaments of the Papacy. St Luke knew that our Lord had made him the leader, cf. Lk 22:31-32, and the chief witness, Lk 24:34, cf. 1 Cor 15:5, and shows Him to us, performing his functions at once after the Ascension. He arranges for the election of St Matthias. He is the spokesman at Pentecost and afterwards, the chief teacher. He works the first miracle, and remains the principal thaumaturge, 5:15; cf. 9:38. He wields the authority in the case of Ananias and Sapphira. In the early persecutions by the Sanhedrin, he is the ringleader, and he is the one Herod must arrest. When he is in prison, the special prayer of the Church shows the esteem in which he is held, 12:5, 12, 14.

During the first period, the church at Jerusalem was the whole church of God, and possessed the essential elements of its organization, Apostles, and St Peter at the head. As new districts are evangelized, St Peter is seen to be responsible for them also. After the Gospel has been preached in Samaria, St Peter and St John are delegated to link up the new converts with the mother church, 8:14. 'The word "delegation" must not deceive us, any more than the demeanour, democratic in the old sense of the word, of the primitive community. Authority does not abdicate because it is willing to listen to the Church, and Peter, the delegate of the Church of Jerusalem and of the Apostolic Body—they are one and the same thing—remains the head. There are shades of meaning there which we western people misconstrue. But also, and above all, the same Spirit that gave Peter the first place, and made him the head, inspired the Church and the Twelve to put back into his hands the responsibility for decisions. Whether it is a question of his own initiative, or whether he gets himself delegated, Peter always enjoys full powers', Cerfaux, La Communauté Apostolique (1943) 71. The Church is extended to Samaria. St Peter's responsibilities increase, and he makes a pastoral visitation of the Church in Judaea and Samaria, 9:31-32.

The most momentous decision made in apostolic times was that of admitting Gentiles to share in the new Messianic blessings, without having to observe circumcision and the Mosaic Law. This made clear the independence of the new religion. It was St Peter alone, specially enlightened, who made this decision, and it was of great importance for St Luke's story, to show from whom it had emanated. With the growth of the large Gentile church at Antioch, a further development is seen. The Church at Jerusalem, with its love for the temple and the law, becomes archaic. But St Peter has left for Antioch and then Rome. 'As the ship enters the sea of the Gentiles, Peter is at the helm', L. Cerfaux, ibid. However, the growth of the Gentile churches leads to an attempt to undo St Peter's decision in the Cornelius case. Later on at the Council of Jerusalem, he reaffirms it, and St James himself explains how God chose him out specially to receive the first Gentiles. St Peter appears above the debate, with the matter already settled in his mind, and his authoritative utterance on the main point at issue is accepted. All are led by the Spirit, St Paul the defender of liberty, St James of the Law, and St Peter, the true shepherd, reconciling them. On 15:19 see comm. The quarrel at Antioch, since it had no lasting effects, St Luke omits out of respect, as we may safely guess, for the Prince of the Apostles, the visible sign of that unity in the Church which St Luke loved so well.

The Sacraments: Baptism—Our Lord's teaching about faith, repentance and baptism is put into practice at once. All who wish to be saved must be baptised with water, 8:36; 10:47. Then their sins are remitted, 2:38, 22:16, they belong to the Church, and are able to receive the Spirit, 8:12; 9:18; 16:33. They become the followers of Jesus, united to him, and are said to be baptised 'in his name', cf. comm. on 2:38. By the formula almost certainly used, they are consecrated to the Holy Trinity. Only after this mystery has been taught is baptism conferred, 19:1-7. Concerning the baptism of infants see note on 21:5-6.

Confirmation—Closely associated with baptism, is the laying on of hands to give the Holy Spirit, the 'Baptism of the Spirit', 1:5; 11:16. St Peter mentions the effects of the two rites in the same verse, 'be baptised for the remission of your sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost', 2:38; and after Pentecost, and for long, in the Church, the two were normally administered together. However, in Ac we learn more about the separate sacrament of Confirmation than anywhere else in the NT. In the account of the Samaritans, 8:15-17, and of the disciples of John, 19:5-6, the laying on of hands comes as something distinct from baptism, and it can only be performed by those holding special 820b authority, Apostles. On the case of Ananias see comm. on 9:17. The Eunuch too, 8:38, seems only to have been baptised, and on the other hand, the Apostles, who had long since repented of their sins, received at Pentecost the Spirit who could not be given till our Lord was glorified, 2:33; cf. Jn 7:39. The gift was permanent, and, as at Pentecost and with the Samaritans, was often accompanied by the granting of charismata. It seems especially to fit disciples to be witnesses of Jesus, and to enable them to preach with courage and confidence, cf. 4:33 and 5:32.

• The Holy Eucharist—St Luke uses the term 'the Breaking of Bread' for a rite which the disciples practised from the first. A comparison with Lk 22:19 and 1 Cor 10:16 shows that the reference is to the Holy Eucharist, and the action which symbolized the death of Christ, cf. comm. on 2:42 and 46. St Paul celebrates the Breaking of Bread, on the Sunday, at Troas, 20:7, 11, and perhaps too, on board ship, 27:35. There may also be a reference to the Holy Eucharist in 1:4.

• Holy Order—The laying on of hands is used not only to give the Holy Spirit, but also to confer authority and spiritual powers, within the Church, in the case of the Seven Deacons, and Paul and Barnabas, 6:1-6; 13:3; cf. comm. in loc.

In 11:30 St Luke mentions 'presbyters' in the church at Jerusalem. They collect alms for the poor, and so have a ministry similar to that of the deacons, but higher, as their title and their place immediately after the Apostles suggest. They are found joined with the Apostles at the Council of Jerusalem, 15:4; 16:4, and later, 21:18. They evidently form a sort of college, presided over by St James. St Paul also establishes presbyters in the communities he founds, 14:22. In his farewell to those at Ephesus, he calls them 'bishops' and says they have been appointed by the Holy Spirit, to feed the church of God, to act as unselfish shepherds, and as teachers, 20:28-35. There are also 'prophets' and 'doctors', such as we find in St Paul's epistles, possessing charismatic gifts. Their presence in the church at Antioch, shows the approval of the Holy Spirit, as it had done at Jerusalem, 11:27; 13:1. cf. also § 659.

• Liturgy and Prayer—The Breaking of Bread is surrounded by prayer, the beginnings of the Mass, whilst the rites of ordination, 6:6; 13:2-3; 14:22, and confirmation, 8:15, are already part of a liturgy. For long too, the Apostles join in the temple liturgy, 2:46; 3:1, and so does St Paul, 21:26; 22:17, and in prayer in synagogues as well, 16:13-16. Although our Lord had announced the ruin of the temple, it was also the house of his Father. Only gradually was it realized that new wine could not be put into old bottles. The establishment of the church in such places as Antioch, meant that the splendour of the temple could not longer eclipse the Christian assembly for the Breaking of Bread, prayer and praise held in private houses. Even then much of the Jewish liturgy was taken over, and with it the custom of praying at the Third, Sixth and Ninth hour, and at the hour of the evening sacrifice.

• As in his gospel, St Luke is constantly drawing attention to prayer. Our Lord had prayed before the Holy Spirit descended on him, Lk 3:21, and the disciples do the same before the Descent at Pentecost. Prayer and the inspiration of the Holy Spirit go hand-in-hand, 4:31. Cornelius, 'always praying to God', receives the grace of being the first-fruits of the Gentiles; and St Peter is praying when he has the vision which compels him to take his momentous step, 10:9. St Luke gives us the first recorded prayer of the community, that preceding the election of St Matthias, and one of thanksgiving after the release of St Peter and St John, 4:24-30. The Church prays 'without ceasing' for St Peter imprisoned by Herod and is answered by his miraculous escape. St Peter and St Paul pray before working miracles, 9:40; 28:8. In the gaol of Philippi at midnight, after their scourging, St Paul and Silas praise God, 'and all they that were in prison heard them', 16:25. St Paul exhorts the presbyters at Ephesus, in their care for others, not to neglect their own souls, and then he prays with them, 20:28, 36, as he does with the Christians of Tyre, 21:5. Common prayer is the sign of union. During the great storm, St Paul's prayer saves all those on the ship, and for the welcome accorded to him by the Church at Rome St Paul gives thanks to God, 28:15.

• Angels—In the Gospel of the Holy Spirit we are not allowed to forget the spirits that surround God's throne. How often an 'angel of the Lord' or 'of God' guides and protects. Two are present after the Ascension. Twice St Peter is rescued from prison by an angel. Philip is sent to the Ethiopian by one, and another sends Cornelius to St Peter. An angel assures St Paul that all on his ship will escape with their lives. When they appear it is in white apparel and shining, so that the face of St Stephen in the presence of the Sanhedrin looks as if it were the face of an angel. The Jewish doctrine about angels, denied only by the Sadducees, 23:8-9, continues in the Church. This is true as well of guardian angels, who appear in the OT, and who were thought to be able to take on the likeness and the voice of their charges. All this is confirmed in the reference to St Peter's guardian angel, 12:15.

The Text—This has come down to us in two forms, 821a

(1) The 'Alexandrian' Text, that of the great uncial MSS, B, Sin. A. (2) The 'Western' Text, represented chiefly by D. This latter has many additions, often of vivid details, cf. note on 19:9. A number of these additions are found very early, attested even by the papyri. Hence the theory was put forward by F. Blass in 1895 that St Luke brought out two editions of his work, one in Rome, the 'Western' Text, and a more concise revision for Theophilus. This theory has not won acceptance. A minute examination of each of the divergent passages seems to show that the great majority of the changes in the Western Text are made in the interests of clarity or piety. It is a corrected text. The classical example of this occurs in the Apostolic Decree, 15:20, 29; 21:25. The Western Text reduces the four prohibitions to three, 'to abstain from meat sacrificed to idols, from blood, and from fornication' and adds the golden rule. Thus prohibitions, chiefly concerned with ritual matters in particular circumstances, have become a moral code of universal application, forbidding, as some of these MSS have it, 'idolatry, homicide and fornication'. The most recent research seems to show that the 'Alexandrian' text has also been corrected, but rather in the interests of accuracy, and the papyri on the whole favour it. It is a safe text, one to be followed for practical purposes, and on it Vg and DV are based, cf. Lagrange, Critique Textuelle, II. La Critique Rationnelle, Livre II, Les Actes des Apôtres, 387-463, for an exhaustive discussion; cf. also §§ 581-3.

• Chronology—[The reader should take note that Fr b Dessain's system of chronology in Ac differs at certain points from the views taken elsewhere by other contributors. Chronological indications should therefore be checked against the Chart in §§ 674-6, and also with other articles such as the commentaries on St Luke's Gospel and on Galatians.—Gen. Ed.]

• The Title—though probably not due to St Luke, is very early, being found in St Irenaeus and the Muratorian Canon. Its best attested form is 'Acts of Apostles' (Sin, B and D), which well describes this history of some of the acts of some of the Apostles.

I-XII The Preaching of the Gospel in Palestine and 822a Syria, St Peter (A.D. 30-44).

I 1-26 Introductory—1-5 The Prologue—1. St Luke begins by linking up Ac with his Gospel. In Lk 1:1 he had already presented his credentials, which make it unnecessary to repeat them. 'The first treatise', i.e. the Gospel. The use of 'first' rather than 'former' does not, in the Greek, imply that St Luke planned a third volume, cf. § 815b. The story, only sketched in the Gospel, of the events between the Resurrection and the 822a Ascension, is now filled in, and the impression left by Lk 24:50 ff., that the one followed immediately on the other, is removed, cf. v 3. There is still no reference to the appearances in Galilee, but these did not concern St Luke's theme, the spread of the Church from Jerusalem. For Theophilus see Lk 1:3. 2. Jesus, guided by the Holy Spirit, gave the Apostles their last great commandments, especially that to preach to all nations. It was important to emphasize the part played by the Holy Spirit in this order. St Luke refers elsewhere to our Lord's guidance by the Spirit, Lk 3:22; 4:1, 14, 18. 3. Ac begins and ends with the preaching of the Kingdom of God, cf. 28:23 and 31, and the Kingdom is always that on earth, the Church, even, as the context shows, in 14:21. 4. 'Eating together' is the translation of all ancient versions and commentators, including Chrysostom in five separate places. This is a rare sense of the Greek word, and the weak but more common sense of 'gathering' is sometimes preferred. The meal in common was a further proof of the Resurrection, a sign of the union of Jesus and his Apostles, and may even have included the Eucharist. They were to await in the Holy City the Promise of the Father, as in Lk 24:49, the Holy Spirit, promised in the OT, and also by our Lord, Jn 14:16; 16:7. 5. The distinction between the baptism of John and that of the Holy Spirit was made in Lk 3:16. The outpouring of the Holy Spirit is called a 'baptism', or cleansing, as in Jl 2:28 and Is 44:3, but the sacrament of Baptism is not meant. This we may presume, with St Augustine and St Chrysostom, the Apostles had already received. Leaving aside the case of Cornelius, Christian baptism always preceded the baptism with the Spirit, as is clearly asserted in 2:38.

b 6-12 The Ascension—6. The Apostles, 'who had come together', i.e. for the meal, or perhaps, 'who had come with him', i.e. on the road to Bethany, asked. Their question shows that they still hoped for the immediate reign of the Messias, with themselves as his ministers, cf. Lk 19:11. They connected the outpouring of the Holy Spirit not merely with Messianic times, but with the Second Coming, and the Final Kingdom. They are reminded that this will only be set up when the whole world has been preached to, cf. Mt 24:14. 'Lord' is a divine title; cf. note on 2:36. 7. Only the Father knows the times, 'which he hath fixed by his own authority', cf. Mk 13:32. 8. 'But you shall receive power, when the Holy Spirit shall come upon you'; 'power' has no article, and is followed by a genitive absolute. Though the timing of God's plan is not revealed, the Apostles will receive the strength their mission requires, and are told its extension. Unlike that in Mt 10:5, it is to the whole world, as in Lk 24:47, cf. Mt 28:19, Mk 16:15. Ac will describe the first fulfilment of this programme, in the power of the Spirit. 9. The Ascension is described elsewhere only in Mk 16:19 and Lk 24:51; cf. Art. by P. Benoit in RB (1949) 161 ff. Christ seated on the right hand of God was realized to be so close still, through his Spirit, that the Ascension was not greatly emphasized. The cloud is the veil that hides God in the OT, and also at our Lord's baptism and transfiguration. 10. The Apostles 'strained their eyes towards heaven', KNT. 11. The angels bring the Apostles back to earth, and console them in their disappointment at our Lord's answer as to the Second Coming. He will come again in the clouds, cf. Mt 26:64. This was not a promise that the Apostles would witness the Second Coming, and when they began to die, none thought the promise vain. 12. This verse can be reconciled with Lk 24:50 if we suppose that our Lord led the Apostles along the road to Bethany, as far as Mount Olivet. Six furlongs was a Sabbath walk, the distance of the first slopes from Jerusalem.

c 13-14 The Apostles wait in Jerusalem—13. The Upper Room was more than probably the Cenacle, and the scene of the Descent of the Holy Spirit. This, the first Christian Church, seems to have been the house of St Mark's mother, cf. 12:12, and F. Prat, Jésus-Christ, II, 521. On the apostolic list see Lk 6:15. 14. This is the last mention of our Lady, and she is with the infant church. St Luke, as so often, emphasizes the part played by women, and prayer the bond of union, cf. 2:42; 20:36, etc.

15-26 The choosing of an Apostle—St Luke was greatly interested in the filling up of the apostolic college, since the only other addition was St Paul. Apostles are those marked out personally by Christ, cf. Gal 1:1, and P. Batiffol, Eglise Naissante, 52. St Luke always uses the word in this technical sense in Ac, except 14:4 and 13, where Barnabas is included; and with St Paul who seems to have spread the use of it, he prefers it to the 'disciples' of the Gospels. 15. St Peter is the leader in this important matter, the powers conferred in the Gospels already active. 16. St Peter's faith as to the inspiration of Scripture is here revealed. 18-19. These verses seem to be St Luke's own account. They interrupt the speech of St Peter, who would hardly have described the event so realistically, nor referred to the language of the inhabitants of Jerusalem as 'their tongue'. St Irenaeus omits them, Adv. Haer., III, xii, 1. Presumably the rope broke, or the branch to which it was tied, and Judas fell forward, cf. Mt 27:5-8. There the name of the field is derived from its price, that of the blood of our Lord. St Luke seems to derive it from the blood of Judas. Perhaps both etymologies were current. 20. Ps 68:26 referred to the enemies of David, the type of the Messias. 'His office let another take', Ps 108:8, formed part of David's curse of Doeg, the prototype of Judas. 21-22. An apostle is a witness, cf. § 819c and 1:8; 10:37-43; 1 Cor 9:1; 15:7-8. 23. Nothing certain is known of Joseph or Matthias. 24. The first recorded prayer of the community is addressed to Jesus, for 'Lord' must refer to him, as in 21. He had chosen the Twelve, and must complete the number. He 'knew what was in man', Jn 2:25. 25. 'His own place', the place he had chosen for himself. The Aramaic phrase of which this seems to be a translation is simply a euphemism for 'he died'. 26. Christ must choose the new Apostle, especially as his Spirit had not yet come, to give St Peter full authority. Recourse was had to lots, in the OT, and for filling the temple offices. There is no mention of imposing hands on Matthias.

II 1-42 The Day of Pentecost—1-4 The Descent of the Holy Spirit—1. 'When the day of Pentecost arrived'. Originally a thanksgiving for the harvest, Pentecost later celebrated also the giving of the Law on Sinai; cf. § 1134. If the Crucifixion was on 14th Nisan, Pentecost fell on a Sunday, the traditional day, and, if in A.D. 30, on May 28th. The scene and actors are the same as in 1:13-15, and their unity is again emphasized. 2. The coming of the Holy Spirit was made known, first by sound, the wind that could be heard in the City, v 6. The wind was a symbol of the Holy Spirit, cf. Jn 3:8, who would soon disperse the little community to the whole world. 3. The second sign was for sight, tongues of fire. 'And there appeared to them tongues, as it were of fire, which parted and rested on each one of them'. 'Observe how it is always "as it were"', and rightly: that you may have no gross sensible notions of the Spirit'. Chrys., Hom. in Act. 4 PG 60, 40. Fire symbolized the power and presence of God, Ex 3:2; Mal 3:2-3. Cf. the prophecy that our Lord would baptize with the Holy Spirit and fire, 1:5; Lk 3:16 and 12:49-50. The tongues were first united, a sign of unity, and then parted, so that there was one over each person present, to show that they were to preach to all the 'nations dispersed', for this was what the tongues symbolized, as the next verse shows. 4. All were filled with the Holy Spirit, although the Apostles had already received him, Jn 20:22. 'And they began to speak in other languages, according as the Spirit gave them utterance'. Their word was to reach all nations who would understand each in his own tongue. A new spiritual language was to be spoken to the whole world. The Spirit has now been given, Jn 7:39, as the rest of Acts exemplifies. All receive the Spirit, and all must share in the apostolic 823b work. The Holy Spirit brings the Church to life and begins to form the members of a new universal kingdom. The Apostles especially are inspired. St Peter can now preach boldly and interpret prophecy. The external gifts of the Spirit are designed to manifest his internal mission. The Spirit of the adoption of sons is poured out in abundance. Many of the Fathers go further than this and see in Pentecost the first giving of the divine adoption and indwelling. Thus they make a distinction between the grace of the OT, and the giving of the Spirit there only foretold, Is 32:15; Jer 31:33; Ez 11:19; 36:26; Zach 12:10; Jl 2:28; cf. G. Philips, La Grâce des Justes de l'Ancien Testament, ETL 23 (1947) 521 ff. There is a parallel too between Sinai and the Upper Room, cf. Ex 20:18. On the feast of the Law, a new Law is given, but for all nations.

e 5-13 The Miracle of Pentecost—5. Many Jews from the Dispersion must have been in Jerusalem for the feast, though the text seems to suggest that those present were permanent dwellers there, e.g. for study, like St Paul, but who had been born abroad. Yet these too would be bilingual. Cf. R. A. Knox, Epistles and Gospels, 151. 6. 'And at this sound the multitude came together, and they were bewildered, because each one heard them speaking in his own language'. The sound of the wind drew the crowds towards the Upper Room. All would have understood Greek sufficiently, but the miracle taught that the preaching was to go to the Gentiles, 'to every nation under heaven'. 7-8. As the disciples moved into the street and, no doubt, towards the temple to give thanks, the different national groups each heard one who spoke their language. The miracle was one of speaking, not of hearing. 9-10. The list goes roughly from east to west. 11. 'Both Jews and proselytes' perhaps qualifies only the visitors from Rome, but the presence of proselytes further stresses universality. The Fathers draw the parallel between Babel, when God, because of their spirit of pride, dispersed men by confusing their tongues, and Pentecost when the Spirit of God brought all to unity again, in the Church. Chrys. ibid. St Aug. in Ps. 50, PL 36, 636. 12-13. To those who could only understand one or two of the languages the scene must have resembled that in 1 Cor 14:23, except that the ordinary gift of tongues could be understood by none of the audience. Gk 'sweet wine'. It was too early for the new.

824a 14-36 St Peter's Speech—The change in the disciple who had denied his Master constitutes psychological evidence of the Resurrection. Still more, in the clear explanations St Peter gives of his faith, here and subsequently, we see the Holy Spirit working in the way our Lord had promised during his last discourse, e.g. Jn 14:26; 16:7-14. St Luke explains, v 40, that he has only given a summary of this tactful speech, which begins with an apologia for the disciples, and then shows, chiefly because of his Resurrection, that Jesus is the Messiah.

b 14-21 The Miracle Explained—14. On the leadership of St Peter, see § 819d, e. The solemn exordium reveals his new confidence. 15. The day was divided from daybreak into twelve hours, making the third about 9 a.m. 16. Jl 2:28-32, quoted from LXX, has been fulfilled. This described the outpouring of the Spirit which was to herald the establishment of the kingdom of the Messias. v 22 ff. will prove that the Messias has come. 17. To interpret the prophecy, St Peter adds 'in the last days', i.e. the last age, Messianic times, cf. Is 2:2. 'All flesh' will receive the Spirit, and no longer only prophets. Old and young, all mankind is to be saved, cf. 21. 19-20. Cf. art. on the Second Coming, § 671q. 21. The Lord in Jl is Yahweh, but St Peter seems to refer to our Lord, whose kingdom must be entered by those to be saved.

c 22-24 Although he died, Jesus rose again, and is therefore the Messias—22. St Luke faithfully reproduces the archaic guarded phrases, so necessary if these fiercely monotheistic Jews were to be led to the truth, but so unlike Mt 16:16, and so unnecessary in A.D. 63. 23. St Peter removes the difficulty that had once been his, Mt 16:21-22, how one crucified could be the Messias. All was by God's plan and foreknowledge, so too St Paul, 13:27-29. Jesus, submitting to the will of his Father was delivered up by him, cf. Rom 8:32. Jews killed our Lord, 'wicked men', Gentiles were only instruments. 24. Gk, 'The Sorrows [Heb. 'Bonds'] of death, because it was not possible for it [death] to hold him'. 25-31 A Scripture Proof of the Resurrection—This is based on Ps 15(16):8-11. David spoke, in view of the Messias, words which were only fulfilled in his case, and not in David's. So too St Paul, 13:36. Jews set great store by such proofs. 25. 'I saw the Lord always before me', at my right, as my defender. 26. The joy is because his body will live on. 27. Hell or Hades, not in the modern sense, but Sheol the abode of the dead, is a synonym for death, 'the place of death', cf. 1 Pet 3:19. 28. The speaker will see God. 29. The triumphant conclusion: the psalm cannot apply to David, whose tomb is mentioned by Josephus, and was known to St Jerome. 30. Yet David was a prophet, and knew that one of his descendants would be Messias, Ps 102(103):2. 31. So it must apply to the Resurrection, which he foresaw. The Jews interpreted Ps 15 of the Messias, not David, Ez 34:23; 37:24. For explanation of the prophecy see E. F. Sutcliffe, The OT and the Future Life (1946) 79. 32-36 The Apostles' Witness to the Resurrection: Conclusion—32. Fifty days afterwards, St Peter can proclaim without fear of contradiction, that our Lord rose, and that his tomb was empty, cf. note on 1:22. 33. After his Ascension, Christ does what was attributed to God in 17, and sends the Promise, see note on 1:4. Thus the Spirit is on earth, because Christ is in heaven, Jn 16:7. 34-35. One more psalm, 109:1, in which David speaks either of himself or the Messias, shows that Jesus is the Messias. St Peter learned this from our Lord, Mt 22:43, as also his other applications of psalms, Lk 24:44. Jesus receives the divine name 'Lord', and 'sit on my right' means 'have the same power as I'. 36. The texts converge to the final 'Jesus is Lord, (Kyrios), and Messias'. The two words are roughly synonymous here. Jesus is the Messianic King, he exercises the sovereign powers of God, following his exaltation (v 33). See L. Cerfaux, Le Titre Kyrios. RSPT 12 (1923) 137-8, where the purely Jewish and OT origin of the title is proved. On how the Resurrection manifested our Lord's sovereignty, and allowed his divine power to shine out, see M. de la Taille, Mysterium Fidei, 171 and 286.
